Dash it to earth, or dissipate in air!
Stay, hapless youth! restrain—abhor the draught,
With pangs, with racks, with deep repentance fraught!

Oh, hold! the cup with woe ETERNAL flows,
More—more than death the poisonous juice bestows!

In vain!—he drinks, and now the searching fires,
Rush through his veins, and writhing he expires!
No sorrowing friend, no sister, parent, nigh,
To sooth his pangs, or catch his parting sigh;
Alone, unknown, the muse's darling dies,
And with the vulgar dead unnoted lies!
Bright star of genius!—torn from life and fame,
My tears, my verse, shall consecrate thy name!

ELEGY,

TO THE MEMORY OF MR. THOMAS CHATTERTON
LATE OF BRISTOL.

How shall my pen make known the sad event,
How tell the loss, O earth, by thee sustain'd;
In what expressions give the tidings vent,
Of which the thought, my soul, so oft has pain'd?
Why wilt thou, torturing reflection, mad
Each fond idea of the blessings past;
Blessings which only to the anguish add;
O, did their pleasing efficacy last!

Cc

Think of his tender op'ning unledg'd years,
 Brought to a final crisis ere mature:
 As fate had grudg'd the wonders nature rears,
 Bright genius in oblivion to immerse.

Weep, nature, weep, the mighty loss bewail,
 The wonder of our drooping life is dead;
 O, could but tears or plaintive sighs avail,
 By night and day would I bedew my bed.

O, give his mem'ry reverential due,
 His worth a tributary tear demands:
 Still hold his many virtues in your view,
 Then must a free-will offering 'scape your hands.

Had but his tender budding genius thriv'd,
 Still blooming on, spite of the frosty blast;
 Till ripen'd into manhood still surviv'd,
 The fruits full ripe—how rich the sweet repast!

Ere vital utterance could scarce transpire,
 His infant lips evinc'd a manly soul!
 Predicting that heroic mental fire,
 Which reign'd supreme within the mighty whole.

Friendship cemented by the slightest ties,
 Full hardly brooks the intervening cause
 That separates the friend we lightly prize,
 Bursting the bonds of friendship's sacred laws.

Then how can I but feel the dire effect,
 Where infancy began the social tie,
 Which still increas'd, void of the least defect,
 As each revolving year did multiply.

Though great the loss to me—Heav'n knows how great!
 Were it but individually known,
 I would not vainly thus repine at fate,
 But providential justice ever own.

O, that's not all—my country feels the stroke,
 The public good was ever in his view,
 His pen his lofty sentiments bespoke,
 Nor fear'd he virtuous freedom to pursue.

Yes, Liberty! thy fair, thy upright cause,
 He dar'd defend, spite of despotic force,
 To crush his much-lov'd country's wholesome laws,
 Its noble constitution's only source.

Ye muses, leave your florid airy smiles,
 And thou, mercurial Euphrosyne,
 Forget thy wanton cranks and am'rous wiles,
 To sympathize with sad Melpomene.

Your pride is fallen—your chief, your great support,
 Lies mould'ring to his own primæval dust:
 To you, while living, ever was his court,
 Dead, in return, let not his mem'ry rust.

What ease within his sweet'ned numbers flow'd,
 What symmetry each well-penn'd line evinc'd;
 Such just connection on each verse bestow'd
 Ev'n envy, of his worth, must stand convinc'd.

His lofty numbers how sublimely great!
 Lifting the ravish'd sense to heights supreme,
 Again with fancy painted woes elate,
 He shows the passions of the tragic theme.

Sharp visag'd satire own'd him as her lord,
 Exclusive of her hand-maid in her train,
 Ill-nature, curst attendant of the board
 Of those who stigmatic mankind for gain.

Not so with him—he paints each reigning vice
 In strongest colours of their genuine hue!
 Sweet'ning the bitter draught with fav'ry spice,
 The moral picture relishing the view.

O, could my pen but catch his livid fire,
 Hear thou my invocation, mighty dead!
 My infant muse with life mature inspire,
 Thy shade may dictate, though the substance's fled.

Antiquity, bewail his cruel fate,
 He paid thy hoary head the rev'rence due;
 Thy valu'd acts reviving out of date,
 Recalling ages past to present view.

To truths long dead, he gave a second birth,
 Rescuing from oblivion occult stores:
 Treasures within the bowels of the earth,
 Unheeded by the vulgar mind—explodes.

Most strange! ideas of so vast extent
 Could e'er within his tender mind reside,
 No art or science but some influence lent,
 His intellectual parts to make more wide.

Why, fancy, wilt thou paint him to my eyes,
 Why form the fond idea in my mind;
 O, couldst thou but some plastic means devise,
 The substance with the shadow ill to find.

If it be considered, that the above verse was written

Expand that cloud still broader, wond'rous Dean!
In pity to thy poor Britannia's fate;
Spread it her past and present state between,
Hide from her memory that she'er was great,
That e'er her trident aw'd the subject sea,
Or e'er bid Gallia bow the proud reluctant knee.

XVIII.

Tell her, for thou hast more than Mulgrave's wit,
That France has long her naval strength furpast,
That Sandwich and Germaine alone are fit
To shield her from the desolating blast;
And prove the fact, as Rowley's being, clear,
That loans on loans and loans her empty purse will bear.

XIX.

Bid all her lords, obsequious to command,
As lords that best best a land like this,
Take valiant Viscount Sackville by the hand,
Bid bishops greet him with a holy kiss,
For forming plans to quell the rebel tribe,
Whose execution foil'd all bravery, and all bribe.

XX.

Teach her, two British armies both subdued,
That still the free American will yield;
Like Macbeth's witch †, bid her "spill much
" more blood,"
And stain with brethren's gore the flooded field;

* The reverend Editor proves, in his manner, in that numberless passages, in The Battle of Hastings, are not only borrowed from the original Greek of Homer, but also greatly improved. In the same way he has,
with peculiar sagacity, found out, "that the grave
Milton, in his PENSEROSO, amused himself by reflecting on the buskin'd tale of Chaucer in these lines:

"Or call up him that left half-told
"The story of Cambuscan bold."

Just as Rowley had reflected on him before for not finishing his stories. See note on the Epistle to Masire Canyng. O ye venerable society of antiquarians, whatever ye in your wisdom shall think fit to do with the rest of your president's notes, inscribe this, I beseech you, in letters of gold over your new chimney-piece at Somerset-House.

† This was left unnoted in the first edition, in order that it might prove a crust to the critics: and, if the author is well-informed, some of them have mumbled it.
They say, and they say truly, that there is no such expression in the play of Shakespeare. But, in the representation of that play, where D'Avenant's alterations are admitted, for the sake of some very fine old music, which Locke originally set to them, the following chorus over the caldron is well known by the frequenters of the theatre.

"He must, he shall, he will spill much more blood,
"And become worse, to make his title good."

Now the author has cautiously not called the witch, who sings this, Shakespeare's witch, but "Macbeth's witch;" and therefore the quotation is pertinent, though D'Avenant, and not Shakespeare, put the words into her mouth.

Nor sheath the sword, till o'er one little isle
In snug domestic pomp her king shall reign and smile.

XXI.

So from a dean'ry " rising in thy trade,
And puff'd with lawn by byshoppe-millanere 1,
Ev'n glommed 2 York, of thy amede 3 afraid,
At Lollard's Tower 4 with spyryng 5 eye shall peer,
Where thou, like Ælla's spryte, shalt glare on high,
The triple crown to feize, if old Cornwallis die *.

STANZA XXI. I Byshoppe-millanere.—The word is formed from horse-millanere, and means the robe-maker, or sempstrefs, of the lords spiritual. 2 Sullen, cloudy, or dejected. 3 Reward, or preferment. 4 The highest tower in the palace of Lambeth. 5 Aspiring, or ambitious.

POSTSCRIPT.

I have lately conceived, that, as Dryden, Pope,
&c. employed their great talents in translating

* All readers of true classical taste, will, I trust, applaud this concluding stanza, which returns to the style in which the epistle began, in judicious subserviency to the rule of Horace :

— Servetur ad inum
Qualis ab incepto processeris, & sibi constet.

Virgil, Homer, &c. it would be a very commendable employment for the poets of the present age, to treat some of the better sort of their predecessors, such as Shakspeare and Milton, in a similar manner, by putting them into archaeological language. This, however, I would not call translation, but transmutation, for a very obvious reason. It is, I believe, a settled point among the critics, with Dr.
Johnson at their head, that the greatest fault of Milton (exclusive of his political tenets), is, that he writ in blank verse. See then and admire how easily this might be remedied.

PARADISE LOST, BOOK I.

Offe mannes fyrste bykrous volunde wolle I singe,
And offe the fruiete offe yatte caltyfnyd tre,
Whose lethal taste into thys worlde dydde bryng
Both morthe and tene to all posteritie.

How very near also (in point of dramatic excellence) would Shakspeare come to the author of Ælla, if some of his best pieces were thus transmuted! As for instance the soliloquy of Hamlet,
" To be, or not to be."

To blynye or not to blynye, the denwere is ;
Gif it be bette wythin the spryte to beare
The bawfyn flocs and tackels of dyfresse,
Orr by forloynnyng amenufe them clere.

Blest in each talent, with each gift endow'd,
That lifts the poet from the vulgar crowd;
Superior genius, nature's noblest prize,
The splendid polish, learning's toil supplies;
The vigorous fancy, and the ardent mind,
The judgment solid, and the taste refin'd;
Blest in the feelings, warm with young desire,
Each passion glowing, and each wish on fire;
Blest in the raptures, full of heavenly flame,
Inspiring visions of eternal fame!
With virtues, graces, sciences, adorn'd,
I saw my GRÆME in early youth inurn'd!
His keen eye faded, and extinct the flame
That rapt his wishes in the trance of fame!
Sprinkling the green sod with memorial yews,
I wept—and with me wept each gentle muse!

 SECRETARY OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS
 PHILADELPHIA, PA.

THE LIFE OF GRÆME.

THE poet, whose life the present writer is about to delineate, has a double claim to a place among the poets of our nation, to whose story the public attention has been called by the collection of their works, from genius and from friendship. He was brought up with him from his infancy, and thinks it a duty incumbent on his friendship for him, to be the faithful executor of his fame, and to collect, among others, the incidents of his life, in order that his merits may be known, and his example may be followed. But in making this attempt to state his pretensions, and to estimate his worth, he feels and avows so much affection for the man, that he distrusts his judgment of the poet.

His short life, past in obscurity, and in the silent acquisition of knowledge, has scarce any objects for description to embellish, or events, to which narrative could give importance. If the detail of trivial particulars appear to be little deserving of transmission to posterity, it will be allowed as an excuse for the culpable minuteness of the writer, that the subject of his narrative was the friend of his youth, and the companion of his studies; and, if his opinion, in any instance, appear to be less the result of just judgment than of partial friendship, his feelings may claim some indulgence, though his sentiments do not correspond with those of the reader, who, with less friendship for the poet, than he avows, may possess, in a juster proportion, that peculiar combination of sensibility and judgment, upon which the delicacy of critical discernment depends.

JAMES GRÆME was born at Carnwath, in Lanarkshire, Dec. 15. 1749. He was descended of a reputable family, of the middling class of farmers, that had resided on the estate of Carnwath, ever since it came into the possession of the family of Lockhart, without producing a single example of literary ambition. His father, William Græme, (or Graham), occupied a small farm in the village of Carnwath, and afterwards rented the farm of Spittal, adjacent to that village, on the river Medwan, about half a mile above its junction with the Clyde. The occupation of his ancestors was his principal inheritance, his wealth consisting chiefly in his industry, for which, and his integrity, he was distinguished among his neighbours. His mother, Anne Harvey, was of a family of the same rank, belonging to Lasswade, in the county of Mid-Lothian, and remarkable for nothing, but her exemplary prudence and frugality. They had six children, of whom the poet was the youngest. Of these six, two died before him; William, June 9. 1767, and Euphemia, Feb. 24. 1769, who was married to Thomas Dimmock, a farmer at Bank-Mains, near Carnwath, and left a son, James, now a student of divinity in the University of Edinburgh, a young man of an amiable character, and promising abilities; and three survive, George, the eldest, a farmer at Dolphington, a man of strong parts, and distinguished for his agricultural knowledge as a farmer, and his integrity as a neighbour; Robert, a farmer in Carnwath, a worthy and respectable man; and Anne, his favourite sister, married to Thomas Smith, a farmer in Quothquan, in the parish of Liberton.

In his early childhood, he was of a delicate constitution, and in consequence of an affection commonly produced by extraordinary attention, the favourite of his parents; Providence wisely ordaining that where extraordinary attention is most wanted, parental affection should be most conspicuous.

The first years of his life did not pass without distinction. He very early discovered the most promising marks of lively parts and an active mind, and was much taken notice of for his inclination to letters and his thirst for pre-eminence in the sports and pastimes adapted to his age.

While he was a child, he was initiated in the alphabet by an old woman who kept a day-school in the village, whose discipline bore a strong resemblance to that of the "old dame," of whom Shenstone learned to read, and whom his poem of "the Schoolmistress" has delivered to posterity.

As he grew older, he went to the parish school of Carnwath, which was then taught by Mr. Hugh Smith, a man of such amplitude of learning, and such copiousness of intelligence, that it would be difficult to name any branch of literature or science with which he was unacquainted.

Under the tuition of this man, the present writer was at the same time initiated in grammar; and in his company he has since enjoyed many cheerful and instructive hours. He hoped to have gratified him with this account of his pupil, but he is disappointed by the stroke of death. Mr. Smith died April 17, 1794, in the 73d year of his age, leaving an example of active curiosity, persevering ambition, engaging politeness, and unaffected piety, worthy of imitation.

In those branches of education, which are usually taught in remote villages, Græme soon distinguished himself by the quickness of his progress. His intellect, memory, and diligence, carried him on before the other scholars of the same standing. Mr. Smith seeing his eagerness, and knowing his talents, allowed him to press forward, without waiting the tardy progress of slower boys.

The uncommon proficiency which he made in the learning taught at the school of the village, soon obtained him the reputation of a boy of excellent parts; which, as it commonly happens, prompted him to aspire above the vulgar occupations of the neighbourhood, and to despise every pursuit unconnected with the attainment of a polite and liberal education.

Misplaced and dangerous as this kind of ambition might seem in a boy of his station, it occasioned no anxiety in his parents. Being accustomed, from his infancy, to regard the capacity of their son with partiality, and flattered with the credit he might do the family by his learning, they resolved to dispense with his services in the business of the farm, for which he promised to be unequal, and to educate him for the church.

The want of patronage, and other obstacles equally obvious and intimidating, did not shake their resolution. Examples of success in similar circumstances, were within the reach of their observation. These examples, while they provoked their competition, served also to justify their choice, the singularity of which, indeed, was much less remarkable than the temerity; the clerical profession being an object of common and moderate ambition in North Britain, where the parity of rank and slender emoluments of the clergy offer no temptation to the families of the rich, and the attainment of a liberal education, is within the reach of persons of inferior rank.

He was initiated in the rudiments of the Latin language by Mr. Smith, whom he always praised for his attention and his skill.

Meantime, the knowledge and experience of Mr. Smith in agriculture and rural economy, particularly the culture and management of flax, procured him an appointment under the Honourable Board of Trustees for Fisheries, Manufactures, and Improvements, more suitable to the activity of his mind, than the employment of a schoolmaster; and Græme found his opportunities of improvement disproportionate to his docility; the qualifications of the assistant master being mean, and inadequate to the duties of his station.

Disgusted at the unskilfulness of his teacher, and impatient of the restraint imposed upon his literary progress, he left the school of Carnwath, and repaired to a more reputable seminary, in the village of Liberton, taught by Mr. John Brown, a teacher of classical knowledge superior to what is commonly found in remote country villages; and a worthy and intelligent man.

To this school, which was distant two miles from his father's dwelling, he walked every morning, carrying his daily provisions along with him.

He continued in this course of study two years, in which time he acquired a taste for general reading; was particularly solicitous to borrow books of history, poetry, and divinity, and was laying in stores of information, and improving both his imagination and his judgment.

In 1763, when he was fourteen years old, he was sent to the grammar school of the neighbouring town of Lanark, then taught by Mr. Robert Thomson, brother-in-law to the "poet of the Seasons," a man whose eminent worth, uncommon knowledge in classical learning, indefatigable diligence, and strictness of discipline, without severity, placed him in the first rank among the instructors of youth in North Britain. This worthy and respectable man died in 1789.

Græme had very early obtained distinction in the pastimes adapted to his age, as well as in his classical studies. In a crowded school, collected from different parts of Great Britain and the West Indies, he now felt more strongly his own deficiencies, yet he did not shrink from a competition with the elder boys, in which there was a danger of experiencing the mortification of being inferior; but on every occasion, displayed a vigour of understanding, a quickness of penetration, a boldness of imagination, and a spirit of enterprise, far superior to the talents of his companions.

His proficiency in classical learning was so remarkable, that it excited the emulation of the elder boys, of forward and active, but of superficial talents.

His Latin versions, in particular, were the admiration and boast of Mr. Thomson, who had the penetration to discover, in the fallies of youthful fancy, marks of uncommon genius; and whose discernment construed those eccentricities of imagination, which received his correction, into a praise of literary eminence.

Before he left Liberton, he gave evident signs of a propensity to the study of poetry; but his taste for elegant composition first appeared in his exercises at Lanark; and his first attempts in metrical composition are of no earlier date.

Though the discipline of the Lanark school, like that of the other schools in North Britain, did not require him to perform exercises in Latin verse, yet he attempted this mode of composition, as soon as he was sufficiently master of the ancient prosody, and continued from time to time to write Latin verses, which he found of the greatest advantage, in giving him a ready command of Latin phraseology.

He soon acquired a facility in the composition of Latin poetry; and the following fragment of a Saphic Ode, describing the occupations and pastimes of the scholars in the hours allotted for play, Descriptio Scholæ Lanarcensis, must be allowed to be a very correct and manly performance for a boy of fifteen.

Pueri agrestes irridendum pecus
Pannis obstiti, circa focum premunt
Nugas narrantes, cæteros sed fugant
Rixæ menaces.

Seorsim scamnis inimici sono
Sedunt, ætate catiores quidam
Lufumque vitant, cæteros spernentes,
Fronte obducto.

Ad generosum scribit hic amicum;
Legit ac alter celebrem poetam,
Rite scalpello refecat sed fordes
Tertius unguis.

Quidam quercetis trabibus dependunt,
Nominaque scalpunt Dædalea manu
Quidam, Dum alii (puerilis turma?)
Turbine ludunt.

In the public examination of the school, before the autumn vacation 1766, he pronounced a valedictory oration, in Latin, according to the custom of the school, which was much applauded by his examiners, the ministers of the presbytery of Lanark, and the magistrates of the town.

In 1767, having passed through the forms of the grammar school of Lanark, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh, where he applied himself, during the three succeeding years, to the several branches of literature and philosophy, with his usual assiduity and success.

He was accompanied to Edinburgh, as he had been to Liberton and Lanark, by the present writer, who encouraged his propensity to literature and to poetry, by an emulous and amicable participation of study, and the most unreserved and familiar communication of sentiments upon every subject. The habitudes of intimacy, begun from the cradle, were strengthened by daily intercourse, and improved by a similarity of taste and of pursuits, into a friendship that constituted the chief felicity of their lives.

Soon after his coming to Edinburgh, he contracted an intimacy with Mr. John Græme, then tutor to the sons of the present Lord Chief Baron Montgomery, a young man of an amiable disposition and an elegant taste, who cultivated his favourite studies with congenial enthusiasm, and excited him to poetical composition, by his example and his applause.

This amiable and ingenious young man, endeared to the present writer, by his virtue and his genius, died of a consumption in 1783, without obtaining a provision suitable to his merit. A short time before his death, he wrote the pathetic Invocation to Health, preserved in this collection, which cannot fail of touching the heart of every one who reads it.

Among his fellow collegians, he lived in habits of the most familiar intercourse with Dr. John Griève, now a physician in London, whose well-known ingenuity, and long-tried friendship, it is a pleasure to the present writer to recollect; and the Rev. Dr. William Gardiner, now minister of the English congregation at Dantzick, of whose classic taste, and social disposition, he cannot indulge himself in the remembrance, without anticipating the approaching time,

———When Eurus, to his native bourne,
Shall waft him o'er the Scandinavian wave.

In the prelections of the professors, and in the conversation of his companions, his talents found ample scope and encouragement. Accustomed to excel, his desire of excellence found greater excitement; and his industry was equal to his emulation, which prompted him to aim at distinction in the most abstruse and difficult studies, where either a competitor or applause could be found.

His success was answerable to his assiduity. In classical learning, he surpassed the most industrious and accomplished student of his standing. He spoke and composed in Latin, with a fluency and elegance that had few examples. He even exercised himself a little in Greek composition, which is not often done in the Scottish universities.

The acuteness of his intellect enabled him to enter with facility into the abstrusest doctrines of abstract philosophy. Of mathematics, natural philosophy, and metaphysics, his knowledge was profound and masterly; particularly of the latter, to the study of which he received an early determination, from the prevalence of speculative theology among the lower ranks in North Britain.

He studied the works of Aristotle, Descartes, Malebranche, Locke, Leibnitz, Clarke, Berkeley, Baxter, Hume, Hartley, Reid, &c. with great accuracy, and exercised his ingenuity in writing little essays on Innate Ideas, the Immateriality of the soul, &c. which showed extensive knowledge of pneumatology, of logic, and of philosophy in general.

In endeavouring to qualify himself for deciding questions, which all pretend to dispute about, he often indulged his propensity to metaphysical refinement, in maintaining false principles, which, though apparently trifling, from the consequences they implied, and the mode of reasoning they authorized, subjected him, among the unlearned, to the imputation of freethinking.

But this habit of disquisition was not accompanied with a disputatious humour in conversation. Dispute he hated, and carefully avoided. He knew that it tends to contract and pervert the understanding, deprave the taste, extinguish the love of truth and of delicacy, and render the heart insensible to the pleasures of rational converse.

His thoughts, full of ardour and vivacity, would often make excursions beyond the limits of system and the narrow views of prejudice; but these excursions were made with modesty, nor was his propensity to argument ever accompanied with arrogance, being merely the wantonness of conscious talents, and the ebullition of youthful vanity, which abated and subsided as he advanced in the study of a more liberal and enlightened philosophy.

Ethics, politics, history, poetry, and criticism, afforded more humanizing subjects of inquiry, and unfolded to his view those attractive beauties, to which his mind seemed to have an innate propensity.

Recognizing, as it were the standard of excellence congenial to his taste, the writings of Epicætus, Plutarch, Antoninus, Cicero, Seneca, Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, &c. Sydney, Locke, Montesquieu, Rousseau, &c. Herodotus, Xenophon, Thucydides, Livy, Tacitus, Burnet, Robertson, &c. Homer, Pindar, Sophocles, Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, Tasso, Boileau, Moliere, Voltaire, Spenser, Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Pope, Thomson, &c. Longinus, Quintilian, Bossu, Kaims, &c., became his favourite study, and supplanted every inquisitive pursuit of a less amiable tendency.

The enchantment of metaphysical philosophy, the visions of Malebranche, and the subtleties of Hume, now lost possession of his admiring fancy. Full of admiration of the instructive and sublime writings of the moralist, the historian, the poet, and the critic, he forsook the study of an illusive and unsatisfactory philosophy, whose sophistry deceives the understanding, and whose scepticism contracts the heart.

His attention was now awake to learn what might be useful in improving his taste, enriching his sentiments, and regulating his conduct. His chief delight was to peruse the most approved delineations of virtue and of nature, and the most successful representations of life and of manners, and his highest ambition to rival the best masters in the different departments of classical and ornamental literature.

A passion for romantic fiction and fabulous history, appeared in him very early in life, which was heightened and confirmed by a diligent perusal of the old romances of Scudery, D'Urfe, Sydney, &c., and the modern novels of Cervantes, Le Sage, Marivaux, Rousseau, De Foe, Richardson, Fielding, Smollet, &c.

Of the Gothic, Celtic, and Oriental mythology, he was a warm admirer; and frequently attempted imitations of the wild and flowery fictions of the northern and eastern nations. An imitation of Offian is printed among his poems. His turn for oriental composition appeared in the solution of a philosophic question, proposed by Dr. Ferguson, as a college exercise, Whether personal qualities or external advantages are most conducive to happiness? which he chose to exemplify in the form of a tale, conceived and executed with all the fire and invention of eastern imagination.

In prosecuting his favourite studies, his passion for reading was insatiable, but too often indiscriminate; for as he had not the means of purchasing proper books, and had access to no private library, he eagerly perused such books as the kindness of his friends, the circulating libraries, or the library of the university supplied.

In the departments of philosophical, critical, and philological learning, he was chiefly indebted to the library of the university; by the statutes of which, every student who is matriculated, may take a certain number of books from the library to his own apartments, on depositing a sum equivalent to their value, in the hands of the librarian, which is returned to him when he returns the books. In borrowing expensive books, the pecuniary deposit required in the library, was sometimes wanting, a mortification which he acquiesced under with less patience than any other incident to the narrowness of his circumstances.

His literary intrepidity is humourously described in the following lines of the Student, a poem written about this time, and published in Ruddiman's "Weekly Magazine," a most useful periodical publication, in which several valuable original pieces may be found.

I read whate'er commenting Dutchmen wrote,
Turn'd o'er Stobæus, and could Suidas quote;
In letter'd Gellius trac'd the bearded sage,
Through all the windings of a wise adage;
Was the spectator of each honest scar,
Each sophist carry'd from each wordy war.
Undaunted was my heart, nor could appal
The mustiest volume of the mustiest stall;
Where'er I turn'd, the giant spiders fled,
And trembling moths retreated as I read, &c.

He declined no philological disquisition, profound or verbal; nor shrunk from the most cultivated or barren province of critical learning, or classical antiquities;

Attended heroes to the bloody fields,
Their helmets polish'd, and emboss'd their shields,
With duteous hand the decent matron drest,
And wrap'd the stripling in his manly vest,
Nor stop't I there, but mingled with the boys,
Their rattles rattled, and improv'd their toys,
Lash'd conic turbos as in gyres they flew,
Bestrode their hobbies, and their whistles blew, &c.

In 1768, he was engaged by Laurence Brown, Esq. of Edmonston, to assist the studies of his sons. Mr. Brown then resided at East-hills, in the parish of Dunsyre. In this retreat he spent his vacation; and while he promoted the literary labours of his pupils, he pursued his own, and applied himself particularly to the study of poetry.

The genuine principles of poetry were connate with his mind. They had been actuated and awakened by the study of these writings that are most impregnated with poetical enthusiasm. He had acquired a competent stock of moral and natural knowledge; and his mind was so well furnished with poetical ideas, that his imagination seemed to riot over her intellectual feast. But his poetical powers were confined to the narrow province of external description, and the walks of humour and satire. He had written Pastorals, crowded with trite sentiments and images borrowed from Theocritus and Virgil, composed a mock-heroic poem, called The Ralphiad, in three cantos, with anno-tations, in imitation of Pope's "Dunciad;" and produced a variety of shorter pieces, in Hudibrastic verse, with versions from Simonides, Theocritus, Horace, Ovid, Tibullus, Propertius, &c. But he had not attained to the noblest end of poetry, the power of addressing himself to the heart.

The passion of love was yet wanting to kindle the flame of enthusiasm, and to improve his poetical imagination; and he was hardly enough to risk the dangers attending it, though warned by his favourite Thomson, one of the poets of our country, who was nursed in the lap of nature, and caught the true inspiring breath.

And let th' aspiring youth beware of love,
Of the smooth glance beware;—the kindling grace;
Th' enticing smile; the modest-seeming eye, &c.

Spring.

In the quiet of rural solitude, of which every true poet is fond, he became acquainted with a young lady, whose beauty and accomplishments made an impression on his susceptible heart; which contributed greatly to heighten his poetical enthusiasm, and determined his choice of the species of composition he chiefly cultivated;

————— the song of woe,
The word-weigh'd elegy, of liquid lapse,
And cadence glib —————

His tender attachment to this lady, which ended but with his life, produced a variety of amatory poems, written under the character of ALEXIS, and addressed to her under the names of ELIZA and MIRA, which may be considered as the most universally interesting of his poetical compositions.

In 1769, he obtained the notice of Alexander Lockhart, Esq. then Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, afterwards a Judge of the Court of Session, by the title of Lord Covington, to whose patronage his family had some pretensions. Mr. Lockhart, whose learning and eloquence constitute an era in the history of the Scottish bar, was the grandson of Sir George Lockhart, Lord President of the Court of Session, son of George Lockhart, Esq. author of the "Memoirs of Scotland," and uncle to James Lockhart, Esq. Count of the Holy Roman Empire, the representative of the family of Lee and Carnwath, upon whose estate his father then resided.

In the latter end of that year, he was presented, on the recommendation of Mr. Lockhart, to a burfary or exhibition in the university of St. Andrew's, which he accepted; but found reason soon after to decline, upon discovering that it subjected him to repeat a course of languages and philosophy, which the extent of his acquisitions, and the ardour of his ambition, taught him to hold in no great estimation.

This step, it may be supposed, did not meet with the approbation of Mr. Lockhart, and the only advantage he derived from the exhibition, was a view of the venerable city of St. Andrew's, whose "spires, to Gothic fancy fair," amused his imagination, and an acquaintance which he contracted during his short stay, with Wilkie, Professor of Natural Philosophy in the United College, author of "the Epigoniad," whose conversation and example encouraged his propensity to the study of poetry, and confirmed him in the pursuit of poetical fame.

In 1770, he resumed his studies at Edinburgh, and having finished the usual preparatory course, was admitted into the theological class; but the state of his health, which soon after began to decline, prevented him delivering any of the exercises usually prescribed to students of divinity.

He spent the vacation in the retirement of his native village, dividing the time between poetical composition, the study of the Greek and Roman poets, and an examination of the arguments of the principal writers on the Deistical controversy, Bayle, Hobbes, Collins, Toland, Tindal, Chubb, Morgan, Bolingbroke, &c. Bentley, Butler, Coneybeare, Leland, Foster, Campbell, &c. which he studied with indefatigable application. The result of his examination was such as may be always expected in like cases, where the inquirer has candour and sense, a decided conviction of the truth of Christianity.

Polemical divinity, and Biblical criticism, occupied also his particular attention. The writings of Cadworth, Hooker, Baxter, Barrow, Tillotson, Burnet, Clarke, Hoadley, Balguy, Doddridge, Warburton, Middleton, Jortin, Gerard, &c. he studied with his usual accuracy. Of modern divines his greatest favourites were Clarke, and Jortin. Of the contracted principles and unamiable prejudices of sectaries, he had no conception. The words Presbyterian and Episcopalian, Lutheran and Calvinist he well understood; but set no value on them. The title of a Christian he thought infinitely more honourable.

In his classical and philosophical studies, he was greatly encouraged by the conversation and example of the Rev. John Christie, minister of Carnwath; a man who had from nature, vigour of intellect; from study, enlargement of knowledge; and from habit, precision of reasoning. He united solidity of judgment, nicety of criticism, and elegance of taste, with friendliness of disposition, politeness of manners, and goodness of heart. He was a master in Greek and Latin, and in acquiring those languages, Græme was much aided by the communication of his skill in the grammatical art; without which it is impossible to learn them with accuracy. The present writer knew him very early, and participated in the advantages which Græme derived from the accuracy of his taste, his liberality of communication, and the sincerity of his friendship; of which at least his gratitude, affection, and veneration, made him not unworthy. He died December 16. 1776, in the 58th year of his age, leaving his worthy consort to lament the loss of an affectionate husband, his children, an indulgent parent, his parish, a pious and diligent pastor, and the present writer, an intelligent and sincere adviser.

At the manse of Carnwath, Græme enjoyed many agreeable hours; with such companions as Mr. George Scott, schoolmaster of the village, and a probationer of the presbytery of Lanark, a man of a social, cheerful, and affectionate disposition, and Mr. William Stodart, son of James Stodart, Esq. factor to Count Lockhart; a man whose vigorous faculties, and various attainments, predominated over his opportunities of improvement; and whose modest worth, liberality of sentiment, and amiable manners, made him the delight of those friends to whom he was thoroughly known. Mr. Stodart became afterwards an architect, an employment for which he was eminently qualified by his habits of study, and died at Hamilton, of a consumption, in 1790, in the 42d of year his age.

But the time was now at hand when all his connections of friendship were to be dissolved, when all his occupations of study and of amusement were to be discontinued, and when all his pursuits in poetry and literature were to cease for ever.

In the summer 1771, he was engaged, upon the recommendation of Mr. Christie, by Martin White, Esq. of Milton, near Lanark, to assist the studies of his sons.

He entered on his new employment on the 24th of July, and soon gained the affectionate attachment of his pupils, and the friendship of Mr. White, which, as his amiable worth and poetical talents became known, was warm even to enthusiasm.

Mr. White was descended of mean parents in the west of Scotland; when very young, he entered as a volunteer into the service of the East India Company, and in the war 1756, his courage and intrepidity recommended him to a pair of colours. In 1760, he had the command of a company in Bengal. In the memorable revolution of that year he adhered to Governor Vansittart, was honoured with his confidence, and numbered among his friends. In every service to which he was appointed, his gallantry and conduct were conspicuous. He had a share in the most distinguished actions with Colonels Caillaud and Yorke. In 1763, he left the service with the rank of Major, and a genteel fortune. Soon after his arrival in Scotland, he purchased the estate of Milton. He married Miss Reid, of Saltcoats, Ayrshire, by whom he had four children. In 1775, bathing in the river Clyde, near his own house, he was seized with a fit, and unfortunately perished. His character bore no traces of his original meanness. Without the advantage of a liberal education, he possessed the truest sentiments of honour, a generous sensibility, a penetrating judgment, an extensive knowledge, improved by reading, and a considerable share of taste and skill in polite literature. His filial affection was truly exemplary. He received his father, a day-labourer, into his house, placed him at his table, and treated him with every mark of attention and respect. The romantic circumstance of his first visit to him, in his obscurity, is supposed to be the original of the story of Brown in Smollet's "Expedition of Humphry Clinker." He was the early friend and patron of the late ingenious Colonel Dow, of whose gratitude and ingenuity, there exists a curious monument in a MS. heroic poem, celebrating his military services, in the possession of his family.

Of this performance Græme gives the following account, in a letter to the present writer, dated Milton, Aug. 29. 1771. "I have gained the Major's confidence so far as to be admitted to the perusal of his private manuscripts, among which there is an heroic poem by Mr. Dow, of which he is the hero. It is, on the whole, a tame, dry, unanimated performance; a mere journal of marches, encampments, and trivial incidents, thrown into a kind of hobbling measure; while here and there (to parody Horace)

Purpureus late qui splendeat unus et alter,
Affluitur pannus cum lucus et Bramatis ara
Et properantis aquæ per amænos, ambitus agros,
Aut flumen Ganges aut pluvius describitur arcus
Cum nunc non erat his locus——

“Mr. Dow himself best knows whether his own genius or interest led him to the choice of a subject, the least of all capable of poetical embellishment. I suspect the latter. The author of “Zingis” left to the sprightly fallies of an unfettered fancy, would certainly make a more gainly figure in the grove of the muses. However, he has my hearty thanks for an hour’s tolerable entertainment his labours afforded me.

“The letters,” he adds, “of which I have read some quires, may all be authentic and true, for ought I know; but what imports to you or me, to pry into the private affairs of the unfortunate and ambitious Shah-zadah, the intriguing Rajah Cossim-aly-khan, or the villainous Soubah Nadir? The warrior-correspondents, Carnac, Caillaud, Yorke, Knox, &c. write all a pretty neat manly style. The Major makes no indifferent figure among them, I assure you, either in point of sense, courage, or consideration. His superiors speak of him with deference, and allow that his joining Major (afterwards Colonel) Yorke, with a party, so inconsiderable when compared with the vast numbers that opposed him, and the difficulty of the passes, equalled, if not surpassed any thing achieved in the whole war. His personal bravery (and indeed he appears to have killed two Indian chiefs with his own hand) is acknowledged to have been nothing to his prudence and conduct. You would be surpris’d at his letters; they have more elegance, sentiment, and propriety, than are commonly to be met with.”

The distinction which was paid him by Mr. White, and the reputation of his abilities, procured him the acquaintance of Dr. Mackinlay, of Woodside, the Rev. James Scott, of Carluke, and other intelligent and respectable gentlemen in the neighbourhood; and entitled him to familiarity with persons of higher rank than those to whose conversation he had been before admitted; which served to enlarge his knowledge of human life, and afforded him opportunities of indulging his speculations on conspicuous characters, for which he was admirably qualified by the quickness of his discernment, and the inquisitiveness which is natural to an active and vigorous mind. In every person, and in every occurrence he found something that deserved attention, and he regularly communicated his observations to the present writer, in a kind of weekly journal, written in a correct, easy, and simple style, and like his conversation, seasoned with that unaffected and playful humour in which he so greatly excelled.

In his first letter to him, dated Milton, July 26. 1771, he gives the following humorous account of the apartment allotted to him, on the attic story. “After many a weary step, I had the good fortune to reach my apartment, 1° 15 and as many seconds, on this side absolute giddiness. In spite of the carpet, the chairs, the hangings, and a thousand fripperies with which it is decked, I suspect it is neither more nor less than a garret. I had not been six minutes in it, before I discovered to my sorrow, that I was not like to be its only inhabitant. A thriving family of swallows; with open mouth, saluted me very familiarly from the chimney, and an obliging colony of rats tired themselves very heartily to communicate to me an idea of a horse race, by scampering along the ceiling. The familiarity of the one, and the sprightly humour of the other, could not hinder the exertion of a certain natural antipathy in my breast, towards the immediate expulsion of my brother garreteers. However, not to incur singly the odium of dislodging old tenants, I associated to me my trusty friends, the footman and the cat. William set on a large fire, with a design to send the swallows to their winter quarters, by fumigation or otherwise, while Tabby, with a very significant mew, gave her bearded cousins to understand what might be the fatal consequences of so preposterous a mirth persisted in.”

In the beginning of his letter to him, dated August 29th, he reflects on the happiness which he derived from his periodical correspondence, in the following terms of exultation: “What a com-

portable thing it is for one that is obliged to act a borrowed part (and that a very dull one too) to break through the formal fetters that hang so heavy on him, and be at least one day in seven, himself. My countenance brightens, more manly spirits expand my heart, and every limb exults in its native freedom, and performs its office with greater alacrity. 'Tis here I breathe, and I don't know whether I can be said to live any where else. Here reason assumes a firmer tone, and judgment decides with proper assurance of men, manners, and things, her almost forgotten theme. Let me catch the propitious moment, and exhaust the friendly breast, ere "the curfew toll the knell" of departing liberty, and choke each glow of genius, in the cold, form-condensed atmosphere of a dining-room."

During his continuance with Mr. White, most of his time was spent in assisting the literary labours of his pupils, or in promoting the social pleasures of the family, by the vivacity and sprightliness of his conversation. His knowledge of nature and extensive learning, supplied him with innumerable images, and his lively fancy, aided by a ready eloquence, enabled him to combine them, with an amazing exuberance of humour and pleasantry.

His muse, however, was not idle. While he was practising the duties of his employment, and the arts of conversation, he dedicated a considerable proportion of his time to reading, and found leisure to write verses, with his usual promptitude of invention, and facility of composition.

The following instance, among others, is not incurious. In the autumn 1771, Archibald Hamilton, Esq. of the Isle of Man, and his new married lady, a daughter of the late Robert Dinwiddie, Esq. Governor of Virginia, were on a visit at Milton. It happened that Græme made one of the company at dinner, and being privately requested by Mr. White, to present the new-married couple with a poetical compliment, he retired to his apartment, and in little more than half an hour, produced a poem to Archibald Hamilton, Esq. on his marriage with Miss Dinwiddie, consisting of fifty-six lines, which displays a happy invention, and great command of numbers. Mr. Hamilton and his lady were highly pleased with his performance, and returned their acknowledgments in the following extemporaneous lines, expressive of their gratitude, and admiration of his genius.

Health to th' ingenious bard we grateful send,
Heav'n guard his talents and his life defend;
When themes so humble can inspire his lay,
And call such powers of fancy into play;
What notes sublime may we expect to hear,
His story's grace drawn from a higher sphere!

Thus encouraged and applauded, he continued to exercise his genius in poetical composition; and wrote his Abra, a fragment; Alexis, a tale; and some verses to Mr. White, in the couplet measure, which, from this time, he constantly used, with the single exception of the elegiac fragment on the loss of the Aurora.

He spent his time, upon the whole, not unusefully, nor unpleasantly; but neither the kindness of Mr. White, nor the docility of his pupils, could reconcile him to a state of dependence, nor restore the tranquillity of his mind.

In a letter to the present writer, dated August 21st, he observes, "In vain do you wrest a few innocent phrases in my last—in vain draw the flattering conclusion that I am happy—happy! dependence and happiness, I am afraid, are two incompatible things; I have ever found them so. Books, indeed, I have—Voltaire, Hume, Rapin, Robertson, Swift, Pope, Universal History, Biographia Britannica, Reviews, Voyages, and a thousand others; but where is the friendly face divine? Where is Mira? Where is every thing that can sweeten social life? As far as east is distant from, &c. But let me stop—I never touch that string, but it vibrates so long, that I become at the same time both wearisome and ridiculous. It ill becomes a pretender to philosophy to be dissatisfied with that station in the scale of society which Providence has assigned him. Though the most abject dependence, an artificial poverty of spirit, and the snare of undeserved contempt, be objects, of all others, one should think, the least desirable to an ingenuous mind, yet 'murmur not,' says the Parenetic sage, 'nay, rather rejoice in thy prosperous fortune, thou gloomy child of discontent; give her food, give her raiment, and nature is satisfied; thou hast these, thou hast more than these, modo contrabe vela et vale: thou hast no more to do, than just correct the dreams of an heated fancy, by the cool determinations of reason, and be as happy as a prince.' 'Tis a great pity that a thing so very obvious in theory, that the rawest student of moral philosophy comprehends it perfectly, should grow so cross, and wind itself into such a multiplicity of intricate warpings and implexures, as to defy the most patient and skilful unraveller, that ever whirled a philosophical windlass, to make so much of it as a bandage for the little finger of Affliction, far less a complete searchcloth for the leprous sons of Misfortune!—Tell me honestly, don't you think life is an insipid tedious, irregular, tragi-comic farce? The first act is an unincidental infantine piece of trifling low humour. The two first scenes of the second are tolerably pleasant and characteristical; the remaining ones become gradually more flat and uninteresting. The spectators and actors equally desire the catastrophe. It is delayed by incidents unpleasant and unexpected. We turn our eyes on the scenes that formerly gave us pleasure, and demand them with a vain encore! We demand impossibilities. The scenery is painted with fading colours; they glitter for a moment, and perish; and the most skilful painter cannot restore the transitory tints. What can we do? Why, just wish for the catastrophe again, and prefer our dark, cold, narrow, hereditary dwelling, to the magnificent wide illuminated theatre.—Away with life! I never think of it but it puts me out of humour. For the love of God write every week; it is all the comfort I have."

In the social circle, however, he was capable of putting on for a while the gay colours of mirth and cheerfulness, to cover that pensive melancholy, which the family had no opportunity of witnessing. Even on the distresses of his too susceptible mind, that fancy, in whose creation he so much delighted, threw a certain romantic shade of melancholy, which left him sad, but did not make him unhappy.

Meantime, the approbation which his compositions had received from Mr. White, and his friends, made him conceive a design of publishing a volume of poems, in which he meant to include the pieces which had appeared in Ruddiman's "Weekly Magazine," his Elegies, in conjunction with those of the present writer, on similar subjects, his version of Museus, the Student, Night-Piece, Alexis, and other miscellaneous pieces. In the prosecution of this design he was warmly encouraged by Mr. White, who testified, upon every occasion, the utmost solicitude to promote his fortune and his fame.

It is a consideration mortifying to human pride, that fine talents and the most exquisite sensibility are but too often the predisposing cause of an insidious and fatal disease. The history of the human mind furnishes many examples of premature genius, not infrequently connected with extreme weakness and delicacy of frame. This connection is not accounted for in the common systems of the animal economy, which suppose the growth of the body, and developement of the mental faculties to be progressive and proportional, till they reach the point of maturity. The body, it is said, shoots out till the age of twenty, and the solids are attaining a degree of density till thirty; when the flexible muscles, growing daily more rigid, give a physiognomie, or character to the countenance, and energy to the mind. Though something like this progress is observed to take place, especially among the individuals of our species, who arrive slowly at maturity, and are distinguished by longevity; yet it is observed, to be infinitely diversified in different persons, from causes not very obvious, nor of easy explanation. The most probable causes appear to the present writer to be chiefly physical; for in the cases of mental precocity that have fallen under his observation, the early proofs of reason and genius were connected with appearances of a more sensible organization, and more irritable nerves; and, most frequently, with that peculiar structure of the glands and lymphatic vessels, which gives a predisposition to scrophula and pulmonary consumption.

While the scheme of publication was ripening, he was seized with a fever and cough, which, almost unperceived, and for some time, without any positive pain, terminated in a pulmonary consumption; a disease to which his delicacy of frame and of mind gave him a peculiar predisposition, and of which he had always been particularly apprehensive; especially after it had deprived him of a brother and a sister, a few years before.

In a letter to the present writer, dated September 23. 1771, he expresses his feelings on this event in a strain of manly dignity and composure. "By little less than a miracle, I am enabled to communicate to you an event the most important that ever entered into our correspondence. You will pity me, yes, you will pity me, when you know that I am far gone in a consumption. I cannot walk three yards without being the worse of it. I have a prodigious pain in my head and breast, attended with a great difficulty in breathing. I sweat in the mornings, and have, in short, all the symptoms of a decline. I promise myself some advantage from riding, which exercise I begin to-morrow; as the Major and Mrs. White have been so good as set apart a poney for my sole use. If I live yet a week you shall have more—if not—Heaven be our portion."

"Don't you despise me," he writes him October 13. 1771, "for my cowardice? It was nothing else kept me from writing to you. I can present a laughing face to all my acquaintances, and talk with my usual indifference about any thing whatever; but when I think of you, my heart fails me, and I cannot persuade myself that it is an easy matter to bid an eternal farewell to the man I love.—But I begin to feel rather too much for one in my way, and desperate as my case is, I am resolved to give my constitution fair play, at least for a few weeks; so back' foolish tears to your hollow fountains, and since ye have shown yourselves so very forward on certain subjects, I will beware of you for the future. I need not tell you I am day by day approaching nearer and nearer to the perfection of leanness, a skeleton. I have not a pair of stockings that will clap to my legs, and my breeches are become the very picture of Captain Bobadil's. A kind of pale yellow has taken possession of the hollow of my cheeks, which have by a natural sympathy subsided to the level of my eye-balls.—abscesses, I am told, are forming or already formed in my lungs. I don't in the least doubt of it. I feel a mortal twang, I don't know what to call it, about them. But be that as it may, I am resolved to die secundum artem, most methodically. I eat new milk and stew'd apples, ride two hours and a half every day, &c.—My room is on the first floor now.—I am used like an only son.—I am under great obligations to the whole family—Heaven reward them; I shall never be able! When will I see you? Some demon tempts me to add—never. God bless you, and preserve you for the noble uses of society, for which I was never designed."

His decline, though slow and insidious, gaining a little ground every week, he saw death approaching, with his usual calmness and resignation, and now resolved to return home, to receive those attentions which his increasing weakness required, from the anxiety of parental affection.

He left Milton about the latter end of October, and for some time after he returned to Carnwath, made his daily excursions, and in December, was still able to walk a few miles; but every experiment of this kind was followed by fatigue, and commonly by a fit of fever considerably severe.

From this time to his death, the cough and night sweats continued to molest him; the complicated distress of which, aggravated by the discomforts and inconveniences of humble life, he bore with unexampled dignity and composure of mind. Hope, that commonly alleviates the sufferings of the consumptive, he renounced from the beginning; which at his years, and with his sensibility, the fires of literary ambition just kindling, and his wishes wrapt in the trance of fame, required an uncommon union of philosophy and religion.

He lingered through the winter, during which his strength sunk so much that he could no longer bear riding on horseback, nor walk without leaning on somebody's arm.

In this state of helplessness and decay, he found some alleviation of his sufferings, in the familiar visits of Mr. White, and in the kind attentions shown him by his friends, Christie, Scott, Stodart, and Somerville, who frequently sat with him, and took particular pleasure in devising expedients to amuse him.

In the spring, he exercised his poetical talent, for the last time, in writing a complimentary poem to Major White, in which he drew the characters of Mrs. White and his pupils, in testimony of his gratitude for the friendship and benevolence, which served to lessen the wants and to sooth the severity of his illness.

As his life drew towards a close, his weakness increased by degrees, but his pains abated considerably; he retained his composure, as well as the full use of his rational faculties to the last. Nor did his wit and playful humour forsake him, till he was no longer able to smile, or even to speak. The present writer almost constantly sat by him during the three last months of his life. He expired his last breath, without a groan, in the morning of the 26th of July 1772, in the 22d year of his age. His life was virtuous and innocent, and his end pious and exemplary. He was buried in the church-yard of Carnwath, without a stone to mark the place of his dust. His father died June 14. 1774, and his mother, December 6. 1788.

In the moment of recent grief for the loss of the associate of his childhood, his bosom-friend, and one of the pleasantest and most instructive companions that ever man was delighted with, the present writer found some consolation in the preservation of his poetical remains.

The collection of his poems, in which he had made some progress before the commencement of his illness, was completed by the present writer before his death, and published soon after, according to his intended plan, in one volume octavo, under the title of Poems on Several Occasions, by James Grant, Edinburgh 1773, with a preface, containing a short account of his character. The expense of the impression, which did not exceed three hundred copies, was defrayed by a subscription, promoted by Mr. White, and his literary friends, at whose solicitation it was undertaken, and to whom its distribution was confined. It was never advertized for sale. The profits of the publication were given to Mr. Walter Somerville, bookseller in Lanark, who was of the same village, a school-fellow, and common friend; and a man of great goodness of heart, and the strictest rectitude of principle. He died at Lanark in 1785.

The prefatory advertisement concludes with the following deprecatory wishes for the temerity of the present writer in giving to the world, the incorrect effusions of amorous tenderness, and the idle fallacies of youthful and poetic fancy.

“The public must decide, whether the author and his friend have acted with judgment and propriety in the present publication. It is only hoped, from the general strain of the pieces, that this collection will furnish no unpleasing entertainment to the reader of sensibility. For him it is chiefly intended, and to him it is now inscribed, in the fond persuasion, that he will regard with candour, and cherish with respect, the simple effusions of fancy, friendship, and love.”

A brief account of his life and writings, drawn up by the present writer, was printed in the “Gentleman’s Magazine” for 1782, and has since been reprinted in the 12th volume of the “General Biographical Dictionary” 1784.

His poems, reprinted from the edition 1773, with some corrections, and additions, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry. The pieces originally furnished by the present writer, he has been prevailed with to preserve in this edition, though they have no pretensions to be retained, but the partiality of his friend to what he had attempted in verse, and the propriety of uniting compositions that have a personal, poetical, and sentimental relation, in the same publication. As he is to answer for them to the world, in justice to his friend, he has prefixed his name to them, though they might be easily distinguished by the diversity of subject, and manner, and added some pieces, written since his death, containing, either directly or incidentally, his tribute of sentiment to his memory; for which he flatters himself that he shall be excused by those who value talents, and honour goodness. Of the character of a poet he deems too highly to plead a title to it before the impartial tribunal of the public; which allows no mediocrity in poetry. Whatever is capable of delighting in an extreme degree, cannot with impunity fall short of the effect expected from it. But his failing to produce what he is supposed to promise, is not owing to a mistake of his powers. Though the transition is easy, from admiring poetical beauties, to believing ourselves capable of producing similar excellencies; yet the association of youthful study, and the aspirations of juvenile ambition, never led him to mistake the talent of writing smooth verses for poetical genius, or the rapid insipidity of rhyme for the genuine fire of poetry. The making and mending verses is not the business of his life. Amidst the severer studies, and laborious duties of a learned and useful profession, he cherishes the love of poetry and the liberal arts; without any ambition of being distinguished as a “two-fold disciple of Apollo.”

His character may easily be collected from this account of his life. A few of his peculiarities remain to be mentioned. His person was manly and prepossessing. His eye was lively and penetrating. His features were pleasing and expressive, his gestures animated, and all his movements and expressions were marked by extraordinary energy and vivacity. In the fortune of his life and the fate of his writings, he resembles Bruce; and, like him, he was equally amiable and ingenious. His mind was capacious, his curiosity excursive, and his industry indefatigable. He united acuteness of intellect with good sense, and sensibility of heart with correctness of taste and critical sagacity.

Though studious and learned, he was neither austere nor formal. In him the strictest piety and modesty were united with the utmost cheerfulness, and even playfulness of disposition. He had, what perhaps all people of observation have, a slight tendency to satire; but it was of the gentlest kind. He had too much candour and good-nature to be either a general satirist, or a severe one. Of persons notoriously profligate, or rendered impudent by immorality, breach of public trust, or ignorance, he was at no pains to conceal what he thought. The slightest appearance of immorality, vanity, pedantry, coarse manners, or blameable levity disgusted him. Like other votaries of the muses, he was passionately fond of rural scenery, and delighted in walking alone in the fields. By the villagers, to whom he was little known, his love of solitude was mistaken for an unsocial disposition. The reverse was his character. He was social, cheerful, and affectionate, and by those friends who thoroughly knew him, beloved even to enthusiasm. He practised every manly exercise with dexterity, participated in the amusements becoming his age, and particularly excelled in the games of chess and backgammon; but to games of chance he had rather a disinclination. In every thing he pursued he was indefatigable in aiming at perfection. The lowliness of his lot conspired with the simplicity of his heart, to possess him with an early veneration for the virtues and the writings of the primitive ages; and the nature of his studies afforded him the best opportunities to heighten and confirm that veneration, by enabling him to converse familiarly with the most celebrated writers of Greece and Rome. He read their remains with ardour, and imbibed their sentiments with enthusiasm; on them he formed his taste and improved his heart. In his admiration of Grecian and Roman liberty, he founded his ardent love of political freedom, and his peculiar attachment to the popular part of our constitution. He found the principles of good writing in Homer, Xenophon, Herodotus, Cæsar, and others who are distinguished by a severe and majestic simplicity of style. But he was charmed above all others with the humane writers of the elegiac class. The wit of Ovid and the learning of Propertius were the qualities he least admired; but the tender simplicity of Tibullus affected him with the liveliest delight, as it was most congenial to the gentleness of his disposition, and exhibited the purest model of elegiac poetry. Time was not allowed him for going deep into French, Italian, and German literature; but he had read the best authors in these languages, in English versions.

From the gentleness of his disposition, the elegance of his fancy, and the classical simplicity of his taste, the style of his poetry took its character, which has more tenderness than sublimity, more elegance than dignity, more ease than force. Prompted generally by incident, and impatient of design, he wrote with more happiness than care. But all his compositions are distinguished by marks of genius and poetical feeling, with numbers animated and varied according to the subject. His thoughts are often striking, and always just. His versification, though not exquisitely polished, is commonly flowing and harmonious. His language is, in general, chaste, correct, and well adapted; in elegy frugal of epithet and metaphor; in blank verse and burlesque heroic, swelling and pompous, but not stiff or obscure. In some passages, he has not been so careful as might have been wished to choose perfect rhymes, or to avoid prosaic diction. All his pieces were written with surprising facility; most of them, as occasion suggested, being the production of an evening in bed, before he went to sleep, and, as his custom was, committed to any scrap of paper, or blank leaf of a book that came in his way in the morning. As these scraps received the first effusion of thought, unsubdued by the reiterated castigation of judgment, so they commonly remained, for he seldom could be brought to submit to the trouble of revising them. His last production was always his favourite; but it continued to please him no longer than it was new. The piece that dropped from his pen in the morning, after having been presented with eagerness, and read with transport to the present writer, was forgotten in the returning meditation of the evening, like the production of the preceding day. Of the incredible number of pieces he composed, the printed collection contains only thirty-eight elegies, and somewhat more than half that number of miscellaneous poems and translations; being all he designed for publication, or of which any complete copies have been preserved.

His Love Elegies, the most finished and the most pleasing of his performances, are mostly written in alternate rhyme, in the style of Hammond, whose simplicity and tenderness he has judiciously imitated, without adopting his Roman imagery derived from Tibullus, whom for the most part he translates. But as love is of no particular country, and its language universal, he confesses in his admiration of Hammond, the sympathetic feelings of passion and of nature, so forcibly expressed in his elegies; a confession common to every reader of sensibility, whose sentiments have not been corrupted by literary prejudice, or perverted by the unmerited censure of Dr. Johnson. Sincere in his love, almost without example, he wrote to a real not a fancied mistress; and as he felt the distress he describes, he has few ambitious ornaments, but expresses the simple unaffected language of the tender passions. To his sincerity it is also owing, that the character of his elegies is but little diversified; presenting chiefly a recurrence of the querulous ideas of grief and disappointment, a repetition of the soft distress of ill-requited love, and a series of pathetic comparisons of the pretensions of birth and wealth, with the happiness and security of humble fortune, in which the preference is constantly ascribed to the latter, and the rights of sensibility asserted with persuasive energy.

Sublimar happiness can titles yield,
 Can wealth or grandeur greater meed bestow?
 Unbiais'd nature scorns the blazon'd field,
 And every finer feeling answers, No!

Of his Elegies, moral and descriptive, the sentiments, in general, are pleasing and pathetic, and the imagery picturesque and beautiful. The Elegy on the loss of the Aurora, the elegy written at Cutbally Castle, October an Elegy, and the elegy on Mr. Fisher, deserve particular commendation. They unite poetical beauty with that plaintive tenderness which is the characteristic of elegy. The amiable humanity, and tender simplicity which distinguish the Linnet an Elegy, are attractive and affecting in the highest degree. Though the palm of merit in this species of elegy be chiefly due to Jago, he has not adopted into his performance the identical circumstances of fictitious distress employed by that poet, in his "Blackbirds," nor followed him in the train of his thoughts, or in the structure of his stanza. The sentiments arise spontaneously from the subject, which is new and happily imagined, and the pathetic touches and delicate strokes of nature are such as would not discredit the pen of the humane and ingenious "poet of the birds." They, who may think the supplemental stanza, offered by the present writer, unnecessary, are at liberty to reject it; as well as the pieces of the same class, under his name, the comparative inferiority of which cannot escape observation. For the sentiments, he flatters himself that he shall find an easy pardon. Sylvia and Clara were not the phantoms of his mind; but his life has been protracted till they have sunk into their graves, and his pity and his praise are but empty sounds.

Of his Miscellaneous Poems, the Night Piece, Hymn to the Eternal Mind, Fit of the Spleen, Abra, The Student, Alexis, Verses to Mr. Hamilton, and Major White, are chiefly distinguished for felicity of invention, seriousness of subject, and strength and elegance of composition. The poem on Curling, a winter amusement peculiar to North Britain, abounds with picturesque description and original imagery. But the subject being local and little known, the didactic and technical allusions, which are numerous, can only be understood by those who are acquainted with the manly diversion of Curling. His Epistles, Songs, Anacreontics, &c. display invention, and no small portion of that ease, vivacity, and delicacy, essential to success, in the lighter and less elevated productions of fancy.

His Hero and Leander is for the most part a translation from the Greek poem of Musæus. Several passages in the original are omitted; others paraphrased, and some entire speeches and new circumstances introduced. Following, in some measure, a new plan, he laboured under several disadvantages, of which, in justice to himself, he gives the following account, in a familiar dedication to the present writer, omitted in this edition. "Ovid is far from being explicit. Had I known at what time the lovers lived, I might have introduced some of the public transactions of that period into the poem, and given it a greater air of probability. But all I could learn from him was, that they lived after the Trojan war. Perhaps my account of the matter may scarce appear an ingenious one, but I could positively give no better without running into novel intrigue, which the dignity of my numbers would not allow. Even where Ovid is explicit, I did not always find it convenient to follow him. Ovid has the Nurse in the secret. I, out of pure regard to Hero's tranquillity, have given her no knowledge of the matter. Ovid makes Leander, at the approach of winter, intermit his visits, which was absolutely necessary to his plan of epistolary correspondence. I had no such view, and therefore drowned him in the first storm I could conveniently raise.—The reasons I give for the catastrofhe, or in other words, the moral of the poem, may probably awake a laugh in a modern fine gentleman, but if you don't join him in it, a fine gentleman's laugh won't put me out of countenance." His version is in many parts happily executed, but is extremely unequal; the metre was, perhaps, injudiciously chosen, for a tale so romantic in itself, swelling with all the pomp of blank verse, is apt to grow into the idea of burlesque. But an easy flow of numbers, and a pleasing harmony of expression, make considerable amends for the diffusion which this occasions. Some of the speeches are exquisitely delicate and tender, and the description which opens the second book, is animated and poetical in an uncommon degree. The moral of the poem, contains a fine eulogium on conjugal love, which does honour to his sensibility and his virtue.

This celebrated love-tale is not the production of Museus of high antiquity, but of a grammarian of that name who lived in the 5th century. It was partly translated by Marlow, in his admirable performance entitled "the Sestiad," 1593, which was finished by Chapman, 1606, and highly merits republication. It was afterwards translated by Sir Robert Stapylton, 1647. The subsequent versions are too numerous to be specified.

To expatiate farther, in the strain of friendly panegyric, on the moral and intellectual character of Græme would be neither difficult nor unpleasing.

————— Juvat usque morari
Et conferre gradum —————
Virg. V. 487.

But to accumulate yet more instances, of his amiable worth and poetical genius, would extend this preface to an undue length. The present writer is loth to part with his subject; which, there are a few who know, is by no means exhausted. To Græme, and to every thing connected with him, he acknowledges he is partial; and they who have experienced the loss of a beloved friend, will not think the worse of him for having this infirmity. He can gain, alas! but little from his praise; but in stating his pretensions, and estimating his worth, he finds a pleasing, though a melancholy subject of remembrance. His mind is painfully soothed by a tender recurrence to those events which helped to fill up the vacuum of youthful studies and amusements, by the reciprocal exchanges of confidence and friendship. To him, his memory and his fame will be ever dear and precious, till his own remembrance, and other faculties, shall fail him,

"And o'er his head close the dark gulf of time!"

From the general commendation bestowed, by the partiality of friendship, on the compositions of Græme, particular criticism may make many deductions. Many of his performances, written hastily, at the age of eighteen, and of which his promiscuous studies and early death had prevented the revival, can scarcely be inspected with all the severity of criticism; and there is no reason to fear that it will ever be exerted against them. But, when every deduction is made which criticism requires, the general poetical merit of his compositions will be allowed to be considerably above mediocrity. That he had great force of genius, and genuine poetical feeling, cannot justly be denied; and there are scarce any of his performances that do not display a tenderness of sentiment, an energy of expression, a vivacity of description, and an apposite variety of numbers, which evince the vigour of his imagination, and the accuracy of his taste, and reflect much honour both on his heart and his understanding.

Whatever rank may be due to Græme, among the poets of our nation, his correctness of taste, variety of erudition, vivacity of imagination, tenderness of sentiment, felicity of invention, and facility in numbers, will be allowed to afford indications of a poetical genius, which, when matured by years, and improved by practice, might have produced something considerable, and to furnish an example of unnoticed ingenuity aspiring to literature and to poetry under the pressure of indigence, sufficiently interesting to learning and to benevolence, to justify the bringing his compositions forward to the attention of the readers of poetry, which may be the means of doing justice to his merit, and of preserving his memory.

Virg. VI. 815.

THE WORKS OF GRÆME.

ELEGIES;

MORAL, DESCRIPTIVE, AND AMATORY.

ELEGY I.

WRITTEN IN SPRING.

THE tuneful lark awakes the purple morn,
Returning plovers glad the dreary waste;
The trees no more their ravish'd honours mourn,
No longer bend below the win'try blast:

The Spring o'er all her genial influence sheds,
Her smelly fragrance scents the balmy breeze;
Her op'ning blossoms purple o'er the meads,
Her vivid verdure veils the robbed trees.

The airy cliff resounds the shepherd's lay,
Within it's banks the murmur'ing stream let flows;
Around their dams the sportive lambskins play,
And from the stall the vacant heifer lows.

The voice of music warbles from the wood,
Delightful objects crowd the smiling scene;
All nature shares the universal good,
And cold despair exalts no breast but mine.

Dismal to me appears the bloomy vale,
The haunts of pleasure sadden at my tread;
Unheard, unnoted, vernal zephyrs fail
The flow'ry waste, and bend the quiv'ring reed.

No more, enraptur'd with successful love,
I fit my numbers to the tuneful string;
No more pourtray the verdure of the grove,
Or hear the voice of incense-breathing Spring.

The torrents, whiten'd with descending rain,
The wave-worn windings of the wand'ring rill,
The flow'ry flush that liv'ries all the plain,
The blue-gray mist that hovers o'er the hill;

I sing no more:—But ravish'd from the maid
Who kindly listen'd to my faithful sighs,
I, inly grieving, droop the pensive head,
And mourn the blis's relentless fate denies.

ELEGY II.

TO MIRA.

THE cottage-swains, how exquisitely blest
With sun-burnt virgins in the prime of years!
A sigh obtains the fairest and the best;
At most, the pleading eloquence of tears.

No stubborn honour parts the willing pair;
No maiden barter's happiness for fame;
No prideful demon whispers in her ear,
The long succession of a titled name.

O, had a turf-built hamlet's humble roof,
A shot-clad rafter caught your earliest view!
Or, sternly rigid, fortune scowl'd aloof,
Nor stamp'd with dignity a parent's brow!

Or had I (love demands the lowly boon)
Grown to maturity in splendor's ray!
In folly's tinsel tatters tript the town,
The pride of fops, and glitter of a day!

Had treasure'd gold improv'd my native worth,
Inglorious robb'd from Afric's ebon fons;
A ruin'd castle claim'd a father's birth,
Where jack-daws nestle, and the howlet moans!

But money'd merit, and paternal fame,
The gods to poor Alexis never meant:
He lives unforty'd; lo!t, alas! to him,
The herald's blazon and the painter's tint.

A soul unfully'd by the thirst of gain,
A bosom rising at another's woe,
He boasts no more;—his cottage bounds the plain,
Where wild woods thicken, and where waters
flow.

A mansion not unworthy of the fair:
Why blushes Mira at the simple tale?
Can all the pomp of dirty cities dare
Vie with the fragrance of the vernal vale?

But, nurs'd amid the formulas of pride,
You want the heart to own the man you love,
Walk with feign'd pleasure by the fopling's side,
And praise the nonsense which you disapprove.

The very vale, you tread with willing feet,
You seem to scorn, and wantonly prefer,
The dull rotation of a crowded street,
A shrill-pip'd actresses, and a dancing bear.

Farewell, dear maid! some happier youth possess
The blooming beauties ne'er design'd for me;
May fruitful Hymen yield him every blis's,
And every joy I, hapless! hop'd in thee.

But, O, may none, invidious of your mirth,
Name lost Alexis on the bridal day!
For, could you, Mira, though obscure his birth,
Unpitying hear, a lifeless corse he lay?

ELEGY III.

TO MIRA.

PRESENTS may buy Belinda's venal kiss,
And venal kisses charm the tasteless tribe;
My delicacy calls for cheaper bliss,
And patriot distance scorns a paltry bribe.

The hill, that midway rears its lordly brow,
The torrent, headlong from its bosom roll'd;
A gift, with reckless eye, like Celia, view,
And frown, forbidding, on the proffer'd gold.

Colin may con with care the flatt'ring lay,
With blushing roses vermilion Trulla's cheek;
Bid unheaven'd graces on her bosom play,
And paint a goddess—for the girl is weak.

But other, Mira! were Alexis' strains;
No heav'n-bred virgin stuff'd his dreaming
head;
Thy beauties, such as daily haunt our plains,
He sung—the graces of a mortal maid.

When someone with thee in the silent hour,
He hail'd no goddess,—but a girl embrac'd;
Prostrated low, ador'd no heav'nly pow'r,
But clung transported to thy maiden waist.

And should the gods restore thee to my arms,
No fullsome flatt'ry should exalt my phrase;
No epithetic nonsense daub thy charms,
Good sense thy beauty, constancy thy praise.

But vain the thought—I'll never see thee more;
The gods decree it, and the gods are just:
For ever doom'd thy absence to deplore,
Till grief, slow-lapping, crumble me to dust.

ELEGY IV.

NIGHT, raven-wing'd, usurps her peaceful reign,
Sleep's lenient balsam stills the voice of woe;
A keener breeze breathes o'er the lowly plain,
And pebbly rills in deeper murmurs flow.

The paly moon through yonder dreary grove,
The screech-owl's haunt, emits a feeble ray;
The plummy warblers quit the fong of love,
And dangle, slumb'ring, on the dewy spray.

The mastiff, conscious of the lover's tread,
With wakeful yell the list'ning maid alarms,
Who, loosely robb'd, forsakes the downy bed,
And springs reserveless to his longing arms.

O, happy he! who, with the maid he loves,
Thus toys endearing on the twilight green,
While all is rapture, Cupid's self approves,
And Jove consenting veils the tender scene.

O, happy he! by gracious fate allow'd,
At dusky eve, to clasp the slender waist,
Press the soft lip, dissolve the silky shroud,
And feel the heavings of a love-sick breast.

Once mine the bliss:—But now with plaintive care

I, lonely wand'ring, tune the voice of woe;
And, patient, brave the chilly midnight air,
Where wild woods thicken, and where waters
flow.

ELEGY V.

WITHIN this willow-woven bower
I'll lay my limbs to rest;
And breathe the fragrance of the mead,
In orient colours dress'd.

Sacred to grief, hail, hallow'd spot!
Here, long inur'd to woe,
Alexis tun'd the plaintive reed,
By Medwan's mazy flow.

Reclining on this very sod,
While sorrow dimm'd his eyes,
He rais'd his suppliant hands in vain!
Relentless were the skies.

O, cruel, to refuse his boon!
How little did he crave?
'Twas but the cov'ring of a turf,
Th' oblivion of a grave.

And still more cruel, to exile
The luckless lover so!
To drive him from the lovely haunts
Of solitary woe.

Here, memory of former days
Would cheer the musing boy;
And o'er his melancholy spread
A transient gleam of joy.

But the wild hurry of a town
Recals no blissful scene;
Starves fond remembrance, and affords
No leisure to complain.

The willows wav'd, by wanton winds,
Still shade thy sedgey shore;
But rueful, Medwan! are thy banks,
Thy muses mourn no more.

On yonder poplar's topmost bough,
Their airy harps are hung;
And silence mutes on the mead,
Where midnight fairies sung.

ELEGY VI.

THE SUICIDE.

YES, gentle ghost! I hear the solemn sound,
That nightly rouses to the scene of woe;
I see the shade that beckons to thy wound,
While o'er thy grave the teary torrents flow.

Though screams the howlet from the dreary glade,
And croaks the raven from her bough-built nest;
I'll bow me lowly o'er thy clay-cold bed,
And bid the turf lie lightly on thy breast.

Here ly'st thou, hapless! (let me wipe this tear),
Where slowly creeping steals the silent wave;
No pious parent deck'd thy early bier,
No maiden willows-wither'd on thy grave.

In drear procession went no friendly train
Solemnly sad, or bade thy spirit rest;
But, hurrying on, a noisy crew profane
The coarse green turf threw careless on thy breast.

Ghastly magnificent, no sculptur'd tomb,
In busto'd grandeur, courts the distant sky;
No veiny marble emulates thy bloom,
No mournful lay bedews the passing eye.

But lowly, Lucy! lies thy lovely frame;
The dust enclasps thee in a cold embrace;
Breeze-chaff'd beside thee mourns a falling stream,
And o'er thee lone some waves the dark-green grass.

Why bare thy bosom, ting'd with vital gore!
Point to thy wound?—I hasten, gentle shade—
Despair invites—I learn her fatal lore—
With desp'rate hand thus urge the gleamy blade.

Some woodland bard shall mourn our early doom,
Soft o'er our grave awake the plaintive strain;
Shall flit the meteor round our humble tomb,
And screaming goblins haunt the bloody plain.

Shall tell the shepherds, on this verdant swathe,
A dismal story of a luckless pair;
Whom, brought untimely to a violent death,
A mistress buried, and a fire severe.

ELEGY VII.

A FLEETING life of pain, is man's Inevitable lot;
To-day is privy to our woe,
To-morrow knows us not.

Fate bids a snaky wreath of care
Entwine the vital thread;
And feel alike its baneful pow'r,
The death and bridal bed.

Hope gilds in vain the future hour
With bliss of ev'ry kind;
The wishful period wastes away
But bliss we never find.

In vain we strive to ease the smart,
And meditate repose;
In vain assume the face of joy,
The mask of human woes.

Who warring with a sea of ills,
Some weary days have past,
Will ever find the future day
An image of the last.

Till death, no more a tyrant, speed
The amicable blow,
Shut the sad scene of mortal life,
And terminate their woe.

O, happy he! above his peers,
The favourite of Heav'n,
To whom a certain place of rest,
An early grave is given.

Nor falling tear, nor swelling sigh,
That mourn an absent maid,
Tormenting fears, nor wishes vain,
Afflict his peaceful shade.

In sure oblivion of his woes,
He moulders into dust;
Spring's roses wither on his grave
And cheer his hov'ring ghost.

ELEGY VIII.

TO ALEXIS.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

WHEN rose-lip'd Health reveals her vivid bloom,
And Youth and Genius all their charms impart;

Why wears the face the discontented gloom?
Why, sadly sighing, heaves the pensive heart?

Can weeping melancholy's frantic train,
'The brow deep-fadden'd, and the tear-swoln
eye,

Inva'de the vernal hour with plaint profane,
And pleasure, peace, and letter'd fame supply?

Mistaken friend!—it cannot, will not do;
Musing and sad, to murmur all alone!
'Tis fearful fancy guides your trembling view,
And from your bosom bursts th' unmeaning moan.

What though you meet with fortune's frowning
form,

Pale envy's rage, and passion's stormy pow'r?
See slander's sons your fairest deeds deform,
And dark suspicion shade the social hour?

Soft pity best becomes the human heart,
And weakness claims the mild regarding eye;
And since the vernal day may soon depart,
Why should you strive to lengthen out the sigh?

For think, ah think! it will not always last,
'This fleeting life you lov'd, and now deplore!
Soon will the swift-wing'd day of youth be past,
Soon fate o'erwhelm—and ev'ry joy be o'er.

'Twere better far to join the jocund throng,
Wind the wild walk along the summer lawn;
Toy with the fair sequester'd bow'rs among,
Or pour the lay at Mira's soft command!

What though no purpl'd king, nor titled fire,
Grace the leag progress of your hamble line;
No gazing crowds your glitt'ring pomp admire,
Or, prostrate low, miscal your power divine.

What though no costly robe, nor shining ore,
Adorn your limbs, or heap th' o'erflowing chest;
The muses scorn the splendid pride of pow'r,
And shed their honours on the low-born breast.

Poetic youths, in many a lawn, and grove,
Musing, in tuneful transports, oft we find;
And oft the thymy heath they fauntering rove,
Or court, in wayward strains, the whispering wind.

The sylvan choirs, that wake the vocal lay;
The crystal streams, that murmur as they flow;

The waving meadows, fragrant, fresh, and gay,
Have sweets the sons of grandeur never know !

Say, then, when nature spreads the pleasing theme,
And willing muses shed their genial art ;
Say, will you quench the heav'n-enlighten'd flame,
And bid lorn sorrow chill the glowing heart ?

Forbear, my friend ! the mournful sigh forbear ;
Too long hath sorrow held her baleful sway !—
See vengeful mirth her prostrate banners rear,
And force the fury from her realms away !

'Tis done—and pleasure takes her wonted stand ;—
I see the smile ;—I hear the sprightly song ;—
In ruddy circles crowd the jocund band,
And hail the numbers as they pour along.

Wide, and more wide, the vengeful victor flies ;—
I see the lovers seek their fav'rite grove—
In either bosom soft ideas rise ;—
In every accent breathes inspiring love !

'Tis just—indulge the long-forgotten feast,
With eager hand life's fleeting sweets receive !—
Soon may disease impair the vig'rous taste,
Dull ev'ry sense, and ev'ry pow'r deprave !

Ah ! could thy friend, in wonted ease reclin'd,
When health inspir'd, and pleasure led the day ;
Again enjoy the genial feast refin'd,
The mutual rapture, or the melting lay !

He would not restless roll his languid eyes,
With piercing pain exalt the cry of woe ;
And cheerless view involving tempests rise,
And vernal roses wither as they blow.

But pale disease exhausts him fast away ;
From him reviving joy will bloom no more ;
No muse melodious cheer the ling'ring day,
'No lovely Clara learn her tender lore !

Dark is the dawning morn, that shone so fair ;
And sad the night that shed the balmy rest ;
And dim the radiant sun's resplendent glare ;
And bleak the field, in flow'ry fragrance dress'd !

Cold-hearted death, with wanly, glaring eye,
Forth from the gloom begius his destin'd way—
Soon will my lifeless frame forgotten lie,
; Resign'd to native earth—a clod of clay !

Haply, with partial tenderness possess'd,
Clara may breathe one secret sigh sincere ;
And friendship strike the sorrow-sobbing breast,
And bid remembrance drop one pious tear !

But not unmindful of the life you love,
Leave each warm wish to cold complaint a prey ;
Follow, where pleasure's soft suggestions move,
And wipe the streamy tribute swift away.

ELEGY IX.

ON THE ANNIVERSARY.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

THE wènd sisters, on the dreary strand,
Forelaw this day, twining the fatal thread,
And would have stopt, but, urg'd by Jove's command,
They spun the rest, and weeping firm'd the deed.

O day accurs'd ! that saw her last adieu,
To maiden honour, innocence, and fame ;
Nor night's black mantle round thy visage drew,
Nor sent one cloud to cover Sylvia's shame !

On thee no morn shall rouse the grateful song,
No gladd'ning sun-beam wake the flow'ry dy ;
But Phœbus roll his rayless car along,
In awful sadness through the mirky sky !

Vile birds obscene shall range the sulphury air,
The boding raven spread her footy plume ;
The shrivell'd bat, the moping owl be there,
And, clattering, add new horror to the gloom,

The hand of dread shall seal the lips of joy,
Pleasure, aghast, forget her siren song ;
Amazement petrify the festive boy,
And freeze the vig'rous spirits of the young.

Terror shall range the fav'rite haunts of love,
Fear's paly'd arm embrace the poplar shade ;
The graves pale 'habitants traverse the grove,
While verdure withers at their baleful tread.

Not even more terrible that dreadful day,
When worlds shall stagger, and creation shake ;
When chaos shall echo, and archangels say,
" Be time no more !—ye sleeping dead awake !"

ELEGY X.

IN THE MANNER OF THE ANCIENTS.

THE zephyrs, wak'd at spring's refreshing gale,
Flap their light wings, and fan the verdant vale ;
Where'er their balmy influence they breathe,
Green grows the grafs, and flow'rets bloom beneath ;

In softer numbers rolling waters flow,
And ev'ry heart is freed from ev'ry woe ;
The feather'd songsters wanton on the spray,
Sport with their mates, and love their lives away ;
From hill to hill the careless shepherd roves,
And gathers garlands for the maid he loves ;
With art he blends the flow'rs of diff'rent hue,
The green, the red, the yellow, and the blue.

O happy swain ! O swain secure of bliss !
The grateful girl will thank you with a kiss.
Come, gentle swain ! I'll join my toil with yours,
I'll weave gay garlands, and I'll gather flow'rs ;
Won with such gifts, Eliza may relent,
Forego her harshness, and her frowns repent ;
Pity my passion, and relieve my pain,
Nor let me sigh the live-long night in vain. [vice,
Ah, flatt'ring thought ! what garland, what decan melt a bosom of unfeeling ice ?

Still might I hope more happy days to see,
Were she but cold and cruel unto me.
But the whole race alike her scorn and hate,
The gods themselves can hardly mend my fate !
Then ply your labour, shepherd, and be blest,
With some fair maiden of more tender breast,
While I indulge, in unavailing woe,
Another's joy, the only joy I know.

ELEGY XI.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

THE clam'rous din of busy day is o'er ;
Night, downy-wing'd, resumes her silent sway

Soft o'er the village sheds the balmy pow'r,
And sooths with cheering dreams the hours away.

The fons of labour o'er the homely straw,
Out-stretch'd at ease, in sweet refreshment doze;
And modest maids from moon-led swains withdraw,

To bathe their lovely limbs in soft repose.

But what avail the silence-shedding eve,
The downy bed, or sleep's refreshing pow'r?
Awake to anguish and inglorious grief,
Sylvia bewails the solitary hour!

Still unbefriended, succourless, and sad,
Her lasting shame arrests her closing eye;
Pensively droops her weary-wakeful head,
And from her bosom bursts a bitter sigh.

Cease, Sylvia! cease the unavailing view,
Quit the sad theme, and close the cry of care!
Can ceaseless sighs unspotted fame renew,
Or sorrows mingled with the midnight air?

Ah no! 'tis past, th' irrevocable doom!
In vain the tear, in vain the plaintive lay!
When black dishonour spreads her cheerless gloom,
Returning fame ne'er sheds one genial ray.

The scornful look, the acrimonious taunt,
Pale envy's sneer, and scandal's busy tongue,
Will still the hapless maiden mourner haunt,
Proclaim her folly, and her shame prolong.

In vain the pitying pray'r, the wish forlorn,
The contrite tear, the penitential sigh;
Alike thy smooth the wreathy brow of scorn,
Melt the proud heart, or loss of fame supply.

Yes, you may sigh, and mourn, and wish in vain,
Nor find a balm to sooth your growing grief;
Contempt will still perpetuate the stain,
Returning virtue vainly beg relief.

No soft distress can melt the stubborn race,
Th' unfeeling heart, the ear that will not hear;
Nor maiden honour, sunk in sad disgrace,
Draw down the cheek the pity-streaming tear.

Yet, while the proud, with rival scorn pursue
Your shameful fall, and, unrelenting, frown,
I'll drop a tear—'tis nature's tribute, due
To other's woes, and frailties not our own.

Yes, I will mourn thee, hapless, charming maid!
Soft o'er thy virtue pour the pitying tear;
Till low in earth thy high-shook frame be laid,
And kind oblivion close thy doom severe!

ELEGY XII.

THE FAIR.

THE sun shines potent from the mid-day sky,
His rays glance dazzling from the tinsel'd head,
The noon-tide fervour smooths the glossy hair,
And aids the bluffs of the panting maid.

The rustic gallants, with their redd'ning prize,
Retire exulting from the dusty street,
Quaff the cool beer, and mix'd with kisses bland,
And forceful sighs, the tender tale repeat.

While coyly passive sits the modest fair,
With breast wild-throbbing, and dejected eye;

Or should she kind adjust the rosy lip,
Or court th' embrace, no envious tell-tale nigh.

On yonder board the bowl and tumbler mark
More costly liquor, and a richer Miss;
Fast by her side the brawny stripling smiles,
Nor values sixpence, while he gains a kiss.

If such the blessings of a low estate,
Who would not joy to guide the shining share,
To whirl the flail, engulf the polish'd spade,
Or tune the reed beside a fleecy care?

Name not the biting blast the peasant bears,
The face embrown'd, the blister-swelling hand;
A day like this rewards an age of toil,
Softens the voice of many a rough command.

But lo! appears amid yon jovial crew
A brow deep-furrow'd by the hand of care!
'Tis Damon's---sorrow blanks his native bloom,
And musing melancholy dulls his air.

In vain Dorinda, fondling, strives to ease
The sorrows ranking in his pensive breast;
In vain his cheek is pal'd with jocund blow,
In vain his hand with artful squeeze is prest.

No kind endearments will the youth return,
Though instant thus she courts the balmy bliss,
And oft averts the radiance of her eyes,
In fond expectation of the ravish'd kiss.

Be gallant, Damon! with the willing maid,
Like others, toy the laughing hours away;
Commix'd with rugged labour's lusty sons,
Why more refin'd and delicate than they?

Can the smooth pebble of the playful boy
For ever curl the surface of the deep?
Can Clara censure what she does not see,
Or read inconstancy upon thy lip?

Still art thou gloomy---consolation's vain:
Can consolation bring the virgin here?
Till then, you feel the weighty hand of woe,
And drop in secret disappointment's tear.

ELEGY XIII.

IMITATED FROM HORACE.

WHEN virtue guards, and innocence protects,
The deadly musket and the sword are vain;
Fortune may frown, surrounding ills perplex,
The smile of conscience smooths the path of pain.

Serenely brave, through Lybia's scorching wilds
The good man walks, nor dreads her brindled brood,

Pursues his way where Indian never builds
His humble hut, and stems Orellan's flood.

A meagre wolf, a fiercer never den'd
In Alpin forest, or Helvetic hill,
Gaunt famine lengthen'd every claw to rend,
And hunger whetted ev'ry tusk to kill;

From me, unarm'd, with hideous howling fled,
Aghast, deserted his defenceless prey,
As in Virginian woods I lonely stray'd,
On Mira mus'd, and plann'd the plaintive lay,

Yes, lovely maid! ev'n here I feel thy pow'r,
Though kingdoms lie, and oceans rage between;
Revere thy virtues, all thy charms adore,
And with thee present at each pleasant scene.

Wherever station'd by the will of Heav'n,
On Lybian deserts, or on Zemblan snows,
Wherever carry'd, or wherever driven,
Still shall thy absence number with my woes.

ELEGY XIV.

The moon shines silv'ry on the limpid stream,
Scarce blush the flow'rs, in fainter dyes array'd;
The howlets, roosting at the friendly beam,
With lazy pinions scour the dusky glade.

The time-struck turret, on yon mountain's brow,
Projecting wide, embrowns the lowly vale;
The spiry column lessens to the view,
And bluish clouds the scatter'd huts conceal.

The younglings, ravis'd from the fleecy-clad ewes,
Wake plaintive bleatings from the turf-built fold;

The moon-scar'd heifer hollow-murm'ring lows,
And drony beetles noisy wings unfold.

The lapwing, clam'rous, seeks her vary'd race,
Along the heath the shoots on sounding wing;
From where yon firs their shaggy tops raise,
The widow'd turtles doleful dirges sing.

It was Eliza! in a night like this,
As calm the air, as clear the conscious moon,
The midnight mourner sung our mutual bliss,
And rivers lull'd us, as they slowly run:

When you around me threw your velvet arms,
Moist roll'd your eye, wild heav'd your snowy
breast,

And gentle spoke, while radden'd all your charms,
Words well remember'd, for you spoke and kiss'd.

"Before Alexis cease, in love's bright garb,
To be Eliza's dearest chief delight,
Shall cease yon twinkling stars--that glorious orb,
With silv'ry radiance to adorn the night."

But what avail, Eliza, all thy vows,
The soft endearments of thy faithless tongue,
Since for another all thy beauty blows,
Heaves thy fair breast, and warbles forth thy song?

The captive, fetter'd with the galling chain,
Immur'd in dungeons, and remote from day,
Should bright-ey'd hope her cheering influence deign,

The fug-surr'd concave echoes to his joy.

But hope no more illumes the future hour,
Despair invests it with her dismal shade;
Soon lay me low shall death's tremendous pow'r,
In long oblivion of the bridal bed.

I need no poison blended with the bowl,
No wound red-streaming from the pointed steel,
Grief chills the living vigour of my soul,
And round my heart death's leaden hand I feel.

ELEGY XV.

THE LINNET.

UNHAPPY and unblest the man,
Whom mercy never charm'd;
Whose heart, insensible and hard,
No pity ever warm'd.

Far from his dangerous abode,
Heav'n! may my dwelling lie;
And from his unrelenting race
Ye little warblers fly.

Though thick'ning hawthorns blend their boughs,
And furze wide spread around,
Yet build not there your downy nests,
Nor trust the faithless ground.

Although his smiling fields produce
The most, the fittest food;
Beware, beware, nor thither bring
Your young, your tender brood.

Behold a sister linnet there,
Laid lifeless on the green!
Fled is the smoothness of her plumes,
And fled her sprightly mien.

The grass grows o'er her ruffled head,
And many a tapping rust;
Though once a fairer, sweeter bird,
Did never grace a bush.

It was but yesterday she sat
Upon a thistle's top,
And ey'd her family pecking round:
Their support and their hope--

Each look, and ev'ry chirp, betray'd
A mother's fond delight;
To see them all so fully fledg'd,
And capable of flight.

Closet in the middle of a bush,
With prickles thick beset,
She brought them forth; no savage boy
The wily nest could get.

Full twenty days, with pious bill,
Their gaping mouths she fed;
Till ripe, they left their hair-lin'd home,
Slow fitting as the led.

Joyful they flap'd their new-grown wings,
But happy for them all!
Had they but kept their native bush,
Nor seen a mother fall.

Blisthesome she sat, and sweetly sang,
Nor dream'd of danger near;
How could she, conscious of no ill?
The guilty only fear.

But, prais'd for villany, alas!
Not innocence can shun,
Nor all a linnet's music ward
The schoolboy's lawless stone.

"Train'd by a rough unfeeling fire,
To cruelty and pride,
An infant ruffian passing by,
The harmless bird espied *."

* This stanza added by Dr. Anderson.

Conceal'd behind an hawthorn hedge,
He took his deadly aim;
Thick thick the feathers floated round,
And flutt'ring down she came.

Full fast her fearful younglings fly,
Into a neighb'ring shade;
Where low they cowl'd disconsolate,
And mourn a mother dead.

Pensive they sit, with hunger pin'd,
Nor dare desert the spray;
Nor know they how to gather food,
No mother leads the way.

ELEGY XVI.

LAURA.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

DEEP in yon vale, where tow'rs the poplar tall,
And winds the slow wave down its crystal way;
A ruin'd castle lifts its hoary wall,
O'erhung with spreading pines, and beeches grey.

Where oft, responsive to the sprightly lay,
The light foot bounded o'er the festive floor;
And, shelter'd from the dog-star's sultry ray,
The jolly lordling led the revel hour.

Where oft, along the cool sequester'd glade,
The glitt'ring female train was seen to rove,
And warbled softly from the woodbine shade,
Were heard the vows of undissembled love.

But there, the song has now forgot to found,
The gentle lovers there no longer sigh;
The mould'ring mansion howlets hoot around;
And echoing bowers to hoding rooks reply.

There, oft, along the solitary green
The frightened shepherd hears the cry of care;
And fire-clad forms, and shadowy shapes, are seen
To walk the wild, or wing the mirky air.

There oft, contemplative of pomp and pow'r,
Time's wasteful rule, and fortune's fleeting day,
The muse-fir'd poet, at this solemn hour,
Sighs deeply sad, and plans the pensive lay.

Perhaps, now musing on the mould'ring wall,
The moss-grown roof, or ivy-mantled gate,
He eyes the crumbling fragments as they fall,
And vindicates the varying forms of fate.

Did Contemplation aid my mounting mind,
Or Fancy deign her eye-enlightening ray,
I oft wou'd loiter there, to thought resign'd,
And pour with rapture forth the moral lay.

But me no gifts the tuneful sisters give,
To grace the song with philosophic lore;
Fond love alone instructs me to deceive,
With wild-notes weak, the solitary hour.

All by the margin of this murmur'ing stream,
That through the lone-vale leads its winding way,

Frequent I roam, in many a wayward dream,
Till twilight robe the glimmering groves with grey.

Till Clara come,—my secret step to trace,
From scenes where joys in dull succession roll;
How sweet to fold her here in chaste embrace,
While rising rapture runs from soul to soul!

But who is she, along the op'ning glade,
Whose gentle form now rushes on my eye!
Low on the bank she leans her pensive head,
And pores upon the streamlet rolling by.

Fled are the charms which health and joy inspire,
Fled the fresh bloom, and fled the mirthful
mien;

Her eye beams mildly with a fading fire,
And slow tears trickle down her cheek serene.

'Tis Laura!—musing melancholy leads
Her frequent footstep o'er the lonely dale,
Where winding waters glide through gloomy shades,
And pensive stock-doves pour their weary wail.

How chang'd from her, in beauty's brighter day,
The pride and envy of each sparkling ball!
No sweeter tongue could chaunt the sprightly lay
No lighter foot could trip the festive hall.

The good, the gay, the graceful, and the young,
Submissive saw their rival charms surpass;
According praises flow'd from ev'ry tongue,
And hope, presaging, promis'd they should last,
And had she known the fly licentious art,
That gilds the praises of the rich and gay,
Free from dishonour's unrelenting smart,
She still had sung her smiling youth away.

But, unperceiv'd, the flatt'ring Flavio strove,
With soft deceit, to soothe her simple ear;
He bade the eye in melting fondness move,
And ev'ry word a winning softness wear.

The blooming prospect breath'd restless guile,
The soft contagion ran through ev'ry pore;
Unhallow'd pleasure wore a wooing smile,
And, warmly wanton, urg'd the siren lore.

She little knew, to dread the tempting round,
Where vernal flow'rets veil their venom'd hue;
But rashly burst th' irremicable bound,
And bade the haunts of hallow'd love adieu!

The fair illusion now dissolves away,
No sprightly music warbles from her tongue!
No gay assemblies wing the jocund day,
No fawning Flavio leads her steps along!

Far from the sparkling ball, the festive shade,
She wastes her days in solitude forlorn!
While weeping loves surround her sleepless bed,
And mourning graces cloud her joyless morn.

So fades a flow'r by deadly drought destroy'd,
Nor breathes one sweet of all its fragrance past;
So droops a tree by wint'ry winds annoy'd,
And sighs its ravish'd honours to the blast.

Entranc'd in pleasure's meretricious bow'r,
Her madness, mirth, and giddy riot rave,
Unfeeling Flavio laughs his conquest o'er,
And boasts the wound his cruel flatt'ry gave.

In vain, revolves her solitary day,
Her sleepless night and ceaseless sigh are vain;
Unheard, unnoted, roll their rounds away,
Nor shed one sorrow o'er the frolic scene.

Pity, perhaps, amid the mad career
Of magic raptures, circling wildly round,
Some future day may disenchant his ear,
And all the bliss of jovial joy confound.

Haply, when age with retrospective eye,
Reviews the arts that stain'd her spotless name,
Remorse may learn to breathe a bitter sigh
O'er the sad relics of her ruin'd fame.

For me, lone wand'ring in the twilight shade,
When solemn stillness holds her lonely sway,
May malice ne'er my musing mind invade,
Nor scorn loud-laughing, claim my gentle lay.

Be mine the heart that melts at others woe,
The hearing ear and pitying eye be mine;
With soft compassion may my bosom glow,
And grief sincere my feeling soul refine.

And may my maid, with sympathizing care,
A frail and feebler virtue full in view,
Just heave one sigh, and drop one tender tear!
To female fortune surely this is due!

So, may regarding heav'n our loves prolong;
So, when we sink in honour'd age to rest,
Some gentle bard may raise the mournful song,
And strew with sweetest flow'rs the feeling breast.

ELEGY XVII.

TO THE MEMORY OF MR. JAMES FISHER*.

SOFT let me tread the hallow'd ground,
A druid's buried near!
And can I pass a druid's grave,
Nor drop a friendly tear?

Short is the path, and broad the way,
That leads unto the tomb;
The flow'rs of youth but seldom bud,
Or wither in their bloom.

The vernal breezes sweetly breathe,
And all their beauties wake;
When, lo! a storm descends, and they
Are ravish'd from the stalk.

Full many a youth in flow'ry prime Indulges hope to-day,
Who never sees to-morrow dawn,
Death's unsuspected prey.

But while I weep in mournful strains,
O'er youthful years laid low;
Still let me pause, nor dare blaspheme
The hand that gives the blow.

How many different ills conspire
To sour the cup of life!

What various passions vex the breast,
With unabating strife!

The woes that harrow up the heart
Increase with ev'ry day;
Death is our only hope, and he
In mercy ends the fray.

* A student of divinity, in the University of Edinburgh, of distinguished abilities, and of agreeable manners, was unfortunately drowned in the Clyde, between Lanark and Stonebyres, in 1769. He was the son of William Fisher, a respectable farmer in Covington. It is necessary to add, that the character of this pleasant, accomplished, and sensible young man, having been mistaken by some people, more prone to censure, than acute to observe, the Presbytery of Biggar denied him his probation; and he was meditating a voyage to America. His body was thrown on the land, about six weeks after the accident, and interred in the church-yard of Covington.

Hail! highly favoured of Heav'n,
Who safely on the shore,
Without concern, behold the wreck
That serv'd to waft you o'er.

But chiefly hail! lamented youth,
On whose green grave I lie;
While round me stalks thy pensive ghost
In fullen majesty.

No more shall malice wound thy fame,
Or envy's tale be spread;
For sacred is the silent grave,
And hallow'd are the dead.

No longer wilt thou, here and there,
An hapless wand'rer roam;
Earth lends her mantle and supplies
An unmolested home.

As, rescu'd from the bleaching wave,
Thy body turns to dust;
Remember'dance off will drop a tear,
And own thy fate unjust.

The traveller who passes by,
With weeping heart will read,
The mournful lay which marks thy tomb,
And soothe thy pensive shade.

EPITAPH*.

HERE lies, upon the lap of earth,
A youth unknown to fame,
Misfortune damp'd his lively parts,
And check'd his noble flame.

To malice, and to groundless hate,
A smile was all he gave;
And from regarding Heaven he gain'd,
In recompence, a grave.

The virtues that adorn'd his youth,
And mark'd his low estate,
Still, reader, keep before your eye,
And strive to imitate.

The frailties of unripen'd age
Consign to native earth;
Nor seek with sacrilegious hand,
To draw these frailties forth.

So may his lamentable fate
Upon you never fall,
Nor death surprize you unawares,
Without a timely call.

ELEGY XVIII.

WRITTEN NEAR THE RUINS OF CUTHALLY CASTLE †.

THE pale-ey'd moon serenes the silent hour,
And many a star adorns the clear blue sky;
While pleas'd I view this desolated tow'r
That rears it's time-struck tott'ring top so high.

Here was the garden, there the festive hall,
This the broad entry, that the crowded street;
The task how pleasant to repair its fall,
And ev'ry stone arrange in order meet!

* See Gray's Elegy written in a country church-yard.
† The ancient seat of Lord Somerville, near Carnwath.

The scheme is finish'd;—ages backward roll'd
And all its former majesty restor'd:—
Imagination hastens to unfold
The pomp, the pleasures of its long lost lord.

The voice of music echoes through the dome,
The jocund rev'lers beat the bending floor;
In golden goblets generous liquors foam,
And mirth, loud laughing, wings the rapid hour.

As fancy brightens, other scenes are seen;
No privacy can 'scape her eagle eye;
She follows lovers to the midnight green,
And throws a glory round them as they lie.

But mark the change!—the music swells no more
And all the dome another prospect wears;
Its master's blood stains the festive floor,
And mirth, loud-laughing, fades into tears.

O, how unlike that gentle swain, who prest
His yielding mistress on the midnight green!
The lover now, in weeds of warriors dreit,
Destruction threat'ning in his furious mien.

Unmov'd, he sees him murder'd in his prime,
And wipes the blood red-reeking on his sword;
His savage mistress hails the horrid crime,
And spurns the carcase of her late-lov'd lord.

But not unpunish'd is the guilty pair,
Imagination hurries on their end;
Behold the lifted Faulchion's deadly glare!
Now purple vengeance hastens to descend.

That stroke became thee!—pious was the deed;
So much an hapless brother's blood requir'd;
In vain let youth, in vain let beauty plead;
They pled for him, but pled, alas! unheard.

Still, still unwear'd, restless fancy roams,
On swelling waves of wild vagary tost,
Calls sheeted spectres from the opening tombs,
And fills the tow'r with many a grisly ghost.

Pensive they stalk in melancholy state,
And to pale Cynthia bare their gaping wounds;
While many a heapy ruin's moss-clad height,
In hollow murmurs all their woes refounds.

But whence that mournful melodious song,
That voice of elegy so sadly slow
The certain symptom of a mortal wrong;
The dismal utterance of an earthly woe?

Haply, some plaintive solitary wretch,
The thread-bare mourner of a thread-bare tale;
Who nightly does the lunar radiance watch,
And join the howlet in his weary wail.

Grieving he sees the ravages of time,
The fleeting nature of terrestrial things.—
"In vain the stately palace tow'rs sublime,
"Low lie the labour'd monuments of kings.

"Where is the darling seat of scepter'd pride,
"Proud Babylon, with all her brazen gates?
"No pensile gardens grace the dreary void;
"There dens the dragon, with his scaly mates

"Where the magnificence of Grecian sanes?
"No more the story'd pyramids we see:
"An heap of stones is all that now remains;
" 'Tis all they are, and all Versailles shall be!

VOL. XI.

"Where the fam'd structures of imperial Rome?
"Cæsarean theatres to contain a world?
"All, all are buried in one mighty tomb,
"All in one gulph of desolation hurl'd!"

Happy, if this should prove his only woe!
The death of theatres scarce could break my rest;

From other causes all my sorrows flow,
Far other troubles tear my bleeding breast.

From love, from love, my nightly wand'ring springs!

No slumber fetters on my grief-worn eye;
Else not the ruin'd monuments of kings
Could tempt my steps below the midnight sky.

ELEGY XIX.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

FALSE and ill-grounded were my hopes,
My expectations vain;
Each step increases my complaints,
And nourishes my pain.

Here will I pause—this shady walk,
That variegated field,
Nor all the lovely landscape round,
Their wonted pleasures yield.

One black and universal cloud
Wide overspreads the whole;
Creation sickens, and is dark
And gloomy as my soul.

Clyde's plaintive wave, the sighing gale,
The warbler of each tree,
Sing one sad melancholy song,
In unison with me.

Why should I struggle with my fate?
Alas! where'er I go,
I groan beneath my sorrows weight,
And bear about my woe.

Yes, here I'll pause—and lay me down,
Nor ever hope relief!
But brood in silence o'er my ills,
And feed my growing grief.

If ye behold me, gentle peers!
Thus lowly as I lie,
Seek not to raise me from this turf,
In pity pass me by.

So may ye never while ye live
My many mis'ries prove,
And never never, weep forlorn
A luckless latent love.

Unhappy he! who danger sees,
Nor can the danger shun;
Who looks on beauty when it smiles,
And hopes, and is undone.

Yes, Clara smil'd; the smile I caught;
Red was her blush of shame;
But glad I caught the infant love,
And fann'd it to a flame.

Freely I took her to my arms,
Nor once of distance dream'd;
But every coming day and night
One scene of rapture deem'd!

E. g.

But soon, O! soon, the vision past,
The sweet enchantment broke,
Too soon we from this fancy'd bliss
To real woe awoke!

Disjoin'd by destiny's award,
Without one last farewell,
Far, far from the delightful scene
Disconsolate we dwell.

Disjoin'd! for ever if disjoin'd,
Of what avail this breath?
Better the cov'ring of a sod,
The dark cold house of death.

Yet, yet a little, and I leave
Mortality's low sphere;
Another world!—Say, Clara, will
You meet your Damon there?

No:—health and happiness be thine,
Thine pleasures ever new;
And while I live, my life shall be
One long, long sigh for you.

ELEGY XX.

HER starry mantle night aloft displays,
And all heav'n's azure reddens with her rays;
Silence and quiet stillness reign around,
Save where lorn Medwan sends a fullen sound:
The weary swains in silent slumbers lie,
Mute is each tongue, and clos'd is ev'ry eye;
All nature sleeps!—but still this troubled breast
Broods o'er its sorrows, and denies me rest;
Awakes me nightly to lament my woe,
Where green reeds rustle as the breezes blow.
O, Mira! come, O, cruel! come and see
The many mis'ries I endure for thee;
For thee, extended on this turf I lie,
Weep this big tear, and heave this mournful sigh.
'Tis thy disdain, my unrelenting fair!
'Thou bluest my breast, and rends my hapless hair:
Your chilling scorn, O! must I ever prove?
You sure might pity whom you cannot love;
Might heave one sigh, when all my sighs you see,
And give one tear of all I shed for thee.
Hold, hold, rash maid! my youth unripen'd spare,

Another frown will drive me to despair:
Will bring me immaturely to the grave,
And hurl me headlong in the rolling wave.

ELEGY XXI.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

GUILT's grim attendants crowd my loathing sight,
And lordly reason scorns my lowly love;
But all in vain! it pleads prescription's right,
No pow'r can quench it, and no force remove.

My thoughtless childhood suck'd the precious bane,

With growing years the infant passion grew;
Now twisted to the fibres of my heart,
It laughs at reason with a scornful brow.

Though shame with redd'ning cheeks obscure her charms,

And infamy her native beauties shroud;
The lovely Sylvia pictur'd in my breast,
Like mid-day sun dispels the dark'ning cloud.

The smile of youth still haunts my asking thought;
I hear the accents of the yielding maid,
And shrink below prevailing passion's pow'r,
What wife men dictated, and fages laid.

ELEGY XXII.

AT winter's numbing touch, the fields
Lie wither'd to a waste;
The trees their naked boughs extend,
Obnoxious to the blast.

The lifeless leaves blow here and there,
The sport of ev'ry wind;
And here and there the wood-birds sit,
But can no shelter find.

The skirting mountains, lately ting'd
With azure's airy hue,
In winter's hoary mantle clad,
Rise dazzling to the view.

Love, erst admirer of the plain,
To cottages retires,
Prevents the slumbers of the maid,
And kindles warm desires.

In the unfinish'd furrow lies
The plough, nor wounds the field;
The restless rivers cease to run,
In icy durance held.

Shorn of his rays, scarce does the sun
His glaring orb reveal;
But sudden sets:—Night fast behind
Unfolds her sable veil.

But, fields, rejoice! Behold the spring
(Though distant) genial glow;
Behold her verdant mantle spread,
Behold her blossoms blow!

Behold, the warblers to the wood
A-nesting fast repair;
Behold, disporting in the shade,
The loves and graces bare!

In mid-day splendor, see the sun
Melt down the mountain snow!
Impetuous, on every side,
The muddy torrents flow!

But in misfortune's cold embrace
No comfort smiles on me;
Joy saddens at my look, I live
New mis'ries but to see.

Before me ev'ry prospect low'rs;
Not one propitious ray
Of hope beams on my darken'd soul,
To light me on my way.

Mira is absent!—all the same,
A field of flow'rs or snow;
Distant and neighb'ring fens afford
Like nourishment to woe.

ELEGY XXIII.

TO MIRA.

In the Manner of Ovid.

In fruitful Clydesdale stands my native seat,
 Mean, but not fordid, though not spacious, neat;
 In Clydesdale, noted for its lovely dames,
 And meadows, water'd with irriuous streams;
 For juicy apples, and for mellow pears,
 Firm-footed horses, and laborious steers.

In vain would Phæbus cleave the earth with heat,
 Or scorching Sirius desolation threaten;
 In vernal pride still smiles the varied scene,
 The fields still flourish, and the grafs is green;
 Refreshing rills meander all around,
 And flow'ry turfs still shade the fruitful ground.

But what are meads or racy fruits to me,
 When far remov'd from happiness and thee?
 Each charming prospect changes to a wild,
 And desolation reigns in ev'ry field.

Mira is absent!—though I dwelt above,
 'The dismal thought would sadden ev'ry grove,
 Would change the hue of each immortal flow'r,
 And star-stuck arches would appear to low'r.
 But, wert thou there, the windy Alps would please,
 Or Greenland, guarded with her glassy seas;
 Thy presence would disarm the northern blast,
 And melt the mountains of eternal frost.

How doubly pleasant, walking by thy side,
 Were Medwan's meadows, and the banks of Clyde!
 From blooming furze the linnets' matin lay,
 Or lark's, swift borne on early winds away!

Come to my arms, my mistresses and my wife!
 Nor waste the morning of too short a life.
 Where'er she comes, ye swelling hills subside!
 And verdant valleys smile on ev'ry side!

ELEGY XXIV.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

THE wakeful clock proclaims the midnight hour,
 The list'ning ghosts obey the solemn sound;
 Now flocking forth from restless graves they pour,
 And now they range their melancholy round.

Where'er the lonely wood-encircled dome
 Uprears its mould'ring moss-grown roof on high,
 With footstep drear they sweep the silent gloom,
 And wake pale horrors on the sleeper's eye.

Perhaps the spot where first they drew their breath,
 That saw them taste the sweets of cheerful day;
 The spot where some fell ruffian gave them death,
 And tore them from their blooming hopes away.

Faith by the stream whose drowsy waters flow
 Darksome and dreary through the mirky vale,
 Pensive they stalk, and murmur as they go
 Unwearied wallings to the echoing gale.

Perhaps, when summer led the lengthen'd day,
 And shed resistless round the sultry beam;
 Languid they left th' insufferable ray,
 To plunge and wanton in the cooling stream.

Fearless of fate, with far unequal arm,
 Perhaps they prideful fought the farther shore;
 In vain they fought,—in vain the loud alarm!—
 The wave was ruthless, and they rose no more.

With fullen step, and terror-darting mien,
 What crowds from ocean's oozy depths repair!
 How many earth's unhallow'd fields resign,
 To wail unnoted to the desert air!

From the lone church-yard's consecrated gloom,
 Where grafs-green graves in decent order heave;
 The numerous victims of a milder doom
 Their narrow cells with pensive pleasure leave.

Perhaps they hie them to their native grove,
 Some fav'rite walk, or long-frequented scene;
 Perhaps along the silent street they rove,
 Or lightly trip it o'er the vacant green.

Perhaps (since memory of an earthly fire
 Yet warms the bosom of the sep'rate mind)
 They hover o'er some hoary-headed fire,
 Or heart-dividing friend they left behind.

Or, as the rolling hours return the night,
 In vehicles of air, unseen, they rove
 Round some lorn maid, with fondly ling'ring flight,
 Who mourns with many a sigh her ravish'd love;

No closing walls their airy forms restrain,
 No rising hills nor rolling waves divide;
 No dread have they of faucy-wreath'd disdain;
 Nor fear the frown of unrelenting pride.

Delightful talk!—by me envy'd in vain!—
 Far, far remov'd, I plan the plaintive lay,
 Where rising mountains rear their brows between,
 And rolling waters mark the distant way.

And high-born pride, regards with scornful eye
 The humble swain, the youth of low degree;
 And deaf to love, and nature's forceful cry,
 Exiles unhonour'd poverty and me.

Hence Clara wastes away her virgin bloom,
 On distant plains, in solitude obscure,
 Hence, all forlorn! I watch the midnight gloom,
 And hence these melancholy musings pour.

ELEGY XXV.

TO ELIZA:

FAIR is Eliza in her lover's eye;
 No maiden on our plains is half so fair;
 I gaze with rapture on your charms, but sigh
 To think that others may that rapture share.

I can't endure the cringing fawning race
 That bow around you wherefoe'er you go;
 Contract your sphere, be cautious how you please;
 The man that smiles upon you is my foe.

Away, the empty bustle of a crowd,
 The languid star'ling pleasures of a town;
 But take, O take us some sequester'd wood,
 To unknown bliss, or but to angels known.

I do not seek the glory of the vain,
 Nor court I envy from the stolen glance;
 Poor is the gift, and little does he gain,
 Who leads a civil mistress in the dance.

Be mine the silent ecstasies of love;
 Too nice for utterance; too resist'd for view;
 I'm blest indeed! (thus far my wishes rove)
 If only blest with solitude and you.

ELEGY XXVI.

OCTOBER.

DATE does the sun begin his shorten'd race,
Languid, although no cloud obscures the view;
The nipping hoar-frost veils the shrivell'd grafs,
Where wav'd, crewhile, the cool refreshing dew.

Cold from the north his hooked atoms calls,
And ev'ry field in firmer fetters binds;
Rustling in show'rs the wither'd foliage falls,
Slow from the tree, the sport of eddy winds.

The birds, all flocking from their summer haunts,
On the rough stubbles pick the costly grain;
His deadly snares the cruel fowler plants,
And intercepts the wing that flaps in vain.

Hard is their fate—if we may call it hard,
To shun the rigid winter's coming storms,
When famine threatens in the farmer's yard,
And drifted snow the desert field deforms.

The most familiar of all birds of song,
Domestic redbreast, on the window sits,
While, seldom seen, though whirring all day long,
The active wren from hedge to hedge still flits.

In signs like these, the ploughman wisely reads,
Approaching winter, and provides a wife;
The joyless season passes o'er their heads,
Loft and unmark'd amid the sweets of life.

But wretched he, whom all the long dark night
Fate on a lonely couch has doom'd to lie!
Does Mira frown at what I trembling write?
If Mira frown, that wretched swain am I.

ELEGY XXVII.

TO MIRA.

Thy preference, lovely maid! exalts
My breast with harmless glee;
And the decayed face of joy
Renews at sight of thee.

Though harsh the utterance of my lips,
And fault'ring be my tongue,
Thy beauties harmonize my lay,
And linnets learn my song.

Incurtain'd in the shades of night,
I meditate thy charms;
Think on thy form, and slumb'ring feel
The pressure of thy arms.

Waking, the phantom fades away,
And scarce delusion seems—
O! hasten on the wings of wind,
And realize my dreams.

The sun arises, and the swain
Unto his labour hies;
The swathy herbage furs the mead,
The russet hay-cocks rise.

He downward tends on sloping wheels,
His glory gilds the west,
The joyful rustic leaves the rake,
And hastens home to rest.

But, in thy absence, unto me
No season brings repose

Alike, at morn or dusky eve,
I wrestle with my woes.

ELEGY XXVIII.

TO DAMON.

On his having addit'd himself to the Study of Natural History.

Come, Damon! come, enough of wisdom's ways,
Of antic antres, and of grottos wild;
Suppose a daffodil design displays,
Or lily, lady of the flow'ry field.

Suppose a mite, like potentates and kings,
Can plead antiquity, and boast of birth;
That not a mushroom or a maggot springs
From the cold womb of uncreative earth.

Philosophy, and idle whim, away!
What is a mushroom or a mite to you?
"They mark intelligence."—But, Damon! say,
To love and nature is there nothing due?

Must Clara's beauties in their blossom fade?
The tears of sorrow dim her lovely eyes?
While you, insensible, disturb your head
With the genealogy of grubs and flies!

Recal her form, and feed on fancy's breast,
Unheard let Clodio tell his tasteless tale;
Her blooming beauties a divine repast,
An endless banquet, an exhaustless meal!

If fair to fancy, how exceeding fair
When given unclouded to your lawless gaze!
It comes—behold the bridal day! prepare
A long farewell to wisdom and her ways.

ELEGY XXIX.

CLARA TO DAMON.

Art, cruel change! from gentle to severe;
Change ever provés unfriendly to the fair;
Show me the man, the wond'rous man, whose mind
Alters to kinder sentiments from kind?
No, there is no such man; or, if there be,
Who would not wish the youth they love were het
What maid would think she overdid her part,
To grasp the dear inconstant to her heart,
Discard each grim-ey'd guardian of her charms,
And fold, and closer fold him in her arms!

'Tis vision all! the same severe decree
Has ruin'd womankind that ruins me;
Fram'd, delicately fram'd, for social bliss,
We feel each finer passion in excess;
In love at length each female friendship ends;
We scarce distinguish lovers from our friends;
Nor have we learn'd, with philosophic pride,
From our's another's mis'ry to divide.
But man is fashion'd in a rougher mould,
Insensible at best, and always cold;
His lumpish soul no gen'rous wish inspires,
No pity melts, no heart-felt rapture fires;
Or, if for once it kindle into praise,
How soon the momentary flash decays!
Scarce have we time to hail the dawning light,
Ere the weak meteor vanishes in night;
With eager eyes we search around in vain,
And think to see it glimmering again!

Alas, how foolish! 'tis for ever gone,
 With the delightful hour in which it shone!
 Ah me! and must I never more prolong
 The night, in list'ning to my Damon's song!
 Alas! can love admit of no decrease,
 That too, too little! yet be render'd less?
 My happiness requires it should be so;
 It must, it shall! though worlds should answer, No.
 Yes, Damon, yes, a very weak excuse
 Will screen the silence of your faithless muse;
 Tell me on systematic plains you stray,
 "Borne on the wings of wisdom far away."
 But wherefore thus disturb my quiet? why
 Regard your failings with too nice an eye?
 Though gross be the deceit, if you deceive,
 I pledge my maiden honour to believe.

ELEGY XXX.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

YET onward leads the length'ning way,
 Perplexed and forlorn;
 And chilly blows the mountain gale,
 Around me restless borne.
 No vernal verdure, fresh and fair,
 Waves on the wavy ray,
 That frequent streaks yon gath'ring gloom,
 And frequent fades away.
 I see, wide-scatter'd here and there,
 Along the dark-brown waste,
 The faded furze, the wither'd fern,
 The rock moss-clad and vast.
 I hear the wild birds' wailing notes,
 Remurm'ring o'er the heath;
 Now to and fro they flocking flit,
 Or cower the bush beneath.
 In awful blackness rising round,
 I see the brewing blast;
 It howls from yonder hill's brown brow,
 And sweeps the sounding waste.
 Near, and more near, my pensive eye
 Remarks its rapid way;
 Now less'ning sinks yon grey-grown rock,
 Now viewless swims away.
 Restless night is falling fast,
 To fill the frowning scene,
 And leaves no sheltering shade, to ward
 The swift-descending rain.
 I'll sit me down upon the heath,
 And wipe away this tear—
 The chill blast rages ruthless by,
 And horror meets my ear.
 Ah me! the big round briny drop
 Still gathers in my eye,
 And, from my boding breast expires
 Th' involuntary sigh!
 The twilight hour, with horror fraught,
 Is fleeting fast away;
 And fruitless flows the falling tear,
 That weeps my long delay.
 In vain across th' accustom'd green
 May Clara look for me!

Nor her, nor the dear face of man,
 My eyes will ever see!
 Surpris'd along the mid-way waste,
 Where driving tempests blow,
 The stern resistless stroke of fate
 Will lay my body low.
 I feel, I feel the chilling storm
 Obstruct my lab'ring breath;
 My shiv'ring limbs will soon be pale
 And lifeless on the heath.
 Unseen, unwept, no winding shroud
 Will my cold corse receive;
 No sad procession bear me on,
 To fill my father's grave;
 No rising stone reveal my name,
 Or make my merit known;
 No sculptur'd elegiac lay
 Lament my early doom.

Extended o'er the howling heath,
 To bleaching blasts a prey;
 The wearing waste of with'ring winds
 Will moulder me away.
 If e'er to thee, in happier hour,
 My pray'r delightful rose,
 Pity my maid, mysterious heav'n!
 And swift my sorrows close.

ELEGY XXXI.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

BEHOLD, ye fair! yon melancholy maid,
 The tear just bursting from her downcast eye,
 Who on the willow leans her pensive head,
 "And pores upon the brook that babbles by."
 She, once like you, did laugh the hours away,
 Was often merry, and was seldom grave;
 Walks were not wanting to deceive the day,
 Nor love, I ween, to cheer the gloomy eve.
 The flow'rs of beauty blossom'd on her cheek,
 Men thought her witty, and she thought so too;
 She now and then would think, but oft'n'r speak,
 And always did as other virgins do.
 When, lo! she fell, for passion was her guide,
 From seeming pleasure into real shame:—
 Sncer not, ye flaunting progeny of pride!
 In some black hour your fate may be the same!
 Weigh well your actions, ponder ev'ry deed;
 For future fame and future fortune, fear;
 And follow not where pow'ful passions lead,
 For sell repentance rages in the rear.

ELEGY XXXII.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

EXIL'D the social joys of life,
 I wander here forlorn,
 Around me headlong torrents roar,
 Nor gleams the distant morn.
 Why leaps my coward heart with fear?
 Though death besets my way
 No loving wife, no prattling babe,
 Bewails my long delay.
 Hackney'd in woe, my joyless youth
 Dissolves in briny tears;
 And withers on my downy cheek,
 The bloom of boyish years.

My earliest love, my only joy,
 Deserted virtue's lore;
 Ingulph'd in infamy she lies,
 To rise, alas! no more.

Tempests drive on, collect your rage,
 Howl, genius, of the storm;
 Extend, ye rivers! o'er the waste;
 Come, Death, in any form.

Thanks, thanks, officious pow'r! you come;
 I feel thy friendly dart;
 Cold chills the current of my life,
 And freezes to my heart.

Farewell, thou canker of my hopes!
 My ruin'd maid! adieu;
 Welcome, forgetfulness of woe,
 And sleep for ever new.

ELEGY XXXIII.

TO CLARA.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

DEPRIV'D of all that mortals hold most dear,
 The world's free converse, and the social ear;
 Depriv'd of ev'ry pleasurable scene,
 The forest's foliage, and the meadow's green;
 Where can this wretched bosom find repose?
 Without is wildness, and within are woes:
 To whom dissolve in sorrow's simple lay,
 And softly sigh its miseries away?
 To whom but thee, where all my wishes tend,
 My lovely mistress, and my faithful friend:
 To whom but thee, of all the gods have left,
 The greatest blessing, and the latest gift.

Books, unperceiv'd, may steal the lagging hour,
 And fear the wounds they strive in vain to cure,
 May for a moment sooth the troubled mind,
 But still remains a dreadful void behind;
 The pliant passions, hinder'd in their course,
 Collect their rage, and strike with double force;
 Their waves repres'd, with double fury roll,
 O'erwhelm, confound, and stupify the soul.

Hard are the wayward fates, that thus oppose
 A mortal wight against immortal foes;
 That, unconcern'd, behold me from afar
 Waging an endless, an unequal war;
 Hard is my fate! yet never had my cry
 Impreach'd the rigid ruler of the sky;
 Never my murmurs, my complaints, been heard,
 Had thy sweet voice my drooping spirits cheer'd;
 Thy hands sustain'd me fainting in the field,
 My bleeding wounds thy wisdom's balsam heal'd.

Not such the happiness awaits my days,
 For ever banish'd from thy beauty's blaze;
 Weigh'd down by life's whole complicated woes,
 Never to rise from whence none ever rose!
 I slide, by all unnoted, to the tomb;
 Tir'd of the present, court a world to come.

Whatever my hopes, forgive this parting tear!
 They soon shall wither on the mournful bier;
 Soon with this crazy frame for ever lost,
 Hide their aspiring turrets in the dust.

Farewell, dear maid! conjecture what I feel,
 In youth to bid the maid I love farewell:
 Farewell, dear maid! and never may it thou be
 A pining, plaintive, dying wretch, like me.

ELEGY XXXIV.

FLED are the blossoms of each tree,
 And blasted ev'ry bough;

Silent and gloomy is the grove,
 And solitary now,
 In vain I seek each fav'rite spot,
 That gave delight before;
 Dismal each fav'rite spot appears,
 And gives delight no more.

A prospect comfortless and sad,
 Long lengthens all around;
 And ev'ry passing streamlet gives
 A melancholy sound.

If on the azure of the east
 I fix my wand'ring eye,
 Love, grief, and Mira, fill my soul;
 I rave, I mourn, I cry.

And can I look to where the sun
 Directs his ev'ning ray,
 Nor call to mind an hapless friend,
 Who lingers life away?

Yes, yes, I yield, unhappy youth!
 Whene'er I think of thee;
 I yield the dearly purchas'd prize,
 Superior misery.

But though unequal in the strife,
 I some distinction claim;
 Ills, and misfortunes not a few,
 Adorn my growing name.

Fate's iron pencil has engrav'd
 On either pensive brow,
 Some leading features of distress,
 Some well-touch'd tints of woe.

Alike black envy's blasting fang
 And rooted spite we prove;
 Alike we shed the secret tear
 Of disappointed love.

Alike, deceitful hope usurps
 Our unsuspecting breast;
 An artful minister of woe,
 Ingenious to molest.

An endless crowd of ills, a sad
 Variety of pain,
 Cross' issues, and tormenting fears,
 Compose her dreadful train.—

Thrice happy they, who gain from heav'n
 A calm unruffled life,
 Of tearless sorrow, silent woe,
 Uninterrupted grief!

Abstracted from this busy scene,
 Agree'd with all around,
 They feed from life, unfelt the pain,
 Incurable the wound.

Such be the tenor of my days,
 And such my latter end;
 And such (he asks no more) may heav'n
 Bestow upon my friend.

ELEGY XXXV.

ON COMING TO THE COUNTRY.

HAIL, dear companions of my youthful days!
 Frequented hills and natal valleys, hail!

* Dr. Anderson was then at Monkland Well, near Glasgow, for the recovery of his health.

Peace rest around.—while I incessant raise
My plaintive voice, and woes unweary'd wail.

Peace rest around!—the only boon I crave,
Is, undisturb'd, thy unhappier stream to stray;
To muse unnoted in the cool of eve,
Unnoted court the dawning of the day.

Why would you ask a melancholy man,
To number ills th' unhappy only prove?
The dismal tale would turn the wanton wan,
Infectious sorrow seize the group of love.

No, in my bosom let them ever rest;
A bosom that rejoices in the smart:
I grasp the dear destroyer to my breast,
And feed the passion which must break my heart.

Yes, Mira! yes, I hug thy faithless form:
See happy days,—days never meant for me!
Yet still I feel the rising, raging storm,
'Tis transport, joy, and death, to think on thee!

Death! let thy deep-dy'd purple garment flow,
The bloody dagger threaten in thy hand;
I fear thee not, array'd in weeds of woe;
Of woe, awak'd by Mira's own command.

ELEGY XXXVI.

By Medwan's solitary banks,
In vain I pensive stray;
And recollect each happy spot
Where lovely Mira lay.

Sad is the comfort, small the joy,
Remembrance can bestow;
A momentary gleam at most;
Short interval of woe!

Each waving willow brings to mind
Some fleeting pleasure past;
And ev'ry blooming flow'r recalls
Some joy for ever lost.

Ev'n Medwan, as in fullen haste
Her gloomy waters roll,
Points back to former days, and feeds
The sorrows of my soul.

Awak'd by mem'ry, sleeping cares
With keener violence wound:
Each lowly lily bears a thorn,
And briars are spread around.

Ye pleasing, lonely scenes! farewell;
Nor wake my waning woes;
Still let me shun your dang'rous path,
Nor hazard my repose.

Far, far remov'd from all your snares,
By unobserv'd degrees,
My troubled soul may sink again
To melancholy ease.

ELEGY XXXVII.

On the Loss of the Aurora, with the Indian Supervisors, 1769.

ARE there, who, lost to all their country's charms,
To friends, companions, and their native home,
Who burst, unfeeling, from a parent's arms,
And, mad for gold, in foreign regions roam?

Mean is their aim, if gold alone allures;
If glory fires not, nor their country's love:
On such the Indian nightly curses pours,
And calls red vengeance from the courts above.

Alas! how many, lost to honest fame,
On Guinea's coast have courted black disgrace;
Have render'd infamous a Briton's name,
By lording lawless o'er a feeble race!

How many, ev'n on India's farthest shore,
Have robb'd the helpless native of his own!—
Not such the generous band, Aurora bore
To honest industry and fair renown!

Each breast beat faithful in its country's cause,
Each heart was warm with love of human kind;
Keen to establish equitable laws,
They chode the failing breeze and lagging wind.

Not always in the bark where virtue sails,
Does smooth-brow'd safety at the helm preside;
Not always is she fann'd with prosperous gales,
Since death's dark waves oft dash against her side.

Since oft on rocks, to charts and maps unknown,
The hapless vessel suffers sudden wreck:
Nor is it virtue that can save alone,
When all around the wat'ry pillars break.

Were virtue-pow'rful o'er the stormy deep,
Aurora on its bosom ne'er had lain;
Nor mothers taught their infant babes to weep
For fathers tossing on the wat'ry main*.

ELEGY XXXVIII.

ON Medwan's solitary shore
No gaudy blossoms blow;
And silent is its leaf-lin'd bow'r,
Or but repeats my woe.

The fairy forms that revell'd here,
In fancy's fair array,
No longer soothe the list'ning ear
With love's alluring lay.

Sullen they leave their fav'rite scene,
To sorrow's cruel crew;
But fate prepares another plain,
Ye friendly says! for you.

Behold, by Tweed's translucent stream,
Eliza builds your bower!
There shall you feed the secret flame,
While singing swains adore.

But me, what guardian god shall guide
Through this perplexing path?
Here walks wan Want, with giant stride,
And here Despair and Death.

In woe's wild windings, luckless lost,
The fruitless search I drop—
She dwells not on this dreary coast;
No happiness I hope.

The gods no fairer fortune give
I'll bless the breeze that blows;

* In December 1769, the ship arrived at the Cape of Good Hope, from whence it sail'd soon after, but was never heard of afterwards. It is generally supposed to have taken fire, and that all the crew perished.

And spend the ling'ring life I live
In friendship with my woes.
With Want, I'll speak of former days;
With Death, of bliss above;
But, with Despair, I'll wond'ring trace
The luckless lot of love.

ELEGY XXXIX.

FATE, when you forc'd me from the weeping
maid,

Patient I bare it, nor did once repine:—
"Although depriv'd of love's solace, (I said),
The sacred joys of friendship shall be mine;

"Above each trifling wish, each low concern,
In peaceful solitude's untrodden path,
With virtuous Damon wisdom's ways I'll learn,
And coolly wait the timely stroke of death."

"Grant, while I live, the converse of my friend,
And, O, be few the days I'm doom'd to live."—
Such was my pray'r, in lowliness of mind,
No greater boon I ask'd the gods to give.

In vain I pray'd, my woes were not complete,
Nor yet the cup of misery was crown'd;—
Poverty lurk'd in solitude's retreat,
And push'd me, ling'ring, from the hallow'd
ground.

Where shall I wander? to what distant shore,
Where friendship's heav'nly radiance never shone,
Carry this woe-worn carcase, never more
To feel its influence as I have done?

What generous hand will point me out the dome
Where independence and each virtue dwell?
Through India's sultry regions shall I roam,
Or cow'r content in the hermit's cell!

Vain is the search: for, who will condescend
To guide the wand'rings of a wretch so mean!
Restore, kind Heav'n! my best, my only friend,
And let want sweep me from the puzzling scene.

ELEGY XL.

BENEATH this mossy oak's embow'ring shade,
Where Clyde majestic rolls his lengthen'd stream,

I've found a seat for tender sorrow made,
On which the sun ne'er shed one genial gleam.

Hail, gentle genius of this mournful bow'r!
Who mingles tears with ev'ry plaintive guest;
Say, did you ever, by your friendly pow'r,
Serenè the passions of so sad a breast?

Say, skill'd in woes which ancient lovers bare,
Lovers to black oblivion long confin'd;
Can all their complicated ills compare
With my unmingled misery of mind?

When future lovers shall lament their fate,
Beneath the shadow of this aged tree,
The dismal story of my woes relate,
They'll cease to sorrow when they think of me

Tell them, Eliza was my earliest love;
Tell, how my humble passion she repay'd;
When lawless ruffians rush'd into the grove,
And forc'd to distant climes the hapless maid—
Then onward lead them to yon hillock's height,
Whose grass long-rankling drinks the fullen
wave,
And, weeping, bid the verdant turf lie light,
And plant the wat'ry willow round my grave.
So may they all escape my timeless end,
And never, never, my misfortunes feel;
Ne'er lose a mistress,—ne'er lament a friend,—
Nor bare their bosoms to the fatal steel.

ELEGY XLI.

FAREWELL, companions of my secret sighs,
Love-haunted streams, and vales besprent with dew!

Pensive, I see the ridgy hills arise,
Which must for ever hide you from my view.

A fleeting shadow was my promis'd peace,
The baseless fabric of a dream, my rest;
I laid me down in confidence of ease,
And meedless sorrow burst my bleeding breast.

See, yonder fleets the visionary scheme,
The fond illusion of a simple mind—
The sweets of love,—the solitary stream,
The fragrant meadow, and the whispering wind.

Say, my Eliza, was it fancy'd bliss
You us'd to picture by yon falling rill?
O, say, where is it?—must it end in this?
O, still deceive, and I'll believe you still!

Say, fortune yet has happier days in store;
Days big with transport, and with raptures new;
O! say I'm your's; I ask, I hope no more;
But only say so, and I'll think it true.

But whither wanders my distemper'd brain,
On seas of fancy and vagary tost?
Before me lies a bleak extended plain,
And love and rapture are for ever lost.

ELEGY XLII.

TO MIRA.

KNEELING before the Majesty of Heav'n,
For gilded roofs my prayer never rose;
I ask'd no fertile field's delicious fruit,
Nor bent a wish to all a Florio plow,

With thee to share the calmer joys of life,
On thy soft bosom wear my age away;
And timely tott'ring on the verge of fate,
Look back with pleasure on each well-spent day.

I ask'd no more:—Of what avail to me
The transient honours of a fleeting hour;
The cumb'rous trappings of a large estate,
The painted hanging, and the marble floor?
Can riches blunt the dreadful dart of pain;
Or check misfortune in her mid career?
Dispel the terrors of approaching fate;
Or snatch their owner from the mournful bier?

Let want expose me to the world's contempt,
 And poverty in all her rags invest ;
 Return,—and let the foolish world despise ;
 Return,—in spite of poverty I'm blest.
 If Heav'n, averse, reject my earnest pray'r,
 And fortune fix me in these distant plains,
 Cease, cease, dread sisters ! your ungrateful toil,
 And burn the luckless thread that yet remains.

ELEGY XLIII.

TO MIRA.

In the Manner of Tibullus.

WHY, Mira ! why this useless waste of time ?
 To round your nails with artificial care,
 To smear your lovely locks with sullome grime,
 And add false ringlets to your glossy hair ?
 The irksome task of meditating drest,
 Each sacrifice to fashion's labour lost ;
 The more you strive to please, you please the less,
 When unadorned, then adorn'd the most.
 Let the stale virgin, with cosmetic art,
 To wonted bloom the faded cheek restore ;
 In gorgeous garments strive to gain a heart,
 Who dares not trust her native beauties more.
 Rouge, and false ringlets certainly were meant
 For cheeks turn'd yellow, and for locks turn'd gray ;
 The fringed petticoat, to hide within't
 A leg that's clumsy, or a foot that's splay.
 Some hoary beldam, in the natal hour,
 Mumbled her incantations o'er your head ;
 Some beldam, skill'd in every simple's pow'r,
 That grows unnoted in the vernal mead.
 I wrong your sacred beauties, and profane
 Their mystic energy to raise desire ;
 Yes, magic spells and potent herbs were vain,
 Your native charms, without enchantment, fire.
 Come, Mira ! come, while in your beauty's pride
 Indulge to love ; away with meaner things ;
 In raptures lost, in love's embraces ty'd,
 How silly grandeur, and the wealth of kings !
 Let driv'ling dotards buy the stately dame,
 To watch the foibles of declining years ;
 To wipe with duteous hand the rosy phlegm,
 And wrap the flannel cov'ring round their ears.
 To listen sleepless to the midnight moan,
 Requires a jointure, and a rich reward ;
 And fay what settlement can'er atone
 For the gruff violence of a grisly beard ?
 But to enclasp the polish'd limbs of youth,
 To share the secrets of a tender breast,
 Where every thought is constancy and truth,
 And each wish rises to make Mira blest !
 Sublimier happiness can titles yield ?
 Can wealth, or grandeur, greater meed bestow ?
 Unbias'd nature scorns the blazon'd field,
 And ev'ry finer feeling answers, No.

ELEGY XLIV.

WHILE sad I stray in solitary grief,
 Where wild woods thicken, and where waters
 flow ;

No hope prophetic ministers relief,
 Nor thought presaging mitigates my woe.
 The dismal prospect thick'ning ills deform,
 Black, and more black, each coming day appears ;
 Remov'd from shelter, I expect the storm,
 And wait the period of deceitful years.
 Soon may it come :—and, O, may Mira soon
 Forget the pleasures she has left behind ;
 All that at first her virgin graces won,
 And all that since engag'd her youthful mind.
 What is Alexis ? what his boasted love,
 The banks of Medwan, and the vales around ?
 But a fair blossom in the dreamer's grove,
 That sudden sinks, and never more is found.
 Yes, yes, dear maid ! the happiness of youth
 Is but the rev'ry of a real dream ;
 We catch delusions in the guise of truth ;
 A lover's raptures are not what they seem.
 But yet a little, and the eye of age
 Dissolves the phantoms to their native air ;
 A new creation opens on the sage,
 Another passion, and another fair.
 Forgive my weakness, for 'tis surely weak,
 To teach, and yet despise the prudent part ;
 I feel, alas ! I feel it as I speak ;
 This is a language foreign to my heart.
 Her rigid lecture reason reads in vain,
 Cold are her precepts, and her comforts cold ;
 I would not barter poverty and pain
 For Clodio's wisdom, or for Florio's gold.
 One only boon is all I ask of thee ;
 When in the mansion of the peaceful plac'd,
 O, do not shed one precious tear for me,
 But let my sorrows in oblivion rest !
 As in the bosom of unwater'd wilds
 A lowly lily languishes unseen,
 And soon to drought, unknown, unnoted, yields,
 Leaving no traces that it once had been.

ELEGY XLV.

YE dreams of bliss, and flatt'ring hopes, that wont
 With momentary joy to ease my care,
 Where are ye now ? and what is your amount ?
 Vexation, disappointment, and despair.
 Well pleas'd, I saw your airy bubbles blown,
 Seemingly fair, and deck'd with many a ray ;
 But, lo ! the tempest rose, and they were gone,
 Broke and evanish'd in a single day.
 Peace, base-born wishes, sprung from selfish pride !
 Will fate reverse her positive decree ?
 Yon hill divides us, and will still divide,
 Nor bend its lordly brow to pleasure me.
 Yes, far beyond yon hill's aspiring height,
 Which, to the orient, bounds our utmost view,
 Where other streams reflect the morning light,
 And other mountains are array'd in blue ;
 Mira now listens to the midnight knell,
 By little rills that mimic Medwan's flow ;
 And bids sublimely sad the spinet swell,
 The solemn notes of sympathetic woe.
 Enough, dear maid ! to constancy and love,
 To tender parents surely something's due ;
 Let others taste the joys I cannot prove,
 The happy man whom fortune means for you.

O! bring not down, with unavailing tears,
 Their hoary heads with sorrow to the grave;
 Let not thy grief afflict the full-of-years,
 But grant the grandson whom they justly crave.

One thought is all I ask; if marriage vows,
 And jealous Hymen, shall admit of one;—
 One only thought,—in mem'ry of my woes,
 One thought,—in pity of a wretch undone!

ELEGY XLVI.

SAY, have I sworn deceitfully to heav'n,
 Or yet profan'd the deities of love?
 Has one injur'd me, and not been forgiv'n
 Or, want neglected, drawn the wrath of Jove?

If so, let years in painful penance pass,
 And midnight pray'rs the grievous sin atone;
 My youthful strength let pining sickness waste,
 And tort'ring aches prey on ev'ry bone.

But spare, O spare, the lovely guiltless maid!
 Why should she suffer for another's fault?
 Is this the due of matin prayers paid,
 Of purest piety, and untainted thought?

The dire disease deforms each lovely limb,
 Death's pallid yellow overspreads her face;
 Vain are my vows; for what can soften him,
 The unrelenting butcher of the race!

Farewell, dear maid! again, again, farewell;
 Nor doubt thy lover will survive thy death:
 One fatal hour shall ring our solemn knell,
 One grave shall hold, one turf shall cover both.

ELEGY XLVII.

TO MIRA.

By the remembrance of our secret joys,
 And all the hallow'd mysteries of love;
 Thy blooming beauties, and unfully'd fame,
 The rolling river, and the conscious grove;

Forgive my fears, from too fond passion sprung,
 Nor blame thy lover, if he dares complain—
 The wonted favours you deny me now,
 Are they not lavish'd on a richer swain?

When prideful Florio exulting boasts
 His lowing herds, that blacken all the lea,
 Numbers his boundless stores; is he receiv'd,
 Or heard with cold civility, like me?

Shook by disease, you late desponding lay,
 Wan was your cheek, and hollow was your eye;
 Rejenting Heav'n beheld my pious grief;
 A lover's grief is grateful to the sky:

Straight on your cheek the faded roses bloom'd,
 Your wither'd eye-balls sudden moisture lav'd;
 And shall another riot on these charms,
 Possess these beauties which my piety sav'd?

Think not, false maid! Alexis, unaveng'd,
 Will bear the pangs of ill-requested love;
 O! timely shun the blasting curse of Heav'n;
 An injur'd lover has a friend above.

Why check that tear, repress that swelling sigh?
 Hail, happy omens of my future bliss!
 Flow, quicker flow, ye sweet repentant tears!
 Ye cannot flow so fast as I can kiss.

ELEGY XLVIII.

TO MIRA.

AND were the fond, the tender things you said,
 Your vows, confirm'd by ev'ry pow'r above,
 The mimic raptures of a longing maid,
 To waste the tedious intervals of love?

When, warmly wanton, round my neck you hung,
 For fawning Florio was the favour meant?
 'Twas injur'd I the mournful harp that strung;
 But fell yon tear because of my complaint?

The winning muse I, hapless! woo'd in vain;
 Ascrib'd to Florio was the melting lay;
 I till'd in forrow, and I sow'd in pain,
 A foreign hand the harvest swept away.

Ungrateful maid! for thee, with wakeful care,
 I plann'd the pleasant, elegant retreat;
 For thee the lowly cottage did prepare,
 That might eclipse the dwellings of the great.

As, hand in hand, we left its hazel bourn,
 This was design'd our walk at early dawn;
 Here, sweetly sings the linnet from the thorn,
 And mazy Medwan laves the lilyed lawn.

Dismally shaded with surrounding yews,
 And lonely, rises Florio's Gothic dome;
 With dead men's bones each walk the sexton strews,
 And ev'ry prospect beckons to the tomb.

But if such scenes to Mira's eyes are fair,
 If such the paths her feet delight to tread,
 Despis'd Alexis will attend her there,
 Perhaps so happy as to please when dead.

ELEGY XLIX.

TO MIRA.

If you in fancy's ever-blooming scenes,
 Contemplative of future grandeur, rove,
 Delighted gaze on Florio's wide demesnes,
 And blith to recollect an humbler love;
 'Twere rude, dear maid! to break the golden dream,

To sweep the gaudy equipage away;
 Sully the massy plater's silver gleam,
 Or grind the China to its native clay.

Be far from me th' invidious, cruel task,
 To point the flaws which fancy's colours hide!
 Too soon experience will remove the mask,
 And show the nakedness of pompous pride.

But if you cherish in your faithful breast,
 The pleasing memory of former days,
 Kindly recal each sacred promise past,
 And only fate our happiness delays:

My willing muse shall speed the tedious hour,
 And cheer your solitude with pious care;
 At noon attend you in the woodland bow'r,
 And add fresh fragrance to the ev'ning air.

Still true to virtue, let us shun the bait
 That from her paths would tempt our steps astray;
 Still for a favourable issue wait,
 And through each difficulty edge our way.

Misfortune's waves may overwhelm a while,
 But buoyant virtue will emerge at last;
 The time advances that rewards our toil,
 And blots from memory the sorrows past.

ELEGY L.

TO THE MEMORY OF ALEXIS.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

WIDE o'er the windings of the shadowy vale,
 Silence afar extends her lonely sway;
 Save where the west wind whispers to the gale,
 Or fans, with downy wing, the dewy spray.

Save, where responsive to the blackbird's note,
 The bower of echo murmurs to the grove,
 And the hoarse raven pours her boding throat,
 As through the gloom her rustling pinions rove.

Save, where soft warbling on the hawthorn spray
 The nightingale does to her grief give vent;
 And the fear'd owl on lazy pinions grey,
 Slow-sailing, makes her querulous complaint.

Led by the light of Vesper's twinkling urn,
 That gilds the palegloom gathering o'er the skies;
 My lonely steps to these lov'd scenes return,
 While low in earth, my lost companion lies!

Here, broader spreads the lowly creeping thyme,
 Here, fairer lilies, fresher daisies, grow;
 Here, springs the pride of Flora's flow'ry prime,
 Blue hare-bells bud, and purple v'lets blow.

And here, the willows weave a thicker shade,
 And here, the hawthorns wear a whiter bloom;
 And milder, o'er the many-colour'd mead,
 The blossom'd furze exhales a fragrant fume!

Hard by the stream,—that down its winding way,
 Frequent has led his musing steps along;
 That heard the music of his earliest lay,
 And with its murmurs melodiz'd his song!

Hard by the stream,—within this leaf-lin'd grot,
 Where clearer by, the crystal waters creep;
 I've found the feat Alexis frequent fought,
 Slowly descending from yon upland steep.

Hail, hallow'd feat! so lonely and serene!
 Sequester'd stream, and verdant valley, hail!
 Still may the willow grace your windings green,
 And still the hawthorn whiten o'er your dale.

For oft, on Medwan's willowy banks, the fire
 Of dædal fancy has inspir'd his song;
 And oft the sacred veh'ence of his lyre
 Has chas'd the white-wing'd minutes swift along.

Though now no naiad trace this green retreat,
 Nor fairy footstep mark this mazy way;
 At eve's chaste hour, I'll seek his hallow'd feat,
 And waste in pensive thought the close of day.

Though fancy on my eye her fairy field,
 Fraught with the sweets of song, may not unfold;
 Sorrow restrain the muse's roving wild,
 And melt to languor down her ardour bold;

Out-stretch'd, beneath this willow-woven shade,
 In flaunting pride unprofitably gay,
 Mem'ry will wake the white-wing'd minutes fled,
 And point each spot where musing late he lay.

Still, still, unwear'd, wander o'er and o'er
 Each haunted walk, and long-frequented scene;
 And, true to friendship's never-venal lore,
 Pour fondly forth one tributary strain!

Yes, Medwan! yes, along thy lengthen'd vales
 Winding and wild, I'll mark thy mazes dear;

And while thy banks and sweet sequester'd dales
 Swell on my sight, I'll drop one tender tear.

For here his foot has now forgot to stray,
 In love-lorn mazes winding sweetly wild;
 No sedge-crown'd naiad listens to his lay,
 Melodious warbled o'er th' accustomed field.

While op'ning youth reveal'd each manly grace,
 Flush'd the plump cheek, and spread the vermilion hue,
 Gave the rapt eye with glowing warmth to trace
 Life's fair enchanting prospects full in view:

Uprose disease, and rose with aspect wan,
 Consumption, slow, relentless, and severe!
 Swift, as the rose, each flatt'ring prospect ran,—
 And left me disappointment's bitter tear!

It nought avail'd, that virtue gave him worth,
 That genius deign'd her eye-enlight'ning ray;
 Or Mira led his frequent footstep forth,
 Where woven willows fringe the wat'ry way!

I saw him sink! I saw him yield his breath,
 Stretch'd in yon lone cot's dim-discover'd shade!
 And, like the swain who dies a vulgar death,
 Low in yon church-yard green I saw him laid!

I saw a mother close his eye to rest!
 I saw a sister stretch him on the bier!—
 Still the remembrance rushes on my breast,
 And widow'd friendship drops another tear!

And sure, when youth is snatch'd from fame's fair
 meed, [glow,
 Friendship's soft warmth, and love's congenial
 And in the narrow grave untimely laid,
 A sigh should murmur, and a tear should flow.

With uncouth rhyme, even I may deck the sod;
 With honest grief even I may wet the bier;
 And oft, where sleeps the learned and the good,
 Give humble verse, and drop the tender tear.

The widow'd turtle oft is heard to mourn
 Her hapless consort's melancholy fate;
 And oft the plaintive blackbird droops forlorn,
 In the lone shade, and does her grief relate.

Yes, my Alexis! while to me 'tis giv'n
 On life's lorn way to wander, and to weep!
 Ere, due to fate, descends the hand of heav'n,
 To close my lids in everlasting sleep:

Oft will my feet at morn's returning dawn,
 With dutious steps to thy sad urn repair,
 And sweep the dew-drops from each haunted lawn,
 In fond remembrance of a friend so dear!

Oft by the margin of this lonely stream—
 What time meek twilight brings the solemn hour;
 Mindful of thee! I'll sit, in wayward dream,
 And oft these melancholy musings pour—

Short is the date to youthful hope assign'd!
 Swift is the hour to dædal fancy due!
 To-day we fold an heart-dividing friend,—
 To-morrow mourn him ravish'd from our view!

Hear this, ye young, and trust your hopes no more,— Though flush'd with health each rostrate feature bloom—
 With happy lapse some fleeting years are o'er,
 And lo! we slumber in the silent tomb!

Hear this ye proud,—and ponder as ye hear,— Though your light hearts now leap with transport high,

Though now ye wanton in your bright career,—
Alike we suffer,—and alike must die!
Youth's tow'ring hope, and learning's copious store,
Pride's thought sublime, and beauty's kindling bloom;
Serve but to sport one flying moment hour,
And grace with short-liv'd verse the frequent tomb.
Inclin'd to error, mortals still mistake,
Expecting solid happiness below;
Made drunk at fancy's feast, we sleep, and wake
From visionary bliss, to real woe.

ELEGY II.

TO THE MEMORY OF MISS MARGARET GREY*.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

THE muse, ere-while, who pensive strains essay'd,
Sigh'd as the sung, and rov'd the deep'ning shade,
O'er death's dread empire cast a mournful view,
And mark'd the dying groan Alexis drew;
With weary wing again pursues her flight,
Where death's dim shadows float in endless night,
And, softly sighing, as she sends her eye
O'er the lone spot where Stella's relics lie,
Stoops, weakly hov'ring, o'er the awful scene;
Yon yew, wild-waving o'er the glimm'ring green,
Where circling fods, in decent order laid,
Now hide, for ev'r hide, the hallow'd dead!

Yes, pensive muse! indulge another tear!
The duit of gentle Stella moulders here!
Grac'd with each gift the gayer world admires,
Beauty that warns, and elegance that fires;
Adorn'd with all that milder worth can give,
That lore which teaches how to love and live!
Good nature, smiling with unclouded eye;
Religion, pointing to her kindred sky,

* Daughter of John Grey, Esq. of Alnwick, in Northumberland, of the family of Howick, distinguished by the military services of Sir Charles Grey, K. B. and the constitutional principles, and parliamentary eloquence, of his son Charles Grey, Esq. M. P. She died of a consumption, December 16. 1773, in the 25th year of her age. Her mother, the eldest daughter of James Scott, Esq. of Alnwick, agent to the Duke of Northumberland, died May 21. 1773. Her only sister, Anne, was married to Dr. Anderson, September 25. 1777, and died of a consumption, December 25. 1785, in the 39th year of her age; leaving three daughters; two of whom, Anne-Margaret, and Margaret-Susannah, yet survive. When the life which made his own life pleasant, was at an end, and the gates of death closed upon his prospects; he sought a vain relief from his misery, by composing the long digressive "Monody to the memory of a Beloved Wife," mentioned in the "Life of Langborne." The loss of a friend in whom the heart was fixed, to whom every wish and endeavour tended, is a state in which the mind looks abroad, impatient of itself, and finds nothing but emptiness and horror. The blameless life, the artless tenderness, the modest resignation, the patient sickness, and the quiet death, are remembered only to add value to the loss,—to aggravate regret for what cannot be repaired,—to deepen sorrow for what cannot be recalled. The dead cannot return, and nothing is left us here, but languishment and grief!

"Uxorem vivam, amare voluptas, defunctam religio."

Taste, unasham'd at virtue's shrine to bow;
Love, undismay'd with friendship's fires to glow;
Sense without pride, and prudence without art,
The softest bosom, and the kindest heart!
Behold her now, in youth's delightful morn,
From life's fair, flow'ry, flatt'ring prospects torn;— Stretch'd where lone silence haunts the solemn yew,

And tufted grass waves wet with baleful dew!
How fleet is life! how frail this boasted breath!

In op'ning youth invades the blast of death!
We flourish like the vernal foliage, blown
By the warm influence of a nearer sun;
A while we bask in spring's enliv'ning ray,
And in sweet indolence imbibe the day;
Anon we fall! and ere the summer sun
The short-liv'd glory of our youth is gone!
Avaits it ought, ye sister-beauties! say,
To lead the dance, and chant the sprightly lay?
Avaits it ought to boast superior grace,
The sparkling eye, the ruby-tinctur'd face?
Can charms like these prolong the parting breath,
Soothe the aching pain, or stop the stroke of death?
Ah! no—though virtue, innocence and truth,
Improv'd these charms, and flush'd the bloom of youth;

Though sweetest manners, gentlest arts combin'd,
Rul'd ev'ry grace, and ev'ry grace refin'd;
Consumption slow extinguish'd nature's fires,
And Stella's self in cruel pangs expires!

Vain is the hope to ward the destin'd blow,
That, undistinguish'd, lays the loveliest low!
All, all must number with the silent dead,
O'er ev'ry eye be mortal darkness spread!
All stoop to moulder in one common dust,
Who charm but little, or who charm the most!
Death, hov'ring round, prevents with nimble dart,
The bloom of beauty, and the pride of art!
Stops the soft cadence of the tuneful tongue,
And treats alike the poet and the song!

Ye weeping pair! whose breasts are doom'd to know

The burst of anguish, and the sigh of woe!
Restrain your grief!—though sure to grief is giv'n

A decent measure from indulging Heav'n:—
A mother's pang, a sister's parting tear,
Suit Stella's doom, and grace her fun'ral bier,—
But sighs that wild from plaintive bosoms flow,
Tears that distil from long-indulged woe,
Arraign the rule of all-directing Heav'n,
To whom ye owe that Stella once was giv'n!
Know, all its ways are righteous, good, and wise,
Though un discern'd by mortals' darken'd eyes!
Nor think unwelcome sped the fatal dart,
That, heav'n-directed, struck at Stella's heart;
For, not to Stella gloom'd that mournful day,
That tore her from your weeping eyes away!
Believe the muse, who borne on faith's bright wings,
Beheld the visionary scene she sings:
Soon as her soul forsook the cumbrous clay,
Burst into air, and soar'd unseen away,
Attendant seraphs led her upward flight
From earth's low orb, and scour'd the shades of night;

Before her bright unbarr'd the shining seats,
Where white-rob'd mercy guards the golden gates;

Unveil'd to view the ever-blooming bow'rs,
Where saints and seraphs hymn the raptur'd hours:
"Go to the mild and good," th' Almighty said,
The mild and good embrac'd the fainted maid!
Now hymning high, she joins th' angelic throng,
Who pour with rapture forth th' eternal song,
And fainter choirs, who mix their grateful lays,
With harpings high of everlasting praise.

This verse be thine! lamented maid! receive
The last sad tribute that the muse can give!
The muse, who once inspir'd with sprightlier pow'r,
Sung livelier lays, and cheer'd your languid hour!
Now weak of wing, and unprepar'd to fly
Where fancy steers her tow'ring flight on high,
Broods, fondly hov'ring, where your ashes rest,
And bids the turf lie lightly on your breast.

MISCELLANEOUS PIECES.

A NIGHT-PIECE.

To speed the luckless moments, heavy-wing'd,
And from the drowsy monarch glorious steal,
And dark oblivion drear, the silent hour,
To meditation sacred and the muse;
In grave abstraction from the noise of life,
Thus let me frequent brush the dewy brake,
And, lonely devious, urge the darksome step,
Where, rising gradual, tow'rs the shrubby hill.

Now, night's vicegerent, silence, awful pow'r!
In sage solemnity, and pomp august,
Brooding, retir'd amid immantling glooms
Horrific, holds her solitary reign,
While yielding nature owns her potent sway.

The scold's loud 'larum, and the dinful mirth
Of lawless revellers, plague not the ear:
And rock-born echo, daughter of the hill,
The dupe of empty clangour, answers not
The ox's bellow, or the horse's neigh.

Not one rebellious murmur wide around
Affects the sense; save from an aged fane
(Whose rocky ruins, honour'd in decay,
Rise venerable, furr'd with drawing flugs),
Her lone retreat, the melancholic bird
Portentous and obscene, the hooting owl
Of formal phiz, in grave discordance hails
The full-orb'd moon, who now from orient climes
Drives slowly on, in majesty sedate,
Her silver wain; with noiseless flight they cleave
The blue expanse, her couriers eagle-wing'd.

Shook from night's sable skirt, the blue-gray cloud
Rests on the hill, slow creeping to the vale.

Athwart the vault ethereal, airy borne,
The steamy vapours, carv'd to giant forms
By rural fancy, playful, wheel convolv'd,
Portending hunger, pestilence, and death:
So dreams the gloomy peasant, labour-worn,
Who, from the turf-clos'd window's scanty round,
With grave regard the novel wonder views,
And, ruminating sad, bewails the times.

The red-blue meteor, daughter of the marsh,
In dance irreg'lar sweeps the rusty vale,
While hell's grim monarch (so the vulgar deem),
Rides in the glimm'ring blaze, with purpose drear,
And murderous intent, and frequent drowns
The heedless wand'rer in the swardy gulf.

Now light-heel'd fairies ply the cir'lar dance,
With sportive elves, upon the midnight green;
While screaming hideous, from the dismal bourne
Of desolated castles, goblins pale;

Bloody and gaunt, the progeny abhorr'd
Of superstition, hell-engender'd pow'r,
By cunning mon'rs conjur'd from lowest Styx,
Affright the maudlin rustic!—Now solemn,
To fancy's morbid eye, the fullen ghost, stalks,
In sheeted grandeur through the church-yard
Horrendous, mutt'ring to the sick'ning moon;
Until the bird of Mars with noisy clap,
Arrouseful of the dawn, shall crow aloud.

Now scandal's votaries, of flippant tongue
And haggard look, low-bending o'er a fire,
Almost extinct, beneath a cloud obscene,
Tobacco-form'd, sit planning future lies.

With bolts and double doors in vain secur'd,
Gray-headed av'rice on the elbow rais'd,
Distrustful listens to the plaintive breeze
That howls without, while to his jealous ear
A dire divan of hellish ruffians curs'd
Debate the future breach: mad at the thought,
With pally'd arms, new-strung from fear, he graps

His money-bags, and swears they shall not leave
Now in his rev'rend study, cobweb-lin'd,
Beside a paly lamp, with bitten nails,
The meagre student o'er a folio sits
Of fagot bulk, in meditation deep:
Weak nature oft invites to sweet repose,
And bids restore the labour'd volume huge
To worms innate; but o'er his fancy come
The patron's money'd aunt, his future spouse,
The glebe, the solemn fables, cravat starch,
And urge some pages more; till rushing prone
The classic cruise, in hapless station plac'd,
In fragments scatter'd lies, and victor sleep
His triumph trumpets from the vocal nose.

Now, by the willow'd brink of wand'ring streams,
The woe-worn lover walks with varied pace,
Mutt'ring his wayward fancies to the wind,
Obtesting heav'n, and cursing ev'ry star
That low'd malicious on his hopeful flame:
Or in a moss-lin'd cave, below an oak
Of ancient growth, he plans the song of woe,
The word-weigh'd elegy of liquid lapse,
And cadence glib: or, weary'd to repose,
His figh-shook frame lies blissfully entranc'd
(For so he dreams), in fair Cleone's arms.

ABRA*. A FRAGMENT.

I sought repose from love's perplexing cares,
His groundless hopes, and still more groundless fears;

* See Prior's Solomon.

The luscious nights with Zion's monarch past,
 In spite of ev'ry art grew itale at last,
 I long'd in solitude to doze the day,
 Nor languishingly dull, nor vainly gay;
 Now in grave contemplation strive to scan
 That charming, teasing, froward creature, man;
 And now with dancing damsels plant a net
 Before the unsuspecting monarch's feet;
 For still (whate'er I thought), my tender breast
 In silent sighs too warm a love exprest;
 Still too much fervour wanton'd in my blood,
 To act with rigour the affected prude.

But bent my fond indulgent spouse to vex (For, come what will, we wives must have our freaks),

To Sharon's pleasant palace I retir'd,
 Of thousands admirable, most admir'd;
 Tyre's dædal sons, with learned wonder gaze,
 And almost deify the dome they raise;
 The humble Hiram scarce will own his plan,
 Content to be a mason and a man:
 On ev'ry side extends a verdant mead,
 With all the charms of various nature spread:
 Here strays a limpid stream, whose mazy course,
 Is mark'd with willows, fragrant shrubs, and flow'rs;

And there, in distant perspective arise,
 Groves, castles, mountains, mingling with the skies;

The nice proportion, and the chaste design,
 May charm an artist's eye, but charm'd not mine;
 'Twas Ophir's jewels, and Arabia's sweets,
 That lifted Sharon o'er a thousand feats;
 Whate'er pampers'd females hold most rare,
 Of all th' advent'rous merchant brings from far,
 A gallant monarch joy'd to place it there.

On the embroider'd couch myself I flung,
 Inviting sleep, surrounding damsels fung;
 Be rural peace and innocence the theme,
 Lest love (said I), usurp my coming dream.
 Obedient to my voice at once they raise,
 In choir consenting, their harmonious lays:
 Now white-rob'd candour, and his blithsome peers,

O'er temperance's cup forget their years;
 Forget each wayward, frowning fortune past,
 And thank just Heav'n, that will reward at last.
 Now healthy labour, and his russet wife,
 Snatch the coarse meal, nor wish a happier life,
 Bless the kind hand that, with assiduous care,
 Still crowns their table with delicious fare;
 But low, in gratitude for what they have,
 To have no less, the only boon they crave.
 While now beneath a spreading fig-tree's shade,
 The shepherd-swain is indolently laid;
 Sportive around his little lambkins play,
 And all heav'n's music warbles from the spray:
 In distant perspective the wolf appears,
 Who drinks the pleasing sound, and softens as he hears.

Sleep that, unask'd, annoits the peasant's eye,
 And spreads his wings where labour's children lie;
 At bashful distance itands, nor dares approach
 The lussy lady on her lazy couch;
 In vain invok'd! no sleep, no slumber came,
 To pour their balsam on my weary'd frame;
 Each various posture, each device I try'd;
 But in each posture was repose deny'd:

Mad at my fate, now here, now there, I tost, Curs'd the whole world, but curs'd myself the most;

Pray'd sudden ruin on our race in rage,
 Nor spar'd my lovely Solomon the sage.

"The sky, however clouded, soon will clear,"
 Said Father David, that illustrious seer;
 And, says his son, "The most impetuous blast
 "Will spend its fury, and subside at last."

So, after iweaving, raving, all in vain,
 What could I do, but be—myself again?

My native tenderness awak'd in sighs,
 And all the woman lighten'd in my eyes;
 "Which of thy daughters, Zion, canst thou tell,
 "Determines that lover who once lov'd so well?"

"Why lag these feet that once outstrip the wind?
 "Slow are his steps that leaves a heart behind:

"Who could have thought he e'er would prove "Untrue,

"So firm the sanction, and so great the vow!

"By Jacob's God, the dreadful God, he swore,

"The holy temple, and the mystic gore;

"By David's throne, the Majesty Divine,

"Which through all ages shall adorn his line,

"Ever to love me, concubine or wife,

"Or to be blotted from the book of life.

"Rash was the oath—if Heav'n the forfeit spare,

"Thy spouse will pardon, and do thou repair;

"A very little will my claims content,

"'Tis no great matter sure—be complaisant.

"How could, alas! my single charms prevail

"Against the thousands of thy great serail?

"But still one night, or two, or more than two,

"I may at least insist on as my due."

Thus of feign'd falsehoods did my tongue complain,

While all my heart was harrow'd up with pain;
 My troubled thoughts still chang'd from this to that,

I fear'd, I hop'd, I wish'd, I knew not what:
 But hark! is this my royal lover's voice?

"Awake, my fair! my best belov'd, arise!

"A chilly tremor o'er my frame is spread,

"And night's unwholesome damps are on my
 "head."

The well-known sound went thrilling to my heart
 Though still I meant to act the prudish part;
 I strove my rising tenderness to hide,
 And with affected coolness thus reply'd:

"You come, my dear, at an improper hour,

"However willing, 'tis not in my pow'r;

"Indeed it is not—I have wash'd my feet

"With precious ointments, and with odours
 "sweet;

CURLING.

FRETTE'd to atoms by the poignant air,
 Frigid and Hyperborean lies the snow,
 In many a vortex of monades, wind-wing'd,
 Hostile to naked noses, dripping oft
 A crystal humour, which as oft is wip'd
 From the blue lip wide-gash'd: the hanging sleeve
 That covers all the wrist, uncover'd else,
 The peasant's only handkerchief, I wot,
 Is glaz'd with blue-brown ice. But reckless still

Of eold, or drifted snow, that might appal
 The city coxcomb, arm'd with befooms, pour
 The village youngsters forth, jocund and loud,
 And cover all the loch: With many a tug
 The pond'rous stone, that all the summer lay
 Unoccupy'd along its oozy side,
 Now to the mud fast frozen, scarcely yields
 The wish'd-for victory to the brawny youth,
 Who, braggart of his strength, a circling crowd
 Has drawn around him, to avouch the feat:
 Short is his triumph, fortune so decrees;
 Applause is chang'd to ridicule, at once
 The loosen'd stone give way, supine he falls,
 And prints his members on the pliant snow.

The goals are marked out; the centre each
 Of a large random circle; distance scores
 Are drawn between the dread of weakly arms.
 Firm on his cramp-bits stands the steady youth,
 Who leads the game: Low o'er the weighty stone
 He bends incumbent, and with nice eye
 Surveys the further goal, and in his mind
 Measures the distance; careful to bestow
 Just force enough: then, balanc'd in his hand,
 He flings it on direct; it glides along,
 Hoarse murmuring, while, plying hard before,
 Full many a befoom sweeps away the snow,
 Or icicle, that might obstruct its course.

But cease, my muse! what numbers can describe
 The various game? Say, canst thou paint the blush
 Impurpled deep, that veils the stripling's cheek,
 When, wand'ring wide, the stone neglects the rank,

And stops midway?—His opponent is glad,
 Yet fears a sim'lar fate, while ev'ry mouth
 Cries, off the hog,—and Tinto joins the cry.
 Or couldst thou follow the experienc'd play'r
 Through all the myst'ries of his art? or teach
 The undisciplin'd how to wick, to guard,
 Or ride full out the stone that blocks the pass?

The bonspect o'er, hungry and cold, they hie
 To the next alehouse; where the game is play'd
 Again, and yet again, over the jug;
 Until some hoary hero, haply he,
 Whose sage direction won the doubtful day,
 To his attentive juniors tedious talks
 Of former times;—of many a bonspect gain'd,
 Against opposing parishes; and shots,
 To human likelihood secure, yet storm'd:
 With liquor on the table, he pontrays
 The situation of each stone. Convinc'd
 Of their superior skill, all join, and hail
 Their grandfires steadier, and of surer hand.

TO A FLY.

LEAVE this pale, this bloodless cheek,
 Foolish, noisy, flut'ring thing;
 Haſte where fresher features call thee,
 Flitting on thy azure wing.

On yon verdant bank reclining,
 See Eliza's charms invite,
 But, content with perching on them,
 Stop, nor cruel seek to bite.

Safely suck the pearly moisture
 On her jutting rosy lip;

Fan nor handkerchief oppose thee,
 See the maiden's fast asleep.

Fraughted with the pilfer'd fragrance,
 Come and perch on me again;
 Fear not on my lip to fasten;
 Never fear, I won't complain.

But if still thou buzzeſt round me,
 Quickly, quickly thou shalt die;
 Thus, between my hands I'll crush thee,
 An untow'ring vulgar fly.

THE STUDENT.

REMOTE from schools, from colleges remote,
 In a poor hamlet's meanest, homeliest cot,
 My earliest years were spent, obscurely low;
 Little I knew, nor much desir'd to know;
 My highest wishes never mounted high'r
 Than the attainments of an aged fire;
 Proverbial wisdom, competence of wealth,
 Earn'd with hard labour, and enjoy'd with health,
 Blest, had I still these blessings known to prize!
 More rich I sure had been; perhaps more wise.

One luckless day, returning from the field,
 Two swains, the wisest of the village held,
 Talking of books and learning, I o'erheard,
 Of learned men, and learned men's reward:
 How some rich wives, and some rich livings got,
 Sprung from the tenants of a turf-built cot:
 Then both concluded, though it ruin'd health,
 Increase of learning was increase of wealth.

Fir'd with the prospect, I embrac'd the hint,
 A grammar borrow'd, and to work I went,
 The scope and tenor of each rule I kept,
 No accent mis'd me, and no gender 'scap'd;
 I read whate'er commenting Dutchmen wrote,
 Turn'd o'er Stobæus, and could Suidas quote;
 In letter'd Gellius trac'd the bearded sage,
 Through all the windings of a wise adage:
 Was the spectator of each honest scar,
 Each sophist carry'd from each wordy war;
 Undaunted was my heart, nor could appal
 The mustiest volume of the mustiest stall;
 Where'er I turn'd, the giant-spiders fled,
 And trembling moths retreated as I read;
 Through Greece and Rome I then observant
 stray'd,

Their manners noted, and their states survey'd;
 Attended heroes to the bloody fields,
 Their helmets polish'd and emboss'd their shields;
 With duteous hand the decent matron dress'd,
 And wrapp'd the stripling in his manly vest;
 Nor stopt I there, but mingled with the boys,
 Their rattles rattled, and improv'd their toys;
 Lash'd conic turbos as in gyres they flew,
 Bestrode their hobbies, and their whistles blew:
 But still when this, and more than this, was done,

My coat was ragged, and my hat was brown.

Then thus I commun'd with myself: "Shall I
 " Let all this learning in oblivion die;
 " Live in the haunts of ignorance, content
 " With vest unbotton'd, and with breeches rent?
 " None knows my merit here; if any knew
 " A scholar's worth would meet a scholar's due.

“What then? The college! ay, ’tis there I’ll “shine,

“I’ll study morals, or I’ll turn divine;
“Struck with my letter’d fame, without a doubt,
“Some modern Lælius will find me out:
“Superior parts can never long be hid,
“And he who wants deserves not be fed.”

Transported with the thoughts of this and that,

I stich’d my garments, and I dy’d my hat;
To college went, and found, with much ado,
That roses were not red, nor violets blue;
That all I’ve learn’d, or all I yet may learn,
Can’t help me truth from falsehood to discern.

All mere confusion, altogether hurld,
One dreary waste, one vast ideal world!
Where uproar rules, and do you what you will,
Uproar has rul’d it, and will rule it still.

Victorious ergo, daring consequence,
Will ever be a match for common sense!
To lordly reason ev’ry thing must bow,
The hero liberty, and conscience too;
The first is fetter’d in a fatal chain,
The latter, gagg’d, attempts to speak in vain.

Locke! Malebranche! Hume! abstractions thrice abstract!

In reason give me what in sense I lack;
I feel my poverty, and, in my eye,
My hat, though dy’d, has but a dusky dye,
“Mistrust your feelings, reason bids you do.”—

But, gentlemen, indeed I cannot now;
For after all your ergo’s, look you there!
My hat is greasy, and my coat is bare.

Hail moral truth! I’m here at least secure,
You’ll give me comfort, though you keep me poor.

But say you so? in troth ’tis something hard,
Virtue does surely merit a reward.

“Reward! O, servile, selfish; ask a hire!”
Raiment and food this body does require:

A prince for nothing may philosophize,
A student can’t afford to be so wise.

Sometimes the Stoic’s gloomy walks I try’d,
Wrinkled my forehead, and enlarg’d my stride,
Despis’d ev’n hunger, poverty, and pain,
Searching my pockets for a crust in vain.

Sometimes in Academus’ verdant shade
With step more graceful I exulting stray’d,
Saw health and fortune join’d with happiness,
And virtue smiling in her social dress;
On me she did not smile, but rather lour;
I still was wretched, for I still was poor.

Sworn to no master, sometimes I would dwell
With Shaftesbury, sometimes with Mandeville;

Would call at ev’ry system on my way,
And now with Leibnitz, now with Manes stay;

But after all my shiftings here and there,
My hat was greasy, and my coat was bare.

Then I beheld my labours past, and lo!

It all was vanity, and all was woe;
I look’d on Learning, and her garb was mean,
Her eyes were hollow, and her cheeks were lean;
Disease and famine threaten’d in her train,
And want, who strives to hide her rags in vain;
Her lurid brow a sprig of laurel brac’d,
On which was mark’d, ‘Unpension’d and un plac’d.’

I turn’d to Ignorance; and lo! the fat
Enthron’d beneath a canopy of state;
Before her riches all his bags unty’d,
And ever and anon her wants supply’d,
While on a smiling plentitude of face,
Was clearly read, “A pension and a place.”

A FRAGMENT.

THE world was all before me where to choose,
I scorn’d the shelter of a vulgar house,
So well assur’d (assur’d I was) each door
Was open to receive the learn’d and poor;
But none (alas! I felt it, for I try’d);
My learning valu’d, or my wants supply’d
Here star’d grim poverty, pale famine there,
When love and Mira sav’d me from despair.
Chas’d the lean phantoms from my frighted mind,
While all was love and gratitude behind,
Extinguish’d hope rekindled in my breast,
And maudlin reason rav’d at fancy’s feast;
Ages before it dwindled to a day,
And bliss’s barriers felt a swift decay;
Whatever’s dear and valuable in life,
The rising infant and the loving wife,
Were all contracted to a moment’s space,
And ev’ry one, that precious moment was;
To perfect happiness, ideal, grew,
And vague futurity was chang’d to now.

Then said I, in the fullness of my soul,
“No grief shall sway me, nor distress controul;
“Here, will my sorrows find eternal pause;
“Here, am I free from fortune and her laws;
“A source of joy within myself I find,
“And surely fortune cannot change my mind;
“This bliss shall comfort me when all is gone,
“So intellectual, so all my own.”

O, lost to wisdom! to experience lost!
Fortune sways all, but sways the passions most;
On foreign dainties live the beggar train,
The mean dependants of a mobbe scene;
Now triumphs this, now that again prevails,
As fortune swells, or does not swell our sails;
And who would make them subject to the mind,
May fetter torrents, or may rein the wind.

“What!” cries some Stoic of the awful brow,
Who dreams he conquers—when he never knew—
“Are not the passions servants to my will?”
“This, I may spare, and that I too may kill;
“May raise the feeble, and may curb the strong.”
No doubt! and charm the deaf man with a song.
Vain, foolish sage! (a sage can have no gall);
Vaunt not your vict’ries, apathy does all;
Born without feeling, never did you feel;
Great the physician, who the whole can heal!

For me, I ask no philosophic face,
Content to be the various thing I was;
To be in each extreme, and each excess,
Sometimes of misery, sometimes of bliss:
Now calmness all, now altogether tost,
Now shelter’d from, now driven by the blast;
Now in possession of my Mira’s charms,
Now rudely ravish’d from her longing arms.
Such I have been, but such no more will be;
At length safe landed from the raging sea,

My days in one unbroken tenor flow,
 Each the true picture of another's woe;
 No room for hope, no remedy for care,
 All, all is swallow'd up in deep despair!
 Yet not from me the mighty change did spring,
 I neither impt nor cropt his eagle wing;
 'Twas fortune first gave hope her darling flight,
 Then brought her headlong from the giddy height;
 Bade sky-blue hills around the maid ascend,
 And pride's strong bulwarks ev'ry where defend.

* * * * *
 O, heav'nly goddess! not that wanton dame,
 Who blindly scatters beauty, wealth, and fame;
 But thou, (whoe'er thou art), whose eye surveys,
 And human actions yet in embryo weighs,
 Whose boundless wisdom still the best intends,
 By fittest means effecting fittest ends;
 Level each rock-built barrier, and remove
 Whatever mars the success of my love:
 But if thou seest it good to vex me still,
 O, grant submission to thy holy will!
 To human weakness human crimes translate,
 And nature from rebellion separate;
 So shall my hopes fresh vigour yet attain,
 Rise to new heights, and never sink again.

RONA:

IMITATED FROM OSSIAN.

" The noise of war is on the breeze,
 " And can Hidallan stay?
 " My soul is in the strife of shields—"
 He spoke, and burst away.

O! where shall Morna's maid repose,
 Till heroes have their fame?
 On Morna's silent hill of hinds,
 Or by its rushy stream?
 But what if in the hour of blood
 The lovely hero fall?
 While some dark warrior hangs his shield
 A trophy in his hall!

Leave, slumber! leave the eye of tears,
 Forsake my limbs, repose!
 Lean, love-born maidens! from your clouds,
 And aid me with your woes.

Fair was Hidallan, as the flow'r
 That dyes the dusky heath;
 But raise not, bards! the mournful song
 Around his stone of death.

How fell the hero? In his might,
 Amid his growing fame!
 Not feeble was Hidallan's foe,
 His sword a meteor's flame.

No more shall Morna's hall rejoice,
 The feat of shells be spread;
 The sigh of Rona's secret soul,
 In death's dark house is laid.

Lour not on Rona from your cloud,
 The rolling of your rest!
 Not weak, Hidallan! was my fire,
 No fear disturb'd his breast.

In aged Cairbar's lonely hall,
 The strife of heroes rose;

VOL. XI.

His was Rivine's stolen glance,
 And many were his foes.

In strength he grasp'd his sword of fire,
 The stoutest started back:
 Not weak, Hidallan! was my fire,
 Nor is his daughter weak.

Ah! whither rolls thy airy hall?
 The sky its blue resumes;
 Her father's sword prepares the cloud,
 On which thy Rona comes.

TO ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

WHILE some, in all the luxury of health,
 The pride of pleasure, and the pomp of wealth,
 Inglorious, rous'd at passion's frantic call,
 Soak o'er the bowl, or madden at the ball,
 Triumph illiberal o'er the simple maid,
 By love, or promise, to their arms betray'd;
 Some painted trifle with anxiety chafe,
 Or wallow fulsome in the lewd embrace,
 By foul debauch and worthless feats secure,
 Remorse indistinctive in the sober hour;
 The grave associate of the good and sage,
 Or nerv'd with youth, or silver'd o'er with age;
 Through giddy life you urge your steady way,
 While conscience cheers the night and glads the day;

In vain assail the vanities of youth,
 You mark their progress, and you check their growth,
 From learning all its formal pride remove,
 Guard cheating friendship, fetter stubborn love.

O! could I thus th' impetuous passions crush,
 Stifle the sigh, and curb the secret wish;
 By reason's sway this love of self controul,
 This blaze of youth, and impotence of soul;
 Repress the frothy insolence of fame,
 The sigh that heaves for an immortal name;
 I would not restless, midnight vigils keep,
 Nor from my pillow drive encroaching sleep;
 To the tenth stanza elegies prolong,
 Nor clothe my woe in all the pomp of song;
 With joyless step an airy prize pursue,
 Which mocks my grasp, yet glitters in my view;
 Admire a virgin whom I see no more,
 Hills rise between us, and deep waters roar,
 And, worse than streams and mountains, still divide,
 The daughter's piety, and the father's pride.

ON ENVY.

TO ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

You're right, my friend:—I'll ask no longer,
 Whence our sorrow, whence our woe?
 'Tis envy:—yes, you do not wrong her,
 All our ills from envy flow.

Young ladies, at the playhouse shining,
 Seem the happiest beings there,
 But yet, at home, they sit repining,
 At one fairer, or as fair.

The hall when powder'd chaplains visit,
 Ruffles streaming at their breast,
 Each shabby student, sighing, sees it,
 And concludes the puppies blest.

F f

But mark them in the nurs'ry moping;
 Presentations fire their brain;
 The hale incumbent's long a-dropping;
 Waiting-women foon in vain.

The modest bard, whose num'rous numbers,
 Draw'rs and trunks from critics screen;
 What can break his midnight slumbers?
 Writers in the Magazine.

Why, let him be the man he envies,
 Weekly spread his oily odes;
 Yea, let no critic strictly canvass,
 Zephyrs, meads, or groves, or gods.

Say, sleeps he sound? or needs he poppy?
 Something does his brow engloom;
 He still is wretch'd,—and who is happy?
 Beattie, Ogilvie, or Home?

Away, ye whining self-tormenters!—
 Come, ye sons of meek content!
 Whose bosoms envy never enters,
 Clown, philosopher, or saint:

And lead me to her hermit dwelling,
 Lonely, sure, the matron dwells;
 Far from peevish, raving, railing,
 Poets, students, beaux, or belles.

From the happy number dash me too;
 Friend! you find I'm envious too;
 What!—not believe I'm envious!—blefs me!
 Don't you see I envy you?

SONG.

A GIRL that is sensible, lovely, and rich,
 Might ev'n claim a poor poet's respect;
 But ugly, the ignorant, pennylefs b—
 He at least may despise and neglect.

What though at the table his linen be foul,
 And his hair bristle up like a brush;
 In his rat-peopled room he's a resolute soul,
 And values no misfing a rush.

What though he should be but an afs at a bow,
 And what though he bow not at all;
 Full many, I wot, that can bow them full low,
 Arc neither so wise nor so tall.

Some pert little monkey may laugh at his looks,
 And many sneer at the length of his face;
 But I'll lay you the odds, would he leave but his books,
 She would laugh at her lover in lace.

The sober grave matron, that peeps o'er her spectacls,
 And is shock'd at the dust on his shoes;
 Would the cast but an eye on her own yellow cheeks,
 Never more would she do as she does.

Fy, for shame, Mrs. Harridan! how can you talk
 Of a manner so fine, so genteel!
 Who the deuce would not dust all his shoes in a walk,
 To avoid the damn'd clack of a mill!

A truce with your merriment, gentlefolks all!
 That silly-like lad that you see,
 Has oft rais'd a laugh in an handsomer hall,
 O'er a cup of far better than tea.

Though his phiz be so formal, so mute be his tongue,

He can speak, and, nay more, he can smile;
 As wise as your wisest has hung on his song,
 And a fairer embrac'd him the while.

Shorten not your dear noses, my ladies! in scorn,
 He has kiss'd lips as ruddy as yours;
 Yes, though they were fresh as the midsummer
 morn,
 And array'd in the glory of flow'rs.

“Some juicy young milk-maid, the pride of the fold,
 The toast of some ale-drinking ring:”
 Nay, stop till you hear all her merits be told;
 She could curt'fy, could dance, and could sing.

Forgive me, Eliza! yes, you can forgive,
 Though I praise you for what you despise;
 The soft graces that breathe in your bosom, and live,
 They have not, and how can they prize?

Was it not for Eliza, the rigour of fate
 Would soon bow me down to the grave;
 Alexis is lost, if Eliza forget,
 He is left, for she only can save.

TO MISS ———

Thrice, lovely Sylvia! fairest of the fair;
 Fond Damon's favourite, and the muse's care!
 Propitious hear; nor, blooming maid! complain,
 To find unequal to your praise my strain.
 With ease I paint the mazy prattling rill,
 The woods and tow'rs that crown the craggy hill;
 The various blossoms that adorn the spring;
 But Sylvia's charms what raptur'd youth can sing?
 What straining bard exalt his daring aim,
 In just proportion to his lovely theme?

Your beauties crowd—which first shall grace my
 song,

Your blushing cheeks, or pretty lisping tongue?
 Those blushing cheeks where modest charms gambol;

That lisping tongue, which steals the ravish'd soul;
 Your brow smooth polish'd, or your bosom fair,
 Or flowing tresses of your silver hair?
 Your shapely leg, or still more shapely thigh,
 Or the mild radiance of your lust'rous eye?

Shall I ransack the grave for blooming maids?
 For glowing virgins search th' Elysian shades?
 Rouse from dark night the bright Laconian dame;
 Or the chaste object of Apollo's flame?
 Can Spartan Helen, Daphne, blushing fair!
 With thee in charms or modesty compare?

No; let them rest conceal'd from mortal view,
 In all but fame inferior to you;
 Nor long in that, if flowing numbers save
 From blue oblivion, and the dusky grave;
 If wit and worth distinguish'd honours claim,
 And heav'nly shape entitle maids to fame.

Shall I bring down from Atlas' shady height,
 Where blest immortals wanton in delight,
 Where nectar circles as the thund'ring nods;
 The happy fair that charm the happy gods?
 Expose to sight the ruddy Cyprian queen,
 With graces dancing on th' enamell'd green;
 Bid chaste Diana stalk, with maiden pride,
 Athwart the lawn, with quiver by her side,
 Her virgin tresses floating loose behind,
 Kiss'd by each gale, and rais'd by ev'ry wind;

Bid all that's grave, majestic, noble, wife,
 Beam forth effulgent from Minerva's eyes?
 Stamp female grandeur on Queen Juno's brow?
 On Hebe's cheek display the rose's hue?
 Vain were the care—for not the queen of love,
 Or sister-wife of all-controlling Jove;
 Or she that stately scours the grassy plain,
 And counts her days by spotted lynxes slain;
 Or she that pours (when gods expand their soul)
 The sparkling nectar from the copious bowl;
 Or she that dares paternal thunder wield,
 And urge the chariot through the martial field;
 Or equal worth, or equal beauty, share
 With thee all-lovely, all-accomplish'd fair!
 But why in vain produce my tortur'd rhyme,
 Abuse your patience, and consume your time?
 One single verse will better paint your charms,
 You, only you, are worthy Damon's arms.

1767.

TO MISS E—B—.

EASY to learn the flatt'rer's artful tale,
 Learn the soft phrase that soothes the simple ear;
 Of all its beauties strip the flow'ry vale,
 In honour of the maid we hold most dear:
 Suns might with ease be liken'd to your eyes,
 And either break a marble pillar rise.
 But would Eliza listen to the lay,
 Read, blushless read, what others might admire;
 Own the weak folly, wash its faults away,
 Warm'd with the wildness of a lover's fire;
 No, rather would you scorn the varnish'd tale,
 "Equal to most, you want not to excel."

SONG.

WHAT softness of numbers, what sweetness of
 song,
 What thoughts that are handsome and pretty,
 Can justly describe all that's lovely, and young,
 And all that transports me in Betty.
 The least of her beauties what figure can fit;
 What compare with her ringlets so jetty!
 What then can be said of the goodness, the wit,
 Of the graces and virtues of Betty?
 I look'd on the virgin, and wander'd no more
 Through the delicate dames of the city;
 Because, all I sought for, and valu'd before,
 Was entire and complete in my Betty.
 If ever I serv'd you in pureness of heart,
 Ye supreme and subordinate deities!
 Health, pleasure, and peace, to the maid still im-
 part;
 For my life is bound up in my Betty's.

TO MISS M—M—

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D. dT

POETIC art, with mimic tints, may trace
 Each brighter beauty blooming on thy face;
 Give to the dazzling verse, or glowing lay,
 Graces that warm us with a fainter ray.
 Yet, what presumptuous imitative art
 May trace one beauty breathing in thy heart;

Awake these graces, that, in modest guise,
 Charm ev'n unknown, and ravish by surprise,
 Give all their sweetness, all their tender ease,
 In equal numbers equal pow'r to please?
 Boldly they dare description's softest lay,
 Borne on the wings of wonder far away;
 O'er all the bounds that mark the muses' reign,
 Nourish their rapture, or inspire their strain.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

THE tongue of the witty, the eyes of the fair,
 And the pride of high damsels may plague you;
 Nor pert, nor affected, nor prudish her air,
 But modest and free is my Peggy.

Refin'd sensibility brightens her looks,
 Smiles dwell on each delicate feature;
 Her language is plain, not the language of books,
 But the language of truth and good-nature.

Ye frowning pretenders to virtue severe,
 Ye subduers of passions that drag you;
 Away with your rigour, ye never need fear
 To love and to feel like my Peggy.

When flow'rs spring apace in the late-loosen'd field,
 And the fragrance of meadows invite us;
 Why censure the favours my Peggy may yield,
 Since hallow'd the ties that unite us?

Envy may lurk in our woodland retreat,
 And malice may blacken conjecture;
 But nothing our raptures, our bliss shall abate,
 For innocence is our protector.

O ye! by whose bounty and goodness we live,
 By your goodness and bounty I beg you,
 Health, strength, independence, and honesty give;
 And make me a match for my Peggy.

THE CONTRAST.

WHAT now avails to gain a woman's heart,
 The sage's wisdom, or the poet's art!

Pox on the times! the genius of old
 Would whip you off a girl in spite of gold;
 In spite of liv'ries, equipage, and lace,
 And all the Gothic grandeur of a race.

But now the mill'ner's 'prentice, with a saucer, Blessing herself, cries, Heav'n's! what have we here?

A man of rhyme, worth—fifty lines a-year.
 Our wit still pleases; but 'tis deserv'dly hard,
 What saves the elegy should damn the bard;
 That gains access to dressing-rooms,
 A wish'd-for, welcome guest where'er it comes;
 But me, the luckless author, scorn'd and poor,
 Each surly porter drives from ev'ry door.

Conscious of secret worth, I hurry home,
 And now the master damn, and now the dome;
 Firmly resolv'd, whatever shall betide,
 No more to ask what has been once deny'd;
 Resolv'd, indeed! but ev'ry pow'r above
 Laughs at your weak resolves, and chiefly love.

F f ij

Brush the brown hat, and darn the breeches
"knee;

"The wealthy, pride may suit, but suits not thee:
"Papa, I own, look'd mighty four and grim;

"But if the daughter smile, a fig for him!

"Mark'd you the secret motions of her eye?

"How kind yon glance had been, had none been "by!

"Yon proud reserve, yon shyness, I could swear,

"Is prudence all, and pure pretence with her:

"'Tis right—old fellows that can thousands give,

"May claim, at least, some rev'rence while they "live;

"A few, few years lays Fuscus in his grave,

"And Mira's yours, perhaps, and all he gave!"

Intent on future harm, thus said the god

Who bends the stubborn purpose with a nod;

Constrains the stiffest gladly to obey,

Makes the gay gloomy, and the gloomy gay.

Resist who will, too well I knew his pow'r,

In vain resisted, to resist it more!

My hands instinctive, at the forceful call,

At once seize gloves, and hat, and staff, and all;

Then forth I walk, and ever, as I go,

Con o'er my manners, and practise a bow;

Spread, careful spread, the cravat on my breast,

As prim and formal as a parish priest.

The knocker clacks—"Who's there?"—"Is

"Miss within?"

"Confound the booby, what a monstrous din!

"She has no time, she says, to speak with you;

"For Mr. Florimel came here just now."

My heart beat thick, and ev'ry word he said

Distain'd my hollow cheeks with foreign red;

O, brutish times! and is that thing of silk,

That sapless sipper of an afs's milk;

That tea-nurs'd grinner, whose consumptive cough,

Should he but mint a laugh, would take him off,

Prefer'd to me! in whose athletic grasp

Ten thousand buzzing beaux were but a wasp.

Sure wit and learning greater honour claim;

No wit, no learning, ever smil'd on him:

I'll lay my Lexicon, for all his airs,

That fellow cannot read the arms he bears;

Nor, kneeling, Mira! on his trembling knee,

Explain one half of all he says to thee.

"No matter, he has gold; whose precious hue

"Is beauty, virtue, wit, and learning too:

"O, blind to worth! what lovelier than a chaife,

"Two bowing footmen, and a pair of bays?

"What virtue like an handsome country-seat,

"A good per annum, and a course of plate?

"And then for wit—a clever library;

"He cannot read a book: but he can buy:

"A fig for learning! Learning does he lack,

"Whose factor both can write and sign—a tack*?

"Besides, you know, for ten or less per ann.

"Even you or any scholar, is his man."

Bear me, ye gods! O, bear me where you please!

To unknown regions, over unknown seas;

Place me where dews refreshing never drop,

On Niger's banks, a swarthy Æthiop;

Or melt me to the fashionable size,
Below the scorching heat of Iodian skies:
No; there, ev'n there, the lust of gold prevails,
Each river, groans with ships, each breeze with sails:

The land abounds, nay ocean's farthest creeks,
With dirt that's sought for, or with dirt that seeks.
Fix me an icen statue at the pole,
Where winds can't carry, and where waves can't roll;

To man, to greedy man, your bard prefers,
White foxes, fables, ermines, cats, and bears,
And all the furry monsters Greenland can call } hers.

Or, is the boon too great for gods to give?
Recal the mighty word that bade me live:
So, in the dust forever shall I shun
That worst of evils that affronts the sun,
A fool whose crimes, or father's have made great,
Spurning true genius prostrate at his feet.

ANACREON, ODE II. IMITATED.

TO BAVIUS.

KIND indulgent nature gives
Her favours to each thing that lives;
Her hand impartial envies none,
Each son of her's an only son.
"Her gifts are various."—True, indeed;
But various is each creature's need:
Pride and tatters, scholars claim;
Blockheads, family and fame;
City coxcombs, impudence;
Plodding peasants, common sense;
Statesmen, promises and lies;
Sages, cockle shells and flies;
Parsons, gravity of face,
And avarice, that saving grace;
Wits, and bucks, and bloods, and smart,
Rags, and oaths, and ruffled shirts;
And all Apollo's flying fellows,
Laurel crowns and empty bellies.
In short, what mortal does not share
Of nature's fond maternal care?
Ev'n, Bavius, you, whom hardly we Admit her offspring, hardly she;
(No wonder, certes, for you were Beholden more to chance than her):
Yet from the tender matron got
Want of ear and strength of throat,
Staring, silly ignorance,
Nor common, nor uncommon sense.
Go on, industrious chief! go on;
First merit, and then wear the crown!
Another stab for æ features
The spoils of murder'd muses yours.

TO MARTIN WHITE, ESQ.*

UNTIMELY death too oft attends the brave;
"The path of glory leads unto the grave."
Too oft, when war's alarming din is o'er,
Want waits the hero on his natal shore;
And what's more dreadful to a gen'rous mind:
Scorn, from the basest, meanest of mankind,

* A Scottish law-term, for a lease.

* Of Milton, Lanarkshire.

But kinder fates (and kinder fates are due),
O, ever-honour'd White! distinguish you;
The laurels reap'd by Ganges' sacred flow,
In all their verdure still adorn your brow;
Respect and plenty former labours crown,
And envy mutters---They are fairly won.

ELEGIAC BALLAD.

THE sun was hast'ning to the main;
His beamy radiance play'd
Upon the mountain's edge; the plain
Confess'd a deeper shade.

The chant of birds, from vocal groves,
Harmonious swell'd the breeze;
The shepherds sung their rural loves,
And all around was peace.

When on a bank, where purple flow'rs
With blushing lustre shone;
Dissolv'd in woe, thus Sylvia pours
In air her plaintive moan.

"Once, downy-wing'd, the moments stole
Away, with headless flight;
And suns would warm the western goal,
Before I dream'd of night.

To range the mountain's bloomy side,
And mark where daisies grew,
Or cull with art the meadow's pride,
Was all the care I knew.

Or if another shar'd my breast,
It was by Damon led,
To search at eve the linnet's nest,
And see the bow'rs he made.

But, sad reverse! I now forlorn
Weep out the live-long day;
See joyless gleam the ruddy morn,
Joyless the ev'ning ray.

No op'ning blossoms braid my hair,
Or on my bosom shine;
No Damon deigns the name of fair,
Pressing his lips to mine.

For, ah! by cruel guiles misled,
In guardless hour I fell;
The joys of love and youth are fled,
With innocence to dwell.

No beam of hope illumines my soul,
No ray of future bliss;
But ev'ry sun must cheerless roll,
In sorrow black as this.

Damon! a maid whose beauties bloom
Unfollied by a crime,
Shall wipe your tears for Sylvia's doom;
And tears her fate may claim!

Yet, lovely youth! when in the grave,
Where soon I'll seek for rest,
O, bid the mournful cypress wave,
To shade my clay-cold breast!

And, mindful of our young amours,
Come each revolving year,
And strow my sylvan tomb with flow'rs,
Nor check the pitying tear."

TO ARCHIBALD HAMILTON, ESQ.*

ON HIS MARRIAGE WITH MISS DINWIDDIE †.

I YIELD, I yield, 'twere madness to contend,
When most admire you, and when all commend!
I yield, and own, whatever sages write,
A multitude for once have judged right.

The seeds of genius nature did supply,
Their growth was guided by a parent's eye
Nice to discern, and studious to improve,
Each modest wish he rais'd to gen'ral love;
To virtue pointed each luxuriant spray,
Nor coldly show'd, but ardent led the way.
The fire, the son, the world with wonder view,
And all the father they foresaw in you:
Foresaw that generous expanse of soul,
That warm benevolence, which grasps the whole;
O'erlooks distinctions of belief or race,
And closes systems in its wide embrace;
Foresaw that nameless virtue, little known,
Which hears another's praise, nor seeks its own;
Confirms th' applauses grateful hearts bestow,
Grieves at no joy, nor joys at any woe:
Foresaw, in embryo, all that ever can Give grace to youth, and dignity to man;
The godlike fruits religion's garden yields,
When conscience guides the knife which reason wields.

With wonder they foresaw, and wond'ring see }
Each worth (if worth so great can greater be)
Improv'd in kind, and heighten'd in degree. }

Such virtue, spite of trial, still unquell'd,
Benignant Heav'n with gracious eye beheld;
"Shall he at once our happy mansions tread,
From life's low cares and flesh's fetters freed?
"Or rather, with some kindred spirit know
"All that can be conceiv'd of heav'n below?
"Tis fix'd; (and who shall question Heav'n's "award)?

"Be Miss Dinwiddie his divine reward."
Sure virtue somehow mixes with the blood,
Runs in a line, and marks whole kindreds good;
Else, whence is none among your num'rous friends
But to his ancestors new lustre lends?
Else, whence were you and your accomplish'd bride
At once by virtue and by blood ally'd?

May ev'ry blessing, each domestic sweet,
Concur to crown an union so complete;
May ev'ry moment, as it passes by,
Disclose new raptures to the ardent eye;
May years revolving ever find you blest,
Your prospects blooming, and your joys increas'd;
Till bounteous Heav'n exhaust its ample store,
And mortal weakness can receive no more.

Forgive the freedom of a bard unknown,
Nor check his mounting spirits with a frown;
Fain would he fashion his untutor'd lays,
To honour virtue with deserved praise:
But fruitless prove all efforts to arouse
The lifeless languor of a mourning skull;
His genius scanty, and but small his skill,
The laud in merit, but the first in will.

* Son of the Rev. Mr. Hamilton, minister of Dunsglas.

† Daughter of Governor Dinwiddie.

ON MISS AGNES SMITH*.

As some fair flow'ret on a lonely vale,
Grows safely, shaded from each rougher gale;
No vagrant bee is on its bosom found;
Enamour'd fairies haunt the hallow'd ground,
Smelling the breeze that spreads its virgin sweets around.

So pure, so sweet, so lonely, and so fair,
Melinda grows, beneath a parent's care;
I ask but in her presence thus to be,
To breathe her air, and all her charms to see:
Had angels envy, they would envy me.

LINES †

BY WRITTEN AT BAMBURGH CASTLE, 1789.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

As in some vale, remote from human eye,
Nurs'd by the vernal shower and genial sky,
A primrose rears its unregarded head,
Beneath the shelter of some hawthorn shade,
Unseen, its unpolluted bloom displays,
And wastes, unheeded, its ambrosial days;
No vagrant wing is on its bosom found;
No vagrant foot invades the lonely ground;
The breeze, enamour'd of its virgin bloom,
Fans its sequester'd breast, and breathes its sweet perfume.

So pure, so sweet, so lonely, and so fair,
Sophia grows beneath some angel's care!
Sooth'd by the balm that sea-born breezes bring,
When zephyrs sport on aromatic wing;
And, safely shelter'd from the wint'ry blast,
That sweeps, resistless, o'er the wat'ry waste,
Grows unregarded on this rocky steep,
That overhangs th' inhospitable deep,
Echoing the murmur of the surging wave,
And howling winds that o'er the world of waters rave!

TO MARTIN WHITE, ESQ.

FOND the attempt—in measure meet to dress
The various features of your various bliss!
To make you now the gard'ner's garments wear;
Now follow slowly the laborious steer;
Now in Hesperian groves transported stray;
Now to the upland wind your weary way:
An irksome task; yet tasteless were the wight
Who would refuse it for so fine a sight;
Around in various perspective arise
Woods, rivers, mountains, cottages, and skies.

Her choicest gifts to you Pomona yields,
And Indian harvests whiten o'er your fields;
Not richer crops by Ganges' sacred tide
Reap Brama's sons, than grace the banks of Clyde.

Nor be the labour of the ax forgot,
Nor the least shrub that shades the charming spot;
Trees pill'd on trees defend the happy seat,
"Its summer's shadow, and its winter's heat."

What yet remains to make you fully blest,
To still the cravings of a feeling breast?

* Daughter of Mr. Hugh Smith of Carnwath.
She died of a consumption in 1771.

† Imitated from the foregoing verses.

The lovely comfort, social and serene,
Deep read in books, nor of her reading vain:
Yet not from books is choicest knowledge drawn,
Untutor'd thought oft more than learning can;
Nor yet on learning's tow'ring branches grow,
The fittest garland for a female brow;
Minerva's arts all other arts excel,
To net with grace, and ply the needle well;
With nicest care the filmy thread to draw;
Direct the maids, and give the dairy law;
See that clean hands the curdling liquid press,
And mould to various forms the churn's increase.
Yet ev'n these housewife arts, though great, were vain.

Did not good-nature follow in the train; [care;
It follows!—Mark that brow unweath'rd with None but the gentlest passions harbour there!
So kind her look, so temper'd with reserve,
We hope her love, yet wish most to deserve;
Ever the same, no forms can discompose,
The chaife's rattle, nor the brush of clothes;
With the same ease she welcomes ev'ry gust,
But still the worthiest is receiv'd the best.

Luckless the wight, however great her charms,
Who takes a barren mistress to his arms!
Cold are the pleasures of the nuptial bed,
That never ask Lucina's friendly aid;
Though fortune should all other gifts bestow,
These very gifts would but increase his woe;
"What, shall a stranger reap these fertile fields?
"An alien gather what my garden yields?"

"Some shabby cousin, scarcely known by name,
"Flaunt in my clothes, and propagate my shame!"
But happy he, who in his warm embrace
Clasps the fair mother of a lovely race;
His joys are ever growing, ever new—
And glad am I that happy man are you!

See, fondly playful, hanging by her side,
The father's darling, and the mother's pride,
Kind-hearted Harry, form'd for calmer life,
Than the bar's buffle, or the soldier's strife;
For private friendships form'd, and virtuous love,
And all the native passions of the grove.
But yet perhaps revolving years may trace
On each soft feature a more manly grace,
And then his father's footsteps he may fill,
And Milton's owner be a hero still.

See Betsey, careless of her growing charms,
Hug puffy, purring peaceful in her arms;
Arms that, when some important years are run,
Shall bless some hero, or some hero's son.

Afide, in silent muse, see Tommy stands,
Doom'd from his birth to visit foreign lands;
A sturdy boy, undaunted, void of fear,
Dreading alike a faggot and a spear;
Frank as a soldier, honest as a tar,
Equally fitted for the sea or war.

What, little Martin! can be said of thee?
A stranger I to thee, and thou to me!
May Harry's virtues animate thy breast,
And then thy father must be fully blest.

Thus I, enamour'd of my theme, pursue
A task my gratitude preferib'd—not you:—
Should any, too severe, deride my strains,
And think you poorly paid for all your pains,
Tell them (perhaps they'll mind it while they live),
'Twas all a grateful dying bard could give.
April 1772.

DAMON; OR, THE COMPLAINT.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

GREY twilight had begun her dusky reign,
Veiling the glories of the vernal year,
When from the village, his frequented walk,
Pensive and slow, the youthful Damon stray'd,
Along the windings of his native stream.

His downcast visage, clouded, pale, and wan,
Confess'd a bosom pierc'd with pining woe;
The jocund look, the joyous smile, were fled,
Fled the rapt eye that spok'd the social soul:
Silence he fought—and his woe-deafen'd ear,
Long unaccustom'd to the melting voice
Of mirth and gay festivity, was wont
To court the murmur of the falling stream,
And list attentive to the breeze of eve;
While many a sigh fobb'd from his pensive breast,
And many a murmur mutter'd from his tongue,
And ever anon the big round drop,
Unconscious, trickled from his tearful eye.

Onward his step had negligently stray'd,
To where the stream with deeper murmur flow'd,
Incessant rushing o'er a pebbly bed.
There the pale gloom, the lonely rolling stream,
The awful horrors of the waving wood,
Inspir'd his soul with a congenial dread,
And rous'd the secret sorrows of his mind:
He stop'd—he gaz'd—he tore his flowing hair,
He bar'd his bosom to the dewy breeze,
And wildly heaving his distemper'd breast,
In woeful accents breath'd this mournful tale.

“ Forlorn, dejected, hapless, here I roam!
No friendly hand to guide my wand'ring step,
No kindly gleam to light my onward way,
No feeling heart to share my piercing grief,
Or shed the balm of consolation mild!
O, silent night! extend thy peaceful gloom;
Enwrap my musing melancholy head;
Shade all the horrors of my painful heart,
And take, O! kindly take, my rising sighs.

“ Propitious fortune smil'd not on my birth,
No lineal honours grac'd my lowly name;
Remote from greatness and luxurious ease,
The pomp of grandeur, and the pride of wealth,
My youth was rear'd in solitude obscure,
And partial nature crown'd my humble lot
With love alone!—In vacancy of mind,
For ever then my lightsome spirits flow'd,
Obscure dancing to the pleasing call
Of laughing hope, tranquillity, and ease:
The morn unclouded fled serene away,
In friendly, social, heart-exulting joy;
The blooming, modest, rosy-smiling look;
The easy, artless, unaffected grace
Of spotless beauty; the enchanting glance
Of simple virtue, innocence, and love,
Shone ever radiant on the evening hour!

“ Say then, when prostrate on the humble earth
Was e'er, O heav'n! my voice imploring rais'd
To thee for honour, wealth, or gaudy fame?
From my warm heart did e'er one murmur flow,
'Gainst the fair form of that unerring law
Which sways my being with mysterious rule?
No; rather, did not calm contentment lull
Each rising wish? or if one wish escap'd,
Its frail ambition fought no higher boon,

Than, safely shelter'd in my native vale,
Remote, obscure, inglorious, and unknown,
That lasting love might crown my peaceful night,
And Sylvia gladden all my days with joy.
Burst, burst, my heart!—regardless Heav'n Averfe,

Despis'd my humble pray'r!—The modest rose
That early blossom'd on her vermilion cheek,
And, op'ning, promis'd a future flow'r,
To smile delightful many a summer sun,
At guilt's fell touch, all withered and wan,
Droops its pale head, and fades away forlorn!
But let me not impiety to guilt
Presumptuous add, and causeless charge on Heav'n
The wicked purpose and the perverse deed!
Why should a worm, with daring breath, presume

To blame the course of ever-mystic pow'rs?
And pridelike swelling on the feeble plume
Of reptile reason, screen with cobweb veil
This sacred truth,—that Providence is just?
No—It was pride, that tow'ring soar'd aloft,
Arous'd misfortune—who with frigid touch
Benumb'd its wings, and roll'd it in the dust!

But why—ah, whither roves licentious thought?
Still rebel passions rule my madding soul!
Still strays my heart!—though ever on my ear,
Soft-breathing from the lips of hallow'd Truth
And heav'n-descended Reason, sweetly low,
These sage dissuasive accents seem to say:—
“ Go, take a manly courage to your breast,
“ Nor stray, sad forrowing, by the lonely stream;
“ See, art and science spread their grateful store,
“ And all the muses all their sweets display,
“ And court you, beck'ning to their tuneful cell:
“ Forego the dear delights of early love,
“ Unhallow'd by the fair esteem of virtue;
“ And learn that lore divine, the bounteous pow'rs
“ Bestow, to bless the fav'rite sons of earth.”

I come, ye gentle monitors! I come!
But, ere I go, permit this tender sigh,
This swelling tribute of a parting tear:
The hour will come, when, sunk in silent rest,
My heart will cease to beat, my eyes to weep,
And claim the pious drop I now bestow.

“ I rave, I rave! the doleful hour draws nigh!
Already dire affliction saps my frame;
My vitals languish, all my pow'rs decay:

“ I leave you, Sylvia! ne'er remember me;
Forget, when I lie mould'ring in the grave,
How much I lov'd you, or how much I mourn'd.
In rural ease and calm retirement bless'd,
Haply some wealthier, happier youth may 'njoy,
In after-time, what fate denies to me:
But cease the sigh to heave, the wish to breathe,
Again to wander through the guileful rounds
Of fashion, folly, vanity, and vice!
May love, esteem, fair truth, and social joy,
Attend you peaceful through the vale of life;
May Heav'n, benignant, smile on all your ways,
And virtue light you blameless to your grave!

“ 'Tis there we'll meet!—'Tis there one common fate

Will mix our ashes in one common dust!
I go before!—I waste— I die apace!
Farewell, ye wilds! and thou sequester'd stream
The secret witness of my woe, farewell!

And thou, for whom I liv'd, for whom I die,
Sylvia, farewell! and all the world, adieu!"

ALEXIS:

OR, THE CONSTANT LOVER. A TALE.

Is there who scorns a constant lover? here
I claim his censure, and demand his sneer;
That thing am I, and bold enough to own,
Where once I fix my love, I still love on:
Sway'd by no accidents of coy, or kind,
With all my strength, my heart, my soul, my mind

In anno sixty — (four years ago),
My hat, ods me! was then a very beau;
No shears had yet curtail'd its copious brim,
Nor gray-groat dreser spoil'd its welted trim;
My face secure (my face it then could hide),
Beneath its shadow fun and wind defy'd:
My lips no paly scurfs, no blisters knew,
And each plump cheek preserv'd its native hue.
In sixty — (about this very time,
The meadows and my bat were in their prime),
I saw my Betsy first, a strapping lass,
Not quite a beauty, and not quite an ass;
Her feet, though clumsy, and her ancles more,
Silk shoes atton'd for, for silk shoes she wore;
Perhaps above some faults might too be spy'd,
If aught can be a fault that fringes hide;
The napkin floating white, like morning snow,
Made large amends for what was dun below;
And the fair pendants glittering in her ear,
Conceal'd the dirt, if dirt indeed was there:
If music's sweetness flow'd not from her tongue,
Nor Philomela warbled as the song;
Yet was, I ween, her voice both shrill and loud,
And weil could quell a kitchen's ev'ning crowd;
The laughter's giggle, and the laugh'd at's pout,
Struck with the found sublime, alike were mute:
Ev'n pots and gridirons, if a word the spake,
Felt thrilling tremors to their centre shake.
I saw, I blush'd, and (mark, my hat was new),
To a kind curt'ly made as kind a bow;
Some distant words, then compliments ensu'd;
I wrote divinely, she divinely few'd:
Then whp, ere either minded where we were,
I grew a lad of parts, and she grew fair.
"I never spent so pleasantly an hour;"
And, "Ma'am! I ne'er was proud of praise before."

"Sir, was it really you the sonnet wrote?"
"Such beauty, Ma'am, can raise the flattest thought."

"A copy, Sir!" — "'Tis at your service, Ma'am."
"And it you please, Sir, let it have your name."
Such was our first, our secret interview,
Such virtue has a welted hat, when new!

Though dark and gloomy was my lonely hall;
Though rotten was the roof, and rent the wall;
Though n' thing it contain'd of human use,
But lank and feeble was each hungry mouse;
So lank, so feeble, they had surely died,
Had not my book's life's ebbing stream supply'd:
Yet ever after, morning, eve, and noon,
Its humble floor was sweep'd with Mira's gown.
Nay, scarce an hour but from the spider's haunt
She wanted something, or would seem to want

(The spider's haunt my hall, nor named wrong,
And vulgar Befs was Mira still in song).
In easy lapse our moments onward roll'd,
She grew more yielding, and I grew more bold;
The cheek, the hand subdu'd, but fan my fire,
Still higher feats I meditate, and higher:
The lips capitulate, I storm the breast;
But Honour's manly counsel fav'd the rest:
Yet what by day he impudence had deem'd,
With fame unblemish'd we in darkness dream'd.

Think not, licentious profligates profane!
I mean to warm you with a wanton strain;
Pure as Clyde's crystal shall my numbers flow,
In all the native innocence of woe!
Hail, virgin goddess of the streaming eye!
Who cheer my solitude with many a sigh;
Who shed your softest influence on my head,
And drive foul passion from thy cypress shade;
My friend, my sole companion, and my queen!
Life of my song! which else had lifeless been;
Hail to your dark domain! your kingdom come,
And wrap all nations in one friendly gloom:
So shall rude riot wholly disappear,
Nor soul-mouth'd folly wound the modest ear;
The rake with wonder feel each wish refine,
And ev'ry breast be innocent as mine.
Yes, it is innocent; dejecting woe
So found it, and I trust will leave it so:
Ev'n Mira, cruel, faithless as she is,
Will do me justice, and acknowledge this.
Mira! that word recalls my wand'ring song,
And points to days when my old hat was young;
When all was rapture; and the beardless bard
To city fops and country squires prefer'd.

But nothing under heav'n is constant found;
For ceaseless rolls the wheel of fortune round:
Now stand we trembling on the top, and now
The low is lofty, and the lofty low!
This useful lesson what I tell will teach,
A truth old hats, as well as Plato, preach.

O, lust of wealth! what evils spring from thee!
A curse to all, a double curse to me;
The term drew nigh, and frugal was the squire,
I would have rais'd, he would not raise my hire;
With heart-felt grief I saw my coat decay,
My only coat grew biter ev'ry day;
My breeches too the taylor's art surpass,
Fast as he sew'd, they ran to rags as fast:
Autumn's bleak rains descend—where'er I go,
Water and dirt at once pervade my shoe:
A father's fears I for my stockings feel,
And hang in sorrow o'er each helpless heel;
Distant, far distant, from a sister's care,
My stockings, now a solitary pair!
My hat and vest, though decent, still, I said,
Must too decay, as others have decay'd;
Terrestrial is their birth, and, soon or late,
Terrestrial hats and vests must yield to fate!
Time, ever hurrying, brings the period on,
When this shall turn to rags, and that be brown.

Consider, Sir (I said with deference due),
The sum of all my services to you;
The tedious days in close confinement spent:
With all the humble patience of a faint;
The boys were restless, and the nursery near,
But did their scarrings ever reach your ear?
Or did the swollen eye and blubber'd cheek
Ever the rigour of my tribe bespeak?

No, Heaven can witness, gentle was my rule;
That of a drawing-room, and not a school.
Consider then, nor blame me if I'm free,
How coarse my fare has been, how small my fee!
I never drank what for your use was brew'd,
Nor was one offal from your plate my food;
The barley of your fields supplied my bread;
The water of your well my thirst allay'd;
And then my wages—so exceeding poor,
The meanest scullion in your house has more:
The former I might bear, the latter too,
If all my clothes would last forever new:
If heaven with hoofs would harden either foot,
And shag me o'er with an immortal suit.
But Sir, you see (with that I turn'd me round)
This body can't be cover'd with—

For other——it will not do for less—
I might afford a pretty decent dress;
Might yet a student among students shine,
Nor with my rags affront the favouring Nine:
Think not my shabbiness of mean concern,
If I be shabby, will the children learn?
No; be assur'd Sir, every growing rent
Grows certain ruin to my government:
The hour will come,—nay 'tis already here,
When they will scorn the man they should revere,
Will slyly draw each beggar-patch aside,
And most expose what most I wish to hide.

Thus I submit—'Squire Fufcus answer'd fierce,
"You and your favouring Nine may ——,
"Take the old ——, and welcome; but if not,
"Go and be —— I wont advance a great."

Rous'd into rage, I dropp'd the deference due,
And all the scholar open'd to my view;
Below my notice, Sir, I scorn debate,
Though made my master by the frown of fate.
Gods! let my poverty for ever last;
Each coming day add sorrow to the past:
Let labour bend me o'er his heavy spade;
Woe's cup be mine, and mine affliction's bread;
But never riches to my pray'rs impart,
And in your wrath deny a gen'rous heart.

This said, I scornful from the squire withdrew,
Nor fear'd the surly terrors of his brow;
My books I bundled up without delay,
Nor could ev'n Mira's tears command my stay:
"Dear, lovely maid! my race of bliss is run;
"Heav'n bids us part; the will of Heav'n be done:
"Though joy shall never light my mornings more,
"Nor sooth my slumbers in the silent hour;
"Yet shall some gleams of comfort touch my
"mind,
"To think you once were faithful, once were
"kind.

"Farewell! and, oh! may ev'ry pow'r above
"That smil'd propitious on our rising love,
"With ev'ry blessing, ev'ry good reward,
"Your gen'rous friendship for a friendless bard."
I weeping said, and grasp'd her to my breast,
While broken sobs and kisses spoke the rest.

"Farewell, Alexis!—must I say farewell
"To him I've ever lov'd, and lov'd so well!
"Farewell! since thus my cruel stars ordain;
"Stars still regardless of a lover's pain:
"But by the mem'ry of this last embrace,
"Our nights of rapture, and our days of bliss;
"By the immortal fervour of your lays,
"And ev'ry monument of Mira's praise;

"When ravish'd from these arms, I know not
"where,
"Beware, thy weeping Mira bids beware!
"Of wit's enchantment, and of beauty's snare;
"Bethink thee of thy vows of endless love,
"These vows now register'd in heav'n above;
"And ere the subtle fiends lay their lure,
"Prevent its malice, and apply the cure:
"Thus shalt thou, after various fortunes past,
"Come undebauch'd to my bed at last:
"Thine is my heart, and thine my hand shall be,
"My life, my happiness, depends on thee!"

Such were her words.—Philosopher severe!
Thou hard of credit, and of captious ear!
Say, would'st thou, in the wisdom of thy youth,
Have fought a Sorites to prove their truth?
If so, indeed a very sage thou art,
And triple adamant environs thy heart;
With praises due thy prudence I commend;
But may'st thou, Zeno! never be my friend.
For me, with all my weaknesses content,
Soon as I heard, as soon I gave assent;
The sighs and tears that with each word increas'd,
Were demonstration to a feeling breast.

What pity, Heav'n! the morn of all thou'st made,
The radiant image of thy starry head;
What pity woman, woman so divine!
Should want a will immutable as thine;
Then through our groves would plaints of falsehood cease,

And rills, unswell'd with sorrow, seek the seas;
Each gale on lighter pinions scour the skies,
Nor sweat beneath a load of groans and sighs.
Passion their counsellor, and whim their guide,
Their friends and fav'rites, vanity and pride;
No wonder women, angels as they seem,
This just now fit, unfit next moment deem;
No wonder Mira, with each grace adorn'd,
A day, one tedious day my absence mourn'd;
A day, one tedious day, resolv'd to keep
Her vows; but lost them with her morning's sleep.

Spruce from the city came a gaudy wight,
His hat was finer, and his hands more white;
A softer tinge each sickly feature spread,
Crisp'd were the hoary honours of his head;
A gilt staff trembled in his feeble hand,
To him a staff, to me it were a wand;
He came, he bow'd; than me he better bow'd;
Nay, bent the knee; and bend it well he cou'd:
She smil'd, she curtsy'd; and, (alas, alas!
That I should live to sing so sad a case!)
She granted ev'ry favour in an hour,
That cost me many months to gain before!

A woman once inconstant's always so;
One bound'ry broke, no other bounds they know
Thus sheep, if once they break the turf-built fold,
No whins can scare them, and no dikes can hold.

The coxcomb Florio, so prim, so neat,
Soon shar'd his clumsy ragged rival's fate;
Out-bow'd, out-kneel'd, by one of rustic garb,
Who snapt to seize the bait, but seiz'd the barb;
Long pin'd in thinner air the foolish fish,
To gain his shelt'ring mud was all his wish;
Once more below his sunless bank to lie,
In listless, lazy, loitering apathy.
In vain! when Mira ey'd the useless prey,
Far on the shore she flung the thing away.

Irkſome the taſk, and tedious were the tale,
Werds would grow ſcarce, and pen and ink would fail;

Nay, life's ſhort period hardly would ſuffice,
To give the fum of her inconfancies.
Yet ſtill I love her; do I what I will,
Some magic influence attracts me ſtill;
Attracts me ſtill, and with a force as ſtrong
As when my hat, my welſed hat was young:
Elſe, why theſe ſighs that labour in my breaſt,
That ſeek for vent, and wiſh to be expreſt?
Soon as I reach my ſolitary hall,
Ye ſighs burſt forth! ye tears torrents fall!
There no rude ſwain ſhall mock your tender moan;
Your lovely ſorrow ſuits with love alone.

Sept. 6. 1771.

SONNET.

FAREWELL, diſturber of my reſt,
Success leſs love! adieu;
With hopes, and jealousies, and fears,
And all your happy crew.
Farewell, the mournful midnight lay,
The elegy of woe!
And all the diſmal ditties, ſung
By Medwan's mazy flow.
Hail, ſober dulneſs! ever hail,
My only, laſt relief!
Thy ſerious ſons in peace reſoſe,
Inſenſible of grief!
No ſtudied harmony of ſound
Their paſſions e'er reſin'd;
Nor melting melody of woe
E'er touch'd their callous mind.
Alike to them, when nature's call
Ferments their boiling blood,
Whether Belinda ſmile or not;
Another is as good.
The various ills of love and life,
The thinking only know;
And ſenſibility is join'd
Eternally with woe.
At firſt, the little ills of love
My boſom hardly wrung;
But lo! they gather'd ſtrength, and grew
Important as I ſung.
Thus, under a phyſician's care,
Intent on fame and fees,
The titubation of a pulſe
Increases to diſeaſe.
He talks in all the terms of art,
And wags his myſtic head;
While patients tremble for their life,
And think they're really bad.

TO MISS _____

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

LET gentle youths diſſolve in am'rous fires,
And breathe in melting lays their ſoft deſires;
With ſongs of wit, and ſonnets void of care,
Gay as their hopes, and as their hearts ſincere;
To ſpotleſs charms unfading trophies raiſe,
Of real love and undiſſembled praiſe:

Be theirs the bleſſings they deſerve to prove,
The garland gather'd from the myrtle grove;
The gracious glance of condeſcending maids;
Love long to laſt, and fame that never fades:
For them may Venus light the genial bed,
By hallow'd Hymen honourable made;
And crown th' embrace of many wedded years
With gen'rous ſons, to emulate their ſires;
Like them be bleſt with all their wiſhes crave,
A parent's joy, and age's honour'd grave.

Far other hopes my hapleſs breaſt inſpire;
Far other themes demand the muſe's fire!
With me the dear rewards of love are o'er;
For me the myrtle garlands bloom no more!
In cheerleſs darkneſs ſinks the ſhining ſcene,
Where ſoft affection held her early reign;
And chaſte enjoyment ſhed her conſtant ray,
To light, with radiance mild, my years away!
Oft, as unſeen, I ſeek the ſhady grove,
Scenes of young joy, and haunts of early love;
The painted meadow, or the purling ſtream,
Where fancy feeds, and where the muſes dream;
Where laughing loves and naked graces play
In ſportive gambols all the live-long day:
Sudden I ſee your fancy'd form ariſe;
See blooming beauties ſkim before my eyes;
See ev'ry love, and ev'ry charming grace,
Smile in your eye, or languish on your face.
I cloſer gaze—when, lo! a mournful train
Of weeping virtues cloud the radiant ſcene!
Nor love, nor blooming beauty ſtraight appears,
But ev'ry look a diſmal horror wears;
Obſcur'd by guilt, the dimpling ſmiles decay,
And all your glowing graces fade away!
Sad, then, I ſit me down;—or wand'ring rove
Through ev'ry walk, and weep our ruin'd love:
While conſcious bow'rs, and love-frequented ſhades,
Long-winding walks, and intermingled glades,
In fond remembrance op'ning to my view,
Reſreſh my ſorrows, and my ſighs renew;
Deep plaintive murmurs periſh on my tongue,
Or flow away in melancholy ſong;
While all around the penſive groves complain,
Sigh ev'ry ſigh, and murmur ev'ry ſtrain!
But, Sylvia, what avails the murm'ring glade,
The ſighing grove, or ſympathizing ſhade?
Their ſeeming ſorrows unſucceſſful prove,
To ſooth the woes of diſappointed love;
To bid the black-wing'd ſeaſons backward roll,
Clear the foul ſtain, or waſh the guilty ſoul;
To beauty's form fair innocence reſtore,
Huſh the falſe tongue, bid ſlander wound no more:
Your crimes, your follies, riſe in endleſs view,
And my heart ſwells, my tears flow forth for you!
For you!—but why invite you forth to rove
Through ſcenes of ſorrow and deſponding love?
Scenes that (for ſo the ruling pow'rs decree)
Muſt ſtill be view'd, and ſtill bewail'd by me!
Enough for you—with ſolitary care
To view your fall, and ſhed a ſecret tear;
Careleſs of what the mourning muſe may ſay,
When wild with ſorrow burſts the love-lorn lay!
Enough for you—whene'er my thoughts I caſt
On all the joys of youth and virtue paſt;
When I reflect (forgive this ſwelling ſigh,
And this big tear juſt trickling from my eye),
When peaceful innocence and pleaſure play'd,
With gentle love beneath our native ſhade;

And bade our hearts, to grief or care unknown,
 Confess their charming influence alone!
 Enough for you--to grant the meed I crave,
 For me the willow's paly wreath to weave;
 And softly bind it on my youthful brow,
 Mark of my pain, and merit of my woe!
 This sad indulgence will reward my lays,
 Approve my grief, and gives me all my praise;
 So, when your sorrows cease, for cease they must,
 And your fair form shall moulder into dust;
 May some sad youth, by pity's lore improv'd,
 By virtue honour'd, and the muse belov'd,
 Due to your fate, devote the mournful line,
 And join your mem'ry as your love to mine.

To mine!--ah, no! withdraw the wishful eye,
 Check the soft tear, and still the rising sigh;
 Scatter the willow wreath you weave for me,
 Who, idly raving, pour my plaint to thee!
 To thee! who doated on my strains before;
 To thee! who never shall behold me more;
 Praise all your virtues, number all your charms,
 And fold, untainted, fold them in my arms!

'Tis o'er, alas!--the dear delusion's o'er;
 Returning reason reassumes her pow'r;
 Before her swift the magic scenes decay,
 That fancy gilded with delusive ray;
 Your guilt, your shame, arising to her view,
 She tears the veil, and paints their real hue;
 Unmantled follies stand around confest,
 And wounded honour bares the bleeding breast;
 While none remains of all the tender train;
 But soft-ey'd pity's idly ling'ring strain!

Farewell, weak maid! unmercifully long,
 I pain your ear with an ungentle song;
 But, ere I leave you, listen to the lay
 That wears no woe, and weeps no worth away;
 Friendship refin'd inspires the serious theme,
 And reason lights it with her radiant beam;
 While the big thought is lab'ring in my breast,
 That soon the poet, soon the song will rest,
 Soon will my sorrows, my reflections, end;
 You lose a lover, and lament a friend!

Where meek-rob'd penitence, of placid mien,
 Her eye mild-beaming, and her brow serene,
 Sedately sits, uplift a sigh sincere;
 Her smile alone will ruin'd love repair;
 Smooth the rough path that leads to virtue's
 god,

And urge you ling'ring on the arduous road;
 Your wav'ring soul with confidence confirm,
 Inspire with caution, and with courage arm;
 Bid it at vice with indignation rise,
 Scorn all below, and hope its native skies,
 Contemn the pleasures that arise from sense,
 Dare to be good, and aim at excellence.
 And though condemn'd by dooming pow'rs above
 To live far distant from the man you love;
 The irksome path of life alone to tread,
 No friend to counsel, and no hand to lead;
 Regarding Heav'n will glad your weary way,
 And blaze around a reconciling ray;
 Winning and kind, the wand'ring with reprove,
 And grant in grace what is deny'd in love;
 Mild to forgive, and piteous of the past,
 Release from life, and crown with joy at last;
 Command the blow that turns your frame to dust,
 Bids grief subside, and ev'ry sigh be hush'd;

Bids sure oblivion o'er your follies creep,
 And lull you peaceful in eternal sleep.

Sept. 5. 1769.

TO ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

WHILE youth yet scampers in its wild career,
 And life's mad bustle vibrates on our ear;
 While frolic's loofer merriments delight,
 And delicacy yields to appetite;
 Why strives my friend by studies too severe,
 To antedate the tyranny of care?
 To weaken principles already weak,
 The very principles by which we act?
 These bug-bear passions that affright you so,
 Procure us all the happiness we know;
 From their repose results the calm of life,
 But greater bliss accompanies their strife;
 And when their gen'rous efforts you subdue,
 You only do what sager time would do;
 If war was destin'd for each living wight,
 Why has not nature arm'd us for the fight?
 Chastis'd the flowing current of our blood,
 And disengag'd us from the fair and good?
 Each human heart in Stygian armour drest,
 And lin'd with triple brails each ruffian breast?

How happy youth! if youth its bliss but knew;
 Theirs is the present, theirs the future too;
 Where'er they turn, enjoyment courts their eye,
 Enjoyment not forbidden by the sky:
 Here, walk the fairy fantoms of the grove,
 Young friendship leaning on the arms of love;
 There, fame in air displays the gaudy crown,
 By sages, heroes, poets, patriots, won.

Come, let us now each pleasant scene enjoy,
 Ere age's wither'd hands their sweets destroy;
 Sweep all away, and nothing leave behind
 But philosophic apathy of mind.

ELEGIAC BALLAD.

ALL on the grass-green margin of Clyde,
 A fair maiden disconsolate lay;
 Red-swoln was her eye with the salt trickling tear,
 And her cheek was as pale as the clay.

Wither'd and wan was her rose-red lip,
 And the charms of her youth were all flown;
 Like a flow'r that is scorch'd by the mid-summer
 heat,
 Or is plucked before it be blown.

Loose on her neck hung her long long hair,
 No green garland the ringlets combin'd;
 Of Damon's false vows, and his late pledged troth,
 And of mis'ry, she sung to the wind.

"Clyde, Clyde! roll on your clear crystal waves,
 (It was thus with a sigh she began);
 But roll where you will, you never will find
 Such a lovely and faithless young man.

Beware, O! beware, ye fond, fond maids!
 O! beware, and take warning by me!
 Nay, trust not a swain though he swears to be true,
 They are false, but not lovely as he.

It was in yon offer leaf-lin'd bow'r
 O! too well I remember the place; [twigs,
 For my own fingers wove the green bending
 And he cover'd the benches with grass:

That he took me in his left circling arms,
 And did fondlingly kiss me the while;
 But beware, O! beware of the heart-stealing kisses,

For men kiss where they mean to beguile---

Sylvia! to hang on thy lily-white neck,
 And to press thy fair bosom to mine,
 Is enough; yes, away with base dirty self,
 'Tis enough, 'tis enough to be thine.

Proud damsels may deck them in fine rich array,
 And ev'ry rude feature adorn;
 But can riches, or pride, e'er attire them like thee,
 In the purple and freshness of morn?

' Away, foolish grandeur! I'll ne'er change my love,

' Or this kiss, this sweet kiss, be my last:---

' Yes, the gods who do look through this leaflin'd bow'r

' Can bear witness how truly I'm blest.'

Such, such were his words, then more close to his breast,

With full many a sigh he me drew;

So kind, so sincere, and so hearty they seem'd,
 That I could not but think they were true.

Ask not, O! ask not, ye four four maids,
 If more than a kiss he did won;

Think, but think on the place, and the dear,
 dear youth,

And then tell me, what would you have done?

How frail and how feeble a fond maid's bliss,
 Overtur'd by all breezes that blow!

How weak is the barrier, how narrow the line,
 That does sep'rate our love from our woe!

Where are ye now, ye false flatt'ring joys!

Ye prospects of pleasures unknown?

Like Damon, ye faithless have left me to weep,
 And ye with him to Clara are flown.

O! do not receive them, thou rash, rash maid!

Or, farewell thy quiet of mind;

They may charm for a little, but yet, yet beware

Of a poison that festers behind.

Look but on me; nay, nay, never fear,

I'm a rival you scarcely can dread;

No roses now bloom on this pale lily cheek,

Nor is mine the fair flock that I feed.

Look yet again, and tell unto me,

And, O! see it be truth that you tell;

Can your fondness secure you the false wand'ring
 swain,

When I'm thus but for loving too well?

Away, haste away, ye slow, slow hours!

And be dipt, O you fun! in the sea:

Ah me! I but rave; for the time is no more

When the ev'ning brought comfort to me.

Sad, ever sad! --- is there no kind cure?

Not a balsam provided for woe?

O, tell me, some angel! in what happy clime

Does the precious remedy grow?

Kindly remember'd, thou fire-clad sprite!

It is there, it is certainly there;

And soon will I seek in the cold darksome grave

For a balsam to love and despair."

HYMN

TO THE ETHERAL MIND.

HAIL, source of happiness! whate'er thy name,
 Through ages vast succession still the same;
 For ever blest, in giving others bliss
 No boon thou askest of thy reptile race;
 Their virtues please thee, and their crimes offend;
 Not as a governor, but as a friend:
 What can our goodness profit thee? and say,
 Can guilt's black dye thy happiness allay?
 Raise vengeful passions in thy heav'nly mind,
 Passions that ev'n disgrace the human kind?
 No: are we wise? the wisdom is our own;
 And folly's mis'ries wait on fools alone:
 We live and breathe by thy divine command,
 Our life, our breath, are in thy holy hand;
 But something still is ours, and only ours,
 A moral nature, grac'd with moral pow'rs,
 Thy perfect gift, unlimited and free,
 Without reserve of service, or of fee.
 Poor were the gift, if given but to bind
 In everlasting fetters all mankind!
 To bind us o'er to debts we ne'er could pay,
 And for our torment cheat us into day!
 Not thus thou dealest, sure it is not thus,
 Father beneficent! with all, with us!
 Thou form'd'st our souls susceptible of bliss,
 In spite of circumstance, of time and place;
 A bliss internal, ev'ry way our own,
 Which none can forfeit, is deny'd to none;
 For ever forfeit; for our freedom's such,
 'Tis scorn'd or courted, still within our reach;
 And if we sink to misery and woe,
 Thou neither made us, nor decreed us so;
 Perfection in a creature cannot dwell,
 Some men have fallen, and some yet may fall;
 Many the baits that tempt our steps astray,
 From reason's dictates, and from wisdom's way.
 But, hail, Eternal Essence! ever hail!
 Though vice now triumph, passion now prevail;
 Though all should err, yet all are sure to find
 In thee a father! and in thee a friend!
 A friend, to overlook the mortal part,
 The crimes, the follies foreign to the heart.

A FIT OF THE SPLEEN.

What is this creature man, who struts the world,
 With so much majesty?—A frightful dream!
 A midnight goblin, and a restless ghost;
 Leaving the dismal regions of the tomb,
 To walk in darkness, and astonish night,
 With hideous yellings, and with piteous groans!
 The radiant orbs that glitter o'er your heads,
 What are they more than lamps in sepulchres?

That shine on dead men bones, and point out death,

Misfortune, sorrow, misery, and woe,
And all the sad innumerable ills
That blazon the escutcheon of mortality!
A horror visible! than which the shades,
The thickest midnight shades, Cimmerian glooms,
Were clearer sunshine, and more wishful day!

The mountain's fragrance, and the meadow's growth,

The vernal blossom, and the summer's flow'r,
Are but funereal garlands, nature strows
Manificent on this stupendous herse,
This decorated prelude to the grave;
Insatiable monster! yawning still,
Unfathomably deep!—A little while,
And lo! he closes on the painted scene,
And, forfeited with carnage, yawns no more!

Say, what is life?—this privilege to breathe?
But a continued sigh—a lengthen'd groan—
A felt mortality—a sense of pain—
A present evil, still foreboding worse—
A church-yard epitaph—a plaintive song—
A mournful universal elegy,
We ever read, and ever read with tears!

HERO AND LEANDER.

IN TWO BOOKS.

From the Greek of Musæus.

Κιδιά κακοί φθέρωνι γυναικῶν ἴσταν μῦθον
Φύνη Νυμφῆ φωνεῖ:— NAUM. GNOM.

BOOK I.

SING, heav'nly maid! the memorable lamp
Conscious of secret loves, and the bold youth
Who nightly brav'd the horrors of the deep,
Courting a dark embrace, and silent joys,
On which the morn immortal never dawn'd;
That famous lamp, by whose auspicious ray
The amorous Leander safely swam
To ancient Sestus, and the longing arms
Of his fond mistress, who with watchful care
Tended its nightly radiance, and renew'd
Its failing flame; till one malignant hour
Saw it extinguish'd, and Leander dead.

Faith by the margin of the founding deep,
In a sequester'd tow'r, a rev'rend pile,
The work of other days, belov'd of all,
The modest priestess of the Cyprian queen,
Fair Hero dwelt; unspotted was the maid,
And unexperienc'd in the dangerous sweets
Of mutual love. She thunn'd the secret haunts
Of guileful pleasure, where her wanton peers,
To youthful dalliance, and illicit joys,
Gave up their vanquish'd souls. But in the face
With duteous hand on Venus' altar burnt
The fragrant produce of Sabæan groves,
Propitiating the goddess, and her son
All-conqu'ring love—Relentless, savage pow'r!
Could not the piety of the lovely maid
Unbend thy stubborn bow? her pleading tears
Avert thy fatal arrows?—No: she fell
The hapless victim of thy cruel art.

Now came the day through Asia's wide domains
To Venus sacred, and the purple wounds
Of beautiful Adonis.—All the youth
Of sea-girt Cyprus and Hæmenia come
To hold the festival.—Each virgin leaves
Her dance unfinish'd on thy fragrant top
Libanus! and thy soft luxurious sons
On the tall cedars hang their uselefs harps
And throng to Sestus.—All whose tender breast
Exults impassion'd at the pow'ful glance
Of female beauty on the Phrygian plains,
And thine Arcadia! but chiefly thine
Delicious Daphne! Syria's blisful grove
Crowd thither also; and along with these
The youth of Abydos, scarce disjoin'd
By Hæliepontic straits from Europe's shores,
And ancient Sestus.—Hero through the fane
In all the majesty of beauty walk'd,
Performing ev'ry rite; her blushing cheek
Shed a soft lustre round; as when the sun
Gilds with his early beams a vernal mead,
Where, dropt with dew, the rose and lily blend
In sweet assemblage.—Loosely thrown behind,
A snowy garment brush'd her stately steps,
With silver fringes deck'd.—The graces smil'd
In ev'ry feature, ev'ry look;—ease sat
On ev'ry limb;—each attitude confess'd
A priestess worthy of the queen of love.
Each youth is fill'd with ravishment, each breast
Heaves with desire.—Where'er the virgin goes,
She quickly spreads the soft contagion round;
And pray'rs like these are heard through all the fane.

“ Cytherean Venus, or if Ida's grove,
“ Or Carian Cnidus, please thee more! attend
“ My earnest suit.—Be this! be this the maid
“ Destin'd for me, when in the fated hour
“ I kindle up the Hymeneal torch,
“ And leave thy altars; if, like one of us,
“ The earth's increase suffices for her food,
“ And nourishes her lovely frame:—But if “ (As is more likely) an immortal she
“ Of thy celestial train, be such the fair,
“ Th' immortal fair, the fates have mark'd my “ wife.”

Such was the universal pray'r.—But thou,
Leander! fir'd with a sublimer flame,
And inextinguishable ardour, didst
Greatly resolve to gain the beauteous maid,
Or fall the victim of a fruitless love.

The uncorrupted torch of pure desire
Flash'd in his eager ear; his bosom glow'd
With an unusual warmth;—a conscious blush
Suffus'd his burning cheek, and trembling seiz'd
His loosen'd knees, and shook his manly frame.
Thrice he attempted to accost her, thrice
Amazement, fear, and reverence repress'd
His meditated words.—At last his love,
Impatient of controul, o'ercame his fears.

Veiling his real intent in artful guise
Of curious inquiry, with silent tread
He steals to where the maiden stood, amid
A menial train.—He joins himself to these,
Feigning some matter of discourse.—Meanwhile

* The strait is only half a mile over, about three miles from the Dardanelles, where the ruins of these cities are to be seen.

The deep-drawn sigh, the languishing regard,
The downcast pensive look, and frequent blush,
Soliciting attention, did attract
Her serious notice;—then, less fearful grown,
He rais'd his eye, while ev'ry wishful glance
Betray'd his inmost soul.—She, not unpleas'd,
Beheld his infant-love, and nought averse
To the soft intercourse, with a regard
Of infinite complacency receiv'd
Each token of his passion:—Oft the veil'd
In virgin modesty her blushing cheek;
In vain the veil'd! her bosom's tell-tale heave
Pass not unnoticed; ev'n the very blush,
But ill conceal'd; each favourable sign
Did not escape a lover's watchful eye.

Now night in silent majesty advanced,
Wrapt in her starry mantle:—Hesperus,
Propitious to love, with grateful blaze
Flam'd on heav'n's azure front.—The menial train
Forsook the mistress;—ev'ry thing conspir'd
To further his design.—He boldly seiz'd
Her lily hand, and press'd it to his lips
With many a gentle squeeze, and sighing soft,
Whisper'd his tender passion in her ear.
She, suddenly indignant, did withdraw
Her lovely lily hand:—He, nought dismay'd,
Still persever'd, and by the silver fringe
Of her white garment, dragg'd the bashful fair,
Apparently reluctant, from the crowd
To the dread penetrabilia of the fane;
Where she at length gave loose to her complaints,
And chid Leander thus:—Rude stranger, say,
“Whence this presumption? Think you me so “light,

“So cheap a thing, so impotent of soul,
“As to be won by ev'ry breath of praise?
“To stoop and listen to the tedious tale
“Of ev'ry fulsome flatterer's away!
“And dread the vengeance of a pow'rful fire.”

Thus she in maiden dignity; nor wish'd
Her threats successful. While in soothing mood
Leander thus began; and, speaking, kiss'd
Her fragrant neck. “O fair above the fex!
“Upon my heaving breast, immortal bliss
“And real rapture let me ever drink
“Delighted;—ever dwell upon thy lips
“In sacred transport:—Thus to clasp thee—thus “Embrace thy charms, is happiness beyond
“The narrow limits and invidious bourne
“Of weak mortality.—I feel my soul
“Glow with diviner fire, and soar above
“This humble scene of things.—Depriv'd of this,
“Not all the treasure'd ore, nor num'rous herds
“That graze a thousand hills, nor gilded state
“Of purpl'd tyrants, nor the olive crown
“Gain'd with th' applauses of assembled Greece
“On the Elysian plains, could ever draw
“One wish of life, to tread its irksome rounds!
“To crawl the reptile prey of ev'ry care,
“So fall'n from what I am! so abject!—Yes,
“I'd rush on non-existence, and defy
“The silent regions of the dead, to show
“In all their bounds a misery like this.
“If I must lose thee, call thy father in “While yet I hang upon thy neck and quaff
“Immortal pleasures; let him stab me here;
“I'll thank him for his pains, my latest breath
“Shall bless the hand that gave the timely blow.—

“But why this dismal apparatus? why
“This melancholy prospect—this expence
“Of dreadful images? What hinders now
“The sweet indulgence of a lawful flame?
“The time, the place, but most of all the voice,
“The silent pow'rful voice of nature calls
“Sweetly persuasive on us, to obey
“Her pleasant sacred mandates, and fulfil
“Her sovereign decree.—Black darkness round “Extends a negro-covering, and secures
“Our mutual transports from the impious eye
“Of envious cens'ring man;—and how'ring near
“The smiling goddess from her dove-drawn car
“Looks down complacent, and approves each joy,
“Each heart-felt rapture of her youthful guests.”
Thus he impassion'd spoke.—“While ev'ry word,
Each glowing kiss, and ev'ry mournful sigh,
More prevalent than words, the winning speech!
The soft pathetic eloquence of love!
Found but too easy credit.—On the earth
She fix'd her azure eye, and passive stood
In bashful silence;—silence, the consent
Of yielding maids unpractis'd. Oft she drew
Around her snowy breast the loose hung robe;
As oft th' invidious garment was remov'd
By vagrant hands licentious. Then at length,
Though too, too late! collecting the remains
The last weak efforts of a virgin flame,
She push'd him gently from her, and bespoke
The lovely stranger thus:—“In vain you know
“Each passage to the heart! in vain possess
“The various eloquence of words! perhaps
“The next propitious gale may waft you hence
“A faithless wand'rer, leaving me to mourn
“Your broken vows, and ev'ry holy bond
“Transgress'd; each holy bond, and ev'ry vow,
“In secret darkness sworn:—For open rites,
“And Hymen's outward pomp, my wayward
“fate
“And an inexorable fire deny!
“Say, if an exile from your natal shore,
“A sojourner in Sestus, could your tongue
“Conceal the favours of a loving maid,
“And give to deepest night each fond excess
“Of her affection? Ah! the tongue of man
“Is prone to scandal:—Could you hear me prais'd
“For modest charms and chastity, nor yet
“In youthful pride betray me to the world?
“Perhaps I ev'n might trust you.—But declare
“Your name, your country, and your father's “house;
“For mine you know:—Illustrious Hero I,
“The priestess of this fane, condemn'd to dwell
“By cruel parents in a lonely tow'r
“By the rough Hellepont; far, far remov'd
“From the society of man, and all
“My maiden equals! Nightly in my ears
“The hollow winds sing mournful, and the wave
“Beats on the rock below with horrid clash,
“And shakes the aged dome;—while on my “couch,
“My solitary couch, I trembling lie,
“And mourn my luckless fate with many a tear.”
Thus blushing she.—“And thus the amorous youth
Incontinent returns:—“Down, coward fear!
“Let angry tempests rage, and ev'ry wind
“Turmoil the furgy deep, I'll boldly cleave
“The sounding waters.—What is danger? what

“ Death, in his form most frightful, when com“ par’d

“ With the sweet hope of losing all my cares
“ In purest ecstacy and chaste delight
“ On my fair Hero’s bosom? Yes, dear maid!
“ I’ll nightly swim the Hellespont to thee,
“ And bless his boist’rous billows, and his shores
“ Rocky and steep, that graciously afford
“ An opportunity to try my love.
“ In strong Abydos, the conspicuous dome
“ Of my old sire Euryalus the sage,
“ An honour’d name, who haply now laments
“ In cheerless solitude Leander’s stay,
“ His lov’d, his only son, stands eminent
“ Just opposite to this, and clearly mark’d
“ By day; now buried in impervious shade.
“ Doubt not my pledged faith;—do only thou
“ Let a pale lamp extend a glimm’ring ray “ Athwart the midnight gloom, to point the path
“ And guide my doubtful course.—I ask no more,
“ But leave the rest to providence and heav’n.”
Struck with amazement at so bold a thought,
So daring a resolve, she grasp’d the youth
Close to her panting breast, and kindly wish’d
The gods would prosper the attempt.—She fear’d
There might be danger in it;—yet she hop’d
The sea-born Venus would confirm his nerves,
And smooth the deep before his active arm.

The night was far advanc’d. Leander’s mates,
Impatient to be gone, in noisy haste
Call’d loudly on him: The ungrateful sound
Reach’d his unwilling ears; he sudden snatch’d
A parting kiss, and join’d the clam’rous crew.
While sad and pensive Hero left the scene,
Revolving in her mind the midnight lamp,
The dangers of the deep, its rocky shores,
And all that night obstruct Leander’s love.

BOOK II.

Now rising ruddy from Tithonus’ bed,
The young Aurora urg’d her dapp’d steeds
Along the broad celestial way, and chas’d
Reluctant darkness to the western world;
Each fragrant flow’ret of the humble vale
With pearly dew-drops hung, a deeper blush,
A fresher glow assum’d, and sun-burnt hills
A greener mantle wore.—The sons of Greece
Forsook the downy couch, and rang’d the wood
Profuse of melody; or arduous scal’d
The verdant summit, or more gently trac’d
The flow’ry mazes of some murm’ring brook,
As chance or fancy led. But by the shore,
Apart from all, Leander thoughtful sat,
And on fair Hero’s lonely mansion fix’d
His eye unwearied, wishing for the dark,
The favourable hour, the hour of love:
His unbent bow and harmless quiver lay
Neglected on the rock, while round his head
Unhurt, the sea-mew and the screaming hern
Skim’d with incessant clang.—No more his foul
Pants for the bloody cestus, or exults
To hurl the jav’lin, or the weighty disk,
Beyond his peers:—In vain his mett’l’d steeds
Demand their wonted course, and neighing paw
Their stalls indignant; he regards them not:
His secret nuptials, and his spouse’s charms,
Yet unenjoy’d, engage his ev’ry care,
And vindicate each thought.—At last arriv’d

The long-expected hour.—Solemn and slow
Night reasum’d her ebony throne; the breeze
Blew keener from the shore, and onward roll’d
More lengthen’d billows; while the wither’d grais

Long-rankling on the sea-beat cliff, in strains
More sadly-pleasing sooth’d the pensive ear.
Athwart the silent face of night, now gleam’d
The red-blue taper, with a sickly ray
Diffus’d around; not much unlike the sad,
The dreary glare of bearded comets, seen
By the observant sage to shoot along
Their lengthen’d orbits of an hundred years;
Immensely rapid!—Straight Leander hail’d
The glad appearance, and his silken robe,
Of thinnest texture from the Tyrian loom,
Buoyant and light, collected on his head,
He careful bound; in act to plunge he stood,
Reckless of danger, when a threat’ning wave,
Of more than usual bulk, enormous, dash’d
The murm’ring shore, and cover’d all his limbs
With floating sea-weed; then a sudden fear
Congeal’d him to the rock; with both his hands
Immoveable he clung. But soon his love
Restor’d his wonted warmth:—The ridgy waves
Forsaken by the gale subsiding funk
To sweet repose, on the unruffled breast
Of their cerulean fire; with active bound,
And arms extended, from the craggy shore
He leapt impetuous, while the closing main
Refounded to his fall; the gathering foam
In shining circles girt his manly neck
Emerging from the water.—But the maid
By the pale lamp stood watchful, and would oft
Oppose her mantle to the eddy breeze
Threat’ning its friendly radiance; or would steal
With silent steps to where the aged nurse
In peaceful slumbers clos’d her rheumy eyes;
Left haply some returning flow of phlegm,
Some periodic gout, or racking ach,
Should rouse the teasty matron, and betray
Their secret correspondence.—Thus employ’d,
Breathless and spent with toil, Leander reach’d
The wishful harbour: To the nuptial couch
She led him, leaning on her breast, and wip’d
The brine offensive from his shiv’ring limbs,
And wrung his lovely locks; a pleasant task!
A grateful labour! interrupted oft
With mute embraces: then she on his head
Pour’d precious ointment, and the soft’ning balm,
Of Syrian groves, moist savoury, and cheer’d
His drooping spirits thus:—“ My charming youth
“ Much hast thou suffer’d, well approv’d thy faith,
“ But now ’tis past, the mighty danger’s o’er!
“ The couch is ready, and thy spouse’s arms
“ Are open to receive thee; here enjoy
“ The happy fruits of all thy hardy toils.
“ Here, Leander! let me lull thy soul
“ In blest oblivion of the wind and wave.”
Restor’d to wonted vigour, and improv’d
In manly graces, he no longer shunn’d
The fond, the am’rous contest; but unloos’d
The maiden girdle.—Silent were their joys!
No chosen youth with melody and song
Led up the mazy dance; no sacred bard,
Inspir’d of heav’n, attun’d the melting lyre
To hallow’d numbers, and the hidden sweets
Of Hymen’s mystic kingdom, the domain

Of lawful pleasures!—With the fragrant growth
Of blessing meadows, and the verdant boughs
Of spreading palms, no virgin train adorn'd
The nuptial couch;—no venerable fire,
No reverend mother, sung with quav'ring lips
The wishful Hymeneals; and no torch
Illum'd the bridal chamber:—Darkness veil'd
The happy pair, and conscious night diffus'd
Her shadows round them; while, unseen, un-

heard,
The sylvan deities, to celestial airs,
Light swept the floor in an immortal dance.
But drowsy Somnus by Almena's couch,
Fair Hero's guardian, took his silent stand,
And bath'd her temples in the pow'rful juice
Of midnight herbs, inducing sweet respite
From all the dread infirmities of age,
The panting asthma, and the piercing pain
Of joint contracting aches; where'er it sheds
Its balmy influence, no scalding rheum
The deep sunk eye-balls streaks with fiery red,
Averting peaceful slumbers.—Soft the lay
While not a sigh or mournful groan disturb'd
The blissful vigils of ecstatic love.

Such were Leander's nightly toils, and such
Their glorious recompense.—But righteous Heav'n
Oft moot severely punishes the crimes
It seems to prosper: lawless were their joys,
From selfish passion sprung; the sage advice
Of parents was not ask'd: The marriage rites,
Of more than human origin, the bond,
The sacred bond, connecting man and wife
In holy union, and the fruitful source
Of all society, the sole defence
'Gainst an uncertain progeny, untrain'd
And fatherless, the burden of a state;
The marriage rites, that point the nearest road
To real rapture and unblended bliss,
To perfect friendship and parental love,
The noblest passions of the human heart,
Resin'd from all the dregs of gross desire,
Were disregarded.—Now the winter hour,
Cold and uncomfortable, came, o'ercaft
With low-hung vapours, rousing from their caves
Where they had slept the summer suns away
In inoffensive peace; the raging storms
Confus'dly hurrying through the murky void
Clouds roll'd on clouds.—The troubled ocean felt
The universal violence descend
To his profoundest depths, and furious pil'd
High tow'ring waves on tow'ring waves highheap'd,

A wat'ry Caucasus! deform'd with mud
And ooze unsightly; and threat'ning loud to pour
The blacken'd deluge on the frighted shore,
Aiding the wild commotion.—On the rock
The ship is dash'd impetuous: from the shore
The pensive sailor sees the floating wreck
Wide-scatter'd round, and slurs the faithless main.
Not so Leander: the accustom'd lamp
Beam'd through the horrid gloom;—he fearless
plung'd

Into the Hellespont, impell'd by fate,
And love, as strong as fate.—From wave to wave
He bounding flies before the howling winds,
Now here, now there, as this or that prevails;
Undaunted still, he put forth ev'ry nerve,
Exerted ev'ry sinew, fixing still

His steady eyes upon the trembling ray,
Oft intercepted by the heavy surge.
Loud and moze loud the bellowing tempest rag'd,
Whirl'd, corresponding with each dismal blast,
The bulky billows heav'd in dreadful dance,
Weary'd and faint with bootless toil, his limbs
Refus'd their office, and his feeble arms
Cleave to his panting sides.—Then suppliant thus
His pray'r to Neptune, and to ev'ry nymph
Inhabiting the deep, and ev'ry wind,
But chiefly blust'ring Boreas, he address'd:

“Once more, ye pow'rful deities! once more “Indulge a lover's wishes; yet again
“Let me embrace my Hero, let me give
“One parting last embrace; and since this life
“Is due to destiny, in my return
“Let Ocean sink me to his lowest bed.”
Thus he, alas! in vain; unhappy youth!
Nor god, nor nymph, nor blust'ring Boreas heard
The modest pray'r.—Unable to elude
Their sweepy force, each raging billow drove Resistless o'er his head, emerging scarce
After long intervals,—while the rough winds
Extinguished the lamp, and with it all
His hopes of safety.—“Heav'n! (he said), I yield, “Nor struggle longer with my fate.—Adieu,
“My lovely Hero!—but ye stormy winds,
“O bear me, bear me from the Sestian shore!
“Suffice one lover's death”——The greedy wave
Clos'd on the rest!—Already morning dawn'd,
Joyless and sad, when lonely in the tow'r,
Feigning Leander's tread in ev'ry blast,
Hero sat pensive, whilst foreboding sighs
Did shake her tender frame; impatient grown,
She from the window view'd the frightful deep,
High-swell'd and boist'rous.—Who can describe
Her soul's distress? But what must she have felt!
What suffer'd! when she saw his mangled corse
Dash'd on the rock below!—She from her breast
The various garment tore, and headlong leapt
The height prodigious!—Side by side they lay;
A loving pair, united ev'n in death.

THE HAPPINESS OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

How happy, O how happy, if he knew
The ills of higher life, the husbandman;
Whose yellow harvests, by his labour rais'd,
Supply his frugal board.—whose crystal streams
At once enrich his lands, and heaven's best boon,
Health's rosy balm, to their master give;
Beyond the frown of greatness—ought beyond
That wealth can furnish, or that power can give,
But feasters in the bosom, and but feeds
The gluttony of appetite, or struts
The dropp'd belly of impure desire.

ON VISITING CARNWATH SCHOOL, 1769.

DULLNESS AVAUNT!—Cimmerian spectres hence!
The surgy surface of the miry lake
Subsides, horrendous, to receive your fall,
And mirky hell, unathomably deep,
Yawns for her fable sons, with parent care!
Already, hunger-pin'd, with horrid yell
Re-echo'd by the adamantine roof
Of ancient Erebus, the infernal hound

Expands his jaws to welcome your return—
And ah! return ye must—if enter here—
Conscious of former worth, this aged house
Contemptuous totters on its mould'ring base,
Threat'ning destruction to the ideot crew
That with pedantic orgies shall profane
Its hallow'd bourne—where infant genius bloom'd.

Here grave PHILANDER*, elegantly good,
And even in boyish years, maturely wise,
Felt kindling in his breast th' ethereal flame
Prompting to generous deeds—
And with the balm of mediation heal'd
The petty discord of his quarrelling mates,
Or rescu'd with the manly hand of power
Defenceless childhood from the scourge of age.

Here THYRSIS† ravish'd with the sweets of sound,
To indigested numbers tun'd the lyre;
Gaily melodious while with patient charms
His light Belinda flutter'd in the lay.

Here gay FLORELLO‡, of more open front,
And sweeter manners, cheer'd his crowding mates,
With tale facetious, or with equal care,
Set limits to the race, while rival maids
Admir'd the beauty of the gallant boy.

Here O! illustrious and lamented youth!
ASPASIO§! all these lovely virtues dawn'd,
Which gain'd thee friendships in a foreign clime,
And drew compassion's tears from stranger eyes,
'T' see thee, all amid thy blooming hopes,
Struck immaturely from the ranks of men!

Here DAMON|| stemm'd the estuating tide
Of boyish follies, and industrious scann'd
The feats of classic chieftains; early warm'd
With Roman liberty, and Grecian arts:
Or, variously character'd his brow
Stalk'd, indolently thoughtful, dreaming much
Of Hæmus's Pindus, and the holy hill
Of Phocis, water'd with Castalian springs.

And here ALEXIS¶ trifled many an hour,
Reckless of science and the laurell'd maids,
Till late reclaim'd by DAMON's friendly care,
He turn'd the volumes fraught with ancient lore;
And not unfavour'd by the god of song,
To artless numbers tun'd the doric reed.

VOL. XI.

INVOCATION TO THE ELEGIAC MUSE.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

HA! soft-ey'd, tender, melancholy maid!
The poor man's comfort, and the lover's friend!
Give me thy sacred solitudes to tread,
And on thy wildly wand'ring steps attend.

Say, if thou choos'est in the Cean grove
With musing step to weave thy winding way?
Or rather, through the labyrinths of love,
Pensive with thy Callimachus dost stray?

Hark! hark! from Pontus came that doleful
sound?

Was't thou, or Ovid that inspir'd the string?
The solemn music faddens all around—
Not thus the wanton miscreant us'd to sing!

Say, shall I seek thee in the breezy glade,
Where thy Tibullus sigh'd his simple song?
It suits thee well to sooth so sweet a shade,
And guard the relics of the fair and young!

Or, sit'f't thou musing in the desert dome,
Where learn'd Propertius fill'd the labour'd lay?
Or, with Catullus, o'er a brother's tomb,
Sigh'f't thou sad dirges to the crumbling clay?

Lo! the last glimm'ring of departing day,
Streak the smooth surface of the shadowy stream;
The weary hedger homeward plods his way,
And down the rough slope nods the tinkling team.

Now dost thou loiter o'er the hallow'd bourne,
Where heaves the turf in many a mould'ring heap,
And hear thy Gray, in moral musings mourn
The peaceful peasants in their cells that sleep?

Or say, sequester'd from the din some roar,
Which tasteless crowds uninterrupted send,
Meet'f't thou thy Shenstone in the rural bow'r,
Which oaks embosom, and which hills de-send?

Or, deeply shelter'd in the solemn shade,
By noble Temple's gen'rous friendship wove,
Hear'f't thou thy Hammond tune his tender reed,
As through the gloom his love-lorn footsteps rove?

Or, all attentive to the lonesome note
That bursts obscure from Medwan's mazy vale, Hear'f't thou thy Græme, in many a love-sick
thought,
Pour pensive forth his sweetly-vary'd tale?

Ah! does thy foot his favour'd haunt forego,
Led where loud wailings pierce the midnight-
gloom—

Hear'f't thou the knell of death, the shriek of woe,
Tell to the hollow gale his timeless doom!

That tear becomes thee—gentle was thy Græme!
Soft were his woes, and sweet his warbled lays!

Yet lasts his love, and lasts his noble flame,
Blest in the strain that lives to latest days.

G g

Me unambitious, as I breathe my moan,
Nor laurell'd name, nor honour'd meed inspires:
Me it delights to murmur all alone,
True to my love, and faithful to its fires.

Deep in the bosom of this moss-lin'd grove,
Whose verdant side unhallow'd waters lave,
Where never poet pour'd the plaintive note,
Nor ling'ring lover lull'd the lonesome wave—

If e'er, outstretch'd beneath the midnight sky,
Musing, erewhile, I mark'd thy visions dear;
If e'er, when wayward beauty drew my eye,
According murmurs met thy soothed ear!

Deign, meek-ey'd maid! with musing footsteps slow,

Pale face demure, and mien solemnly sweet!
Deign, now invok'd, to harmonize my woe,
Sooth my sad sighs, and guide my wandering feet!

THE VISION,

TO MR. JOHN GRÆME,

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

THOU friend! for whom the languid muse awakes

Her buried fire, and strikes the jarring string,
Propitious listen to the feeble lay,
The backward virgin trills at your command;
She, pensive stretch'd on sloth's inglorious couch,
In secret sighs bewail'd Alexis' fate,
And Nancy's absence ineffectual mourn'd;
Till you, invidious of her sad repose,
To wanted toils impell'd the listless maid,
Reluctant rousing at the friendly call.

When shady night her dewy pinions spread,
Involving deep the summer-painted vale,
And verdant mountain in her formless gloom;
Damon, a youth of melancholy mien,
Who erst, ambitious of the myrtle wreath,
Tun'd his weak reed where Medwan's waters
lave,

Bow'rs built by fays, and fields renown'd in song;
Hard by, where Aeneas devolves her mazy course
Irriguous, through romantic vales, of old
By sister nations fill'd with founding war,—
Lonely and sad, forsook his sleepless couch,
Revolving serious in his anxious mind
The luckless love that wrung his tortur'd breast;
And ever, as in luring smiles array'd,
His gentle Nancy's absent form arose,
And drew th' impassion'd glance from moisten'd eye.

Gold-potent rivals, pageantry and birth,
Successive rose, and dusk'd the low'ring scene:
Nor was the swelling sigh alone confin'd
To proper woes—for Strepson's tender grief
Piteous he pin'd; while, from his proffer'd hand,
Grieving he saw each lovely grace that blooms
On Jeffrey's damask cheek, unequal shrink,
As wealth, exulting, spreads her glittering stores,
In gay profusion on the dazzled eye.

Thus, wrapt in thought, he reach'd a moss-lin'd cave,

O'er which two oaks their verdant branches spread,
Commixing thick their raggy-fringed leaves,
While through and through the shooting ivy
stray'd.

There, musing stretch'd, the river's murmuring chime,

That broad below o'er swept a pebbly channel,
Clos'd his moist lids, and sunk his soul to rest,
While Morpheus thus, to fancy's wakeful eye
Call'd up his airy unsubstantial forms—
And trac'd the scene the faithful virgin sings.

Plac'd on the arid margin of a stream,
That down a rugged bed tumultuous hurl'd
Its dismal wave, he mark'd with deep regard
The vernal flow'rs that flush'd the further shore.
High on a mound, superior to the rest,
Two blushing roses odorific wav'd

Their crimson folds, disspread to Titan's beam:
On these insatiate hung his raptur'd eye,
And wishful mark'd the vermilion glow, diffus'd
On either flow'r, by spring's refreshful hand.

In wild amaze, and fancy'd vision lost!
A more than human form, serenely fair,
Thus gentle spoke—while penetration thone
From either eye, and Reason loud proclaim'd:

“Why, frantic youth! pursue with fateless gaze

“The florid phantoms, that deceitful skim
“In splendid dress before the curtain'd eye?
“’Tis vain illusion all!—the vermeil blush,
“That veils yon painted flow'rs, is but the work
“Of fancy's mimic hand—Fair Nancy's charms,
“If rightly view'd, and Jeffrey's, are no more!”
She ceas'd—and straight the slumbering youth awoke,

And, shiv'ring, quick uprear'd his dewy limbs,
With nightly vapours chill'd, and less perplex'd,
With heedful eye explor'd the homeward path.

INVOCATION TO HEALTH,

BY MR. JOHN GRÆME*.

HAIL! gentle goddess of the sprightly look,
On whose plump cheek the roses ever bloom,
How long shall youth—shall innocence invoke—
And wilt thou point me to the gloomy tomb!

O think how ill the youthful heart can bear
The dismal thought of num'ring with the dead!

How hard to part with all I hold most dear,
Ere half the summer of my life is fled!

What is my crime that thus thou hid'st thy face?
Did e'er these feet the paths of vice pursue?
Did e'er I wallow in the lewd embrace,
Or bid the paths of sober life adieu?

Did e'er this youthful heart ungrateful prove?
Have I not worshipp'd at thy holy shrine?

* Mr. Græme died of a consumption, in 1783;
soon after writing this ode.

Been true to friendship and been true to love,
And shall I urge my innocence in vain?

That these pale cheeks their wonted bloom might wear,

Have I not used ev'ry various mean?
Mounted the steed---brush'd through the balmy
air,

And tript it frequent o'er yon daisi'd green?

What time in western wind I heard thee rove,
Did e'er I loiter at the pleasing sound?

Have I not left the maiden of my love,
And woo'd thee on each silent hill around?

* * * * *

Hail! gentle goddess of the sprightly look,
On whose plump cheek the roses ever bloom,
How long shall youth---shall innocence invoke?---
O come, and snatch me from the gloomy tomb!

NANCY.

A PASTORAL BALLAD.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

You ask why I musingly stray
Where rivers run slowly along!
Why I teach ev'ry bird of the spray
To sing my disconsolate song?
I loiter'd, a simple young swain,
Amid nymphs of an higher degree;
And it is not for me to explain
How fair and how fickle they be.

Invisibly Nancy obtain'd
My heart, inexperienced in love;
When I left her, she fondly complain'd,
Or follow'd my steps to the grove.
When walking, she lean'd on my arm,
And would play with my fingers the while;
And, as oft as I prais'd ev'ry charm,
-She would answer each word with a smile.

If I spoke of a field-flow'r I found,
How her face it but faintly display'd,
She would dart a soft glance on the ground,
And blush a more ravishing red.
Hand in hand, as the path we pursu'd
She would stop, and with transport behold
How my bowers bended bright o'er the flood,
And my feats were spread over with gold.

My reed when I labour'd to sound,
She would say was the sweetest to hear,
And if ever a fault could be found,
It was, " Ah, were the song but sincere!
" For I've heard (she would add with a sigh)
" How the shepherds do pipe on the plain,
" With the notes of the nightingale vie,
" While their bosoms unmoved remain!"

How bright was the sun's golden beam,
When my Nancy so smilingly shone!
And how sweet was the sound of the stream,
When we trac'd its wild windings alone!

Each bird that saluted our ear-
From the grove where we fought to retire,
Warbl'd still more melodious and clear,
As we strove its soft strains to admire!

And the primrose, besprinkl'd with dew,
And the violet of various dye,
Still assum'd a more delicate hue,
As our steps stole lovingly by!
And each tree that extended its shade
Mid the thicket of willows I wove,
Spread its blossoms more bright o'er our head,
As we sat and repeated our love.

But now with fond footstep no more
Through the groves and the valleys we stray,
Recline in the blossoming bower,
And talk about love the long day!
Forsaking the sweets of the vale,
The flower, and the stream, and the tree,
She roves on some far distant dale
With a swain more distinguish'd than me!

Yet, forc'd each fond hope to forego,
Of ev'ry sweet solace forlorn;
Should one murmur upbraiding flow
While I strive with my fate and her scorn!
The proud shepherds who see my despair,
Rebuke me, nor dare I complain
That a nymph so exceedingly fair
Should prefer so engaging a swain.

For his manners, they say, are more smooth,
And the tint of his features more fine,
And the language that flows from his mouth-
Has a softness superior to mine:
Then my raiment, be sure, it must yield
To the lustre his garments display,
And my love-labour'd notes be excell'd
By the ease of his elegant lay!

Thus glide their gay triumphs along;
Nor ought I to utter a sigh,
Since Nancy despises my song,
And the shepherds reprove my reply.
Yet my foot, still averse to forget
The soft scenes that engag'd me before,
Frequents the sweet shade where we met,
And delights in the desolate bower.

And oft-times a reflection will rise---
(But I study the thought to resign),
How a nymph so sincere could despise
A bosom so gentle as mine!
Then (suing my reed to my lay,
I loiter the streamlet along,
And teach the blithe birds of the spray
To sing my disconsolate song.

A FAMILIAR EPISTLE,

TO JOHN GRIEVE, M. D.

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

WHILE you, my dearest Grieve, admire
The august fane, and gilded spire,
The courtly mien, and meafur'd stride,
Which mark the sons of civic pride,

I wander in the rural scene,
 O'er fields, with rising plenty green,
 O'er verdant lawns, and fragrant meads,
 By sloping banks and sylvan shades,—
 Where hill-born Alne, with conscious pride,
 Devolves her silver-winding tide,
 By Alnwick's green-inwoven bowers,
 Gay-gilt alcoves, and trophied towers—
 Pleas'd if the cottage of a friend
 Receive me, at my ramble's end ;—
 Which neither mean, nor elegant,
 Bespeaks nor luxury, nor want,—
 To listen to the homely joke,
 And raillery, of country folk ;
 To tales repeated o'er and o'er,
 Of this turn'd rogue, and that turn'd whore ;
 Of matches, politic and civil,
 Or made by nature, or the devil ;
 Of jocky-feats at fairs and races,
 And hair-breadth 'scapes in critic cafes,
 And births, and deaths, and Sunday suits,
 And dinners, dreams, and drinking-bouts,
 And genealogies, as long
 As epic Blackmore's endless song.

The world its distant din may keep,
 Fred'rick may frown, the Pole may weep,
 Bourbon the work of war renew,
 Cath'rine the flying Turk pursue,
 And George, a gracious guest ! repair
 To Portsmouth, when he will---or where---
 To Alne's green marge I still retire,
 While ev'ning trims her fading fire,
 And still---while morning's meekest beam,
 Just silvers o'er the shadowy stream,
 Reflecting every grace of day---
 To Alne's green marge I haste away,
 And, all along the winding shore,
 I muse---and build my birchen bow'r---
 Pleas'd (if perchance my musings meet
 One spark of that poetic heat,
 Which erst inspir'd my youthful dreams
 On other banks, and other streams).
 To tune my feeble voice to raise
 Another strain to Nancy's praise,
 And bid another sigh sincere
 Pursue my Græme's unhonour'd bier !

" Well, Bob!---but sure 'tis sometimes fit,
 " You mind the lab'ring world of wit ;
 " Inquire if subtle sceptics still
 " Stain their own morals, and their quill ;

I

" Observe the story-telling tribe
 " Trim old-new facts in style full glib ;
 " And eke observe the rant-retailers
 " Of rambles, pranks, and female failures ;
 " And (well distinguish'd from the rest
 " By the rapt eye and tatter'd vest)
 " Observe th' enthusiastic choir,
 " Whose rival fingers strike the lyre."
 Mind wit !---dear Grieve ! you don't reflect,
 My lot how low, my voice how weak !
 Incurious, indolent, and dull,
 I little care to go to school,
 Or waste the morning of my days
 In pilf'ring sprigs from other's bays.

Let Mason's laurels still entwine
 His classic brow, and Goldsmith shine,
 In spite of fortune's blinded sway,
 A Pope in rhyme, in manners Gay !
 What is't to me ?---I may admire,
 But never match their heav'nly fire ;
 Impell'd by that persuasive power
 That plans the whim from hour to hour,
 To woo a wayward muse in vain,
 And force from unimproved brain
 Some sorry couplets, void of merit,
 Or as to diction, or to spirit ;
 For such a poet, passing well,
 As just can write, but ne'er excel.

This draws from vanity its source,
 And with its author, Grieve ! is yours.

A WISH.

BY ROBERT ANDEKSON, M. D.

I ASK not Heav'n ! the cumbrous skill to know
 The tribes and hist'ries of the human race ;
 In foreign climes what herbs sanefcent grow,
 What unknown systems crowd untravel'd space.

I ask not to triumph in glory's car,
 With honour's wreath to twine my lordly brow ;
 To swell my coffers with resplendent ore,
 Nor tame unnumber'd valleys with my plough.

But gracious grant me in some lonely cot
 To spend the remnant of a joyless life ;
 From learning, pride, and pagantry remote,
 Nancy my friend, my mistress, and my wife.

GLOVER! thy mind in various virtue wise,
Each science claims, and makes each art thy prize;
With Newton, soars familiar to the sky,
Looks nature through, so keen thy mental eye;
Or down descending on the globe below,
Through humble realms of knowledge loves to flow;
Promiscuous beauties dignify thy breast,
By nature happy, as by study blest.
Thou wit's Columbus! from the epic throne,
New worlds descry'd, and made them all our own.
Thou first through real nature dar'd explore,
And waft her sacred treasures to our shore.
Nor Ariosto's fables fill thy page,
Nor Tasso's points, but Virgil's sober rage.
How soft, how strong thy varied numbers move,
Or swell'd to glory, or dissolv'd to love.
Correct with ease, where all the graces meet,
Nervously plain, majestically sweet:
The Muses will thy sacrifice repay,
Attendant warbling in each heavenly lay.

BY [Name]

THE LIFE OF GLOVER.

RICHARD GLOVER was born in St. Martin's Lane, Cannon Street, London, in 1712. He was the son of Richard Glover, Esq. an eminent Hamburg merchant in the city.

He received the whole of his education under the Rev. Daniel Sanxay, at Cheam school, a place which he afterwards delighted to visit, and sometimes attended the anniversary, held of late years in London, where he seemed happy in relating his juvenile adventures.

At this seminary he distinguished himself by the quickness of his progress, and early began to exhibit specimens of his poetical powers.

At the age of sixteen, he wrote a poem to the memory of Sir Isaac Newton, prefixed to the "View of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy," published in 4to, 1728, by his intimate friend Dr. Pemberton. "I have presented my readers," says Dr. Pemberton in the preface to this work, "with a copy of verses on Sir Isaac Newton, which I have just received from a young gentleman, whom I am proud to reckon among the number of my dearest friends. If I had any apprehension that this piece of poetry stood in need of an apology, I should be desirous the reader might know that the author is but sixteen years old, and was obliged to finish the composition in a very short time, but I shall only take the liberty to observe, that the boldness of the digressions will be best judged of by those who are acquainted with Pindar."

Considering this poem as the composition of a school-boy, it will excite no small degree of surprise, as it possesses more claim to applause, and requires fewer allowances for faults, than productions of such an age are always allowed. To Glover may be applied what the present Earl of Orford said of his friend Gray, "that he never was a boy."

Though possessed of talents which were calculated to excel in literature, he was content to devote his attention to commerce, and at a proper period commenced a Hamburg merchant; as appears from the following lines, with which he begins his poem called London.

Ye northern blasts, and Eurus, wont to sweep
With rudest pinions o'er the furrowed waves;
A while suspend your violence, and waft
From sandy Weser, and the broad-mouth'd Elbe,
My freighted vessels to the destin'd shore
Safe o'er th' unruffled main——

As a merchant he soon made a conspicuous figure; but his commercial affairs did not occupy his whole attention. He still found leisure to cultivate the study of poetry; and continued to associate with those who were eminent in literature and science; especially among the party in opposition to the administration of Walpole.

One of his earliest friends was Green, the ingenious but obscure author of that truly original poem, intitled "The Spleen," which, in 1737, soon after his death, was published by Glover. This excellent performance contains the following preface of his literary eminence, with an evident allusion to his Leonidas, which he had begun when very young.

But there's a youth that you can name,
Who needs no leading strings to fame,
Whose quick maturity of brain
The birth of Pallas may explain:
Dreaming of whose depending fate,
I heard Melpomene debate,
This, this is he that was foretold,
Should emulate our Greeks of old:
Inspir'd by me with sacred art,
He sings and rules the varied heart;
If Jove's dread anger he rehearse,
We hear the thunder in his verse;

If he describe love turn'd to rage,
 The furies riot on his page;
 If he fair liberty and law,
 By ruffian power expiring draw,
 The keener passions then engage
 Aright, and sanctify their rage;
 If he attempt disastrous love,
 We hear those plaints that wound the grove;
 With him the kinder passions glow,
 And tears distill'd from pity flow.

On the 21st of May 1737, he married Miss Nunn, with whom he received a fortune of 12,000*l.* and in the same month he published his Leonidas, an epic poem in nine books, 4to, which completely established his poetical reputation.

Leonidas was inscribed to Lord Cobham, and on its first appearance, was received by the public with great approbation; though it has since been unaccountably neglected.

But its favourable reception was not entirely owing to its intrinsic merits. At the time of its publication, a zeal, or rather rage for liberty, prevailed in England; a constellation of great men, distinguished by their virtues as well as their talents, set themselves in opposition to the Court; every species of composition that bore the sacred name of freedom, recommended itself to their protection, and soon obtained possession of the public favour. Hence a poem founded on the noblest principles of liberty, and displaying the most brilliant examples of patriotism, soon found its way into the world.

Lyttleton, then high in the ranks of opposition, in a popular publication called Common Sense, under the signature of Philo Musæus, No. 10. April 9. 1737, praised it in the warmest terms. Dr. Pemberton published "Observations on Poetry, especially epic, occasioned by the late poem upon Leonidas," 12mo, 1738, merely with a view to point out its beauties; and it was praised by Thompson, of Queen's College, and other poets. It passed through three editions in 1737, and 1738; but it afterwards experienced the fate of those literary productions, which owe a temporary celebrity to the influence of party-principles, without deserving it.

The imprudent zeal of his friends had encouraged such extravagant ideas of it, that though it was found to have very great beauties, yet the ardour of the lovers of poetry soon sunk into a kind of cold forgetfulness with regard to it; because it did not possess more than the narrow limits of the design would admit of, or indeed than it was in the power of human genius to execute. It was severely animadverted upon, in a series of letters addressed "to the author of Leonidas," in the "Weekly Miscellany," for May 1738, under the signature of Miso-Musæus.

In 1739, he published his London, or the Progress of Commerce, 4to; and soon after his ballad intitled Hester's Ghost; both these pieces seem to have been written with a view to incite the nation to resent the depredations of the Spaniards; and the latter had a very considerable effect.

His connection with Cobham, Lyttleton, Pitt, and other leaders of the opposition, introduced him to the notice of Frederick Prince of Wales, then struggling for popularity, and professing himself the patron of wit; who distinguished him by his countenance and patronage; and once, it is said, presented him with a complete set of the classics, elegantly bound.

The political dissensions at this period, raged with great violence, and more especially in the metropolis. In 1739, Sir George Champion, who was next in rotation for the mayoraity, had opposed a majority of his constituents, by voting with the Court party in the business of the Spanish convention. This determined them to set him aside, and choose the next to him in seniority; accordingly Sir John Salter was chosen on Michaelmas day; and on this occasion Glover took a very active part; as appears from "A Narrative of what passed in the Common Hall of the City of London, assembled for the election of a Lord Mayor, on Saturday the 29th of September, on Monday the 1st and Tuesday the 2d of October; together with a defence of these proceedings, both as reasonable and agreeable to the practice of former times," 8vo, 1739, written by Benjamin Robins, the supposed author of "Lord Anson's Voyage."

In 1740, the same resolution of the majority continuing, Glover presided at Vintner's Hall, September 25th, at a meeting of the Livery, to consider of two proper persons to be recommended to the Court of Aldermen; when it was resolved to support the nomination of Sir Robert Godschall, and George Heathcote, Esq. who being returned to the Court of Aldermen, the latter gentleman was chosen; but he declining the office, another meeting of the Livery was held at Vintner's Hall, October 13th, when Glover again was called to the chair, and the meeting resolved to return Humphry Parsons, Esq. and Sir Robert Godschall, to the Court of Aldermen, who made choice of the former to fill the office.

On the 19th of November, another meeting was held at Vintner's Hall, when Glover pronounced an eulogium on Sir John Barnard, and advised the Livery to choose him one of their representatives in Parliament, notwithstanding his intention to resign.

On all these occasions, Glover acquitted himself in a very able manner. His speeches, printed in the "London Magazine," 1740, and the "Annals of Europe," 1740, p. 283, are elegant, spirited, and adapted.

His talents for public speaking, his knowledge of political affairs, and his information concerning trade and commerce, soon after pointed him out to the merchants of London, as a proper person to conduct their application to Parliament, on the subject of the neglect of their trade. He accepted the office, and in summing up the evidence, gave very striking proofs of his oratorical powers.

This remarkable speech was pronounced at the bar of the House of Commons, January 27. 1742, and soon afterwards published under the title of A short account of the late application to Parliament, made by the merchants of London, upon the neglect of their trade, with the substance thereupon as summed up by Mr. Glover, 8vo, 1742.

By his appearance in behalf of the merchants of London, he acquired, and with great justice, the character of an able and steady patriot; and, indeed, on every occasion, he showed a most perfect knowledge of, joined to the most ardent zeal for, the commercial interests of the nation, and inviolable attachment to the welfare of his countrymen in general, and that of the city of London in particular.

In 1744, died Sarah Duchefs of Marlborough, and by her will left to Glover and Mallet, 500l. each, to write the history of the Duke of Marlborough. Of Glover, her grace says, "that she believes him to be a very honest man, who wished, as she did, all the good that could happen to preserve the liberties and laws of England."

This bequest never took place. It is supposed that Glover very early renounced his share; and Mallet, though he continued to talk of performing the task, almost as long as he lived, is now known never to have made the least progress in it.

About this period, having in consequence of unavoidable losses in trade, and perhaps, in some measure, of his zealous warmth for the public interests, to the neglect of his own private emoluments, somewhat reduced his fortunes, he withdrew a good deal from public notice, and preferred, with a very laudable delicacy, an obscure retreat to popular observation, until his affairs should put on a more prosperous appearance.

While he lived in obscurity, known only to his friends, and declining to take any active part in public affairs, the Prince of Wales, it is said, sent him, on account of the embarrassment of his circumstances, 500l.

The Prince died in March 1751, and in May following, Glover was once more drawn from his retreat by the importunity of his friends, and condescended to stand candidate for the place of Chamberlain of the City of London, in opposition to Thomas Harrison, Esq.

It unfortunately happened, that he did not declare himself till most of the Livery had engaged their votes. After a few days, finding that his antagonist gained ground upon the poll, he gave up the contest on the 6th of May. Mr. Deputy Harrison was declared duly elected, May 7th, and on this occasion, Glover made the following speech to the Livery, which exhibits the feelings of a manly, resigned, philosophical mind, in unprosperous circumstances.

"Heretofore, I have frequently had occasion of addressing the Livery of London in public; but at this time I find myself at an unusual loss, being under all the difficulties which a want of matter deserving your notice, can create. Had I now your rights and privileges to vindicate,—had I the cause of your suffering trade to defend,—or were I now called forth to recommend and enforce the parliamentary service of the most virtuous and illustrious citizen,—my tongue would be free from constraint, and expatiating at large, would endeavour to merit your attention; which now must be confined to so narrow a subject as myself. On those occasions, the importance of the matter, and my known zeal to serve you, however ineffectual my attempt might prove, were always sufficient to promise me the honour of a kind reception, and unmerited regard. Your countenance first drew me from the retirement of a studious life; your repeated marks of distinction first pointed me out to that great body, the merchants of London, who, pursuing your example, condescended to intrust me, unequal and unworthy as I was, with the most important cause; a cause where your interest was as nearly concerned as theirs. In consequence of that deference which has been paid to the sentiments and choice of the citizens and traders of London, it was impossible but some faint lustre must have glanced on me, whom, weak as he was, they were pleased to appoint the instrument on their behalf; and if from these transactions I accidentally acquired the smallest share of reputation, it was to you, that my gratitude ascribes it; and I joyfully embrace this public opportunity of declaring, that whatever part of a public character I may presume to claim, I owe primarily to you. To this I might add the favour, the twenty years countenance and patronage of one, whom a supreme degree of respect shall prevent me from naming; and though under the temptation of using that name as a certain means of obviating some misconstructions, I shall, however, avoid to dwell on the memory of a loss so recent, so justly, and so universally lamented.

“Permit me now to remind you, that when placed by these means in a light not altogether unfavourable, no lucrative reward was then the object of my pursuit; nor ever did the promises or offers of private emolument induce me to quit my independence or vary from the least of my former professions, which always were and remain still founded on the principles of universal liberty; principles which I assume the glory to have established on your records. Your sense, and the sense of your great corporation, so repeatedly recommended to your representatives in Parliament, were my sense, and the principal boast of all my compositions, containing matter imbibed in my earliest education, to which I have always adhered, by which I still abide, and which I will endeavour to bear down with me to the grave; and even at that gloomy period, when deserted by my good fortune, and under the severest trials; even then, by the same consistency of opinions, and uniformity of conduct, I still preserved that part of reputation which I originally derived from your favour, whatever I might pretend to call a public character, unshaken and unblemished; nor, once in the hour of affliction, did I banish from my thoughts, the most sincere and conscientious intention of acquitting every private obligation, as soon as my good fortune should please to return; a distant appearance of which seemed to invite me, and awakened some flattering expectations on the rumour of the vacancy of the Chamberlain’s office; but always apprehending the imputation of presumption, and that a higher degree of delicacy and caution would be requisite in me than in any other candidate, I forbore, till late, to present myself once more to your notice, and then, for the first time, abstracted from a public consideration, solicited your favour for my own private advantage. My want of success shall not prevent my cheerfully congratulating this gentleman on his election, and you on your choice of so worthy a magistrate; and if I may indulge a hope of departing this place with a share of your approbation and esteem, I solemnly from my heart declare, that I shall not bear away with me the least trace of disappointment.”

In his retirement, he finished the tragedy of Boadicea, which he had begun many years before, and in 1753, it was brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, and acted nine nights, with great success. From the following lines in the prologue, it appears to have been patronised by his friends in the city.

Beside his native Thames, our poet long
 Hath hung his silent harp, and hush’d his tongue;
 At length his muse from exile he recalls,
 Urg’d by his patrons in Augusta’s walls,
 Those generous traders, who alike sustain
 Their nation’s glory on th’ obedient main,
 And bounteous raise affliction’s drooping train;
 They who, benignant to his toils, afford
 Their sheltering favour, have his muse restor’d,
 They in her future fame will justly share,
 But her disgrace, herself must singly bear;
 Calm hours of learned leisure they have given,
 And could no more, for genius is from heav’n

Though there is rather a deficiency, both as to incident and characters in this play, yet the language is very poetical, and the descriptions beautiful. It is such a production as might be expected from the author of Leonidas; but it seems better adapted to give pleasure in the closet than the theatre. "To the most material objections," says Archbishop Herring, writing to a friend, of this play, "the author would say (a Shakespeare must in some instances) that he did not make, but told it as he found it. The first page of the play shocked me, and the sudden and heated answer of the Queen to the Roman ambassador's gentle address, is arrant madness; it is, indeed, unnatural. It is another objection in my opinion, that Boadicea is really not the object of crime and punishment, so much as pity; and notwithstanding the strong paintings of her savageness, I cannot help wishing she had got the better. She had been most unjustly and outrageously injured by those universal tyrants, who ought never to be mentioned without horror. However, I admire the play in many passages, and think the two last acts admirable. In the fifth, particularly, I hardly ever found myself so strongly touched." Dr. Pemberton published "Some Reflections on the Tragedy of Boadicea," 8vo, 1753, to recommend this play, upon the principle, that dramatic dialogue without incidents, and poetry without description, metaphor, or similes, approach nearest to perfection, because they approach nearest to nature. From tragedies written on this principle, verse should also be rejected, as nothing can be a more evident or perpetual deviation from nature, than dialogue in verse. Mr. Crisp Mills addressed "A Letter to Mr. Glover, on occasion of his tragedy of Boadicea," 8vo, 1753, in which he applauds him for the regularity of his piece, but censures him for omitting to introduce into it a plot or intrigue; without which, he thinks, a set of connected dialogues can never be a play. A pamphlet intitled "Female Revenge, or the British Amazon, exemplified in the life of Boadicea; with observations on the diction, sentiments, and conduct of the play," 8vo, 1753; and other anonymous remarks, criticisms, and reflections, appeared about this time, relating to this play.

In 1761, he published his Medea, a tragedy, 4to, taken from the dramas of Euripides, and Seneca, and constructed professedly upon the ancient plan, each act terminating with a chorus. It was not acted till 1767, when it was brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, for Mrs. Yates's benefit, and has since been often performed with success. Heinſius and Scaliger have called the "Medea" of Seneca, the Alta Medea; but that title more properly belongs to the work of Glover, which is superior both to the "Medea" of Seneca, and even that of Euripides. In Euripides, Medea tells us that she murders her children because she would rather have them fall by her own hand, than by the hands of the Corinthians, which, as she had effected the death of Creusa, she might expect. This produces very little that is interesting or affecting. Indeed, when Jason is informed of the murder of his children, he gives a loose to parental sorrow, but the altercations between him and Medea on that occasion, are very low and trifling. Seneca, with a greater appearance of probability, imputes her murder to revenge. When Medea discovers Jason's fond affection for his children, she immediately meditates their destruction. But when he describes her as deliberating upon this cruel deed, though very ingenious in his distinctions, he is certainly too minute. Medea's motive to the murder, imputed, as it is by Glover, to the rage of madness, is much more natural, and produces more affecting scenes than could follow from the motives to which either the Greek or Latin poets have ascribed it. She appears in the work of our countryman, that wild, infuriate, sun-born Medea, which the ancient mythology represents her. Her indignation on the thought of Jason's deserting her for Creusa, is forcibly expressed. The pathetic manner of Euripides is happily imitated in the tender conversation between Medea and her children in the second scene of the third act. When she is told by Jason that he is married to Creusa, her sudden madness is well conceived, and expressed in a grand and affecting manner. But when, still raving and distracted, she comes upon the stage, her hands dropping with the blood of her children, her words and wild appearance perfectly harrow up the soul.

It is begun.

- Now, to complete my vengeance, will I mount
The burning chariot of my bright forefather;
The rapid steeds o'er Corinth will I drive,
And with the scatter'd lightnings from their manes
Consume its walls, its battlements, and towers;
Then, as the flames embrace the purple clouds,

And the proud city crumbles from its base,
 The demon of my rage and indignation
 All grin, and wrapt in terror, shall bestride
 The mountainous embers; and denounce abroad
 To gods and men, my wrongs and my revenge.

When her returning reason discovers to her what she had done, her horror and anguish are dreadful, even beyond imagination. The tragedy ends, like that of Seneca, by representing Medea snatched up into the air in a chariot drawn by dragons. The unities are preserved throughout, the diction in general is harmonious, poetical, and picturesque, animated in proportion to the scenes it represents, and rising or falling with the passions. But the thoughts are sometimes spun too fine; some of the epithets, though not pedantic, are too stiff, and the blank odes introduced by way of chorus, though not inharmonious, must be very disagreeable to ears long accustomed to rhyme in lyric compositions.

At length, having surmounted the difficulties of his situation, he again relinquished the pleasures of retirement; and in the parliament which met at the accession of his present Majesty, 1761, he was elected for Weymouth. About this time, he interested himself about India affairs, at one of Mr. Sullivan's elections, and in a speech introduced the fable of the "Man, Horse, and Boar," and drew this conclusion, that whenever merchants made use of armed forces to maintain their trade, it would end in their destruction.

In 1770, he published a new edition (the fifth) of Leonidas, in 2 vols. 12mo, corrected throughout, and extended from nine books to twelve. It had also several new characters added, besides placing the old ones in new situations. The improvements made in it were very considerable; but the public curiosity was not sufficiently alive to recompense the pains bestowed on this once popular performance.

On the failure of the bank of Douglas, Heron, and Company, at Ayr, in June 1772, he took a very active part in the settling those complicated concerns, and in stopping the distress then so universally felt. In February 1774, he called the annuitants of that banking-house together at the King's Arms Tavern, London, and laid proposals before them, for the security of their demands, with which they were fully satisfied.

He also undertook to manage the interests of the merchants and traders of London, concerned in the trade to Germany and Holland, and of the dealers in foreign linens, in their application to Parliament in May 1774. Both the speeches made on these occasions were published in a pamphlet in that year.

In 1775, he engaged on behalf of the West India merchants, in their application to Parliament, and examined the witnesses, and summed up the evidence, in the same masterly manner he had done on former occasions. For the assistance he afforded the merchants in this business, he was complimented by them with a service of plate of the value of 300l. The speech which he delivered in the House was printed in that year. This was the last opportunity he had of displaying his oratorical talents in public.

Having now arrived at a period of life which demanded a recess from business, he retired to ease and independence, and wore out the remainder of his life with dignity and with honour, in the exercise of the virtues of private and domestic life, and in his attention to his muse. He died at his house in Albemarle-Street, November 25. 1785, in the 73d year of his age.

No edition of his Leonidas has been called for since 1770. His London was reprinted in the second volume of "Pearch's Collection of Poems," 1774. The Athenaid, a sequel to Leonidas, which he bequeathed, with his other manuscripts, to his daughter Mrs. Halsey, was presented to the world, as it came from his hands, with the exception of a few corrections from the pen of a friend, in 3 vols. 12mo, 1788. He has also written a sequel to his Medea; but as it requires scenery of the most expensive kind, it has never been exhibited. It is said, indeed, that it was approved by Mrs. Yates, the magic of whose voice and action in the first part, produced as powerful effects as any imputed by Greek or Roman poets, to the character she represented. He has left some other dramatic pieces, which, it is hoped, will be presented to the world. His Leonidas, reprinted from the edition 1770, Poem on Sir Isaac Newton, London, and Hofter's Ghost, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The following character of Glover, drawn up immediately after his death, by his friend Dr. Brocklesby, and printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1785, is adopted without exception, as it contains an accurate and elegant estimate of his virtue, his learning, his eloquence, his patriotism, and his poetry.

“ Through the whole of his life, Mr. Glover was by all good men revered, by the wise esteemed, by the great sometimes caressed and even flattered, and now his death is sincerely lamented by all who had the happiness to contemplate the integrity of his character. Mr. Glover, for upwards of 50 years past, through every vicissitude of fortune, exhibited the most exemplary simplicity of manners; having early attained that perfect equanimity, which philosophy often recommends in the closet, but which in experience is too seldom exercised by other men in the test of trial. In Mr. Glover were united a wide compass of accurate information in all mercantile concerns, with high intellectual powers of mind, joined to a copious flow of eloquence as an orator in the House of Commons. Since Milton, he was second to none of our English poets, in his discriminating judicious acquaintance with all ancient as well as modern literature; witness his Leonidas, Medea, Boadicea, and London; for, having formed his own character upon the best models of the Greek writers, he lived as if he had been bred a disciple of Socrates, or companion of Aristides. Hence his political turn of mind, hence his unwarped affection and active zeal for the liberties of his country—hence his heartfelt exultation whenever he had to paint the impious design of tyrants, in ancient times frustrated, or in modern defeated, defeated in their nefarious purposes to extirpate liberty, or to trample on the unalienable rights of man, however remote in time or space from his immediate presence. In a few words, for the extent of his various erudition, for his unalloyed patriotism, and for his daily exercise and constant practice of Xenophon's philosophy, in his private as well as in public life, Mr. Glover has left none his equal in the city, and some time, it is feared, may elapse, before such another citizen shall arise, with eloquence, with character, and with poetry, like his, to assert their rights, or to vindicate with equal powers, the just claims of free-born men. Suffice this testimony at present, as the well-earned meed of this truly virtuous man, whose conduct was carefully marked, and narrowly watched by the writer of the foregoing hasty sketch, for his extraordinary qualities during the long period in human life of upwards of 40 years; and now it is spontaneously offered as a voluntary tribute, unsolicited and unpurchased; but as it appears justly due to the memory of so excellent a poet, statesman, and true philosopher, in life and death the same.”

This account of his private and public character, by one who knew him well, is so ample and satisfactory, that it leaves little to be added. In the domestic relations of husband and parent, his manners were as amiable as his abilities were respectable. In the character of a merchant he distinguished himself by the most exemplary integrity; yet in fortune he made no advances towards affluence. He was a patriot of the most independent cast, and scorning to bind himself about any one political party, was by all alike neglected. But there is a fame, not resulting from so perishable a means as the contention of parties, and alike out of their power to confer or take away, which will long flourish round the name of Glover.

As a poet his abilities are already well known. His Leonidas, though not in the highest class of epic poems, had, at its first publication, many admirers, and is still perused with pleasure. The subject of the poem is the gallant actions of Leonidas, and his heroic defence of, and fall at the pass of Thermopylæ. It is characterized by a bold spirit of liberty, and generous, tender, and noble sentiments; but it leans towards the tender rather than the sublime. The author every where appears to be a virtuous man, and a good citizen; he expresses manly and patriotic sentiments; though many of them are taken from the orations of Lyfias and Isocrates. The style possesses many poetical graces; but it is often familiar and prosaic, and is generally deficient in that awful simplicity, and unadorned sublimity which are the characteristics of the epic muse. It abounds in the affecting, the tender, and the beautiful, more than in the heroic and sublime. Some of the characters are well-drawn, and supported with proper dignity and elevation. The episode of Teribafus and Ariana, is poetical and pleasing. In its machinery and incident it has been thought defective; but on no principle or reason whatever, unless a superstitious reverence for the practice of Homer and Virgil. These poets very properly embellished their story by the traditional tales and popular legends of their own country; but does it thence follow, that in other countries, and in other ages, epic poetry must be wholly confined to antiquated fictions and fairy tales? Lucan has composed a very spirited poem, certainly of the epic kind, where neither gods nor supernatural beings are at all employed. Davenant has made an attempt of the same kind, not without success; and undoubtedly a poetical recital of great adventures, though the agents be every one of them human, may be made productive of the marvellous, without forsaking the probable, and fulfil the chief requisites of epic composition. Leonidas is not exactly founded upon the model of the Iliad of Homer, the Æneid of Virgil, or the Jerusalem of Tasso, the three most regular and complete epic works that ever were composed. But it affords a sufficient proof, that, however the use of machinery may heighten the effect, it is not essential to the existence, or to the success of epic poetry. It has a just title to be classed with Milton's Paradise Lost, Lucan's Pharsalia, Statius's Thebaid, Camoen's Lusiad, Voltaire's Henriade, and Wilkie's Epigoniad. The diction, the characters, and the narration of the poet are distinguished by the general strain and spirit of epic composition. But it is not without defects. It is too abrupt and laconic in the structure of its periods to suit the melody of verse, and is deficient in that poetical enthusiasm which is chiefly raised and nourished by an intimate acquaintance with the wild and sublime scenes of nature, and that creative and vigorous imagination, which presenting a higher order of things than is to be found in human life, produces the marvellous, and raises that admiration which should be the predominant passion in heroic poetry. Hence Thomson, who was a poet truly inspired, when he heard that a citizen of London had paid his addresses to the epic muse, exclaimed, "He write an epic poem, who never saw a mountain!"

The excellencies of Leonidas have received every possible recommendation and illustration from the elegant critique of Lyttleton, and the learned "Observations" of Dr. Pemberton; to which Mr. Murphy alludes in the following lines inserted in the last edition of his "Epistle to Dr. Johnson," 1786.

For freedom when Leonidas expires,
Though Pitt and Cobham feel their poet's fires,
Unmov'd, lo! Glover hears the world commend,
And thinks even Pemberton too much his friend.

"Since I have read Leonidas," says Lyttleton, Common Sense, No. 10. "I have been so full of all the beauties I met with in it, that to give some vent, I found it necessary to write to you, and invite my countrymen to take part with me in the pleasure of admiring what so justly deserves their admiration. And in doing this I have yet a farther view; I desire to do them good as well as please them; for never yet was an epic poem wrote with so noble and so useful a design; the whole plan and purpose of it being to show the superiority of freedom over slavery; and how much virtue, public spirit, and the love of liberty, are preferable both in their nature and effects, to riches, luxury, and the insolence of power.

"This great and instructive moral is set forth by an action the most proper to illustrate it of all that ancient or modern history can afford, enforced by the most sublime spirit of poetry, and adorned by all the charms of an active and warm imagination, under the restraint of a cool and sober judgment.

"And it has another special claim to protection; for I will venture to say, there never was an epic poem which had so near a relation as this to Common Sense; the author of it not having allowed himself the liberty so largely taken by his predecessors, of making excursions beyond the bounds, and out of sight of it, into the airy regions of poetical mythology. There are neither fighting gods, nor scolding goddesses, neither miracles nor enchantments, neither monsters nor giants, in his work; but whatsoever human nature can afford that is most astonishing, marvellous, and sublime.

"And it has this particular merit to recommend it, that, though it has quite the air of an ancient epic poem, there is not so much as a single simile in it, that is borrowed from any of the ancients, and yet, I believe, there is hardly any poem that has such a variety of beautiful comparisons; so just a confidence had the author in the extent, and rich abundance of his own imagination.

“ The artful conduct of the principal design ; the skill in connecting and adapting every episode to the carrying on and serving that design ; the variety of characters, the great care to keep them, and distinguish each from the other by a propriety of sentiment and thought ; all these are excellencies which the best judges of poetry will be particularly pleas'd with in Leonidas.

“ Upon the whole, I look upon this poem as one of those few of distinguished worth and excellence, which will be handed down with respect to all posterity, and which, in the long revolution of past centuries, but two or three countries have been able to produce. And I cannot help congratulating my own, that after having in the last age brought forth a Milton, she has in this produc'd two more such poets, as we have the happiness to see flourish now together, I mean Mr. Pope, and Mr. Glover.”

Dr. Pemberton's observations on the principal characters in Leonidas, under the head “ Sentiment and Character,” are subjoined ; as “ this is the part of poetry,” as he expresses it, “ in which the divine invention is most eminently distinguished.”

“ Xerxes is an example of a little mind inflated with absolute power. He is not only proud, impatient of contradiction, and precipitate, the natural effects of the adoration and blind submission, which had always been paid him ; but we see in him likewise many personal weaknesses. He is possess'd of so mean a vanity, as to conclude his great and extensive dominion a proof of his being so singular a favourite of heaven, that no bounds could be set to his good fortune : he had persuad'd himself, that the Greeks must have the same abject veneration for him, as his own slaves ; and will scarce believe, that his ambassadors had made a true report, who bring him an answer contrary to what his foolish pride had imagin'd ; and it is with extreme difficulty, that his brothers dissuade him from proceeding against them upon that supposition : nay, at last he gives order for attacking the Greeks with the air of being still confident they must submit to his will without resistance. We soon after find this haughty and insolent monarch indu'd with a temper so weak and fickle, that upon a little ill success all his vain presumption and confidence abandon him, and he condescends to the proposing conditions, which, before, his pride could not have suffer'd him to think of without the utmost indignation.

“ In his brother Hyperantbes we see a good character, but confin'd to the virtues, which can have place under arbitrary government. He is valiant, so far unprejudic'd, as to be duly sensible of the superior virtue in his enemies ; but had no reluctance to commit any kind of injustice towards them, when his brother had pitched upon them for a conquest. Otherwise he has great good nature, and a just esteem for real merit. This appears in his behaviour towards Demaratus, the Spartan exile, and much more in his singular affection for his friend Teribafus.

“ Teribafus possess'es a very worthy mind, improv'd by the study of philosophy, but oppress'd by the violence of a soft passion ; a weakness, which the luxury, and the indulgence for pleasure in an Asiatic court must have greatly increas'd. But Teribafus behaves not under this passion like the whining lovers of romance, who excite our contempt ; but in so manly and reasonable a manner, that makes him an object of just compassion, and still worthy the esteem of every one, that has any feeling for human weakness.

But unreveal'd and silent was his pain :
Nor yet in solitary shades he roam'd,
Nor shun'd resort ; but o'er his sorrows cast
A sickly dawn of gladness, and in smiles
Conceal'd his anguish ;

though still

“ Ariana is still a less exceptionable subject of pity, as we do not so much require in that sex firmness of temper to resist these soft impressions. Her despair and violent resolution in consequence of it are the effects of an excess of passion very natural to the serious and thoughtful turn of her character.

Leonidas in his last fate. The sublimity of this character distinguishably appears upon this occasion towards his kinsman Ditbyrambus.

“The aged Megistias will not permit his son to finish his life with himself. But though Demophilus bears the affection of a parent to his, the superior turn of his mind makes him fonder of the glory than of the life of Ditbyrambus.

“Ditbyrambus possesses, in an eminent degree, the amiable character of high merit accompanied with equal modesty. His ambition is ever to deserve praise rather than receive it. He chooses Diomedon for his constant companion in action, his wish being to equal the greatest. And at the same time he is an admirer of all virtue but his own.

“This moderation, and delicacy of mind, create that reluctance, with which he engages Teribasus, whose virtues, though in an enemy, he held in high esteem. In this scene the poet has brought together several characters, and supported each with great success. The gloomy cast of mind, which ever accompanied Teribasus, here appears without breaking his spirit. The impatience with which Hyperantbes advances forward, when he hopes to see his friend victorious, the eagerness, with which he flies to revenge upon his disappointment, and the sudden suspense of that resolution to assist his dying friend, with the return of his indignation, as soon as his friend expires, are strong effects of that warmth of heart becoming a firm amity.

“The respective characters of these two heroes are also well preserved in the manner, wherein each takes his resolution to share the glory with Leonidas in his fatal catastrophe. The fierce intrepidity of Diomedon prompts him to appear the foremost of all in this high-spirited resolution; and Ditbyrambus with the modesty peculiar to his character, is solicitous to throw an humble shade over his own glory.

“For brevity I pass over the lesser characters of the poem; though they also are distinctly marked. The savage fierceness of Pbraortes, the vain arrogance of Tigranes, the diffidence and hypocrisy of Anaxander, and the confidence in villany of Epiates, are very manifest.

“The character of Leonidas is the most distinctly exhibited of any, being placed in a greater variety of lights. We see him in council, in the army, in his family, and in his retirements. His first appearance in the Spartan council shows us the ruling principle of his mind. The general principle, upon which valiant and heroic actions are founded, is, that there are occasions, which make it reasonable to put life in hazard. And we daily see this principle exerted in very different degrees in proportion to the measure of courage and spirit of different men. But Leonidas extends this principle so far, and has formed so exalted a conception of virtue, as to think it necessary for a great man to place the desire of life wholly out of the question.

“It is upon this foot, that notwithstanding the character of Leonidas is raised so far above that of other men, yet it appears absolutely natural; because his motives are not of a different nature from those of others, but only improved in degree.

“When Leonidas is retired, and the warmth of heart excited by the public presence is so far abated, that he is left without restraint to his cool reflections, the poet has taken care not to outrage his character by divesting him of human nature; but we see those struggles, which must necessarily pass through the mind of the greatest man upon so extraordinary an occasion. Here he is not without natural fears; but has a spirit in his most deliberate moments to overcome them. His principal motive is the public good; though he is also not insensible to the fame which must accompany so meritorious an action.

“Cold men have considered this sublime degree of that desire of praise, which is implanted in our nature, as a weakness; but it is certainly a part of Leonidas's character to hold it in high esteem; for as he has recourse to it for the support of his own mind, so in his first speech to his followers on their arrival at Thermopylæ, he excites them to act with their utmost vigour upon the same motives.

“In his family another part of his character appears. He is there tender and affectionate, but still able to suppress the secret motions of his own heart, when it was necessary for inspiring his queen with spirit to support a calamity unavoidable. And accordingly, he does in part raise and calm her mind. But when the sudden warning for his departure has renewed her grief, that she faints in his arms, and he is left, as it were, alone to himself; he breaks out into a degree of tenderness, that shows all his foregoing resolution to be the effect of true firmness of mind, not of insensibility.

“ We next see him before the general council of Greece. And here he acts a new part. In the Spartan council he exerts a spirit and vigour, that commands all who hear him; but now he gives his advice with the moderation of one more disposed to be directed than authoritatively to influence an assembly, to whose prudence the general states of the country had intrusted the conduct of their affairs.

“ He is next brought into the field, and shown in the midst of those dangers, to which, for the public service, he had so freely offered himself. And here the same resolution supports him to perform with the greatest coolness all the offices of a skilful and prudent commander, to contemn in his last hours every peril, and to meet his fate with no less firmness than that, wherewith he first accepted of it, at a distance in the council of Sparta.

“ Thus I think our author in his principal Grecian heroes, and most eminently in Leonidas their leader, has represented with singular strength, and truth, virtuous characters of high spirit superior to the greatest misfortunes; which is an achievement Plato thought the most difficult of all poetical imitation.”

The author of the “ Remarks on Leonidas, in the “ Weekly Miscellany,” No. 234. after taking notice of several faults and improprieties, concludes thus: “ I ought in justice to confess to those readers who may chance not to have read Leonidas, that though there are faults sufficient to justify the opposition I made to it, yet there are beauties more than sufficient to repay them the trouble in reading it over.”

In the Athenaid, which is a poetical history of the wars between the Greeks and Persians, in thirty books, he proposes revenge for the death of Leonidas, as the great subject of his poem. The following is the exordium:

The Persians vanquish'd, Greece from bondage sav'd,
The death of great Leonidas reveng'd,
By Attic virtue—celebrate O muse!

The conclusion is in the same strain,

—————Night drops her shade
On thirty millions slaughter'd. Thus thy death
Leonidas of Sparta was aveng'd;
Greece thus by Attic virtue was preserv'd.

It is indeed so much a counterpart to Leonidas, though still more profaic, as to supersede the necessity of a particular critique. Events that are the subject of authentic record, are ill adapted to epic poetry. At the same time, the historical transactions of every age, are capable of poetical arrangement, and poetical embellishment. But the narrow and limited view which he has taken of his subject, removes its grandest and most dignified aspect, and renders the epic muse inferior to the historical. Many of the episodes, however, are affecting and pathetic; and some of the characters are well drawn, particularly those of Themistocles and Aristides. But the importance and dignity of the events recorded are much diminished by the poetical mode of narration, and strike us less than in the original historian.

His London requires no distinct examination. The subject, which is the origin and progress of commerce, is peculiarly interesting to Britons; and the composition discovers a vigour of invention, a force of description, a dignity of sentiment, and a facility of expression, not unworthy of the author of Leonidas. His Hofier's Ghost is one of the most pathetic and beautiful ballads in the English language.

PREFACE.

To illustrate the following poem, to vindicate the subject from the censure of improbability, and to show, by the concurring evidence of the best historians, that such disinterested public virtue did once exist, I have thought it would not be improper to prefix the subsequent narration.

While Darius, the father of Xerxes, was yet on the throne of Persia, Cleomenes and Demaratus were kings in Lacedemon, both descended from Hercules. Demaratus was unfortunately exposed by an uncertain rumour, which rendered his legitimacy suspected, to the malice and treachery of his colleague, who had conceived a personal resentment against him; for Cleomenes, taking advantage of this report, persuaded the Spartans to examine into the birth of Demaratus, and refer the difficulty to the oracle of Delphi; and was assisted in his perfidious designs by a near relation of Demaratus, named Leutyichides, who aspired to succeed him in his dignity. Cleomenes found means to corrupt the priests of Delphi, who declared Demaratus not legitimate. Thus, by the base practices of his colleague Cleomenes, and of his kinsman Leutyichides, Demaratus was expelled from his regal office in the commonwealth, a Lacedemonian, distinguished in action and counsel, and the only king of Sparta, who, by obtaining the Olympic prize in the chariot-race, had increased the lustre of his country. He went into voluntary banishment; and, retiring to Asia, was there protected by Darius, while Leutyichides succeeded to the regal authority in Sparta. Upon the death of Cleomenes, Leonidas became king, who ruled in conjunction with this Leutyichides, when Xerxes, the son of Darius, invaded Greece. The number of land and naval forces which accompanied that monarch, together with the servants, women, and other usual attendants on the army of an eastern prince, amounted to upwards of five millions, as reported by Herodotus, who wrote within a few years after the event, and publicly recited his history at the Olympic games. In this general assembly, not only from Greece itself, but from every part of the world, wherever a colony of Grecians was planted, had he greatly exceeded the truth, he must certainly have been detected, and censured by some among so great a multitude; and such a voluntary falsehood must have entirely destroyed that merit and authority, which have procured to Herodotus the veneration of all posterity, with the appellation of the Father of History. On the first news of this attempt on their liberty, a convention, composed of deputies from the several states of Greece, was immediately held at the Isthmus of Corinth, to consult on proper measures for the public safety. The Spartans also sent messengers to inquire of the oracle at Delphi into the event of the war, who returned with an answer from the priests of Apollo, that either a king, descended from Hercules, must die, or Lacedemon would be entirely destroyed. Leonidas immediately offered to sacrifice his life for the preservation of Lacedemon; and, marching to Thermopylae, possessed himself of that important pass with three hundred of his countrymen; who, with the forces of some other cities in the Peloponnesus, together with the Thebans, Thespians, and the troops of those states, which adjoined to Thermopylae, composed an army of near eight thousand men.

Xerxes was now advanced as far as Thessalia; when, hearing that a small body of Grecians was assembled at Thermopylæ, with some Lacedæmonians at their head, and among the rest Leonidas, a descendent of Hercules, he dispatched a single horseman before to observe their numbers, and discover their designs. When this horseman approached, he could not take a view of the whole camp, which lay concealed behind a rampart, formerly raised by the Phocians at the entrance of Thermopylæ on the side of Greece; so that his whole attention was engaged by those who were on guard before the wall, and who at that instant chanced to be the Lacedæmonians. Their manner and gestures greatly astonished the Persian. Some were amusing themselves in gymnastic exercises; others were combing their hair; and all discovered a total disregard of him, whom they suffered to depart, and report to Xerxes what he had seen; which appearing to that prince quite ridiculous, he sent for Demaratus, who was with him in the camp, and required him to explain this strange behaviour of his countrymen. Demaratus informed him, that it was a custom among the Spartans to comb down and adjust their hair, when they were determined to fight till the last extremity. Xerxes, notwithstanding, in the confidence of his power, sent ambassadors to the Grecians to demand their arms, to bid them disperse, and become his friends and allies; which proposals being received with disdain, he commanded the Medes and Cissians to seize on the Grecians, and bring them alive into his presence. These nations immediately attacked the Grecians, and were soon repulsed with great slaughter; fresh troops still succeeded, but with no better fortune than the first, being opposed to an enemy not only superior in valour and resolution, but who had the advantage of discipline, and were furnished with better arms, both offensive and defensive.

Plutarch, in his Laconic Apothegms, reports, that the Persian king offered to invest Leonidas with the sovereignty of Greece, provided he would join his arms to those of Persia. This offer was too considerable a condescension to have been made before a trial of their force, and must therefore have been proposed by Xerxes after such a series of ill success, as might probably have depressed the insolence of his temper; and it may be easily admitted, that the virtue of Leonidas was proof against any temptations of that nature. Whether this be a fact or not, thus much is certain, that Xerxes was reduced to extreme difficulties by this resolute defence of Thermopylæ, till he was extricated from his distress by a Malian, named Epialtes, who conducted twenty thousand of the Persian army into Greece through a pass, which lay higher up the country among the mountains of Oeta; whereas the passage at Thermopylæ was situated on the seashore between those mountains and the Malian bay. The defence of the upper pass had been committed to a thousand Phocians, who, upon the first sight of the enemy, inconsiderately abandoned their station, and put themselves in array upon a neighbouring eminence; but the Persians wisely avoided an engagement, and with the utmost expedition marched to Thermopylæ.

Leonidas no sooner received information that the Barbarians had passed the mountains, and would soon be in a situation to surround him, than he commanded the allies to retreat, reserving the three hundred Spartans, and four hundred Thebans, whom, as they followed him with reluctance at first, he now compelled to stay. But the Thebians, whose number amounted to seven hundred, would not be persuaded by Leonidas to forsake him. Their commander was Demophilus; and the most eminent amongst them for his valour was Dithyrambus, the son of Harmatides. Among the Lacedæmonians, the most conspicuous next to Leonidas was Dieneces, who being told that the multitude of Persian arrows would obscure the sun, replied, the battle would then be in the shade. Two brothers, named Alpheus and Maron, are also recorded for their valour, and were Lacedæmonians. Megistias, a priest, by birth an Acarnanian, and held in high honour at Sparta, refused to desert Leonidas, though entreated by him to consult his safety, but sent away his only son, and remained himself behind to die with the Lacedæmonians.

Herodotus relates, that Leonidas drew up his men in the broadest part of Thermopylæ, where, being encompassed by the Persians, they fell with great numbers of their enemies; but Plutarch, Diodorus Siculus, and others, affirm, that the Grecians attacked the very camp of Xerxes in the night. Both these dispositions are reconcilable to probability. He might have made an attack on the Persian camp in the night, and in the morning withdrawn his forces back to Thermopylæ, where they would be enabled to make the most obstinate resistance, and sell their lives upon the dearest terms. The action is thus described by Diodorus: "The Grecians, having now rejected all thoughts of safety, preferring glory to life, unanimously called on their general to lead them against the Persians, before they could be apprised that their friends had passed round the mountains. Leonidas embraced the occasion, which the ready zeal of his soldiers afforded, and commanded them forthwith to dine as men who were to sup in Elysium. Himself, in consequence of this command, took a repast, as the means to furnish strength for a long continuance, and to give perseverance in danger. After a short refreshment, the Grecians were now prepared, and received orders to assail the enemies in their camp, to put all they met to the sword, and force a passage to the royal pavilion; when, formed into one compact body with Leonidas himself at their head, they marched against the Persians, and entered their camp at the dead of night. The Barbarians, wholly unprepared, and blindly conjecturing that their friends were defeated, and themselves attacked by the united power of Greece, hurry together from their tents with the utmost disorder and consternation. Many were slain by Leonidas and his party, but much greater multitudes by their own troops, to whom, in the midst of this blind confusion, they were not distinguishable from enemies; for as night took away the power of discerning truly, and the tumult was spread universally over the camp, a prodigious slaughter must naturally ensue. The want of command, of a watch-word, and of confidence in themselves, reduced the Persians to such a “state of confusion, that they destroyed each other without distinction. Had Xerxes continued in the royal pavilion, the Grecians, without difficulty, might have brought the war to a speedy conclusion by his death; but he, at the beginning of the tumult, betook himself to flight with the utmost precipitation; when the Grecians, rushing into the tent, put to the sword most of those who were left behind; then, while night lasted, they ranged through the whole camp in diligent search of the tyrant. When morning appeared, the Persians, perceiving the true state of things, held the inconsiderable number of their enemies in contempt, yet were so terrified at their valour, that they avoided a near engagement; but enclosing the Grecians on every side, showered their darts and arrows upon them at a distance, and in the end destroyed their whole body. In this manner fell the Grecians, who, under the conduct of Leonidas, defended the pass of Thermopylæ. All must admire the virtue of these men, who with one consent maintaining the post allotted by their country, cheerfully renounced their lives for the common safety of Greece, and esteemed a glorious death more eligible than to live with dishonour. Nor is the consternation of the Persians incredible. Who among those Barbarians could have conjectured such an event? Who could have expected that five hundred men would have dared to attack a million? Wherefore shall not all posterity reflect on the virtue of these men as the object of imitation, who, though the loss of their lives was the necessary consequence of their undertaking, were yet unconquered in their spirit; and among all the great names delivered down to remembrance, are the only heroes who obtained more glory in their fall, than others from the brightest victories? With justice may they be deemed the preservers of the Grecian liberty, even preferably to those who were conquerors in the battles fought afterwards with Xerxes; for the memory of that valour, exerted in the defence of Thermopylæ, for ever dejected the Barbarians, while the Greeks were fired with emulation to equal such a pitch of magnanimity. Upon the whole, there never were any before

“these who attained to immortality, through the mere excess of virtue; whence the praise of their fortitude hath not been recorded by historians only, but hath been celebrated by numbers of poets, among others by Simonides the lyric.”

Pausanias, in his Laconics, considers the defence of Thermopylæ by Leonidas as an action superior to any achieved by his cotemporaries, and to all the exploits of preceding ages. “Never (says he) had Xerxes beheld Greece, and laid in ashes the city of Athens, had not his forces under Hydarnes been conducted through a path over mount Oeta, and by that means encompassing the Greeks, overcome and slain Leonidas.” Nor is it improbable, that such a commander at the head of such troops should have maintained his post in so narrow a pass, till the whole army of Xerxes had perished by famine. At the same time his navy had been miserably shattered by a storm, and worsted in an engagement with the Athenians at Artemisium.

To conclude, the fall of Leonidas and his brave companions, so meritorious to their country, and so glorious to themselves, hath obtained such a high degree of veneration and applause from past ages, that few among the ancient compilers of history have been silent on this amazing instance of magnanimity and zeal for liberty; and many are the epigrams and inscriptions now extant, some on the whole body, others on particulars, who died at Thermopylæ, still preserving their memory in every nation conversant with learning, and at this distance of time still rendering their virtue the object of admiration and of praise.

I shall now detain the reader no longer, than to take this public occasion of expressing my sincere regard for the Lord Viscount Cobham, and the sense of my obligations for the early honour of his friendship; to him I inscribe the following poem; and herein I should be justified, independent of all personal motives, from his Lordship's public conduct, so highly distinguished by his disinterested zeal and unshaken fidelity to his country; not less in civil life than in the field; to him, therefore, a poem, founded on a character eminent for military glory, and love of liberty, is due from the nature of the subject.

B O O K I.

THE ARGUMENT.

XERXES, king of Persia, having drawn together the whole force of his empire, and passed over the Hellepont into Thrace, with a design to conquer Greece; the deputies from the several states of that country, who had some time before assembled themselves at the Isthmus of Corinth, to deliberate on proper measures for resisting the invader, were no sooner apprised of his march into Thrace, than they determined, without further delay, to dispute his passage at the streights of Thermopylæ, the most accessible part of Greece on the side of Thrace and Thessaly. Alpheus, one of the deputies from Sparta, repairs to that city, and communicates this resolution to his countrymen; who chanced that day to be assembled in expectation of receiving an answer from Apollo, to whom they had sent a messenger to consult about the event of the war. Leutychides, one of their two kings, counsels the people to advance no farther than the Isthmus of Corinth, which separates the Peloponnesus, where Lacedemon was situated, from the rest of Greece; but Leonidas, the other king, dissuades them from it. Agis the messenger, who had been deputed to Delphi, and brother to the queen of Leonidas, returns with the oracle; which denounces ruin to the Lacedemonians, unless one of their kings lays down his life for the public. Leonidas offers himself for the victim. Three hundred more are appointed, all citizens of Sparta, and heads of families, to accompany and die with him at Thermopylæ. Alpheus returns to the Isthmus. Leonidas, after an interview with his queen, departs from Lacedemon. At the end of six days he encamps near the Isthmus, when he is joined by Alpheus; who describes the auxiliaries, then waiting at the Isthmus, those who are already possessed of Thermopylæ, as also the pass itself; and concludes with relating the captivity of his brother Polydorus, in Persia.

THE virtuous Spartan, who resign'd his life
To save his country at th' Oetæan streights,
Thermopylæ, when all the peopled east
In arms with Xerxes fill'd the Grecian plains,
O muse, record! The Hellespont they pass'd,
O'erpow'ring Thrace. The dreadful tidings swift
To Corinth flew. Her Isthmus was the seat
Of Grecian council. Alpheus thence returns
To Lacedemon. In assembly full
He finds the Spartan people with their kings;
Their kings, who boast an origin divine,
From Hercules descended. They the sons
Of Lacedemon had conven'd, to learn
The sacred mandates of th' immortal gods,
That morn expected from the Delphian dome.
But Alpheus sudden their attention drew,
And thus address'd them: For immediate war,
My countrymen, prepare. Barbarian tents
Already fill the trembling bounds of Thrace.
The Isthmian council hath decreed to guard
Thermopylæ, the Locrian gate of Greece.

Here Alpheus paus'd. Leutychides, who shar'd
With great Leonidas the sway, uprose
And spake. Ye citizens of Sparta, hear.
Why from her bosom should Laconia send
Her valiant race to wage a distant war
Beyond the Isthmus? There the gods have plac'd
Our native barrier. In this favour'd land,
Which Pelops govern'd, us of Doric blood
That Isthmus inaccessible secures.
There let our standards rest. Your solid strength,
If once you scatter in defence of states
Remote and feeble, you betray your own,
And merit Jove's derision. With assent
The Spartans heard. Leonidas reply'd:

O most ungen'rous counsel! Most unwise!
Shall we, confining to that Isthmian fence
Our efforts, leave beyond it ev'ry state
Disown'd, expos'd? Shall Athens, while her fleets
Unceasing watch th' innumerable foes,
And trust th' impending dangers of the field
To Sparta's well-known valour, shall she hear,
That to barbarian violence we leave
Her unprotected walls? Her hoary fires,

Her helpless matrons, and their infant race,
To servitude and shame? Her guardian gods
Will yet preserve them. Neptune o'er his main,
With Pallas, pow'r of wisdom, at their helms,
Will soon transport them to a happier clime,
Safe from insulting foes, from false allies,
And eleutherian Jove will bless their flight.
Then shall we feel the unresisted force
Of Persia's navy, deluging our plains
With inexhausted numbers. Half the Greeks,
By us betray'd to bondage, will support
A Persian lord, and lift th' avenging spear
For our destruction. But, my friends, reject Such mean, such dang'rous counsels, which would blast

Your long-established honours, and assist
The proud invader. O eternal king
Of gods and mortals, elevate our minds!
Each low and partial passion thence expel!
Greece is our gen'ral mother. All must join
In her defence, or, sep'rate, each must fall.

This said, authority and shame controul'd
The mute assembly. Agis too appear'd.
He from the Delphian cavern was return'd,
Where, taught by Phœbus on Parnassian cliffs,
The Pythian maid unfolded Heav'n's decrees.
He came; but discontent and grief o'ercast
His anxious brow. Reluctant was his tongue,
Yet seem'd full charg'd to speak. Religious dread
Each heart relax'd. On ev'ry visage hung
Sad expectation. Not a whisper told
The silent fear. Intensely all were fix'd,
All still as death, to hear the solemn tale.
As o'er the western waves, when ev'ry storm
Is hush'd within its cavern, and a breeze,
Soft-breathing, lightly with its wings along
The slacken'd cordage glides, the sailor's ear
Perceives no sound throughout the vast expanse;
None, but the murmurs of the sliding prow,
Which slowly parts the smooth and yielding main:
So through the wide and listening crowd no sound,
No voice, but thine, O Agis, broke the air!
While thus the issue of thy awful charge
Thy lips deliver'd. Spartans, in your name
I went to Delphi. I inquir'd the doom
Of Lacedemon from th' impending war,
When in these words the deity reply'd:

"Inhabitants of Sparta, Persia's arms
"Shall lay your proud and ancient seat in dust;
"Unless a king, from Hercules deriv'd,
"Cause Lacedemon from his death to mourn."

As when the hand of Perseus had disclos'd
The snakes of dire Medusa, all who view'd
The Gorgon features, were congeal'd to stone,
With ghastly eyeballs on the hero bent,
And horror, living in their marble form;
Thus with amazement rooted, where they stood,
In speechless terror frozen, on their kings
The Spartans gaz'd: but soon their anxious looks
All on the great Leonidas unite,
Long known his country's refuge. He alone
Remains unshaken. Rising, he displays
His godlike presence. Dignity and grace
Adorn his frame, where manly beauty joins
With strength Herculean. On his aspect shine
Sublimest virtue, and desire of fame,
Where justice gives the laurel, in his eye

The inextinguishable spark, which fires
The souls of patriots; while his brow supports
Undaunted valour, and contempt of death.
Serene he cast his looks around, and spake :

Why this astonishment on ev'ry face,
Ye men of Sparta? Does the name of death
Create this fear and wonder? O my friends,
Why do we labour through the arduous paths,
Which lead to virtue? Fruitless were the toil,
Above the reach of human feet were plac'd
The distant summit, if the fear of death
Could intercept our passage. But a frown
Of unavailing terror he assumes,
To shake the firmness of a mind, which knows
That, wanting virtue, life is pain and woe,
That, wanting liberty, ev'n virtue mourns,
And looks around for happiness in vain.
Then speak, O Sparta, and demand my life!
My heart, exulting, answers to thy call,
And smiles on glorious fate. To live with fame,
The gods allow to many; but to die
With equal lustre is a blessing, Jove
Among the choicest of his boons reserves,
Which but on few his sparing hand bestows.

Salvation thus to Sparta he proclaim'd.
Joy, wrapt awhile in admiration, paus'd,
Suspending praise; nor praise at last re-sounds
In high acclaim to rend the arch of heav'n:
A reverential murmur breathes applause.
So were the pupils of Lyncurgus train'd
To bridle nature. Public fear was dumb
Before their senate, ephori, and kings,
Nor exultation into clamour broke.
Amidst them rose Dieneceus, and thus:

Haste to Thermopylae. To Xerxes show
The discipline of Spartans, long renown'd
In rigid warfare, with enduring minds,
Which neither pain, nor want, nor danger bend.
Fly to the gate of Greece, which open stands
To slavery and rapine. They will shrink
Before your standard, and their native feats Resume in abject Asia. Arm, ye fires,
Who with a growing race have bless'd the state.
That race, your parents, gen'ral Greece forbid
Delay. Heav'n summons. Equal to the cause
A chief behold. Can Spartans ask for more?

Bold Alpheus next. Command my swift return
Amid the Isthmian council, to declare
Your instant march. His dictates all approve.
Back to the Isthmus let us unweary'd speeds.

Now from th' assembly, with majestic steps,
Forth moves their godlike king, with conscious worth

His gen'rous bosom glowing. Such the port
Of his divine progenitor; impell'd
By ardent virtue, so Alcides trod,
Invincible to face in horrid war
The triple form of Geryon, or against
The bulk of huge Antaeus match his strength.

Say, muse, what heroes, by example fir'd,
Nor less by honour, offer'd now to bleed?
Dieneceus the foremost, brave and staid,
Of vet'ran skill to range in martial fields,
Well-order'd lines of battle. Maron next,
Twin-born with Alpheus, shows his manly frame.
Him Agis follow'd, brother to the queen
Of great Leonidas, his friend in war,

His try'd companion. Graceful were his steps,
And gentle his demeanor. Still his soul
Preserv'd the purest virtue, though refin'd
By arts unknown to Lacedemon's race.
High was his office. He, when Sparta's weal
Support and counsel from the gods requir'd,
Was sent the hallow'd messenger to learn
Their mytic will, in oracles declar'd,
From rocky Delphi, from Dodona's shade,
Or sea-encircled Delos, or the cell
Of dark Trophonius, round Bœotia known.
Three hundred more complete th' intrepid band,
Illustrious fathers all of gen'rous sons,
The future guardians of Laconia's state.
Then rose Megistias, leading forth his son,
Young Menalippus. Not of Spartan blood
Were they. Megistias, heav'n-enlighten'd seer,
Had left his native Acarnanian shore;
Along the border of Eurotas chose
His place of dwelling. For his worth receiv'd,
And hospitably cherish'd, he the wreath
Pontific bore in Lacedemon's camp;
Serene in danger, nor his sacred arm
From warlike toil secluding, nor untaught
To wield the sword, and poize the weighty spear.

But to his home Leonidas retir'd.
There, calm in secret thought he thus explor'd
His mighty soul, while nature in his breast
A short emotion rais'd. What sudden grief,
What cold reluctance now unmans my heart,
And whispers that I fear? Can death dismay
Leonidas? Death, often seen and scorn'd,
When clad most dreadful in the battle's front?
Or to relinquish life in all its pride,
With all my honours blooming round my head,
Repines my soul, or rather to forsake,
Eternally forsake my weeping wife,
My infant offspring, and my faithful friends?
Leonidas, awake. Shall these withstand
The public safety? Hark, thy country calls.
O sacred voice, I hear thee! At the sound,
Reviving virtue brightens in my heart;
Fear vanishes before her. Death, receive
My unreluctant hand. Immortal fame,
Thou too, attendant on my righteous fall,
With wings unweary'd wilt protect my tomb.

His virtuous soul the hero had confirm'd,
When Agis enter'd. If my tardy lips
(He thus began), have hitherto forborne
To bring their grateful tribute of applause,
Which, as a Spartan, to thy worth I owe,
Forgive the brother of thy queen. Her grief
Detain'd me from thee. O unequal'd man,
Though Lacedemon call thy prime regard,
Forget not her, sole victim of distress,
Amid the gen'ral safety! To assuage
Such pain, fraternal tenderness is weak.

The king embrac'd him, and reply'd: O best,
O dearest man, conceive not, but my soul
To her is fondly bound, from whom my days
Their largest share of happiness deriv'd!
Can I, who yield my breath, lest others mourn,
Lest thousands should be wretched when she pines,
More lov'd than any, though less dear than all,
Can I neglect her griefs? In future days,
If thou with grateful memory record
My name and fate, O Sparta, pass not this

Unheeded by. The life, for thee resign'd,
Knew not a painful hour to tire my soul,
Nor were they common joys I left behind.

So spake the patriot, and his heart o'erflow'd
In tead' rest passion. Then in eager haste
The faithful partner of his bed he sought.
Amid her weeping children sat the queen
Immovable and mute. Her swimming eyes
Bent to the earth. Her arms were folded o'er
Her lab'ring bosom, blotted with her tears.
As when a dusky mist involves the sky,
The moon through all the dreary vapours spreads
The radiant vesture of her silver light
O'er the dull face of nature; so the queen,
Divinely graceful shining through her grief,
Brighten'd the cloud of woe. Her lord approach'd.
Soon, as in gentlest phrase his well-known voice
Awak'd her drooping spirit, for a time
Care was appeas'd. She lifts her languid head.
She gives this utt'rance to her tender thoughts:

O thou, whose presence is my sole delight;
If thus, Leonidas, thy looks and words
Can check the rapid current of distress,
How am I mark'd for misery! How long!
When of life's journey less than half is pass'd,
And I must hear those calming sounds no more,
Nor see that face which makes affliction smile.

This said, returning grief o'erwhelms her breast.
Her orphan children; her devoted lord,
Pale, bleeding, breathless on the field of death,
Her ever-during solitude of woe,
All rise in mingled horror to her sight,
When thus in bitterest agony the spake:

O whither art thou going from my arms?
Shall I no more behold thee? Oh! no more,
In conquest clad, o'erspread with glorious dust,
Wilt thou return to greet thy native soil,
And find thy dwelling joyful! Ah! too brave,
Why would'st thou hurry to the dreary gates
Of death, uncall'd—Another might have bled,
Like thee a victim of Alcides' race,
Less dear to all, and Sparta been secure.
Now ev'ry eye with mine is drown'd in tears;
All with these babes lament a father lost.
Alas, how heavy is our lot of pain!
Our sighs must last, when ev'ry other breast
Explains in safety, purchas'd by our loss.
Thou didst not heed our anguish—didst not seek
One pause for my instruction how to bear
Thy endless absence, or like thee to die.

Unutterable sorrow here confin'd
Her voice. These words Leonidas return'd:

I see, I share thy agony. My soul
Ne'er knew how warm the prevalence of love,
How strong a parent's feelings, till this hour;
Nor was she once insensible to thee
In all her fervour to assert my fame.
How had the honours of my name been stain'd
By hesitation? Shameful life preferr'd
By an inglorious colleague would have left
No choice, but what were infamy to shun,
Not virtue to accept. Then deem no more,
That of thy love regardless, or thy tears,
I rush, uncall'd, to death. The voice of fate,
The gods, my fame, my country press my doom.
Oh! thou dear mourner! Wherefore swells afresh
That tide of woe? Leonidas must fall.
Alas! far heavier misery impends

O'er thee and these, if, soften'd by thy tears,
I shamefully refuse to yield that breath,
Which justice, glory, liberty, and heav'n
Claim for my country, for my sons and thee.
Think on my long unalter'd love. Reflect
On my paternal fondness. Hath my heart
E'er known a pause in love, or pious care?
Now shall that care, that tenderness be shown
Most warm, most faithful. When thy husband dies

For Lacedemon's safety, thou wilt share,
Thou and thy children the diffusive good.
I am selected by th' immortal gods
To save a people. Should my timid heart
That sacred charge abandon, I should plunge
Thee too in shame, in sorrow. Thou wouldst mourn

With Lacedemon; wouldst with her sustain
Thy painful portion of oppression's weight.
Behold thy sons now worthy of their name,
Their Spartan birth. Their youthful bloom would pine

Depress'd, dishonour'd, and their youthful hearts
Beat at the sound of liberty no more.
On their own merit, on their father's fame,
When he the Spartan freedom hath confirm'd,
Before the world illustrious will they rise,
Their country's bulwark, and their mother's joy.

Here paus'd the patriot. In religious awe
Grief heard the voice of virtue. No complaint
The solemn silence broke. Tears ceas'd to flow;
Ceas'd for a moment soon again to stream.
Behold, in arms before the palace drawn,
His brave companions of the war demand
Their leader's presence. Then her griefs renew'd,
Surpassing utt'rance, intercept her sighs.
Each accent freezes on her falt'ring tongue.
In speechless anguish on the hero's breast
She sinks. On ev'ry side his children press,
Hang on his knees, and kiss his honour'd hand.
His soul no longer struggles to confine
Her agitation. Down the hero's cheek,
Down flows the manly sorrow. Great in woe
Amid his children, who enclose him round,
He stands indulging tenderness and love
In graceful tears, when thus with lifted eyes,
Address'd to heav'n. Thou ever-living pow'r,
Look down propitious, sire of gods and men;
O to this faithful woman, whose desert
May claim thy favour, grant the hours of peace!
And thou, my bright forefather, seed of Jove,
O Hercules, neglect not these thy race!
But since that spirit, I from thee derive,
Transports me from them to resistless fate,
Be thou their guardian! Teach them like thyself
By glorious labours to embellish life,
And from their father let them learn to die.

Here ending, forth he issues, and assumes
Before the ranks his station of command.
They now proceed. So mov'd the host of heav'n
On Phlegra's plains to meet the giant sons
Of Earth and Titan. From Olympus march'd
The deities embattel'd; while their king
Tower'd in the front with thunder in his grasp.
Thus through the streets of Lacedemon pass'd
Leonidas. Before his footsteps bow
The multitude exulting. On he treads
Rever'd. Unfated, their enraptur'd sight

Pursues his graceful stature, and their tongues
 Extol and hail him, as their guardian god.
 Firm in his nervous hand he grips the spear.
 Low, as the ankles, from his shoulders hangs
 The massy shield; and o'er his burnish'd helm
 The purple plumage nods. Harmonious youths,
 Around whose brows entwining laurels play,
 In lofty-sounding strains his praise record;
 While snowy-finger'd virgins all the way
 Bestrew with od'rous garlands. Now his breast
 Is all possess'd by glory, which dispell'd
 Whate'er of grief remain'd, or vain regret
 For those he left behind. The rev'rend train
 Of Lacedemon's senate last appear
 To take their final, solemn leave, and grace
 Their hero's parting steps. Around him flow
 In civil pomp their venerable robes,
 Mix'd with the blaze of arms. The shining troop
 Of warriors press behind him, Maron here
 With Menalippus warm in flow'ry prime,
 There Agis, their Megistias, and the chief,
 Dienece. Laconia's dames ascend
 The loftiest mansions; thronging o'er the roofs,
 Applaud their sons, their husbands as they march:
 So parted Argo from th' Colchian strand
 To plough the foaming surge. Thessalia's nymphs,
 Rang'd on the cliffs, o'er shading Neptune's face,
 Still on the distant vessel fix'd their eyes
 Admiring, still in peans blest'd the helm,
 By Greece intrusted with her chosen sons
 For high adventures on the Colchian shore.
 Swift on his course Leonidas proceeds.
 Soon is Eurotas pass'd, and Lerna's bank,
 Where his victorious ancestor subdu'd
 The many headed Hydra, and the lake
 To endless fame consign'd. Th' unwear'd bands
 Next through the pines of Mænalus he led,
 And down Parthenius urg'd the rapid toil.
 Six days incessant was their march pursu'd,
 When to their ear the hoarse-reefounding waves
 Beat on the Isthmus. Here the tents are spread.
 Below the wide horizon then the fun
 Had dipp'd his beamy locks. The queen of night
 Gleam'd from the centre of th' ethereal vault,
 And o'er the raven plumes of darkness shed
 Her placid light. Leonidas detains
 Dienece and Agis. Open stands
 The tall pavilion, and admits the moon.
 As here they sit conversing, from the hill,
 Which rose before them, one of noble port
 Is seen descending. Lightly down the slope
 He treads. He calls aloud. They heard, they knew
 The voice of Alpheus, whom the king address'd.
 O thou, with swiftness by the gods endu'd
 To match the ardour of thy daring soul,
 What from the Isthmus draws thee? Do the Greeks
 Neglect to arm and face the public foe?
 Good news give wings, said Alpheus. Greece is arm'd.
 The neighbour'ing Isthmus holds th' Arcadian
 bands,
 From Mantinea Diophantus leads
 Five hundred spears; nor less from Tegea's walls
 With Hegesander move. A thousand more,
 Who in Orchomenus reside, and range
 Along Parrhasius, or Cyllene's bank;

Who near the foot of Erymanthus dwell,
 Or on Alphean banks, with various chiefs
 Expect thy presence. Most is Clonius fam'd,
 Of stature huge, unshaken rock of war.
 Four hundred warriors brave Alcmaon draws
 From stately Corinth's tow'rs. Two hundred march
 From Phlius. Them Eupalamus commands.
 An equal number of Mycena's race
 Aristobulus heads. Through fear alone
 Of thee, and threat'ning Greece the Thebans arm.
 A few in Thebes authority and rule
 Usurp. Corrupted with Barbarian gold,
 They quench the gen'rous, eleutherian flame
 In ev'ry heart. The eloquent they bribe.
 By specious tales the multitude they cheat,
 Establishing base measures on the plea
 Of public safety. Others are immers'd
 In all the sloth of plenty, who unmov'd
 In shameful ease, behold the state betray'd.
 Aw'd by thy name, four hundred took the field.
 The wily Anaxander is their chief
 With Leontides. To see their march
 I staid, then hasten'd to survey the freights,
 Which thou shalt render sacred to renew.
 Forever mingled with a crumbling foil,
 Which moulders round th' indented Malian coast,
 The sea rolls slimy. On a solid rock,
 Which forms the inmost limit of a bay,
 Their promylæ is stretch'd. Where broadest spread,
 It measures threescore paces, bounded here
 By the salt ooze, which underneath presents
 A dreary surface; there the lofty cliffs
 Of woody'd Oeta overlook the pass,
 And far beyond o'er half the surge below
 Their horrid umbrage cast. Across the mouth
 An ancient bulwark of the Phocians stands,
 A wall with gates and tow'rs. The Locrian force
 Was marching forward. Them I pass'd to greet
 Demophilus of Thepsia, who had pitch'd
 Seven hundred spears before th' important fence.
 His brother's son attends the rev'rend chief,
 Young Dithyrambus. He for noble deeds,
 Yet more for temperance of mind renown'd,
 In early bloom with brightest honours shines,
 Nor wantons in the blaze. Here Agis spake:
 Well hast thou painted that illustrious youth.
 He is my host at Thepsia. Though adorn'd
 With various wreaths, by fame, by fortune blest'd,
 His gentle virtues take from envy's lips
 Their blasting venom; and her baneful eye
 Strives on his worth to smile. In silence all
 Again remain, when Alpheus thus proceeds:
 Plataea's chosen veterans I saw,
 Small in their number, matchless in their fame.
 Diomedon the leader. Keen his sword
 At Marathon was felt, where Asia bled.
 These guard Thermopylae. Among the hills,
 Unknown to strangers winds an upper freight,
 Which by a thousand Phocians is secur'd.
 Ere these brave Greeks I quitted, in the bay
 A stately chieftain of th' Athenian fleet
 Arriv'd. I join'd him. Copious in thy praise
 He utter'd rapture, but austere blam'd
 Laconia's tardy counsels; while the ships
 Of Athens long had stemm'd Eubœan tides,
 Which slow not distant from our future post.
 This was the far-fam'd Æchylus, by Mars,

By Phœbus lov'd. Farnassus him proclaims
The first of Attic poets, him the plains
Of Marathon a soldier, try'd in arms.

Well may Athenians murmur, said the king.
Too long hath Sparta slumber'd on her shield.
By morn, beyond the Isthmus we will spread
A gen'rous banner. In Laconian strains
Of Alcman and Terpander lives the fame
Of our forefathers. Let our deeds attract
The brighter muse of Athens in the fong
Of Æschylus divine. Now frame thy choice.
Share in our fate; or, hast'ning home, report,
How much already thy discerning mind,
Thy active limbs have merited from me,
How serv'd thy country. From the impatient lips
Of Alpheus swift these fervid accents broke:

I have not measur'd such a tract of land,
Have not untir'd, beheld the setting sun,
Nor through the shade of midnight urg'd my steps
To animate the Grecians, that myself
Might be exempt from warlike toil, or death.
Return? Ah! no. A second time my speed
Shall visit thee, Thermopylæ. My limbs
Shall at thy side, Leonidas, obtain
An honourable grave. And oh! amid
His country's perils, if a Spartan breast
May feel a private sorrow, fierce revenge
I seek not only for th' insulted state,
But for a brother's wrongs. A younger hope,
Than I, and Maron, blec'd our father's years,
Child of his age, and Polydorus nam'd.
His mind, while tender in his op'ning prime,
Was bent to strenuous virtue. Gen'rous scorn
Of pain, or danger taught his early strength.
To struggle patient with severest toils.
Oft, when inclement winter chill'd the air,
When frozen snôw'rs had swoln Eurotas' stream,
Amid th' impetuous channel would he plunge
To breast the torrent. On a fatal day,
As in the sea his active limbs he bath'd,
A savage corsair of the Persian king
My brother naked and defenceless bore,
Ev'n in my sight, to Asia; there to waste
With all the promise of its growing worth
His youth in bondage. Tedious were the tale,
Should I recount my pains, my father's woes,
The days he wept, the sleepless nights, he beat
His aged bosom. And shall Alpheus' spear
Be absent from Thermopylæ, nor claim,
O Polydorus, vengeance for thy wrongs
In that first slaughter of the barb'rous foe.

Here interpos'd Dieneçes. Their hands
He grasp'd, and cordial transport thus express'd:
O that Lycurgus from the shades might rise
To praise the virtue, which his laws inspire!
Thus till the dead of night these heroes pass'd
The hours in friendly converse, and enjoy'd
Each other's virtue. Happiest of men!
At length with gentle heaviness the pow'r
Of sleep invades their eye-lids, and constrains
Their magnanimity and zeal to rest:
When sliding down the hemisphere, the moon
Immers'd in midnight shade her silver head.

BOOK, II.

THE ARGUMENT.

LEONIDAS on his approach to the Isthmus is met by the leaders of the troops, sent from other

Grecian states, and by the deputies, who composed the Isthmian council. He harangues them; then proceeds in conjunction with these forces towards Thermopylæ. On the first day he is joined by Dithyrambus; on the third he reaches a valley in Locris, where he is entertained by Oileus, the public host, of the Lacedemonian state; and the next morning is accompanied by him in a car to the temple of Pan: he finds Medon there, the son of Oileus, and commander of two thousand Locrians, already posted at Thermopylæ, and by him is informed, that the army of Xerxes is in sight of the pass.

AURORA spreads her purple beams around,
When mov'd the Spartans. Their approach is known.

The Isthmian council, and the diff'rent chiefs,
Who lead th' auxiliary bands, advance to meet
Leonidas; Eupalamus the strong,
Alcæmon, Clonius, Diophantus brave
With Hegesander. At their head is scen
Aristobulus, whom Mycæ's ranks
Obey Mycæ once august in pow'r,
In splendid wealth, and vaunting still the name
Of Agamemnon. To Laconia's king
The chieftain spake. Leonidas, survey
Mycæ's race. Should ev'ry other Greek
Be aw'd by Xerxes, and his eastern host,
Believe not, we can fear, deriv'd from those,
Who once conducted o'er the foaming surge
The strength of Greece; who desert left the fields
Of ravag'd Asia, and her proudest walls
From their foundations level'd to the ground.

Leonidas replies not, but his voice
Directs to all. Illustrious warriors, hail!
Who thus undaunted signalize your faith,
Your gen'rous ardour in the common cause.
But you, whose counsels prop the Grecian state,
O venerable synod, who consign
To our protecting sword, the gate of Greece,
Thrice hail! Whate'er by valour we obtain,
Your wisdom must preserve. With piercing eyes
Contemplate ev'ry city, and discern
Their various tempers. Some with partial care
To guard their own neglect the public weal.
Unmov'd and cold are others. Terror here,
Corruption there presides. O fire the brave
To gen'ral efforts in the gen'ral cause.
Confirm the wav'ring. Animate the cold,
The timid. Watch the faithless. Some betray Themselves and Greece. Their perfidy prevent,
Or call them back to honour. Let us all
Be link'd in sacred union, and this land
May face the world's whole multitude in arms.
If for the spoil, by Paris borne to Troy,
A thousand keels the Hellepont o'erspread;
Shall not again confederated Greece
Be rous'd to battle, and to freedom give
What once she gave to fame? Behold, we haste
To stop th' invading tyrant. Till we fall,
He shall not pour his myriads on your plains.
But as the gods conceal, how long our strength
May stand unvanquish'd, or how soon may yield;
Waste not a moment, till consenting Greece
Range all her free-born numbers in the field.

Leonidas concluded. Awful stepp'd
Before the sage assembly one supreme

And old in office, who address'd the king.

Thy bright example ev'ry heart unites.
From thee her happiest omens Greece derives
Of concord, safety, liberty and fame.
Go then, O first of mortals, go, impress
Amaze and terror on the barb'rous host;
The free-born Greeks instructing life to deem Less dear, than honour, and their country's cause.

This heard, Leonidas, thy secret soul,
Exulting; taste of the sweet reward
Due to thy name through endless time. Once more

His eyes he turn'd, and view'd in rapt'rous thought
His native land, which he alone can save;
Then summon'd all his majesty, and o'er
The Isthmus trod. The phalanx moves behind
In deep arrangement. So th' imperial ship
With stately bulk along the heaving tide
In military pomp conducts the pow'r
Of some proud navy, bounding from the port
To bear the vengeance of a mighty state
Against a tyrant's walls. Till sultry noon
They march; when halting, as they take repast,
Across the plain before them they desery
A troop of Thespians. One above the rest
In eminence precedes. His glitt'ring shield,
Whose gold-embazon'd orb collects the beams,
Cast by meridian Phœbus from his throne,
Flames like another sun. A snowy plume,
With wanton curls disporting in the breeze,
Floats o'er his dazzling casque. On nearer view
Beneath the radiant honours of his crest
A countenance of youth in rosy prime,
And manly sweetness won the fix'd regard
Of each beholder. With a modest grace
He came respectful tow'rd the king, and show'd,
That all ideas of his own desert
Were sunk in veneration. So the god
Of night salutes his empyreal fire;
When from his altar in th' embow'ring grove
Of balmy Delos, or the hallow'd bound
Of Tenedos, or Claros, where he hears
In hymns his praises from the sons of men,
He reascends the high, Olympian seats:
Such reverential homage on his brow,
O'er shading, softens his effulgent bloom
With loveliness and grace. The king receives
Th' illustrious Thespian thus. My willing tongue
Would style thee Dithyrambus. Thou dost bear,
All in thy aspect to become that name,
Renown'd for worth and valour. O reveal
Thy birth, thy charge. Whoe'er thou art, my soul
Desires to know thee, and would call thee friend.

To him the youth. O bulwark of our weal,
My name is Dithyrambus; which the lips
Of some benevolent, some gen'rous friend
To thee have founded in a partial strain,
And thou hast heard with favour. In thy fight
I stand, deputed by the Thespian chief,
The Theban, Locrian, by the fam'd in war,
Diomedon, to hasten thy approach.
Three days will bring the hostile pow'rs in view.

He said. The ready standards are uprear'd.
By zeal enforce'd, till ev'ning shadows fall,
The march continues, then by day-spring sweeps
The earliest dews. The van, by Agis led,
Displays the grisly face of battle rough
With spears, obliquely trail'd in dreadful length

Along th' indented way. Beside him march'd
His gallant Thespian host. The centre boasts Leonidas the leader, who retains
The good Megistias near him. In the rear
Dienece commanded, who in charge
That Menalippus, offspring of his friend,
For these instructions. Let thine eye, young man,
Dwell on the order of our varying march;
As champain, valley, mountain, or desile
Require a change. The eastern tyrant thus Conducts not his Barbarians like the sands
In number. Yet the discipline of Greece
They will encounter feeble, as the sands,
Dash'd on a rock, and scatter'd in their fall.

To him th' inquiring youth. The martial tread,
The flute's slow warble, both in just accord,
Entrance my senses; but let wonder ask,
Why is that tender vehicle of sound
Prefer'd in war by Sparta? Other Greeks
To more sonorous music rush in fight.

Son of my friend, Dienece rejoins,
Well dost thou note. I praise thee. Sparta's law
With human passions, source of human woes,
Maintains perpetual strife. She sternly curbs
Our infant hearts, till passion yields its seat
To principle and order. Music too,
By Spartans lov'd, is temper'd by the law;
Still to her plan subservient melts in notes,
Which cool and sooth, not irritate and warm.
Thus by habitual abstinence, apply'd
To ev'ry sense, suppressing nature's fire,
By modes of duty, not by ardour sway'd,
O'er each impetuous enemy abroad,
At home o'er vice and pleasure we prevail.

O might I merit a Laconian name!
The Acarnanian answer'd. But explain,
What is the land we traverse? What the hill,
Whose parted summit in a spacious void
Admits a bed of clouds? And gracious tell,
Whose are those suits of armour which I see
Borne by two Helots? At the questions pleas'd,
Dienece continues. Those belong
To Alpheus and his brother. Light of foot
They, disencumber'd, all at large precede
This pond'rous band. They guide a troop of slaves,

Our missile-weapon'd Helots, to observe,
Provide, forewarn, and obstacles remove.
This tract is Phocis. That divided hill
Is fam'd Parnassus. Thence the voice divine
Was sent by Phœbus, summoning to death
The king of Sparta. From his fruitful blood
A crop will spring of victory to Greece.

And these three hundred high in birth and rank,
All citizens of Sparta . . . cries the youth,
They all must bleed, Dienece subjoins,
All with their leader. So the law decrees.

To him with earnest looks the gen'rous youth,
Wilt thou not place me in that glorious hour
Close to thy buckler? Gratitude will brace
Thy pupil's arm to manifest the force
Of thy instruction. Menalippus, no,
Return'd the chief. Not thou of Spartan breed,
Nor call'd to perish. Thou unwedded too
Would'st leave no race behind thee. Live to praise,
Live to enjoy our salutary fall,
Reply is needless. See, the sun descends.
The army halts. I trust thee with a charge,

Son of Megistias. In my name command
Th' attendant Helots to erect our camp.
We pitch our tents in Locris. Quick the youth
His charge accomplish'd. From a gen'rous meal,
Where at the call of Alpheus, Locris show'r'd
Her Amalthean plenty on her friends,
The fated warriors soon in slumber lose
The memory of toil. His watchful round
Dienece with Menalippus takes.

The moon rode high and clear. Her light benign
To their pleas'd eyes a rural dwelling show'd,
All unador'd, but seemly. Either side
Was fenc'd by trees high-shadowing. The front
Look'd on a crystal pool, by feather'd tribes
At ev'ry dawn frequented. From the springs
A small redundancy fed a shallow brook,
O'er smoothest pebbles rippling just to wake,
Not furtle silence, and the ear of night
Entice to listen undisturb'd. Around
The grafs was cover'd by reposing sheep,
Whole drowsy guard no longer bay'd the moon.

The warriors stopp'd, contemplating the feat
Of rural quiet. Suddenly a swain
Steps forth. His fingers touch the breathing reed.
Uprife the fleecy train. Each faithful dog
Isrous'd. All heedful of the wonted sound
Their known conductor follow. Slow behind
Th' observing warriors move. Ere long they reach
A broad and verdant circle, thick enclos'd
With birches straight and tall, whose glossy rind
Is clad in silver from Diana's car.
The ground was holy, and the central spot
An altar bore to Pan. Beyond the orb
Of freening trees th' external circuit swarm'd
With sheep and bees, each neighb'ring hamlet's wealth

Collected. Thither soon the swain arriv'd,
Whom, by the name of Melibœus hail'd,
A peasant throng surrounded. As their chief,
He nigh the altar to his rural friends
Address'd these words: O sent from diff'rent lords
With contribution to the public wants,
Time presses. God of peasants, bless our course!
Speed to the slow-pac'd ox, for once impart!
That o'er these valleys, cool'd by dewy night,
We to our fummons true, ere noon-tide blaze
May join Oilæus, and his praise obtain.

He ceas'd. To rustic madrigals and pipes,
Combin'd with bleating notes and tinkling bells,
With clamour shrill from busy tongues of dogs,
Or hollow-sounding from the deep-mouth'd ox,
Along the valley herd and flock are driv'n
Successive, halting oft to harmless spoil
Of flow'rs and herbage, springing in their fight.
While Melibœus marshall'd with address
The inoffensive host, unseen in shades
Dienece applauded, and the youth
Of Menalippus caution'd. Let no word
Impede the careful peasant. On his charge
Depends our welfare. Diligent and staid
He suits his godlike master. Thou wilt see
That righteous hero soon. Now sleep demands
Our debt to nature. On a carpet dry
Of moss beneath a wholesome beech they lay,
Arm'd as they were. Their slumber short retires
With night's last shadow. At their warning rous'd,
The troops proceed. Th' admiring eye of youth
In Menalippus caught the morning rays

To guide its travel o'er the landscape wide
Of cultivated hillocks, dales and lawns,
Where mansions, hamlets interpos'd; where domes
Rose to their gods through consecrated shades.
He then exclaims. O say, can Jove devote
These fields to ravage, those abodes to flames?

The Spartan answers: Ravage, sword and fire
Must be endur'd as incidental ills.
Suffice it, these invaders, soon or late,
Will leave this soil more fertile by their blood
With spoils abundant to rebuild the fane.
Precarious benefits are these, thou see'st
So fram'd by heav'n; but virtue is a good
No foe can spoil, and lasting to the grave.

Befide the public way an oval fount
Of marble sparkled with a silver spray
Of falling rills, collected from above.
The army halted, and their hollow casques
Dipp'd in the limpid stream. Behind it rose
An edifice, compos'd of native roots,
And oaken trunks of knotted girth unwrought.
Within were beds of moss. Old, batter'd arms
Hung from the roof. The curious chiefs approach'd
These words, engraven on a tablet rude,
Megistias reads; the rest in silence hear.
"Yon marble fountain, by Oilæus plac'd,
"To thirsty lips in living water flows;
"For weary steps he fram'd this cool retreat;
"A grateful off'ring here to rural peace,
"His dinted shield, his helmet he resign'd.
"O passenger, if born to noble deeds,
"Thou would'st obtain perpetual grace from Jove,
"Devote thy vigour to heroic toils,
"And thy decline to hospitable cares.
"Rest here; then seek Oilæus in his vale."

O Jove, burst forth Leonidas, thy grace
Is large and various. Length of days and bliss
To him thou giv'st, to me a shorten'd term,
Nor yet less happy. Grateful we confess
Thy diff'rent bounties, measur'd full to both.
Come let us seek Oilæus in his vale.

The word is giv'n. The heavy phalanx moves.
The light-pac'd Helots, long ere morning dawn'd,
Had recommenc'd their progress. They o'ertook
Blithe Melibœus in a spacious vale,
The fruitfulest in Locris, ere the sun
Shot forth his noon-tide beams. On either side
A surface scarce perceptibly ascends.
Luxuriant vegetation crowds the soil
With trees close-rang'd and mingling. Rich the loads

Of native fruitage to the sight reveal
Their vig'rous nurture. There the flushing peach,
The apple, citron, almond, pear and date,
Pomegranates, purple mulberry, and fig
From interlacing branches mix their hues
And scents, the passenger's delight; but leave
In the mid-vale a pasture long and large,
Exuberant in vivid verdure cropp'd
By herds, by flocks innum'rous. Neighb'ring knolls
Are speckled o'er with cots, whose humble roofs
To herdsmen, shepherds, and laborious hinds
Once yielded rest unbroken, till the name
Of Xerxes shook their quiet. Yet this day
Was festive. Swains and damsels, youth and age,
From toil, from home enlarg'd, disporting, fill'd
Th' enliven'd meadow. Under evy shade
A hoary mintrel fat; the maidens danc'd;

Flocks bleated; oxen low'd; the horses neigh'd;
 With joy the vale resounded; terror fled;
 Leonidas was nigh. The welcome news
 By Melibœus, haſt'ning to his lord,
 Was loudly told. The Helots too appear'd.
 While with his brother Alpheus thus diſcourſ'd.
 In this fair valley old Oilens dwells,
 The firſt of Locrians, of Laconia's ſtate.
 The public hoſt. Yon large pavilions mark.
 They promiſe welcome. Thither let us bend,
 There tell our charge. This ſaid, they both advance.

A hoary band receives them. One, who ſeem'd
 In rank, in age ſuperior, wav'd his hand
 To Melibœus, ſtanding near, and ſpoke.

By this my faithful meſſenger I learn,
 That you are friends. Nor yet th' invader's foot
 Hath paſſ'd our confines. Eliſ, o'ercaſt by time,
 My fight would ſcarce diſtinguiſh friend or foe,
 A Grecian or Barbarian. Alpheus then.

We come from Lacedæmon, of our king
 Leonidas forerunners. Is he nigh?

The cordial ſenior tenderly exclaims,
 I am Oilens. Him a beardleſs boy
 I knew in Lacedæmon. Twenty years
 Are ſince elap'd. He ſcarce remembers me.
 But I will feaſt him, as becomes my zeal,
 Him and his army. You, my friends, reſpoſe.

They ſit. He ſtill diſcourſes. Spartan gueſts,
 In me an aged ſoldier you behold.

From Ajax, fam'd in Agamemnon's war,
 Oilcan Ajax flows my vital ſtream,
 Unmix'd with his preſumption. I have borne
 The higheſt functions in the Locrian ſtate,
 Not with diſhonour. Self-diſmiſs'd, my age
 Hath in this valley on my own demerit
 Liv'd tranquil, not recluſe. My comrades theſe,
 Old magiſtrates and warriors like myſelf,
 Relcas'd from public care, with me retir'd
 To rural quiet. Through our laſt remains
 Of time in ſweet garrulity we ſlide,
 Recounting paſt achievements of our prime;
 Nor wanting lib'ral means far lib'ral deeds,
 Here bleſs'd, here bleſſing we reſide. Theſe flocks, Theſe herds and paſtures, theſe our num'rous
 hinds,

And poverty, hence exil'd, may divulge
 Our generous abundance. We can ſpread
 A banquet for an army. By the ſtate
 Once more entreated, we accept a charge,
 To age well-fuited. By our watchful care
 The goddeſs Plenty in your tents ſhall dwell.

He ſcarce had finiſh'd, when the enſigns broad
 Of Lacedæmon's phalanx down the vale
 Were ſeen to wave, unfolding at the ſound
 Of flutes, ſoft warbling in th' expreſſive mood
 Of Dorian ſweetneſs unadorn'd. Around,
 In notes of welcome ev'ry ſhepherd ſound'd
 His ſprightly reed. The damſels ſhow'd their hair,
 Diverſify'd with ſtow'rets. Garlands gay,
 Ruſh-woven baskets, glowing with the dyes
 Of amaranths, of jaſmin, roſes, pinks
 And violets they carry, tripping light
 Before the ſteps of grimly-featur'd Mars
 To blend the ſmiles of Flora with his frown.
 Leonidas they chaunt in ſilvan lays,
 Him the defender of their meads and groves,
 Him more than Pan, a guardian to their flocks.

While Philomela, in her poplar ſhade
 Awaken'd ſtrains her emulating throat,
 And joins with liquid trills the ſwelling ſounds.

Behold Oilens and his ancient train
 Accoſt Laconia's king, whoſe looks and words
 Confeſs remembrance of the Locrian chief.

Thrice hail! Oilens, Sparta's noble hoſt.
 Thou art of old acquainted with her ſons,
 Their laws, their manners. Muſical as brave,
 Train'd to delight in ſmooth Terpander's lay,
 In Alcman's Dorian meaſure, we enjoy
 In thy melodious vale th' unlabour'd ſtrains,
 Of rural pipes, to nightingales, around.

Our heart-ſelt gladneſs deems the golden age
 Subſtiting where thou govern'ſt. Still theſe tones
 Of joy continu'd may thy dwelling hear!
 Still may this plenty, unmoleſted, crown
 The favour'd diſtrict! May thy rev'rend duſt
 Have peaceful ſhelter in thy father's tomb!
 Kind heav'n, that merit to my ſword impart!

By joy uplifted, forth Oilens broke.
 Thou doſt recal me then! O ſent to guard Theſe fruits from ſpoil, theſe huary locks from ſhame,

Permit thy weary'd ſoldiers to partake
 Of Locrian plenty. Enter thou my tents,
 Thou and thy captains. I ſalute them all.

The hero ſull of dignity and years,
 Once bold in action, plac'd now in eaſe,
 Ev'n by his look, benignly caſt around,
 Gives laſtitude relief. With native grace,
 With heart-eſſus'd complacency the king
 Accepts the lib'ral welcome, while his troops,
 To relaxation and reſt diſmiſs'd,
 Pitch on the wounded green their briftled ſpears:
 Still is the evening. Under cheſnut ſhades
 With interweaving poplars ſpacious ſtands
 A well-fram'd tent. There calm the heroes ſit,
 The genial board enjoy, and feaſt the mind
 In eaſe diſcourſe; which thus Oilens cloſ'd.

Behold, night liſts her ſignal to invoke
 That friendly god, who owns the drowly wand.
 To Mercury this laſt libation flows.

Farewell till morn. They ſeparate, they ſleep
 All but Oilens, who forſakes the tent.

On Melibœus, in theſe words he calls.
 Approach my faithful friend. To him the ſwain.
 Thy bondman hears thy call. The chief replies;
 Loud for the gath'ring peaſantry to heed.

Come, Melibœus, it is ſurely time,
 That my repeated gift, the name of friend
 Thou ſhouldeſt accept. The name of bondman wounds

My ear. Be free. No longer, beſt of men,
 Rejeſt that boon, nor let my feeble head,
 To thee a debtor, as to gracious heaven,
 Deſcend and ſleep unthankful in the grave:
 Though yielding nature daily feels decay;
 Thou doſt prevent all care. The gods eſtrange.
 Pain from my pillow, have ſecur'd my breaſt
 From weeds too oft in aged ſoil proſufe,
 From ſelf-tormenting petulance and pride,
 From jealousy and envy at the ſame
 Of younger men. Leonidas will dim
 My former luſtre, as that ſilver orb
 Outſhines the meaneſt ſtar; and I rejoice.
 O Melibœus, theſe elect of Jove

To certain death advance. Immortal powers!
 How social, how endearing is their speech!
 How flow in lib'ral cheerfulness their hearts!
 To such a period verging men like these Age well may envy, and that envy take
 The genuine shape of virtue. Let their span
 Of earthly being, while it lasts, contain
 Each earthly joy. Till blest'd Elysium spread
 Her ever-blooming, inexhausted stores
 To their glad sight, be mine the grateful task
 To drain my plenty. From the vaulted caves
 Our vessels large of well-fermented wine,
 From all our gran'ries lift the treasure'd corn.
 Go, load the groaning axles. Nor forget
 With garments new to greet Melissa's nymphs.
 To her a triple change of vestments bear
 With twenty lambs, and twenty speckled kids.
 Be it your care, my peasants, some to aid
 Him your director, others to select
 Five hundred oxen, thrice a thousand sheep,
 Of lusty swains a thousand. Let the morn,
 When first she bluffs, see my will perform'd.

They heard. Their lord's injunctions to fulfil
 Was their ambition. He, unretting, mounts
 A ready car. The couriers had enroll'd
 His name in Isthmian and Nemean games.
 By moonlight, floating on the splendid reins,
 He o'er the busy vale intent is borne
 From place to place, o'erlooks, directs, forgets
 That he is old. Meantime the shades of night,
 Retiring, wake Dienece. He gives
 The word. His pupil seconds. Ev'ry hand
 Is arm'd. Day opens. Sparta's king appears.
 Oilcus greets him. In his radiant car
 The senior stays reluctant; but his guest
 So wills in Spartan reverence to age.
 Then spake the Locrian. To assist thy camp
 A chosen band of peasants I detach.
 I trust thy valour. Doubt not thou my care,
 Nor doubt that swain. Oilcus, speaking, look'd
 On Melibœus. Skillful he commands
 These hinds. Him wife, him faithful I have prov'd

More than Eumæus to Laertes' son.
 To him th' Oetæan woods, their devious tracks
 Are known, each rill and fountain. Near the pass

Two thousand Locrians wilt thou find encamp'd,
 My eldest born their leader, Medon nam'd,
 Well exercis'd in arms. My daughter dwells
 On Oeta. Sage Melissa she is call'd,
 Enlighten'd priestess of the tuneful nine.
 She haply may accost thee. Thou wilt lend
 An ear. Not fruitless are Melissa's words.
 Now, servants, bring the sacred wine. Obey'd,
 He, from his seat uprising, thus proceeds:

Lo! from this chalice a libation pure
 To Mars, to Grecian liberty and laws,
 To their protector, eleutherian Jove,
 To his nine daughters, who record the brave,
 To thy renown, Leonidas, I pour;
 And take an old man's benediction too.

He stopp'd. Affection, struggling in his heart,
 Burst forth again. Illustrious guest, afford
 Another hour. That slender space of time
 Yield to my sole possession. While the troops,
 Already glitt'ring down the dewy vale,

File through its narrow'd outlet; near my side
 Deign to be carry'd, and my talk endure.

The king, well pleas'd, ascends. Slow move the steeds

Behind the rear. Oilcus grasps his hand,
 Then in the fulness of his soul pursues.

Thy veneration for Laconia's laws
 That I may strengthen, may to rapture warm,
 Hear me display the melancholy fruits
 Of lawless will. When o'er the Lydian plains
 Th' innumerable tents of Xerxes spread,
 His vassal, Pythius, who in affluent means
 Surpasses me, as that Barbarian prince
 Thou dost in virtue, entertain'd the host,
 And proffer'd all his treasures. These the king
 Refusing, ev'n augmented from his own.
 An act of fancy, not habitual grace,
 A sparkling vapour through the regal gloom
 Of cruelty and pride. He now prepar'd
 To march from Sardis, when with humble tears
 The good old man besought him. Let the king
 Propitious hear a parent. In thy train
 I have five sons. Ah! leave my eldest born,
 Thy future vassal, to sustain my age!

The tyrant fell reply'd: Presumptuous man,
 Who art my slave, in this tremendous war,
 Is not my person hazarded, my race,
 My comfort? Former merit saves from death
 Four of thy offspring. Him, so dearly priz'd,
 Thy folly hath destroy'd. His body'st'raight
 Was hewn astunder. By the public way
 On either side a bleeding half was cast,
 And millions pass'd between. O Spartan king,
 Taught to revere the sanctity of laws,
 The acts of Xerxes with thine own compare,
 His fame with thine. The curies of mankind
 Give him renown. He marches to destroy,
 But thou to save. Behold the trees are bent,
 Each eminence is loaded thick with crowds,
 From cots, from ev'ry hamlet pour'd abroad,
 To bless thy steps, to celebrate thy praise.

Oft times the king his decent brow inclin'd,
 Mute and obsequious to an elder's voice,
 Which through th' instructed ear, unceasing flow'd
 In eloquence and knowledge. Scarce an hour
 Was fled. The narrow dale was left behind.
 A causeway broad disclos'd an ancient pile
 Of military fame. A trophy large,
 Compact with crested morions, targets rude,
 With spears and corsets, dimn'd by eating
 age,

Stood near a lake pellucid, smooth, profound,
 Of circular expanse, whose bosom show'd
 A green-slop'd island, figur'd o'er with flow'rs,
 And from its centre lifting high to view
 A marble chapel, on the massy strength
 Of Doric columns rais'd. A full wrought freeze
 Display'd the sculptor's art. In solemn pomp
 Of obelisks and buits, and story'd urns
 Sepulchral mansions of illustrious dead
 Were scatter'd round, o'ercaust with shadows black
 Of yew and cypress. In a serious note
 Oilcus, pointing, opens new discourse.

Beneath you turf my ancestors repose.
 Oilean Ajax singly was depriv'd
 Of imm'ral honours there. With impious lust
 He stain'd Minerva's temple. From the gulf

Of briny waters by their god preserv'd,
That god he brav'd. He lies beneath a rock,
By Neptune's trident in his wrath o'erturn'd.
Shut from Elysium for a hundred years,
The hero's ghost bewail'd his oozy tomb.
A race more pious on the Oilean house
Felicity have drawn. To ev'ry god
I owe my bliss, my early fame to Pan.
Once on the margin of that silent pool
In their nocturnal camp Barbarians lay,
Awaiting morn to violate the dead.
My youth was fir'd. I summon'd from their cots
A rustic host. We sacrific'd to Pan,
Assail'd th' unguarded ruffians in his name.
He with his terrors smote their yielding hearts.
Not one surviv'd the fury of our swains.
Rich was the pillage. Hence that trophy rose;
Of costly blocks constructed, hence that fane,
Inscrib'd to Pan th' armpotent. O king,
Be to an old man's vanity benign.
This frowning emblem of terrific war
Proclaims the ardour and exploits of youth.
This to Barbarian strangers, ent'ring Greece,
Shows what I was. The marble fount thou saw'st,

Of living water, whose transparent flow
Reliev'd thy march in yester sultry sun,
The cell, which offer'd rest on beds of moss
Show what I am, to Grecian neighbour's show
The hospitality of age. O age,
Where are thy graces, but in lib'ral deeds,
In bland deportment? Would thy furrow'd cheeks

Lose the deformity of time? Let smiles
Dwell in thy wrinkles. Then, rever'd by youth,
Thy feeble steps will find—Abruptly here
He paus'd. A manly warrior full in sight
Beside the trophy on his target lean'd,
Unknown to Sparta's leader, who address'd
His rev'rend host. Thou pausest. Let me ask,
Whom do I see, resembling in his form
A demigod? In transport then the sage.

It is my son, discover'd by his shield,
Thy brave auxiliar Medon. He sustains
My ancient honours in his native state,
Which kindly chose my offspring to replace
Their long-sequester'd chief. Heart-winning guest!

My life, a tide of joy, which never knew
A painful ebb, beyond its wonted mark
Flows in thy converse. Could a wish prevail,
My long and happy course should finish here.

The chariot rested. Medon now approach'd,
Saluting thus Leonidas: O King
Of warlike Sparta, Xerxes' host in sight
Begin to spread their multitude, and fill
The spacious Malian plain. The king replies:

Accept, illustrious messenger, my thanks.
With such a brave assistant, as the son
Of great Oileus, more assur'd I go
To face those numbers. With this godlike friend
The father, now dismounting from his car,
Embraces Medon. In a sliding bark
They all are waded to the island fane,
Erected by Oileus, and enrich'd
With his engrav'd achievements. Thence the eye

Of Sparta's gen'ral in extensive scope
Contemplates each battalion, as they wind
Along the pool; whose limpid face reflects
Their weapons, glitt'ning in the early sun.
Them he to Pan armpotent commends,
His favour thus invoking. God, whose pow'r
By rumour vain, or echo's empty voice
Can sink the valiant in defponding fear,
Can difarray whole armies, smile on these,
Thy worshippers. Thy own Arcadians guard.
Through thee Oileus triumph'd. On his son,
On me look down. Our shields auxiliar join
Against profane Barbarians, who insult
The Grecian gods, and meditate the fall
Of this thy shrine. He said, and now intent
To leave the island, on Oileus call'd.

He, Medon answer'd, by his joy and zeal
Too high transported, and discoursing long,
Felt on his drowsy lids a balmy down
Of heaviness descending. He, unmark'd
Amid thy pious commerce with the god,
Was silently remov'd. The good old chief
On carpets, rais'd by tender menial hands,
Calm in the secret sanctuary is laid.

His hast'ning step Leonidas restrains,
Thus fervent prays: O Maia's son, best pleas'd,
When calling slumber to a virtuous eye,
Watch o'er my venerable friend. Thy balm
He wants, exhausted by his love to me.
Sweet sleep, thou soft'nest that intruding pang,
Which gen'rous breaths for parting must admit.
He said, embark'd, relanded. To his side
Inviting Medon, he rejoin'd the host.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

LEONIDAS arrives at Thermopylæ about noon on the fourth day of his departure from the Isthmus. He is received by Demophilus, the commander of Theſpia, and by Anaxander the Theban, treacherously recommending Epialtes, a Malian, who seeks, by a pompous description of the Persian power, to intimidate the Grecian leaders, as they are viewing the enemy's camp from the top of mount Oeta. He is answered by Dienece and Diomedon. Xerxes sends Tygranes and Phraortes to the Grecian camp, who are dismissed by Leonidas, and conducted back by Dithyrambus and Diomedon; which last, incensed at the arrogance of Tygranes, treats him with contempt and menaces. This occasions a challenge to single combat between Diomedon and Tygranes, Dithyrambus and Phraortes. Epialtes after a conference with Anaxander declares his intention of returning to Xerxes. Leonidas dispatches Agis with Melibœus, a faithful slave of Oileus, and high in the estimation of his lord, to view a body of Phocians, who had been posted at a distance from Thermopylæ for the defence of another pass in mount Oeta.

Now in the van Leonidas appears,
With Medon still conferring. Hast thou heard,
He said, among th' innumerable foes [trust
What chiefs are most distinguish'd? Might we
To fame, reply'd the Locrian, Xerxes boasts
His ablest, bravest counsellor and chief
In Artemisia, Caria's matchless queen.
To old Darius benefits had bound

Her lord, herself to Xerxes. Not compell'd,
 Except by magnanimity, she leads
 The best appointed squadron in his fleet.
 No female softness Artemisia knows,
 But in maternal love. Her widow'd hand
 With equity and firmness for her son
 Administers the sway. Of Doric race
 She still retains the spirit, which from Greece
 Her ancestors transplanted. Other chiefs
 Are all Barbarians, little known to fame,
 Save one, whom Sparta hath herself supply'd,
 Not less than Demaratus, once her king,
 An exile now. Leonidas rejoins.

Son of Oileus, like thy father wife,
 Like him partake my confidence. Thy words
 Recall an era, sadd'ning all my thoughts.
 That injur'd Spartan shar'd the regal sway
 With one—Alas! my brother, eldest born,
 Unblest'd by nature, favour'd by no god,
 Cleomenes. Infanity of mind,
 Malignant passions, impious acts deform'd
 A life, concluded by his own fell hand.
 Against his colleague envious he suborn'd
 Leutychides. Him perjury and fraud
 Plac'd on the seat, by Demaratus held
 Unstain'd in lustre. Here Oileus's son.

My future service only can repay
 Thy confidential friendship. Let us close
 The gloomy theme. Thermopylæ is nigh.
 Each face in transport glows. Now Oeta rear'd
 His tow'ring forehead. With impatient steps
 Our rush'd the phalanx, sounding pæans high;
 As if the present deity of fame
 Had from the summit shown her dazzling form,
 With wreaths unfading on her temples bound,
 Her adamant trumpet in her hand
 To celebrate their valour. From the van
 Leonidas advances like the sun,
 When through dividing clouds his presence stays
 Their sweeping rack, and stills the clam'rous wind.

The army silent halt. Their ensigns fan
 The air no longer. Motionless their spears.
 His eye reveals the ardour of his soul,
 Which thus finds utterance from his eager lips.
 All hail! Thermopylæ, and you, the pow'rs,
 Presiding here. All hail! ye sylvan gods,
 Ye fountain nymphs, who send your lucid rills
 In broken murmurs down the rugged steep.
 Receive us, O benignant, and support
 The cause of Greece. Conceal the secret paths,
 Which o'er these crags, and through their forests
 wind,

Untrod by human feet, and trac'd alone.
 By your immortal footsteps. O defend
 Your own recesses, nor let impious war
 Profane the solemn silence of your groves.
 Then on your hills your praises shall you hear
 From those, whose deeds shall tell th' approving world,

That not to undeservers did ye grant
 Your high protection. You, my valiant friends,
 Now rouse the gen'rous spirit, which inflames
 Your hearts; exert the vigour of your arms.
 That in the bosoms of the brave and free
 Your memorable actions may survive;
 May sound delightful in the ear of time,
 Long, as blue Neptune beats the Malian strand,

Or those tall cliffs erect their saggy tops
 So near to heav'n, your monuments of fame.
 As in some torrid region, where the head
 Of Ceres bends beneath her golden load;
 If from a burning brand a scatter'd spark
 Invade the parching ground; a sudden blaze Sweeps o'er the crackling champagne: through his host

Not with less swiftness to the furthest ranks
 The words of great Leonidas diffus'd
 A more than mortal fervour. Ev'ry heart
 Distends with thoughts of glory, such as raise
 The patriot's virtue, and the soldier's fire;
 When danger most tremendous in his form
 Seems in their fight most lovely. On their minds Imagination pictures all the scenes
 Of war, the purple field, the heaps of death,
 The glitt'ring trophy, pil'd with Persian arms.

But lo! the Grecian leaders, who before
 Were station'd near Thermopylæ, salute
 Laconia's king. The Thespian chief, ally'd
 To Dithyrambus, first the silence breaks,
 An ancient warrior. From behind his casque,
 Whose crested weight his aged temples bore,
 The slender hairs, all-silver'd o'er by time,
 Flow'd venerable down. He thus began:

Joy now shall crown the period of my days;
 And whether nigh my father's urn I sleep;
 Or, slain by Persia's sword, embrace the earth,
 Our common parent; be it as the gods
 Shall best determine. For the present hour
 I bless their bounty, which hath giv'n my age
 To see the brave Leonidas, and bid
 That hero welcome on this glorious shore,
 To fix the basis of the Grecian weal.

Here too the crafty Anaxander spake.
 Of all the Thebans, we, rejoicing, hail
 The king of Sparta. We obey'd his call.
 O may oblivion o'er the shame of Thebes
 A dark'ning veil extend! or those alone
 By fame be curs'd, whose impious counsels turn
 Their countrymen from virtue! Thebes was sunk,
 Her glory bury'd in dishonest sloth.
 To wake her languor gen'rous Alpheus came,
 The messenger of freedom. O accept
 Our grateful hearts, thou, Alpheus, art the cause,
 That Anaxander from his native gates
 Not single joins this host, nor tamely these,
 My chosen friends behind their walls remain.
 Enough of words. Time presses. Mount, ye chiefs,
 This loftiest part of Oeta. This o'erlooks
 The freights, and far beyond their northern mouth

Extends our fight across the Malian plain.
 Behold a native, Epialtes call'd,
 Who with the foe from Thracia's bounds hath march'd.

Disguis'd in seeming worth, he ended here.
 The camp not long had Epialtes reach'd,
 By race a Malian. Eloquent his tongue,
 His heart was false and abject. He was skill'd
 To grace perfidious counsels, and to clothe
 In swelling phrase the baseness of his soul,
 Foul nurse of treasons. To the tents of Greece,
 Himself a Greek, a faithless spy he came.
 Soon to the friends of Xerxes he repair'd.
 The Theban chiefs, and nightly councils held
 How to betray the Spartans, or deject

By conternation. Up the arduous slope
 With him each leader to the summit climbs.
 Thence a tremendous prospect they command,
 Where endless plains, by white pavilions hid,
 Spread like the vast Atlantic, when no shore,
 No rock, no promontory stops the sight,
 Unbounded, as it wanders; while the moon,
 Resplendent eye of night, in fullest orb
 Surveys th' interminate expanse, and throws
 Her rays abroad to deck in snowy light
 The dancing billows. Such was Xerxes' camp;
 A pow'r unrivall'd by the mightiest king,
 Or fiercest conqueror, whose blood-thirsty pride,
 Dissolving all the sacred ties which bind
 The happiness of nations, hath upcall'd
 The sleeping fury, Discord, from her den.
 Not from the hundred brazen gates of Thebes,
 The tow'rs of Memphis, and those pregnant fields,
 Enrich'd by kindly Nile; such armies swarm'd
 Around Sesostris; who with trophies fill'd
 The vanquish'd east, who o'er the rapid foam
 Of distant Tanais, o'er the surface broad
 Of Ganges sent his formidable name.
 Nor yet in Asia's far extended bounds
 E'er met such numbers, not when Ninus led
 Th' Assyrian race to conquest. Not the gates
 Of Babylon along Euphrates pour'd
 Such myriads arm'd; when, emptying all her streets,

The rage of dire Semiramis they bore
 Beyond the Indus; there defeated, left
 His blood-stain'd current turbid with their dead.
 ' Yet of the chiefs, contemplating this scene,
 Not one is shaken. Undismay'd they stand;
 Th' immeasurable camp with fearless eyes
 They traverse: while in meditation near
 The treacherous Malian waits, collecting all
 His pomp of words to paint the hostile pow'r;
 Nor yet with falsehood arms his fraudulent tongue
 To scign a tale of terror. Truth herself
 Beyond the reach of fiction to enhance
 Now aids his treason, and with cold dismay
 Might pierce the boldest heart, unless secur'd
 By dauntless virtue, which disdains to live,
 From liberty divorc'd. Requested soon,
 He breaks his artful silence. Greeks and friends,
 Can I behold my native Malian fields;
 Presenting hostile millions to your sight,
 And not in grief suppress the horrid tale,
 Which you exact from these ill-omen'd lips.
 On Thracia's sea-beat verge I watch'd the foes;
 Where, joining Europe to the Asian strand,
 A mighty bridge restrain'd th' outrageous waves,
 And stemm'd th' impetuous current: while in arms

The universal progeny of men
 Seem'd trampling o'er the subjugated flood
 By thousands, by ten thousands. Persians, Medes,
 Assyrians, Saces, Indians, swarthy files
 From Ethiopia, Egypt's tawny sons,
 Arabians, Bactrians, Parthians, all the strength
 Of Asia, and of Libya. Neptune groan'd
 Beneath their number, and indignant heav'd
 His neck against th' incumbent weight. In vain
 The violence of Eurus and the north,
 With rage combin'd, against th' unyielding pile
 Dash'd half the Hellespont. The eastern world
 Sev'n days and nights uninterrupted pass

VOL. XI.

To cover Thracia's regions. They accept
 A Persian lord. They range their hardy race
 Beneath his standards. Macedonia's youth,
 The brave Thessalian horse with ev'ry Greek,
 Who dwells beyond Thermopylae, attend,
 Assist a foreign tyrant. Sire of gods,
 Who in a moment by thy will supreme
 Canst quell the mighty in their proudest hopes,
 Canst raise the weak to safety, Oh! impart
 Thy instant succour! Interpose thy arm!
 With lightning blast their standards! Oh! confound
 With triple-bolted thunder Asta's tents,
 Whence rushing millions by the mora will pour
 An inundation to o'erwhelm the Greeks.
 Resistance else were vain against a host,
 Which ever spreads Thessalia. Far beyond
 That Malian champain, stretching wide below,
 Beyond the utmost measure of the sight
 From this aspiring cliff, the hostile camp
 Contains yet mightier numbers; who have drain'd
 The beds of ceptuous rivers with their thirst,
 Who with their arrows hide the mid-day sun.

Then we shall give them battle in the shade,
 Diances reply'd. Not calmly thus.
 Dionædon. On Persia's camp he bent [o'er,
 His low'ring brow, which frowns had furrow'd
 Then fierce exclaim'd. Bellona, turn and view
 With joyful eyes that field, the fatal stage,
 By regal madness for thy rage prepar'd
 To exercise its horrors. Whet thy teeth,
 Voracious death, All Asia is thy prey.
 Contagion, famine, and the Grecian sword,
 For thy insatiate hunger will provide Variety of carnage. He concludes;
 While on the host immense his cloudy brow
 Is fix'd disdainful, and their strength defies.

Meantime an eastern herald down the pass
 Was seen, slow-moving tow'rd's the Phocian wall
 From Asia's monarch delegated, came Tigranes and Phraortes. From the hill
 Leonidas conducts th' impatient chiefs.
 By them environ'd, in his tent he sits;
 Where thus Tigranes their attention calls.
 Ambassadors from Persia's king we stand
 Before you, Grecians. To display the pow'r
 Of our great master were a needless task.
 The name of Xerxes, Asia's mighty lord,
 Invincible, exalted on a throne,
 Surpassing human lustre, must have reach'd
 To ev'ry clime, and ev'ry heart impress'd
 With awe, and low submission. Yet I swear
 By you resurgent orb; which flames above,
 The glorious symbol of eternal pow'r,
 This military throng, this show of war
 Well nigh persuade me, you have never heard
 That name, at whose commanding found the banks

Of Indus tremble, and the Caspian wave,
 Th' Egyptian flood, the Hellespontic surge
 Obedient roll. O impotent and rash!
 Whom yet the large beneficence of heav'n;
 And heav'nly Xerxes, merciful and kind,
 Deign to preserve. Resign your arms. Disperse
 All to your cities. There let humblest hands
 With earth and water greet your destin'd lord.
 As through th' extensive grove, whose leafy boughs,
 Entwining, crown some eminence with shade,

The tempests rush sonorous, and between
The crashing branches roar; by fierce disdain,
By indignation, thus the Grecians rous'd,
In loudest clamour close the Persian's speech:
But ev'ry tongue was hush'd, when Sparta's king
This brief reply deliver'd from his feat.

O Persian! when to Xerxes thou return'st,
Say, thou hast told the wonders of his pow'r.
Then say, thou saw'st a slender band of Greece,
Which dares his boasted millions to the field.

He adds no more. Th' ambassadors retire.
Them o'er the limits of the Grecian lines
Diomedon and Theſpia's youth conduct.
In slow solemnity they all proceed,
And sullen silence; but their looks denote Far more than speech could utter. Wrath contracts

The forehead of Diomedon. His teeth
Gnash with impatience of delay'd revenge.
Disdain, which sprung from conscious merit, flush'd

The cheek of Dithyrambus. On the face
Of either Persian arrogance, incens'd
By disappointment, lour'd. The utmost streight
They now attain'd, which open'd to the tents
Of Asia, there discover'd wide to view
Her deep, immense arrangement. Then the heart
Of vain Tigranes, swelling at the sight,
Thus overflows in loud and haughty phrase.

O Arimanius! origin of ill,
Have we demanded of thy ruthless pow'r
Thus with the curse of madness to afflict
These wretched men? But since thy dreadful ire
To irresistible perdition dooms

The Grecian race, we vainly should oppose.
Be thy dire will accomplish'd. Let them fall,
Their native soil be fatten'd with their blood.

Enrag'd, the stern Diomedon replies.
Thou base dependent on a lawless king,
Thou purple slave, thou boaster, dost thou know,
That I beheld the Marathonian field?
Where, like the Libyan sands before the wind,
Your host was scatter'd by Athenian spears;
Where thou, perhaps, by ignominious flight
Didst from this arm protect thy shiv'ring limbs.
O let me find thee in to-morrow's fight!
Along this rocky pavement shalt thou lie,
To dogs a banquet. With uplifted palms
Tigranes then. Omnipotent support
Of scepter'd Xerxes, Horomazes, hear!

To thee his first victorious fruits of war
Thy worshipping devotes, the gory spoils,
Which from this Grecian, by the rising dawn,
In sight of either host my strength shall rend.

At length Phraortes, interposing, spake.
I too would find among the Grecian chiefs
One, who in battle dares abide my lance.

The gallant youth of Theſpia swift reply'd.
Thou look'st on me, O Persian. Worthier far
Thou might have singled from the ranks of Greece,
Not one more willing to essay thy force.
Yes, I will prove before the eye of Mars,
How far the proofs of her meanest chief
Beyond thy vaunts deserves the palm of fame.

This said, the Persians to their king repair,
Back to their camp the Grecians: There they find
Each soldier, poising his extended spear,
His weighty buckler bracing on his arm

In warlike preparation. Through the files
Each leader, moving vigilant, by praise,
By exhortation aids their native warmth.
Alone the Theban Anaxander pin'd,
Who thus apart his Malian friend bespake.
What has thy lofty eloquence avail'd,
Alas! in vain attempting to confound
The Spartan valeur? With redoubled fires,
See, how their bosoms glow. They wish to die;
They wait impatient for th' unequal fight.
Too soon th' insuperable foes will spread
Premisuous havoc round, and Thebans snare
The doom of Spartans. Through the guarded pass
Who will adventure Asia's camp to reach
In our behalf? That Xerxes may be warn'd
To spare his friends amid the gen'ral wreck;
When his high-swoln resentment, like a flood,
Increas'd by stormy show'rs, shall cover Greece
With desolation. Epialtes here.

Whence, Anaxander, this unjust despair?
Is there a path on Oeta's hills unknown
To Epialtes? Over trackless rocks,
Through mazy woods my secret steps can pass.
Farewell. I go. Thy merit shall be told
To Persia's king. Thou only watch the hour;
When wanted most, thy ready succour lend.

Meantime a wary, comprehensive care
To ev'ry part Leonidas extends;
As in the human frame through ev'ry vein,
And artery minute, the ruling heart
Its vital pow'rs disperses. In his tent
The prudent chief of Locris he consults;
He summons Melibæus by the voice
Of Agis. In humility not mean,
By no unseemly ignorance deprest'd,
Th' ingenuous swain, by all th' illustrious house
Of Ajax honour'd, bows before the king,
Who gracious spake. The confidence bestow'd,
The praise by sage Oileus might suffice
To verify thy worth. Myself have watch'd,
Have found thee skilful, active, and discreet.
Thou know'st the region round. With Agis go,
The upper streights, the Phocian camp explore.

O condescension! Melibæus then,
More ornamental to the great, than gems,
A purple robe, or diadem. The king
Accepts my service. Pleasing is my task.
Spare not thy servant. Exercise my zeal.
Oileus will rejoice, and smiling, say,
An humble hand may smooth a hero's path.
He leads the way, while Agis following, spake.
O swain! distinguish'd by a lib'ral mind,
Who were thy parents? Where thy place of birth?
What chance depriv'd thee of a father's house?
Oileus sure thy liberty would grant,
Or Sparta's king solicit for that grace;
When in a station equal to thy worth
Thou may'st be rank'd. The prudent hind began.

In dif'rent stations dif'rent virtues dwell,
All reaping dif'rent benefits. The great
In dignity and honours meet reward
For acts of bounty, and heroic toils.
A servant's merit is obedience, truth,
Fidelity; his recompense content.
Be not offended at my words, O chief!
They, who are free, with envy may behold
This bondman of Oileus. To his trust,
His love exalted, I by nature's pow'r

From his pure model could not fail to mould
 What—thou entitlest lib'ral. Whence I came,
 Or who my parents, is to me unknown.
 In childhood seiz'd by robbers, I was sold.
 They took their price. They hush'd th' atrocious deed.

Dear to Oileus and his race I thrive;
 And whether noble, or ignoble born,
 I am contented, studious of their love
 Alone. Ye sons of Sparta, I admire
 Your acts, your spirit, but confine my own
 To their condition, happy in my lord,
 Himself of men most happy. Agis bland
 Rejoins. O! born with talents to become
 A lot more noble, which, by thee refus'd,
 Thou dost the more deserve. Læonia's king
 Discerns thy merit through its modest veil.
 Consummate prudence in thy words I hear.
 Long may contentment, justly priz'd, be thine.
 But should the state demand thee, I foresee,
 Thou wouldst like others in the field excel,
 Wouldst share in glory. Blithe return'd the swain.

Not ev'ry service is confin'd to arms.
 Thou shalt behold me in my present state
 Not useless. If the charge Oileus gave
 I can accomplish, meriting his praise,
 And thy esteem, my glory will be full.

Both pleas'd in converse, thus pursue their way,
 Where Oeta lifts her summits huge to heav'n
 In rocks abrupt, pyramidal, or tower'd
 Like castles. Sudden from a tufted crag,
 Where goats are browsing, Melibœus hears
 A call of welcome. There his course he stays.

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Tigranes and Phraortes repair to Xerxes, whom they find seated on a throne, surrounded by his Satraps in a magnificent pavilion; while the Magi stand before him, and sing a hymn, containing the religion of Zoroastres. Xerxes, notwithstanding the arguments of his brothers, Hyperanthes and Abrocomes, gives no credit to the ambassadors, who report, that the Grecians are determined to maintain the pass against him; but by the advice of Artemisia, the queen of Caria, ascends his chariot to take a view of the Grecians himself, and commands Demaratus, an exiled king of Sparta, to attend him. He passes through the midst of his army, consisting of many nations, differing in arms, customs and manners. He advances to the entrance of the streights, and, surpris'd at the behaviour of the Spartans, demands the reason of it from Demaratus; which occasions a conversation between them on the mercenary forces of Persia, and the militia of Greece. Demaratus, weeping at the sight of his countrymen, is comforted by Hyperanthes. Xerxes, still incredulous, commands Tigranes and Phraortes to bring the Grecians bound before him the next day, and retires to his pavilion. Artemisia remains behind with her son, and communicates to Hyperanthes her apprehensions of a defeat at Thermopylae. She takes an accurate view of the pass, chooses a convenient place for an ambuscade, and her departure to the Persian camp is surpris'd by a reproof from a woman of an awful appearance on a cliff of mount Oeta.

THE plain beyond Thermopylae is girt
 Half round by mountains, half by Neptune lav'd.
 The arduous ridge is broken deep in clefts,
 Which open channels to pellucid streams
 In rapid flow sonorous. Chief in fame
 Spércheos, boasting once his poplars tall,
 Foams down a stony bed. Throughout the face
 Of this broad champain numberless are pitch'd
 Barbarian tents. Along the winding flood
 To rich Thessalia's confines they extend.
 They fill the vallies, late profusely blest
 In nature's vary'd beauties: Hostile spears
 Now bristle horrid through her languid shrubs.
 Pale die her flowrets under barb'rous feet.
 Embracing ivy from its rock is torn.
 The lawn, dismantled of its verdure, fades,
 The poplar groves, uprooted from the banks,
 Leave desolate the stream. Elaborate domes,
 To heav'n devoted in recesses green,
 Had felt rude force, insensible and blind
 To elegance and art. The statues, busts,
 The figur'd vases, mutilated lie
 With chisell'd columns, their engraven freeze;
 Their architrave and cornice, all disjoint'd.

Yet unpopulated is a part reserv'd
 In this deep vale, a patrimonial spot
 Of Aleuadian princes, who, allies
 To Xerxes, reign'd in Thessaly. There glow
 Inviolate the shrubs. There branch the trees,
 Sons of the forest. Over downy moss
 Smooth walks and fragrant, lucid here and broad;
 There clos'd in myrtle under woodbine roofs,
 Wind to retreats delectable, to grots,
 To silvan structures, bow'rs, and cooling dells,
 Enliven'd all and musical with birds
 Of vocal sweetness, in reluctant plumes
 Innumerable various. Lulling falls
 Of liquid crystal from perennial founts
 Attune their pebbled channels. Here the queen,
 The noble dames of Persia, here the train
 Of royal infants, each with cunuch guards,
 In rich pavilions, dazzling to the sight,
 Possess'd, remote from onset and surprisè,
 A tranquil station. Ariana here,
 Ill-destin'd princess, from Darius sprung,
 Hangs, undelighted, o'er melodious rills
 Her drooping forehead. Love-afflictèd fair!
 All inharmonious are the feather'd choirs
 To her sad ear. From flow'rs, and florid plants
 To her the breezes, wafting fresh perfumes,
 Transmit no pleasure. Sedulous in vain,
 Her tender slaves in harmony, with lutes
 Of soothing sound, their warbled voices blend
 To charm her sadness. This, the precious part
 Of Asia's camp, Artuchus holds in charge,
 A satrap, long experienc'd, who presides
 O'er all the regal palaces. High rank'd,
 Bold, resolute and faithful, he commands
 The whole Spérchean vale. In prospect rise
 The distant navy, dancing on the foam,
 Th' unbounded camp, enveloping the plain,
 With Xerxes' tent, august in structure plac'd
 A central object to attract the eyes.
 Of subject millions: Thither now resort
 Tigranes and Phraortes. Him they find

Enclos'd by princes, by illustrious chiefs,
 The potentates of Asia. Near his side
 Abrocomes and Hyperanthes wait,
 His gallant brothers, with Mazæus brave,
 Pandates, Intaphernes, mighty lords.
 Their scepter'd master from his radiant seat
 Looks down imperious. So the stately tow'r
 Of Belus, mingling its majestic brow
 With heav'n's bright azure, from on high survey'd
 The huge extent of Babylon, with all
 Her sumptuous domes and palaces beneath.
 This day his banners to unfold in Greece
 The monarch's will decides; but first ordains,
 That grateful hymns should celebrate the name
 Of Horomazes: So the Persians call'd
 The world's great author. Rob'd in purest white,
 The Magi rang'd before th' unfolded tent.
 Fire blaz'd beside them. Tow'rd's the sacred flame
 They turn'd, and sent their tuneful praise to heav'n.

From Zoroastres was the song deriv'd,
 Who on the hills of Persia, from his cave,
 By flow'rs environ'd, and melodious founts,
 Which sooth'd the solemn mansion, had reveal'd,
 How Horomazes, radiant source of good,
 Original, immortal, fram'd the globe
 In fruitfulness and beauty: how with stars
 By him the heav'ns were spangled: how the sun,
 Refulgent Mithra, purest spring of light,
 And genial warmth, whence teeming nature
 smiles,

Burst from the east at his creating voice;
 When straight beyond the golden verge of day
 Night show'd the horrors of her distant reign,
 Where black and hateful Arimanius frown'd,
 The author foul of evil: how with shades
 From his dire mansion, he deform'd the works
 Of Horomazes, turn'd to noxious heat
 The solar beam, that foudful earth might parch,
 That streams, exhaling, might forsake their beds,
 Whence pestilence and famine: how the pow'r
 Of Horomazes in the human breast
 Benevolence and equity infus'd,
 Truth, temperance, and wisdom, sprung from
 heav'n:

When Arimanius blacken'd all the soul
 With falsehood and injustice, with desire
 Insatiable, with violence and rage,
 Malignity and folly. If the hand
 Of Horomazes on precarious life
 Sheds wealth and pleasure; swift th' infernal god
 With wild excess, or av'rice, blasts the joy.
 Thou Horomazes, victory dost give.
 By thee with fame the regal head is crown'd.
 Great Xerxes owns thy succour. When in forms
 The hate of direful Arimanius swell'd
 The Hellespont; thou o'er its chafing breast
 The destin'd master of the world didst lead,
 This day his promis'd glories to enjoy:
 When Greece affrighted to his arm shall bend;
 Ev'n as at last shall Arimanius fall
 Before thy might, and evil be no more.

The Magi ceas'd their harmony. Behold,
 From her tall ship, between a double row
 Of naval warriors, while a golden ray
 Shoots from her standard, Artemisia lands.
 In her enrich'd accoutrements of war,
 The full-wrought buckler, and high-crested helm,

In Caria first devis'd, across the beach
 Her tow'ring form advances. So the pine,
 From Taurus hewn mature in spiry pride,
 Now by the sailor in its canvass wings
 Voluminous, and dazzling pendants dress'd,
 On Artemisia's own imperial deck
 Is seen to rise, and overtop the grove.
 Of crowded masts surrounding. In her heart
 Deep scorn of courtly counsellors she bore,
 Who fill with impious vanity their king;
 As when he lash'd the Hellespont with rods,
 Amid the billows cast a golden chain
 To fetter Neptune. Yet her brow severe
 Unbent its rigour often, as the glance
 On her young son, who, pacing near in arms
 Of Carian guise, proportion'd to his years,
 Look'd up, and waken'd by repeated smiles
 Maternal fondness, melting in that eye,
 Which scowl'd on purple flatterers. Her seat
 At the right hand of Xerxes she assumes,
 Invited; while in adoration bow'd
 Tigranes and Phraortes. Prone they lay,
 Across their foreheads spread their servile palms,
 As from a present deity, too bright
 For mortal vision, to conceal their eyes.
 At length in abject phrase Tigranes thus.

O Xerxes, live for ever! Gracious lord,
 Who dost permit thy servants to approach
 Thy awful sight, and prostrate to confess
 Thy majesty and radiance. May the pow'r
 Of Horomazes stretch thy regal arm
 O'er endless nations, from the Indian shores
 To those wide floods, which beat Iberian strands,
 From northern Tanais to the source of Nile!
 Still from thy head may Arimanius bend
 Against thy foes his malice! Yonder Greeks,
 Already smit with frenzy by his wrath,
 Reject thy profer'd clemency. They choose
 To magnify thy glory by their fall.

The monarch, turning to his brothers, spake.
 Say, Hyperanthes, can thy soul believe
 These tidings? Sure these slaves have never dar'd
 To face the Grecians, but delude our ears
 With base impostures, which their fear suggests.

He frown'd, and Hyperanthes calm reply'd.
 O from his servants may the king avert
 His indignation! Greece was fam'd of old
 For martial spirit, and a dauntless breed.
 I once have try'd their valour. To my words
 Abrocomes can witness. When thy fire
 And ours, Darius, to Athenian shores
 With Artaphernes brave, and Datis, sent
 Our tender youth; at Marathon we found
 How weak the hope, that numbers could dismay
 A foe, resolv'd on victory, or death.
 Yet not, as one contemptible, or base,
 Let me appear before thee. Though the Greeks
 With such persisting courage be endur'd,
 Soon as the king shall summon to the field,
 He shall behold me in the dang'rous van
 Exalt my spear, and pierce the hostile ranks,
 Or sink beneath them. Xerxes swift rejoind'd.

Why over Asia, and the Libyan soil,
 With all their nations, doth my potent arm
 Extend its sceptre? Wherefore do I sweep
 Across the earth with millions in my train?
 Why shade the ocean with unnumber'd sails?
 Why all this pow'r, unless th' Almighty's will

Decreed one master to the subject world;
 And that the earth's extremity alone
 Should bound my empire? He for this reduc'd
 The Nile's revolted sons, enlarg'd my sway
 With sandy Libya, and the sultry clime
 Of Æthiopia. He for this subdu'd
 The Hellepontic foam, and taught the sea
 Obedience to my nod. Then dream no more,
 That heav'n, deserting my imperial cause,
 With courage more than human, will inspire
 Yon despicable Grecians, and expunge
 The common fears of nature from their breasts.
 The monarch ceas'd. Abrocomes began.
 The king commands us to reveal our thoughts.
 Incredulous he hears. But time and truth
 Not Horomazes can arrest. Thy beams
 To instant lightning, Mithra, may'st thou change
 For my destruction; may th' offended king
 Frown on his servant, cast a loathing eye;
 If the assertion of my lips be false:

Our further march those Grecians will oppose.
 Amid th' encircling peers Argestes sat,
 A potent prince. O'er Sipylus he reign'd,
 Whose verdant summits overlook'd the waves
 Of Hermus and Pactolus. Either stream,
 Enrich'd by golden sands, a tribute pay'd
 To this great satrap. Through the servile court
 Yet none was found more practic'd in the arts
 Of mean submission; none more skill'd to gain
 The royal favour; none, who better knew
 The phrase, the look, the gesture of a slave;
 None more detesting Artemisia's worth,
 By her none more despis'd. His master's eye
 He caught, then spake. Display thy dazzling state,

Thou deity of Asia. Greece will hide
 Before thy presence her dejected face.
 Last Artemisia, rising stern, began:
 Why sits the lord of Asia in his tent,
 Unprofitably wasting precious hours
 In vain discussion, whether yonder Greeks,
 Rang'd in defence of that important pass,
 Will fight, or fly? A question by the sword
 To be decided. Still to narrow streights
 By land, by sea thy council hath confin'd
 Each enterprise of war. In numbers weak
 Twice have th' Athenians in Eubœa's frith
 Repuls'd thy navy—But whate'er thy will,
 Be it enforc'd by vigour. Let the king
 The difference see by trial in the field
 Between smooth sound and valour. Then dissolve
 These impotent debates. Ascend thy car.
 The future stage of war thyself explore.
 Behind thee leave the vanity of hope,
 That such a foe to splendour will submit,
 Whom steel, not gold must vanquish. Thou provide

Thy mail, Argestes. Not in silken robes,
 Not as in council with an oily tongue,
 But spear to spear, and clanging shield to shield,
 Thou soon must grapple on a field of blood.

The king arose—No more. Prepare my car.
 The Spartan exile, Demaratus, call.

We will ourselves advance to view the foe.
 The monarch will'd; and suddenly he heard
 His trampling horses. High on silver wheels
 The ivory car with azure sapphires shone,

Cærulean beryls, and the jasper green,
 The emerald, the ruby's glowing bluish,
 The flaming topaz with its golden beam,
 The pearl, th' empurpled amethyst, and all
 The various gems, which India's mines afford
 To deck the pomp of kings. In burnish'd gold
 A sculptur'd eagle from behind display'd
 His stately neck, and o'er the royal head Outstretch'd his dazzling wings. Eight gen'rous steeds,

Which on the fam'd Nisæan plain were nurs'd
 In wint'ry Media, drew the radiant car.
 Not those of old, to Hercules refus'd
 By false Laomedon, nor they, which bore
 The son of Thetis through the scatter'd rear
 Of Troy's devoted race, with these might vie
 In strength, or beauty. In obedient pride
 They hear their lord. Exulting, in the air
 They toss their foreheads. On their glitt'ring chests

The silver manes disport. The king ascends.
 Beside his footstool Demaratus sits.
 The charioteer now shakes th' effulgent reins,
 Strong Patiramphes. At the signal bound
 Th' attentive steeds; the chariot flies: behind,
 Ten thousand horse in thunder sweep the field.
 Down to the sea-beat margin, on a plain
 Of vast expansion in battalia wait
 The eastern bands. To these th' imperial wheels,
 By princes follow'd in a hundred cars,
 Proceed. The queen of Caria and her son
 With Hyperanthes rode. The king's approach
 Swift through the wide arrangement is proclaim'd.
 He now draws nigh. Th' innumerable host
 Roll back by nations, and admit their lord
 With all his satraps. As from crystal domes,
 Built underground an arch of pendent seas,
 When that stern pow'r, whose trident rules the floods,

With each cerulean deity ascends,
 Thron'd in his pearly chariot, all the deep
 Divides its bosom to th' emerging god;
 So Xerxes rode between the Asian world,
 On either side receding: when, as down
 Th' immeasurable ranks his sight was lost,
 A momentary gloom o'ercast his mind,
 While this reflection fill'd his eyes with tears:
 That, soon as time a hundred years had told,
 Not one among those millions should survive.
 Whence to obscure thy pride arose that cloud?
 Was it, that once humanity could touch
 A tyrant's breast? or rather did thy soul
 Repine, O Xerxes, at the bitter thought,
 That all thy pow'r was mortal? but the veil
 Of sadness soon forsook his brightning eye.
 As with adoring awe those millions bow'd,
 And to his heart relentless pride recall'd.
 Elate the mingled prospect he surveys
 Of glitt'ring files unnumber'd, chariots scyth'd,
 On thundering axes roll'd, and haughty steeds,
 In sumptuous trappings clad, Barbaric pomp.
 While gorgeous banners to the sun expand
 Their streaming volumes of relucient gold,
 Pre-eminent amidst tiaras gemm'd,
 Engraven helmets, shields emboss'd, and spears,
 In number equal to the bladed grass,
 Whose living green in vernal beauty clothes
 I i iij

Theſſalia's vale. What pow'rs of founding verſe
Can to the mind preſent th' amazing ſcene?
Not thee, whom rumour's ſabling voice delights,
Poetic fancy, to my aid I call;
But thou, hiſtoric truth, ſupport my ſong,
Which ſhall the various multitude diſplay,
Their arms, their manners, and their native ſeats.

The Perſians firſt in ſcaly corſelets ſhone,
A gen'rous nation, worthy to enjoy
The liberty, their injur'd fathers loſt,
Whoſe arms for Cyrus overturn'd the ſtrength
Of Babylon and Sardis. Pow'r advanc'd
The victor's head above his country's laws.
Their tongues were practis'd in the words of truth,
Their limbs inur'd to ev'ry manly toil,
To brace the bow, to rule th' impetuous ſteed,
To dart the javelin; but untaught to form
The ranks of war, with unconnected force,
With ineffectual fortitude they ruſh'd,
As on a fence of adamant, to pierce
Th' indiſſoluble phalanx. Lances ſhort,
And oſter-woven targets they oppoſ'd
To weighty Grecian ſpears, and maſſy ſhields.
On ev'ry head tiaras roſe like tow'rs,
Impenetrable. With a golden gloſs
Blaz'd their gay ſandals, and the floating reins
Of each proud courſer. Daggers on their thighs,
Well-furniſh'd quivers on their ſhoulders hung,
And ſtrongeſt bows of mighty ſize they bore.
Reſembling theſe in arms, the Medes are ſeen,
The Ciſſians and Hyrcanians. Media once
From her bleak mountains aw'd the ſubject eaſt.
Her kings in cold Ecbatana were thron'd.
The Ciſſians march'd from Suſa's regal walls,
From ſultry fields, o'erſpread with branching palms,

And white with lilies, water'd by the floods
Of ſam'd Choaspes. His transparent wave
The coſtly goblet waſt' to Perſia's kings.
All other ſtreams the royal lip diſdains.
Hyrcania's race forſook their fruitful clime,
Dark in the ſhadows of expanding oaks,
To Ceres dear and Bacchus. There the corn,
Bent by its foodful burden ſeeds, unreap'd,
Its plenteous ſeed, impregnating the ſoil
With future harveſts; while in ev'ry wood
Their precious labours on the loaden boughs
The honey'd ſwarms purſue. Aſſyria's ſons
Diſplay their brazen caſques, unkiſful work
Of rude Barbarians. Each ſuſtains a mace,
O'erlaid with iron. Near Euphrates' banks
Within the mighty Babylonian gates
They dwell, and wherè ſtill mightier once in ſway

Old Ninus rear'd its head, th' imperial feat
Of eldeſt tyrants. Theſe Chaldea joins,
The land of ſhepherds. From the paſtures wide
There Beluſ firſt diſcern'd the various courſe
Of Heav'n's bright planets, and the cluſt'ring ſtars
With names diſtinguiſh'd; whence himſelf was deem'd

The firſt of gods. His ſky-aſcending ſane
In Babylon the proud Aſſyrians rais'd.
Drawn from the bounteous ſoil, by Ochus lav'd,
The Bactrians ſtood, and rough in ſkins of goats
The Paricanian archers. Caſpian ranks
From barren mountains, from the joyleſs coaſt

Around the ſtormy lake, whoſe name they bore,
Their ſcimiters upheld, and cany bows.
The Indian tribes, a threefold hoſt compoſe.
Part guide the courſer, part the rapid car;
The reſt on foot within the bending cane
For ſlaughter fix the iron-pointed reed.
They o'er the Indus from the diſtant verge
Of Ganges paſſing, left a region, low'd
By laſhiv nature. There the ſeaſon bland
Beſtows a double harveſt. Honey'd ſhrubs,
The cinnamon, the ſpikenard bleſs their fields.
Array'd in native wealth, each warrior ſhines.
His ears bright-beaming pendants grace; his hands,

Encircled, wear a bracelet, ſtarr'd with gems.
Such were the nations, who to Xerxes ſent
Their mingled aids of infantry and horſe.

Now, muſe, recite, what multitudes obſcur'd
The plain on foot, or elevated high
On martial axles, or on camels beat
The looſen'd mold. The Parthians firſt appear,
Then weak in numbers, from unfruitful hills,
From woods, nor yet for warlike ſpeeds re-nown'd.

Near them the Sogdians, Dadices arrange,
Gandarians and Chorafmians. Sacian throngs
From cold Imans pour'd, from Oxus' wave,
From Cyra, built on Iaxartes' brink,
A bound of Perſia's empire. Wild, untam'd,
To fury prone their deſerts they forſook.
A bow, a falchion, and a pond'rous ax
The ſavage legions arm'd. A pointed caſque
O'er each grim viſage rear'd an iron cone,
In arms like Perſians the Saranges ſtood.
High, as their knees, the ſhapely buſkins clung
Around their legs. Magnificent they trod
In garments richly tinctur'd. Next are ſeen
The Paſtian, Mycian, and the Utian train;
In ſkins of goats rude-veſted. But in ſpoils
Of tawny lions, and of ſpotted pards
The graceful range of Ethiopians ſhows
An equal ſtature, and a beauteous frame.
Their torrid region had imbrown'd their cheeks,
And curl'd their jetty locks. In ancient ſong
Renown'd for juſtice, riches they diſtain'd,
As ſoes to virtue. From their ſeat remote
On Nilus' verge above th' Egyptian bound
Forc'd by their king's malignity and pride,
Theſe friends of hoſpitality and peace,
Theſelves uninjur'd, wage reluctant war
Againſt a land, whoſe climate, and whoſe name
To them were ſtrange. With hardeſt ſtone they point

The rapid arrow. Bows four cubits long,
Form'd of elastic branches from the palm,
They carry, knotted clubs, and lances, arm'd
With horns of goats. The Paphlagonians march'd,
From where Carambis with projected brows
O'erlooks the duſky Euxine, wrapt in miſts,
From where through flow'rs, which paint his va-
ry'd banks,

Parthenius flows. The Ligyian bands ſucceed;
The Martienians, Mariandeniens next;
To them the Syrian multitudes, who range
Among the cedars on the ſhaded ridge
Of Libanus; who cultivate the glebe,
Wide-water'd by Orontes; who reſide

Near Daphne's grove, or pluck from loaded palms

The foodful date, which clusters on the plains
Of rich Damascus. All, who bear the name
Of Cappadocians, swell the Syrian host,
With those, who gather from the fragrant shrub
The aromatic balsam, and extract
Its milky juice along the lovely side
Of Jordan, winding, till immers'd he sleeps
Beneath a pitchy surface, which obscures
Th' Asphaltic pool. The Phrygians then advance,
To them their ancient colony are join'd,
Armenia's sons. These see the gushing founts
Of strong Euphrates cleave the yielding earth,
Then, wide in lakes expanding, hide the plain;
Whence with collected waters, fierce and deep,
His passage rending through diminish'd rocks,
To Babylon he foams. Not so the stream
Of soft Araxes to the Caspian glides;
He, stealing imperceptibly, sustains
The green profusion of Armenia's meads.

Now strange to view, in similar attire,
But far unlike in manners to the Greeks,
Appear the Lydians. Wantonness and sport
Were all their care. Beside Cayster's brink,
Or smooth Mæander, winding silent by,
Beside Pactolean waves, among the vines
Of Timolus rising, or the wealthy tide
Of golden-faned Hermus they allure
The sight, enchanted by the graceful dance;
Or with melodious sweetness charm the air,
And melt to softest languishment the soul.
What to the field of danger could incite
These tender sons of luxury? The lash
Of their fell sov'reign drove their shiv'ring backs
Through hail and tempest, which enrag'd the main,

And shook beneath their trembling steps the piec,
Conjoining Asia and the western world.
To them Mœonia hot with sulph'rous mines
Unites her troops. No tree adorns their fields,
Unblest by verdure. Ashes hide the soil;
Black are the rocks, and ev'ry hill deform'd
By conflagration. Helmets press their brows.
Two darts they brandish. On their woolly vests
A sword is girt; and hairy hides compose
Their bucklers round and small. The Mysians left
Olympus wood-envelop'd, left the meads,
Wash'd by Cæicus, and the baneful tide
Of Lycus, nurse to serpents. Next advance
An ancient nation, who in early times
By Trojan arms assail'd, their native land
Esteem'd less dear, than freedom, and exchang'd
Their seat on Strymon, where in Thrace he pours
A freezing current, for the distant flood
Of silly Sangar. These, Bithynians nam'd,
Their habitation to the sacred feet
Of Dindymus extend. Yet there they groan
Beneath oppression, and their freedom mourn
On Sangar now, as once on Strymon lost.
The ruddy skins of foxes cloth'd their heads.
Their shields were fashion'd like the horned moon.
A vest embrac'd their bodies; while abroad,
Ting'd with unnumber'd hues, a mantle flow'd.
But other Thracians, who their former name
Retain'd in Asia, fulgent morions wore,
With horns of bulls in imitating brass,

Curv'd o'er the crested ridge. Phœnician cloth
Their legs infolded. Wont to chase the wolf,
A hunter's spear they grasp'd. What nations still
On either side of Xerxes, while he pass'd,
Their huge array discover'd, swell his soul
With more than mortal pride? The cluster'd bands

Of Moschians and Macronians now appear,
The Mosynœcians, who, on berries fed,
In wooden towers along the Pontic sands;
Repose their painted limbs; the mirthful race
Of Libareniens next, whose careless minds
Delight in play and laughter. Then advance
In garments, buckled on their spacious chests,
A people, destin'd in eternal verse,
Ev'n thine, sublime Mœonides, to live.
These are the Milyans. Solymi their name
In thy celestial strains, Pisidia's hills
Their dwelling. Once a formidable train
They fac'd the strong Bellerophon in war.
Now doom'd a more tremendous foe to meet,
Themselves unnerv'd by thralldom, they must leave

Their putrid bodies to the dogs of Greece.
The Marians follow. Next is Aria's host,
Drawn from a region horrid all in thorn,
A dreary waste of sands, which mock the toil
Of patient culture; save one favour'd spot,
Which from the wild emerges like an isle,
Attir'd in verdure, intersper'd with vines
Of gen'rous nurture, yielding juice, which scorns
The injuries of time: yet nature's hand
Had sown their rocks with coral; had enrich'd
Their desert hills with veins of sapphires blue,
Which on the turbant shine. On ev'ry neck
The coral blushes through the num'rous throng.
The Allarodians, and Sasserian bands,
Equipp'd like Colchians, wield a falchion small.
Their heads are guarded by a helm of wood,
Their lances short, of hides undress'd their shields.
The Colchians march'd from Phasis, from the strand,

Where once Medea, fair enchantress, stood,
And, wond'ring, view'd the first advent'rous keel,
Which cut the Pontic foam. From Argo's side
The demigods descended. They repair'd
To her fell sire's inhospitable hall.
His blooming graces Jason there disclos'd.
With ev'ry art of eloquence divine
He claim'd the golden fleece. The virgin heard,
She gaz'd in fatal ravishment, and lov'd.
Then to the hero she resigns her heart.
Her magic tames the brazen-footed bulls.
She lulls the sleepless dragon. O'er the main
He wafts the golden prize, and gen'rous fair,
The destin'd victim of his treach'rous vows.
The hostile Colchians then pursu'd their flight
In vain. By ancient enmity inflam'd,
Or to recal the long-forgotten wrong
Compell'd by Xerxes, now they menace Greece
With desolation. Next in Median garb
A crowd appear'd, who left the peopled isles
In Persia's gulf, and round Arabia strewn.
Some in their native topaz were adorn'd,
From Ophiodes, from Topazos sprung;
Some in the shells of tortoises, which brood
Around Castis' verge. For battle range

Those, who reside, where, all beset with palms,
Erythras lies entomb'd, a potent king,
Who nam'd of old the Erythrean main.
On chariots feyth'd the Libyans sat array'd
In skins terrific, brandishing their darts
Of wood, well-temper'd in the hard'ning flames.
Not Libya's deserts from tyrannic sway
Could hide her sons; much less could freedom dwell

Amid the plenty of Arabia's fields:
Where spicy Cassia, where the fragrant reed,
Where myrrh, and hallow'd frankincense perfume

The zephyr's wing. A bow of largest size
Th' Arabian carries. O'er his lucid vest
Loose floats a mantle, on his shoulder clasp'd.
Two chosen myriads on the lofty backs.
Of camels rode, who match'd the fleetest horse.

Such were the numbers, which, from Asia led,
In base prostration bow'd before the wheels
Of Xerxes' chariot. Yet what legions more
The Malian sand o'ershadow? Forward rolls
The regal car through nations, who in arms,
In order'd ranks unlike the orient tribes,
Upheld the spear and buckler. But, untaught
To bend the servile knee, erect they stood;
Unless that, mourning o'er the shameful weight
Of their new bondage, some their brows depress'd,
Their arms with grief distaining. Europe's sons
Were these, whom Xerxes by resistless force
Had gather'd round his standards. Murm'ring here,

The sons of Thrace and Macedonia rang'd;
Here on his steed the brave Thesalian trown'd;
There pin'd reluctant multitudes, of Greece
Redundant plants, in colonies dispers'd
Between Byzantium, and the Malian bay.

Through all the nations, who ador'd his pride,
Or fear'd his pow'r, the monarch now was pass'd;
Nor yet among those millions could be found
One, who in beauteous feature might compare,
Or tow'ring size with Xerxes. O possess'd
Of all, but virtue, doom'd to show, how mean,
How weak without her is unbounded pow'r,
The charm of beauty, and the blaze of state;
How insecure of happiness, how vain!

Thou, who couldst mourn the common lot, by heav'n
From none withheld, which oft to thousands proves

Their only refuge from a tyrant's rage;
Which in consuming sickness, age, or pain
Becomes at last a soothing hope to all:
Thou, who couldst weep, that nature's gentle
hand

Should lay her weary'd offspring in the tomb;
Yet couldst remorseless from their peaceful seats
Lead half the nations, victims to thy pride,
To famine, plague and massacre a prey;
What didst thou merit from the injur'd world?
What suff'rings to compensate for the tears
Of Asia's mothers; for unpeopled realms,
For all this waste of nature? On his host
Th' exulting monarch bends his haughty sight,
To Demaratus then directs his voice.

My father, great Darius, to thy mind
Recal, O Spartan, Gracious he receiv'd

Thy wand'ring steps, expell'd their native home,
My favour too remember. To beguile
Thy benefactor, and disfigure truth
Would ill become thee. With confid'rate eyes
Look back on these battalions. Now declare,
If yonder Grecians will oppose their march.

To him the exile. Deem not, mighty lord,
I will deceive thy goodness by a tale
To give them glory, who degraded mine.

Nor be the king offended, while I use
The voice of truth. The Spartans never fly.

Contemptuous smil'd the monarch, and resum'd.
Wilt thou in Lacedemon once supreme,

Encounter twenty Persians? Yet these Greeks
In greater disproportion must engage
Our host to-morrow. Demaratus then.

By single combat were the trial vain
To show the pow'r of well-united force,
Which oft by military skill surmounts
The weight of numbers. Prince, the difference learn

Between thy warriors, and the sons of Greece.

The flow'r, the safeguard of thy numerous camp
Are mercenaries. These are canton'd round

Thy provinces. No fertile field demands
Their painful hand to break the fallow glebe.

Them to the noon-day toil no harvest calls.
Nor on the mountain falls the stubborn oak

By their laborious ax. Their watchful eyes
Observe not, how the flocks and heifers feed.

To them of wealth, of all possessions void,
The name of country with an empty sound

Flies o'er the car, nor warms their joyless hearts,
Who share no country. Needy, yet in scorn

Rejecting labour, wretched by their wants,
Yet profligate through indolence, with limbs

Enervated and soft, with minds corrupt,
From misery, debauchery and sloth

Are these to battle drawn against a foe,
Train'd in gymnastic exercise and arms,

Inur'd to hardship, and the child of toil. [storm
Went through the freezing show'r, the wintry

O'er his own glebe the tardy ox to goad,
Or in the sun's impetuous heat to glow

Beneath the burden of his yellow sheaves;
Whence on himself, on her, whose faithful arms

Infold him joyful on a growing race,
Which glad his dwelling; plenty he bestows

With independence. When to battle call'd,
For them his dearest comfort, and his care,

And for the harvest, promis'd to his toil,
He lifts the shield, nor shuns unequal force.

Such are the troops of ev'ry state in Greece.
One only yields a breed more warlike still,

Of whom selected bands appear in fight,
All citizens of Sparta. They the glebe

Have never turn'd, nor bound the golden sheaf;
They are devoted to severer tasks,

For war alone, their sole delight and care.
From infancy to manhood they are train'd

To winter watches, to inclement skies,
To plunge through torrents, brave the tusky boar,

To arms and wounds; a discipline of pain

So fierce, so constant, that to them a camp
With all its hardships is a feat of rest,

And war itself remission from their toil.

Thy words are folly, with redoubled scorn
Returns the monarch. Dost not freedom dwell

Among the Spartans? Therefore will they shun
Superior foes. The unrestrain'd and free
Will fly from danger; while my vassals, born
To absolute contrölmönt from their king,
Know, if th' allotted station they desert,
The scourge awaits them, and my heavy wrath.

To this the exile. O conceive not, prince,
That Spartans want an object, where to fix
Their eyes in rev'rence, in obedient dread.
To them more awful than the name of king
To Asia's trembling millions, is the law;
Whose sacred voice enjoins them to confront
Unnumber'd foes, to vanquish, or to die.

Here Demaratus pauses. Xerxes halts.
Its long desile, Thermopylae presents.
The satraps leave their cars. On foot they form
A splendid orb around their lord. By chance
The Spartans then compos'd th' external guard.
They, in a martial exercise employ'd,
Heed not the monarch, or his gaudy train;
But poise the spear, protended, as in fight;
Or lift their adverse shields in single strife;
Or, trooping, forward rush, retreat and wheel
In ranks unbroken, and with equal feet:
While others calm beneath their polish'd helms
Draw down their hair, whose length of sable curls
O'erspread their necks with terror. Xerxes here
The exile questions. What do these intend,
Who with assiduous hands adjust their hair?

To whom the Spartan. O imperial lord,
Such is their custom, to adorn their heads,
When full determin'd to encounter death.
Bring down thy nations in resplendent steel;
Arm, if thou canst, the gen'ral race of man,
All, who possess the regions unexplor'd
Beyond the Ganges, all whose wand'ring steps
Above the Caspian range the Scythian wild,
With those, who drink the secret fount of Nile:
Yet to Laconian bosoms shall dismay
Remain a stranger. Fervour from his lips
Thus breaks aloud; when, gushing from his eyes,
Resistless grief o'erflows his cheeks. Aside
His head he turns. He weeps in copious streams.
The keen remembrance of his former state,
His dignity, his greatness, and the sight
Of those brave ranks, which thus unshaken stood,
And spread amazement through the world in arms,
Excite these sorrows. His impassion'd looks
Review the godlike warriors, who beneath
His standard once victorious fought, who call'd
Him once their king, their leader; then again,
O'ercharg'd with anguish, he bedews with tears
His rev'rend beard, in agony bemoans
His faded honours, his illustrious name
Forgotten long, his majesty desil'd
By exile, by dependence. So obscur'd
By sordid moss, and ivy's creeping leaf,
Some princely palace, or stupendous fane
Magnificent in ruin nods; where time
From under shelving architraves hath mow'd
The column down, and cleft the pond'rous dome.

Not unobserv'd by Hyperanthes, mourn'd
Th' unhappy Spartan. Kindly in his own
He pres'd the exile's hand, and thus humane.

O Demaratus, in this grief I see,
How just thy praises of Laconia's state.
Though cherish'd here with universal love,
Thou still deplor'st thy absence from her face,

How'er averse to thine. But swift relief
From indignation borrow. Call to mind
Thy injuries. Th' auspicious fortune blest,
Which led thee far from calumny and fraud,
To peace, to honour in the Persian court.

As Demaratus with a grateful mind
His answer was preparing, Persia's king
Stern interrupted. Soon as morning shines,
Do you, Tigranes and Phraortes, head
The Medes and Cissians. Bring these Grecians

This said, the monarch to his camp returns.
Th' attendant princes reascend their cars,
Save Hyperanthes, by the Carian queen
Detain'd, who thus began. Impartial, brave,
Nurs'd in a court, yet virtuous, let my heart
To thee its feelings undiguish'd reveal.
Thou hear'st thy royal brother. He demands
These Grecians bound. Why stops his mandate
there?

Why not command the mountains to remove,
Or sink to level plains. Yon Spartans view,
Their weighty arms, their countenance. To die
My gratitude instructs me in the cause
Of our imperial master. To succeed
Is not within the shadow of my hopes
At this dire pass. What evil genius sways?
Tigranes, false Argestes, and the rest
In name a council, ceaseless have oppos'd
My dictates, oft repeated in despite
Of purple flatterers, to embark a force,
Which, pouring on Laconia, might confine
These sons of valour to their own defence.
Vain are my words. The royal ear admits
Their sound alone; while adulation's notes
In syren sweetness penetrate his heart,
There lodge ensnaring mischief. In a sigh
To her the prince. O faithful to thy lord,
Discreet adviser, and in action firm,
What can I answer? My afflicted soul
Must seek its refuge in a feeble hope.
Thou mayst be partial to thy Doric race,
Mayst magnify our danger. Let me hope,
Whate'er the danger, if extreme, believe,
That Hyperanthes for his prince can bleed
Not with less zeal, than Spartans for their laws.

They separate. To Xerxes he repairs.
The queen, surrounded by the Carian guard,
Stays and retraces with sagacious ken
The destin'd field of war, the vary'd space,
Its depth, it confines both of hill and sea.
Meantime a scene more splendid hath allur'd
Her son's attention. His transported sight
With ecstacy like worship long pursues
The pomp of Xerxes in retreat, the throne,
Which show'd their idol to the nations round,
The bounding steeds, caparison'd in gold,
The plumes, the chariots, standards. He excites
Her care, express'd in these pathetic strains.

Look on the king with gratitude. His fire
Protected thine. Himself upholds our state.
By loyalty inflexible repay
The obligation. To immortal pow'r's
The adoration of thy soul confine;
And look undazzled on the pomp of man
Most weak, when highest. Then the jealous gods
Watch to supplant him. They his paths, his courts,
His chambers fill with flatt'ry's pois'nous swarms,
Whose honey'd bane, by kingly pride devour'd,

Consumes the health of kingdoms. Here the boy
By an attention, which surpass'd his years,
Unlocks her inmost bosom. Thrice accurs'd
Be those, th' indignant heroine pursues,
Those who have tempted their imperial lord
To that prepos't'rous arrogance, which cast
Chains in the deep to manacle the waves,
Chastis'd with stripes in heav'n's offended fight
The Hellespont, and fondly now demands
The Spartans bound. O child, my soul's delight,
Train'd by my care to equitable sway,
And imitation of the gods by deeds
To merit their protection, heed my voice.
They, who alone can tame, or swell the floods,
Compose the winds, or guide their strong career,
O'erwhelming human greatness, will confound
Such vanity in mortals. On our fleet
Their indignation hath already fall'n.
Perhaps our boasted army is prepar'd
A prey, for death to vindicate their pow'r.

This said, a curious search in ev'ry part
Here eye renews. Adjoining to the streights,
Fresh bloom'd a thicket of entwining shrubs;
A seeming fence to some sequester'd ground,
By travellers unbeaten. Swift her guards
Address'd their spears to part the pliant boughs.
Held back, they yield a passage to the queen,
And princely boy. Delicious to their sight
Soft dales meandering, show their flow'ry laps
Among rude piles of nature. In their sides
Of rock are mansions hewn; nor loaden trees
Of cluster'd fruit are wanting: but no found,
Except of brooks in murmur, and the song
Of winged warblers, meets the list'ning ear.
No grazing herd, no flock, nor human form
Is seen, no careful husband at his toil,
Beside her threshold no indutrious wife,
No playful child. Instructive to her son
The princefs then. Already these abodes
Are desolate. Once happy in their homes
Th' inhabitants forsake them. Pleasing scene
Of nature's bounty, soon will savage Mars
Deform the lovely ringlets of thy shrubs,
And coarsely pluck thy violated fruits
Unripe; will deafen with his clangour fell
Thy tuneful choirs. I mourn thy destin'd spoil,
Yet come thy first despoiler. Captains, plant,
Ere morning breaks, my secret standard here.
Come, boy, away. Thy safety will I trust
To Demaratus; while thy mother tries
With these her martial followers, what sparks,
Left by our Doric fathers, yet inflame
Their sons and daughters in a stern debate
With other Dorians, who have never breath'd
The soft'ning gales of Asia, never bow'd
In forc'd allegiance to Barbarian thrones.
Thou heed my order. Those ingenuous looks
Of discontent suppress. For thee this fight
Were too severe a lesson. Thou might'st bleed
Among the thousands, fated to expire
By Sparta's lance. Let Artemisia die,
Ye all-disposing rulers, but protect
Her son. She ceas'd. The lioness, who reigns
Queen of the forest, terrible in strength,
And prone to fury, thus by nature taught,
Melts o'er her young in blandishment and love.
Now slowly tow'rd's the Persian camp her steps
In silence she directed; when a voice,

Sent from a rock, accessible which seem'd
To none, but feather'd passengers of air,
By this reproof detain'd her. Garia's queen
Art thou, to Greece by Doric blood ally'd?
Com'st thou to lay her fruitful meadows waste,
Thou homager of tyrants? Upward gaz'd
Th' astonish'd princefs. Lo! a female shape,
Tall and majestic, from th' impendent ridge
Look'd awful down. A holy fillet bound
Her graceful hair, loose flowing. Seldom wept
Great Artemisia. Now a springing tear Between her eyelids gleam'd. Too true, she sigh'd,

A homager of tyrants! Voice austere,
And presence half divine! Again the voice.

O Artemisia, hide thy Doric sword.
Let no barbarian tyrant through thy might,
Thy counsels, valiant as thou art and wife,
Consume the holy fanes, deface the tombs,
Subvert the laws of Greece, her sons enthal.

The queen made no reply. Her breast-plate heav'd.

The tremulous attire of cov'ring mail
Confess'd her struggle. She at length exclaim'd.

Olympian thund'rer, from thy neighb'ring hill
Of sacred oaths remind me! Then aside
She turns to shun that majesty of form,
In solemn sounds upbraiding. Torn her thoughts
She feels. A painful conflict she endures
With recollection of her Doric race;
Till gratitude, reviving, arms her breast.
Her royal benefactor she recalls,
Back to his sight precipitates her steps.

BOOK V.

THE ARGUMENT.

LEONIDAS, rising by break of day, hears the intelligence which Agis and Melibæus bring from the upper pass, then commands a body of Arcadians, with the Platæans and Thespians, to be drawn out for battle, under the conduct of Demophilus, in that part of Thermopylæ which lies cloie to the Phocian wall, from whence he harangues them. The enemy approaches. Diomedon kills Tigranes in single combat. Both armies join battle. Dithyrambus kills Phraortes. The Persians, entirely defeated, are pursued by Demophilus to the extremity of the pass. The Arcadians, inconsiderately advancing beyond it, fall into an ambush, which Artemisia had laid to cover the retreat of the Persians. She kills Clonius, but is herself repulsed by Demophilus. Diomedon and Dithyrambus give chase to her broken forces over the plains, in the fight of Persia's camp, whence she receives no assistance. She rallies a small body, and, facing the enemy, disables Dithyrambus by a blow on his helmet. This puts the Grecians into some confusion, and gives her an opportunity of preserving the remainder of her Carians by a timely retreat. She gains the camp, accuses Argestes of treachery, but pacified by Demaratus, is accompanied by him with a thousand horse, to collect the dead bodies of her soldiers for sepulchre.

AURORA dawn'd. Leonidas arose.
 With Melibœus Agis, now return'd,
 Address'd the king. Along the mountain's side
 We bent our journey. On our way a voice,
 Loud from a crag, on Melibœus call'd.
 He look'd and answer'd. Mycon, ancient friend!
 Far hast thou driv'n thy bearded train to-day;
 But fortunate thy presence. None like thee,
 Inhabitant of Oeta from thy birth,
 Can furnish that intelligence, which Greece
 Wants for her safety. Mycon show'd a track.
 We mounted high. The summit where we stopp'd,
 Gave to the sight a prospect wide o'er hills,
 O'er dales and forests, rocks, and dashing floods
 In cataracts. The object of our search
 Beneath us lay, the secret pass to Greece,
 Where not five warriors in a rank can tread.
 We thence descended to the Phocian camp,
 Beset with scatter'd oaks, which rose and spread
 In height and shade; on whose sustaining boughs
 Were hung in snowy folds a thousand tents,
 Containing each a Phocian heavy-mail'd,
 With two light-weapon'd menials. Northward ends

The vale, contracted to that narrow stright,
 Which first we saw with Mycon. Prudent care
 Like yours alleviates mine, well pleas'd the king
 Reply'd. Now, Agis, from Arcadia's bands
 Select a thousand spears. To them unite
 The Thespians and Platœans. Draw their lines
 Beneath the wall, which fortifies the pass.
 There, close embody'd, will their might repulse
 The num'rous foe. Demophilus salute.
 Approv'd in martial service him I name
 The chief supreme. Obedient to his will
 Th' appointed warriors, issuing from the tents,
 Fill their deep files, and watch the high command.
 So round their monarch, in his stormy hall,
 The winds assemble. From his dusky throne
 His dreadful mandates Æolus proclaims
 To swell the main, or heav'n with clouds deform,
 Or bend the forest from the mountain's brow.
 Læonia's leader from the rampart's height
 To battle thus the list'ning host inflames.

This day, O Grecians, countrymen, and friends,
 Your wives, your offspring, your paternal seats,
 Your parents, country, liberty, and laws,
 Demand your swords. You gen'rous, active, brave,
 Vers'd in the various discipline of Mars,
 Are now to grapple with ignoble foes
 In war unskilful, nature's basest dross,
 And thence a monarch's mercenary slaves.
 Relax'd their limbs, their spirits are deprav'd
 By eastern sloth and pleasures. Hire their cause,
 Their only fruit of victory is spoil.
 They know not freedom, nor its lib'ral cares.
 Such is the flow'r of Asia's host. The rest,
 Who fill her boasted numbers, are a crowd,
 Forc'd from their homes; a populace in peace
 By jealous tyranny disarm'd, in war
 Their tyrant's victims. Taught in passive grief
 To bear the rapine, cruelty, and spurns
 Of Xerxes' mercenary band, they pine
 In servitude to slaves. With terror sounds
 The trumpeter's clangour in their trembling ears.
 Unwonted loads, the buckler and the lance
 Their hands sustain, encumber'd, and present

The mockery of war.—But ev'ry eye
 Shoots forth impatient flames. Your gallant breasts
 Too long their swelling spirit have confin'd.
 Go then, ye sons of liberty; go, sweep
 These bondmen from the field. Resistless rend
 The glittering standard from their servile grasp.
 Hurl to the ground their ignominious heads,
 The warrior's helm profaning. Think, the shades
 Of your forefathers list their sacred brows,
 Here to enjoy the glory of their sons.

He spake. Loud pœans issue from the Greeks.
 In fierce reply barbarian shouts descend
 From hostile nations, thronging down the pass.
 Such is the roar of Ætna, when his mouth
 Displodes combustion from his sulph'rous depths,
 To blast the smiles of nature. Dauntless stood,
 In deep array before the Phocian wall
 The phalanx, wedg'd with implicated shields,
 And spears protended, like the graceful range
 Of arduous elms, whose interwoven boughs
 Before some rural palace, wide expand,
 Their venerable umbrage to retard
 The north's impetuous wing. As o'er the main,
 In lucid rows, the rising waves reflect
 The sun's effulgence; so the Grecian helms
 Return'd his light, which o'er their convex pour'd
 A splendour, scatter'd through the dancing plumes.

Down rush the foes. Exulting in their van,
 Their haughty leader shakes his threat'ning lance,
 Provoking battle. Instant from his rank
 Diomedon bursts furious. On he strides,
 Confronts Tigranes, whom he thus defies.

Now art thou met, barbarian. Wouldst thou prove
 Thy actions equal to thy vaunts, command
 Thy troops to halt, while thou and I engage.

Tigranes, turning to the Persians, spake.
 My friends and soldiers, check your martial haste,
 While my strong lance that Grecian's pride con-founds.

He ceas'd. In dreadful opposition soon
 Each combatant advanc'd. Their sinewy hands Grip'd fast their spears, high brandish'd. Thrice they drove,

With well-directed force, the pointed steel
 At either's throat, and thrice their wary shields
 Repell'd the menac'd wound. The Asian chief
 At length, with pow'rs collected for the stroke,
 His weapon rivets in the Grecian targe.
 Aside Diomedon inclines, and thuns
 Approaching fate; then all his martial skill
 Undaunted summons. His forsaken spear
 Beside him cast, his saulchion he untheaths.
 The blade, descending on Tigranes' arm,
 That instant struggling to redeem his lance,
 The nervous hand dissevers. Pale affright
 Unmans the Persian; while his active foe
 Full on his neck discharg'd the rapid sword,
 Which open'd wide the purple gates of death.
 Low sinks Tigranes in eternal shade.
 His prostrate limbs the conqueror bestrides;
 Then in a tuft of blood-distilling hair
 His hand entwining, from the mangled trunk
 The head disjoins, and whirls with matchless itrength

Among the adverse legions. All in dread
 Recoil'd, where'er the ghastly visage flew

In sanguine circles, and pursu'd its track
Of horror through the air. Not more amaz'd,
A barb'rous nation, whom the cheerful dawn
Of science ne'er illumin'd, view on high
A meteor, waving its portentous fires;
Where oft, as superstition vainly dreams,
Some demon sits amid the baneful blaze,
Dispersing plague and desolation round.
A while the stern Diomedon remain'd
Triumphant o'er the dire dimay, which froze
The heart of Persia; then with haughty pace
In fullen joy among his gladsome friends
Refum'd his station. Still the hostile throng
In consternation motionless suspend
The charge. Their drooping hearts Phraortes warms.

Heav'n! can one leader's fate appal this host,
Which counts a train of princes for its chiefs?
Behold Phraortes. From Niphates' ridge
I draw my subject files. My hardy toil
Through pathless woods and deserts hath explor'd
The tiger's cavern. This unconquer'd hand
Hath from the lion rent his shaggy hide.
So through this field of slaughter will I chase
Yon vaunting Greek. His ardent words revive Declining valour in the van. His lance
Then in the rear he brandishes. The crowd
Before his threatening ire, affrighted, roll
Their numbers headlong on the Grecian steel.
Thus with his trident ocean's angry god
From their vast bottom turns the mighty mass
Of waters upward, and o'erwhelms the beach.

Tremendous frown'd the fierce Plataean chief
Full in the battle's front. His ample shield
Like a strong bulwark prominent he rais'd
Before the line. There thunder'd all the storm
Of darts and arrows. His undaunted train
In emulating ardour charg'd the foe.
Where'er they turn'd the formidable spears,
Which drench'd the glebe of Marathon in blood,
Barbarian dead lay heap'd. Diomedon
Led on the slaughter. From his nodding crest
The sable plumes shook terror. Asia's host
Shrunk back, as blasted by the piercing beams
Of that unconquerable sword, which fell
With lightning's swiftness on dissever'd helms,
And, menacing Tigranes' doom to all,
Their multitude dispers'd. The furious chief,
Encompass'd round by carnage, and besmear'd
With sanguine drops, enflames his warlike friends.

O Dithyrambus, let thy deeds this day
Surmount their wonted lustre. Thou in arms,
Demophilus, worn gray, thy youth recal.
Behold, these slaves without resistance bleed.
Advance, my hoary friend. Propitious fame
Smiles on thy years. She grants thy aged hand
To pluck fresh laurels for thy honour'd brow.

As, when endu'd with Promethean heat,
The molten clay respir'd; a sudden warmth
Glows in the venerable Thespian's veins;
In ev'ry sinew new-born vigour swells.
His falchion, thund'ring on Cherafmes' helm,
The forehead cleaves. Ecbatana to war
Sent forth Cherafmes. From her potent gates
He proud in hope her swarming numbers led.
Him Ariazus and Peucefies join'd,
His martial brothers. They attend his fate,
By Dithyrambus pierc'd. Their hoary fire

Shall o'er his solitary palace roam;
Lamenting loud his childless years, shall curse
Ambition's fury, and the lust of war,
Then, pining, bow in anguish to the grave.

Next by the fierce Plataean's fatal sword
Expir'd Damates, once the host and friend
Of fall'n Tigranes. By his side to fight
He left his native bands. Of Syrian birth
In Daphné he resided near the grove,
Whose hospitable laurels in their shade
Conceal'd the virgin fugitive averse
To young Apollo. Hither she retir'd
Far from her parent stream. Here fables feign,
Herself a laurel chang'd her golden hair
To verdant leaves in this retreat, the grove
Of Daphné call'd, the seat of rural bliss,
Fann'd by the breath of zephyrs, and with rills
From bubbling founts irriguous, Syria's boast,
The happy rival of Thesfalia's vale,
Now hid for ever from Damates' eyes.

Demophilus, wise leader, soon improves
Advantage. All the veterans of his troop,
In age his equals, to condense the files,
To rivet close their bucklers he commands.
As some broad vessel, heavy in her strength,
But well-compacted, when a favouring gale
Invites the skilful master to expand
The sails at large, her slow but steady course
Impels through myriads of dividing waves;
So, unresisted, through Barbarian throngs
The hoary phalanx pass'd. Arcadia's sons
Pursu'd more swift. Gigantic Clonius press'd
The yielding Persians, who before him sunk,
Crush'd like vile stubble underneath the steps
Of some glad peasant, visiting his fields
Of new-shorn harvest. On the gen'ral rout
Phraortes look'd intrepid still. He sprang
O'er hills of carnage to confront the foe.
His own inglorious friends he thus reproach'd.

Fly then, ye cowards, and desert your chief.
Yet single here my target shall oppose
The shock of thousands. Raging, he impels
His deathful point through Aristander's breast.
Him Dithyrambus lov'd. A sacred bard,
Rever'd for justice; for his verse renown'd,
He sung the deeds of heroes, those who fell,
Or those who conquer'd in their country's cause,
Th' enraptur'd soul inspiring with the love
Of glory, earn'd by virtue. His high strain
The muses favour'd from their neighbour'ing bow'rs,
And bless'd with heav'nly melody his lyre.
No more from Thefia shall his feet ascend
The steady steep of Helicon; no more
The stream divine of Aganippe's fount
Bedew his lip harmonious: nor his hands,
Which, dying, grasp the unforfeaken lance,
And prostrate buckler, evermore accord
His lofty numbers to the sounding shell.
Lo! Dithyrambus weeps. Amid the rage
Of war and conquest swiftly-gushing tears
Find one sad moment's interval to fall
On his pale friend. But soon the victor proves
His stern revenge. Through shield and corselet
plung'd,

His forceful blade divides the Persian's chest;
Whence issue streams of royal blood, deriv'd
From ancestors, who sway'd in Niius old
Th' Assyrian sceptre. He to Xerxes' throne

A tributary satrap rul'd the vales,
 Where Tigris swift between the parted hills
 Of tall Niphates drew his foamy tide,
 Impregnating the meads. Phraortes sinks,
 Not instantly expiring. Still his eyes
 Flash indignation, while the Persians fly.
 Beyond the Malian entrance of the straits
 Th' Arcadians rush; when, unperceiv'd till felt,
 Spring from concealment in a thicket deep
 New swarms of warriors, clust'ring on the flank
 Of these unwary Grecians. Tow'rd's the bay
 They shrink; they totter on the fearful edge,
 Which overhangs a precipice. Surpris'd,
 The strength of Clonius fails. His giant bulk
 Beneath the chieftain of th' assailing band
 Falls prostrate. Thespians and Plataeans wave
 Auxilar ensigns. They encounter foes,
 Resembling Greeks in discipline and arms.
 Dire is the shock. What less, than Caria's queen
 In their career of victory could check
 Such warriors? Fierce she struggles; while the rout

Of Medes and Cissians carry to the camp
 Contagious terror; thence no succour flows.
 Demophilus stands firm; the Carian band
 At length recoil before him. Keen pursuit
 He leaves to others, like th' almighty fire,
 Who sits unshaken on his throne, while floods,
 His instruments of wrath, o'erwhelm the earth,
 And whirlwinds level on her hills the growth
 Of proudest cedars. Through the yielding crowd
 Plataea's chief and Dithyrambus range
 Triumphant side by side. Thus o'er the field,
 Where bright Alpheus heard the rattling car,
 And concave hoof along his echoing banks,
 Two gen'rous couriers, link'd in mutual reins,
 In speed, in ardour equal, beat the dust,
 To reach the glories of Olympia's goal.
 Th' intrepid heroes on the plain advance,
 They press the Carian rear. Not long the queen
 Endures that shame. Her people's dying groans
 Transpire her bosom. On their bleeding limbs
 She looks maternal, feels maternal pangs.
 A troop she rallies. Goddess-like she turns,
 Not less than Pallas with her Gorgon shield.
 Whole ranks she covers, like th' imperial bird
 Extending o'er a nest of callow young
 Her pinion broad, and pointing fierce her beak,
 Her claws outstretch'd. The Thespian's ardent
 hand,

From common lives refraining, hastes to snatch
 More splendid laurels from that nobler head.
 His pond'rous falchion, swift descending, bears
 Her buckler down, thence glancing, cuts the thong,
 Which holds her headpiece fast. That golden fence
 Drops down. Thick tresses, unconfind, disclose
 A female warrior; one whose summer pride
 Of fleeting beauty had begun to fade,
 Yet by th' heroic character supply'd,
 Which grew more awful, as the touch of time
 Remov'd the soft'ning graces. Back he steps,
 Unmann'd by wonder. With indignant eyes,
 Fire-darting, she advances. Both her hands
 Full on his crest discharge the furious blade.
 The forceful blow compels him to recede
 Yet further back, unwounded, though confus'd.
 His soldiers flock around him. From a scene
 Of blood more distant speeds Plataea's chief.

The fair occasion of suspended fight
 She seizes, bright in glory wheels away,
 And saves her Carian remnant; while his friend
 In fervent sounds Diomedon bespake.

If thou art slain, I curse this glorious day.
 Be all thy trophies, be my own accurs'd.

The youth, recover'd, answers in a smile.
 I am unhurt. The weighty blow proclaim'd
 The queen of Caria, or Bellona's arm.
 Our longer stay Demophilus may blame.
 Let us prevent his call. This said, their steps
 They turn, both striding through empurpled heaps
 Of arms, and mangled slain, themselves with gore
 Distain'd, like two grim tigers, who have forc'd
 A nightly mansion, on the desert rais'd
 By some lone-wand'ring traveller, then dy'd
 In human crimson, through the forest deep
 Back to their covert's dreary gloom retire.

Stern Artemisia, sweeping o'er the field,
 Bursts into Asia's camp. A furious look
 She casts around. Abrocomes remote
 With Hyperanthes from the king were sent.
 She sees Argestes in that quarter chief,
 Who from battalions numberless had spar'd
 Not one to succour, but his malice god's
 With her distress. Her anger now augments.
 Revenge frowns gloomy on her darken'd brow.
 He cautious moves to Xerxes, where he sat
 High on his car. She follows. Lost her helm,
 Resign'd to sportive winds her cluster'd locks,
 Wild, but majestic like the waving boughs
 Of some proud elm, the glory of the grove,
 And full in foliage. Her emblazon'd shield
 With gore is tarnish'd. Pale around are seen
 All faint, all ghastly from repeated wounds
 Her bleeding soldiers. Brandishing her sword,
 To them she points, to Xerxes thus she speaks.

Behold these mangled Carians, who have spent
 Their vital current in the king's defence,
 Ev'n in his fight; while Medes and Cissians fled,
 By these protect'd, whom Argestes saw
 Pursu'd by slaughter to thy very camp,
 Yet left unhelp'd to perish. Ruling fire,
 Let Horomazes be thy name, or Jove,
 To thee appealing, of the king I claim
 A day for justice. Monarch, to my arm
 Give him a prey. Let Artemisia's truth
 Chastise his treason. With an eye submiss,
 A mien obsequious, and a soothing tone
 To cheat the king, to moderate her ire
 Argestes utters these fallacious words.

May Horomazes leave the fiend at large
 To blast my earthly happiness, confine
 Amid the horrors of his own abode
 My ghost hereafter, if the sacred charge
 Of Xerxes' person was not my restraint,
 My sole restraint! To him our all is due,
 Our all how trifling, with his safety weigh'd.
 His preservation I prefer to fame,
 And bright occasion for immortal deeds
 Forego in duty. Else my helpful sword,
 Fair heroine of Asia, hadst thou seen
 Among the foremost blazing. Lo! the king
 A royal present will on thee bestow,
 Perfumes and precious unguents on the dead,
 A golden wreath to each survivor brave.

Aw'd by her spirit, by the flatterers spell
 Deluded, languid through dismay and shame

At his defeat, the monarch for a time
Sat mute, at length unlock'd his falt'ring lips.

Thou hear'st, great princess. Rest content. His words

I ratify. Yet farther, I proclaim
Thee of my train first counsellor and chief.

O eagle-cy'd discernment in the king!
O wisdom equal to his boundless power!
The purpled sycophant exclaims. Thou seest
Her matchless talents. Wanting her, thy fleet,
The floating bulwark of our hopes, laments,
Foil'd in her absence, in her conduct fails.
Thy penetrating sight directs the field;
There let her worth be hazarded no more.

Thy words are wise, the blinded prince rejoins.
Return, brave Carian, to thy naval charge.

Thus to remove her from the royal ear
Malicious guile prevails. Redoubled rage
Swells in her bosom. Demaratus sees
And calms the storm by rend'ring up his charge
To her maternal hand. Her son below'd
Dispels the furies. Then the Spartan thus:

O Artemisa, of the king's command
Be thou observant. To thy slaughter'd friends
Immediate care, far other than revenge,
Is due. The ravens gather. From his nest
Among those cliffs the eagle's rapid flight
Denotes his scent of carnage. Thou, a Greek,
Well know'st the duty sacred to the dead.

Depart; thy guide is piety. Collect,
For honourable sepulchres prepare
Those bodies, mark'd with honourable wounds.
I will assist thee. Xerxes will intrust
To my command a chosen guard of horse.

As oft, when storms in summer have o'ercast
The night with double darkness, only pierc'd
By heav'n's blue fire, while thunder shakes the pole,

The orient sun, diffusing genial warmth,
Refines the troubled air; the blast is mute;
Death-pointed flames disperse; and placid Jove
Looks down in smiles: so prudence from the lips
Of Demaratus, by his tone, his mien,
His aspect strength'ning smooth persuasion's flow,
Compos'd her spirit. She with him departs.
The king assigns a thousand horse to guard
Th' illustrious exile, and heroic dame.

BOOK VI.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE Grecian commanders, after the pursuit, retire for refreshment to a cave in the side of mount Oeta. Demophilus returns to the camp; Diomedon remains in the cave; while Dithyrambus, discovering a passage through it, ascends to the temple of the muses. After a long discourse with Melissa, the daughter of Oilcus, he intrusts him with a solemn message to Leonidas. Dithyrambus deposes this charge to Megistias, the augur. Leonidas, recalling the forces, first engaged, sends down a fresh body. Diomedon and Dithyrambus are permitted, on their own request, to continue in the field with the Platæans. By the advice of Diomedon, the Grecians advance to the broadest part of Thermopylæ, where they form a line of twenty in depth, consisting of the Platæans, Mantineaans, Tegæans, Thebans, Corinthians, Philiatians, and Mycæneans. The Spartans compose a second line in a narrower part. Behind them are placed the light armed troops under Alpheus, and further back a phalanx of Locrians under Medon, the son of Oilcus. Dieneceus commands the whole.

Now Dithyrambus and Platæa's chief,
Their former post attaining, had rejoin'd
Demophilus. Recumbent on his shield
Phraortes, gasping there, attracts their sight.
To him in pity Thespia's gallant youth
Approaching, thus his generous soul express'd.

Liv' st thou, brave Persian? By propitious Jove,
From whom the pleasing stream of mercy flows
Through mortal bosoms, lets my soul rejoice'd,
When fortune blest'd with victory my arm,
Than now to raise thee from this field of death.

His languid eyes the dying prince unclos'd,
Then with expiring voice. Vain man, forbear
To proffer me, what soon thyself must crave.
The day is quite extinguish'd in these orbs.
One moment fate allows me to disdain
Thy mercy, Grecian. Now I yield to death.

This effort made, the haughty spirit fled.
So shoots a meteor's transitory gleam
Through nitrous folds of black nocturnal clouds,
Then dissipates for ever. O'er the corse
His rev'rend face Demophilus inclin'd,
Pois'd on his lance, and thus address'd the slain.

Alas! how glorious were that bleeding breast,
Had justice brac'd the buckler on thy arm,
And to preserve a people bade thee die.
Who now shall mourn thee! Thy ungrateful king
Will soon forget thy worth. Thy native land
May raise an empty monument, but feel
No public sorrow. Thy recorded name
Shall wake among thy countrymen no sighs
For their lost hero. What to them avail'd
Thy might, thy dauntless spirit? Not to guard
Their wives, their offspring from th' oppressor's
hand;

But to extend oppression didst thou fall,
Perhaps with inborn virtues in thy soul,
Which, but thy froward destiny forbade,
By freedom cherish'd, might have blest'd mankind.
All-bounteous nature, thy impartial laws
To no selected race of men confine
The sense of glory, fortitude, and all
The nobler passions, which exalt the mind,
And render life illustrious. These thou plant'st
In ev'ry soil. But freedom like the sun
Must warm the gen'rous seeds. By her alone
They bloom, they flourish; while oppression blasts
The tender virtues: hence a spurious growth,
False honour, savage valour taint the soul,
And wild ambition: hence rapacious pow'r
The ravag'd earth unpeoples, and the brave,
A feast for dogs, th' ensanguin'd field bestrew.

He said. Around the venerable man
The warriors throng'd attentive. Conquest hush'd
Its joyful transports. O'er the horrid field,
Rude scene so late of tumult, all was calm.
So, when the song of Thracian Orpheus drew
To Hebrus' margin from their dreary seats
The savage breed, which Hæmus, wrapp'd in clouds,

Pangæus cold, and Rhodopean snows
In blood and discord nurs'd, the soothing strain

Flow'd with enchantment through the ravish'd ear,
Their fierceness melted, and, amaz'd, they learn'd
The sacred laws of justice, which the bard
Mix'd with the music of his heavenly string.

Meantime th' Arcadians with inverted arms
And banners, sad and solemn on their shields
The giant limbs of Clonius bore along
To spread a gen'ral woe. The noble corse,
Dire spectacle of carnage, passing by
To those last honours, which the dead partake,
Struck Dithyrambus. Swift his melted eye
Review'd Phraortes on the rock supine;
Then on the sage Demophilus he look'd
Intent, and spake. My heart retains thy words.
This hour may witness how rapacious pow'r
The earth unpeoples. Clonius is no more.
But he, by Greece lamented, will acquire
A signal tomb. This gallant Persian, crush'd
Beneath my fortune, bath'd in blood still warm,
May lie forgotten by his thankless king;
Yet not by me neglected shall remain
A naked corse. The good old man replies.

My gen'rous child, deserving that success
Thy arm hath gain'd! When vital breath is fled,
Our friends, our foes are equal dust. Both claim
The fun'ral passage to that future seat
Of being, where no enmity revives.
These Greek and Persian will together quaff
In amaranthine bow'rs the cup of bliss
Immortal. Him thy valour slew on earth,
In that blest'd region thou may'st find a friend.

This said, the ready Thespian he commands
To lift Phraortes from his bed of death,
Th' empurpled rock. Outstretch'd on targets broad,
Sustain'd by hands late hostile, now humane,
He follows Clonius to the fun'ral pyre.

A cave not distant from the Phocian wall
Through Oeta's cloven side had nature form'd
In spacious windings. This in moss the clad;
O'er half the entrance downward from the roots
She hung the shaggy trunks of branching firs,
To heav'n's hot ray impervious. Near the mouth
Relucant laurels spread before the sun
A broad and vivid foliage. High above,
The hill was darken'd by a solemn shade,
Diffus'd from ancient cedars. To this cave
Diomedon, Demophilus resort,
And Thespia's youth. A deep recess appears,
Cool as the azure grot, where Thetis sleeps
Beneath the vaulted ocean. Whisp'ring sounds
Of waters, trilling from the riven stone
To feed a fountain on the rocky floor,
In purest streams o'erflowing to the sea,
Allure the warriors hot with toil and thirst
To this retreat serene. Against the sides
Their disencumber'd hands repose their shields;
The helms they loosen from their glowing cheeks;
Propp'd on their spears, they rest: when Agis brings

From Lacedemon's leader these commands.
Leonidas recalls you from your toils,
Ye meritorious Grecians. You have reap'd
The first bright harvest on the field of fame.
Our eyes in wonder from the Phocian wall
On your unequal'd deeds incessant gaz'd.
To whom Plataea's chief. Go, Agis, say
To Lacedemon's ruler, that, untir'd,

Diomedon can yet exalt his spear,
Nor feels the armour heavy on his limbs.
Then shall I quit the contest? Ere he sinks,
Shall not this early sun again behold
The slaves of Xerxes tremble at my lance,
Should they adventure on a fresh assault?

To him the Thespian youth. My friend, my guide

To noble actions, since thy gen'rous heart
Intent on fame disdains to rest, O grant
I too thy glorious labours may partake,
May learn once more to imitate thy deeds.
Thou, gentlest Agis, Sparta's king entreat
Not to command us from the field of war.

Yes, persevering heroes, he reply'd,
I will return, will Sparta's king entreat
Not to command you from the field of war.

Then interpos'd Demophilus. O friend,
Who lead'st to conquest brave Plataea's sons;
Thou too, lov'd offspring of the dearest man,
Who dost restore a brother to my eyes;
My soul your magnanimity applauds:
But, O reflect, that unabating toil
Subdues the mightiest. Valour will repine,
When the weak hand obeys the heart no more.

Yet I, declining through the weight of years,
Will not assign a measure to your strength.
If still you find your vigour undecay'd,
Stay and augment your glory. So, when time
Casts from your whiten'd heads the helm aside;
When in the temples your enfeebled arms
Have hung their consecrated shields, the land,
Which gave you life, in her defence employ'd,
Shall then by honours, doubled on your age,
Bequit the gen'rous labours of your prime.

So spake the senior, and forsook the cave.
But from the fount Diomedon receives
Th' o'erflowing waters in his concave helm,
Addressing thus the genius of the stream.

Whoe'er thou art, divinity unstain'd
Of this fair fountain, till unsparing Mars
Heap'd carnage round thee, bounteous are thy streams

To me, who ill repay thee. I again
Thy silver-gleaming current must pollute,
Which, mix'd with gore, shall tinged the Malian flume.

He said, and lifted in his brimming casque
The bright, refreshing moisture. Thus repairs
The spotted panther to Hydaspes' side,
Or eastern Indus, feasted on the blood
Of some torn deer, which nigh his cruel grasp
Had roam'd unheeding in the secret shade;
Rapacious o'er the humid brink he stoops,
And in the pure and fluid crystal cools
His reeking jaws. Meantime the Thespian's eye Roves round the vaulted space; when sudden sounds

Of music, utter'd by melodious harps,
And melting voices, distant, but in tones
By distance soften'd, while the echoes sigh'd
In lulling replication, fill the vault
With harmony. In admiration mute,
With nerves unbrac'd by rapture, he, entranc'd,
Stands like an eagle, when his paring plumes
The balm of sleep relaxes, and his wings
Fall from his languid side. Plataea's chief,
Observing, rous'd the warrior. Son of Mars,

Shall music's softness from thy bosom steal
The sense of glory? From his neighb'ring camp
Perhaps the Persian sends fresh nations down.
Soon in bright steel Thermopylæ will blaze.
Awake. Accustom'd to the clang of arms,
Intent on vengeance for invaded Greece,
My ear, my spirit in this hour admit
No new sensation, nor a change of thought.

The Thespian, starting from oblivious sloth
Of ravishment and wonder, quick reply'd:
These sounds were more than human. Hark!
Again!

O honour'd friend, no adverse banner streams
In sight. No shout proclaims the Persian freed
From his late terror. Deeper let us plunge
In this mysterious dwelling of the nymphs, Whose voices charm its gloom. In smiles rejoin'd

Diomedon. I see thy soul enthral'd.
Me thou would'st rank among th' unletter'd rout
Of yon barbarians, should I press thy stay.
Time favours too. Till Agis be return'd,
We cannot act. Indulge thy eager search.
Here will I wait, a sentinel unmov'd,
To watch thy coming. In exploring haste
Th' impatient Thespian penetrates the cave.
He finds it bounded by a steep ascent
Of rugged steps; where down the hollow rock
A modulation clear, distinct and slow
In movement solemn from a lyric string,
Dissolves the stagnant air to sweet accord
With these sonorous lays. Celestial maids!
Whistle, from our cliffs contemplating the war,
We celebrate our heroes, O impart
Orphean magic to the pious strain!
That from the mountain we may call the groves,
Swift motion through these marble fragments breathe

To overleap the high Oetæan ridge,
And crush the fell invaders of our peace.

The animated hero upward springs
Light, as a kindled vapour, which, confin'd
In subterranean cavities, at length
Pervading, rives the surface to enlarge
The long-imprison'd flame. Ascending soon,
He sees, he stands abash'd, then rev'rend kneels.

An aged temple with insculptur'd forms
Of Jove's harmonious daughters, and a train
Of nine bright virgins, round their priestesses rang'd,
Who stood in awful majesty, receive
His unexpected feet. The song is hush'd.
The measur'd movement on the lyric chord
In faint vibration dies. The priestesses sage,
Whose elevated port and aspect rose
To more, than mortal dignity, her lyre
Consigning graceful to attendant hands,
Looks with reproof. The loose, uncover'd hair
Shades his inclining forehead, while a flush
Of modest crimson dyes his youthful cheek.
Her pensivè visage softens to a smile
On worth so blooming, which the thus accosts.

I should reprove thee, inadvertent youth,
Who through the sole access, by nature left
To this pure mansion, with intruding steps
Dost interrupt our lays. But rise. Thy sword
Perhaps embellish'd that triumphant scene,
Which wak'd these harps to celebrating notes.

What is the impress on thy warlike shield?

A golden eagle on my shield I bear,
Still bending low, he answers. She pursues.

Art thou possessor of that glorious orb,
By me distinguish'd in the late defeat
Of Asia, driven before thee? Speak thy name.
Who is thy sire? Where lies thy native seat?
Com'st thou for glory to this fatal spot,
Or from barbarian violence to guard
A parent's age, a spouse, and tender babes,
Who call thee father? Humbly he again.

I am of Thespia, Dithyrambus nam'd,
The son of Harmatides. Snatch'd by fate,
He to his brother, and my second sire,
Demophilus, consign'd me. Thespia's sons
By him are led. His dictates I obey,
Him to resemble strive. No infant voice
Calls me a father. To the nuptial vow
I am a stranger, and among the Greeks
The least entitled to thy partial praise.

None more entitled, interpos'd the dame.
Deserving hero, thy demeanor speaks,
It justifies the fame, so widely spread,
Of Harmatides' heir. O grace and pride
Of that fair city, which the muses love,
Thee an acceptant visitant I hail
In this their ancient temple. Thou shalt view
Their sacred haunts. Descending from the dome,
She thus pursues. First know, my youthful hours
Were exercis'd in knowledge. Homer's muse
To daily meditation won my soul,
With my own spirit mix'd undying sparks
Of her own rapture. By a father sage Conducted, cities, manners, men I saw,
Their institutes and customs. I return'd.
The voice of Locris call'd me to sustain
The holy function here. Now throw thy sight
Across that meadow, whose enliven'd blades
Wave in the breeze, and gladden in the sun
Behind the hoary fane. My bleating train
Are nourish'd there, a spot of plenty spar'd,
From this surrounding wilderness. Remark
That fluid mirror, edg'd by shrubs and flow'rs,
Shrubs of my culture, flow'rs by Iris dress'd.
Nor pass that smiling concave on the hill,
Whose pointed crags are soften'd to the sight
By figs and grapes. She pauses; while around
His eye, delighted, roves in more delight
Soon to the spot returning, where she stood
A deity in semblance, o'er the place
Presiding awful, as Minerva wife,
August like Juno, like Diana pure,
But not more pure than fair. The beautiful lake,

The pines wide-branching, falls of water clear,
The multifarious glow on Flora's lap
Lose all attraction, as her gracious lips
Resume their tale. In solitude remote
Here I have dwelt contemplative, serene,
Oft through the rocks responsive to my lyre,
Oft to th' Amphictyons in assembly full,
When at this shrine their annual vows they pay,
In measur'd declamation I repeat
The praise of Greece, her liberty and laws.
From me the hinds, who tend their wand'ring goats
In these rude purlieus, modulate their pipes.

To smother cadence, Justice from my tongue
Diffentions calms, which ev'n in deserts rend
Th' unquiet heart of man. Now furious war
My careful thoughts engages, which delight
To help the free, th' oppressor to confound.
Thy feet auspicious fortune hither brings,
In thee a noble messenger I find.

Go, in these words Leonidas address.
"Melissa, priestess of the tutelè nine,
"By their behests invites thy honour'd feet
"To her divine abode. Thee, first of Greeks,
"To conference of high import she calls."

Th' obedient Thespiàn down the holy cave
Returns. His swiftness suddenly prevents His friend's impatience, who salutes him thus.

Let thy adventure be hereafter told.
Look yonder. Fresh battalions from the camp
File through the Phocian barrier to construct
Another phalanx, moving tow'r of war,
Which scorns the strength of Asia. Let us arm;
That, ready station'd in the glorious van,
We may secure permission from the king
There to continue, and renew the fight.

That instant brings Megistias near the grot.
To Sparta's phalanx his paternal hand
Was leading Menalippus. Not unheard
By Dithyrambus in their slow approach,
The father warns a young and lib'ral mind.

Sprung from a distant boundary of Greece,
A foreigner in Sparta, cherish'd there,
Instructed, honour'd, nor unworthy held
To fight for Lacedæmon in her line
Of discipline and valour, lo! my son,
The hour is come to prove thy gen'rous heart:
That in thy hand, not ill-instructed, shine
The spear and buckler to maintain the cause
Of thy protectress. Let thy mind recal
Leonidas. On yonder bulwark plac'd,
He overlooks the battle; he discerns
The bold and fearful. May the gods I serve,
Grant me to hear Leonidas approve
My son! No other boon my age implores.

The augur paus'd. The animated cheek
Of Menalippus glows. His eager look
Demands the fight. This struck the tender fire, Who then with moisten'd eyes. Remember too,

A father sees thy danger. Oh! my child,
To me thy honour, as to thee is dear;
Yet court not death. By ev'ry filial tie,
By all my fondness, all my cares I sue!
Amid the conflict, or the warm pursuit,
Still by the wife Dienece abide.
His prudent valour knows th' unerring paths
Of glory. He admits thee to his side.
He will direct thy ardour. Go—They part.

Megistias, turning, is accosted thus
By Dithyrambus. Venerable fear,
So may that son, whose merit I esteem,
Whose precious head in peril I would die
To guard, return in triumph to thy breast,
As thou deliver'st to Laconia's king
A high and solemn message. While anew
The line is forming, from th' embattled field
I must not stray, uncall'd. A sacred charge Through hallow'd lips will best approach the king.

VOL. XI.

The Acarnanian in suspense remains
And silence. Dithyrambus quick relates Melissa's words, describes the holy grot,
Then quits th' instructed augur, and attends Diomedon's loud call. That fervid chief
Was reassuming his distinguish'd arms,
Which, as a splendid recompense, he bore
From grateful Athens, for achievements bold;
When he with brave Miltiades redeem'd
Her domes from Asian flames. The sculptur'd helm

Enclos'd his manly temples. From on high
A four-fold plumage nodded; while beneath
A golden dragon with effulgent scales,
Itself the crest, shot terror. On his arm
He brac'd his buckler. Bord'ring on the rim,
Gorgonian serpents twin'd. Within, the form
Of Pallas, martial goddess, was embos'd.
Low, as her feet, the graceful tunic flow'd.
Betwixt two griffins on her helmet sat
A sphynx with wings expanded; while the face
Of dire Medusa on her breastplate frown'd.
One hand supports a javelin, which confounds
The pride of kings. The other leads along
A blooming virgin, Victory, whose brow
A wreath encircles. Laurels she presents;
But from her shoulders all her plumes were shorn,
In favour'd Athens ever now to reit.
This dread of Asia on his mighty arm
Diomedon uprear'd. He snatch'd his lance,
Then spake to Dithyrambus. See my friend,
Alone of all the Grecians, who sustain'd
The former onset, inexhausted stand
Platæa's sons. They well may keep the field,
Who with unshaken'd nerves endur'd that day,
Which saw ten myriads of Barbarians driv'n
Back to their ships, and Athens left secure.
Charge in our line. Amid the foremost rank
Thy valour shall be plac'd to share command,
And ev'ry honour with Platæa's chief.

He said no more, but tow'rd's the Grecian van Impetuous, ardent strode. Nor slow behind
The pride of Thespia, Dithyrambus mov'd.
Like youthful Hermes in celestial arms;
When lightly graceful with his feather'd feet.
Along Scamander's flow'ry verge he pass'd,
To aid th' incens'd divinities of Greece
Against the Phrygian tow'rs. Their eager haste
Soon brings the heroes to th' embattling ranks,
Whom thus the brave Diomedon exhorts.

Not to contend, but vanquish are ye come.
Here in the blood of fugitives your spears
Shall unoppos'd, be stain'd. My valiant friends,
But chief, ye men of Sparta, view that space,
Where from the Malian gulf more distant rise
Th' Oetæan rocks, and le's confine the streights.
There if we range, extending our wide front,
An ampler scope to havoc will be giv'n.
To him Dienece. Platean friend,
Well dost thou counsel. On that widening ground

Close to the mountain place thy vet'ran files.
Proportion'd numbers from thy right shall stretch
Quite to the shore in phalanx deep like thine.
The Spartans wedg'd in this contracted part
Will I contain. Behind me Alpheus waits
With lighter bodies. Further back the line

K. 5

Of Locris forms a strong reserve. He said.
The different bands, confiding in his skill,
Move on successive. The Platæans first Against the hill are station'd. In their van Dithyrambus rank'd. Triumphant joy
Defends their bosoms, sparkles in their eyes.

Bless'd be the great Diomedon, they shout,
Who brings another hero to our line.
Hail! Dithyrambus. Hail! illustrious youth.
Had tender age permitted, thou hadst gain'd
An early palm at Marathon. His post
He takes. His gladness blushes on his cheek
Amid the foremost rank. Around him crowd
The long-try'd warriors. Their unnumber'd scars
Discovering, they in ample phrase recount
Their various dangers. He their wounds surveys
In veneration, nor disdains to hear
The oft-repeated tale. From Sparta's king
Return'd, the gracious Agis these address'd.

Leonidas salutes Platæa's chief
And Dithyrambus. To your swords he grants
A further effort with Platæa's band,
If yet by toil unconquer'd—but I see,
That all, unyielding, court the promis'd fight.
Hail! glorious veterans. This signal day
May your victorious arms augment the wreaths
Around your venerable heads, and grace
Thermopylæ with Marathonian fame.

This said, he hastens back. Meantime advance
The Mantinean, Diophantus brave,
Then Hegesander, Tegea's dauntless chief,
Who near Diomedon in equal range
Erect their standards. Next the Thebans form.
Alcmaeon, bold Eupalamus succeed
With their Corinthian and Phliasian bands.
Last on the Malian shore Mycenes youth
Aristobulus draws. From Oeta's side
Down to the bay in well-connected length
Each gleaming rank contains a hundred spears,
While twenty bucklers ev'ry rank condense.
A sure support, Dienees behind
Arrays the Spartans. Godlike Agis here,
There Menalippus by their leader stand
Two bulwarks. Breathing ardour in the rear,
The words of Alpheus fan the growing flame
Of expectation through his light arm'd force;
While Polydorus present in his thoughts
To vengeance sharpens his indignant soul.

No foe is seen. No distant shout is heard.
This pause of action Dithyrambus chofe.
The solemn scene on Oeta to his friend
He open'd large; pourtray'd Melissa's form,
Reveal'd her mandate; when Platæa's chief.

Such elevation of a female mind
Bespeaks Melissa worthy to obtain
The conference she asks. This wond'rous dame
Amid her hymns conceives some lofty thought
To make these slaves, who loiter in their camp,
Dread ev'n our women. But, my gentle friend,
Say, Dithyrambus; whom the liquid spell
Of song enchants, should I reproach the gods,
Who form'd me cold to music's pleasing pow'r?
Or should I thank them, that the soft'ning charm
Of sound or numbers ne'er dissolv'd my soul!
Yet I confess, thy valour breaks that charm,
Which may enrapture, not unman thy breast.
To whom his friend. Doth he, whose lays record

The woes of Priam, and the Grecian fame,
Doth he dissolve thy spirit? Yet he flows
In all the sweetest harmony can breathe.

No, by the gods Diomedon rejoins.
I feel that mighty muse. I see the car
Of fierce Achilles, see th' encumber'd wheels
O'er heroes driv'n, and clotted with their gore.
Another too demands my soul's esteem,
Brave Æschylus of Athens. I have seen
His muse begirt by furies, while she swell'd
Her tragic numbers. Him in equal rage
His country's foes o'erwhelming I beheld
At Marathon. If Phœbus would diffuse
Such fire through ev'ry bard, the tuneful band
Might in themselves find heroes for their songs.
But, son of Harmatides, list thine eye
To yonder point, remotest in the bay.
Those seeming clouds, which o'er the billows fleet

Successive round the jutting land are fail.
Th' Athenian pendant hastens to salute
Leonidas. O Æschylus, my friend,
First in the train of Phœbus and of Mars,
Be thou on board! Swift-bounding o'er the waves,
Come, and be witness to heroic deeds!
Brace thy strong harp with loftier-sounding chords
To celebrate this battle! Fall who may;
But if they fall with honour, let their names
Round festive goblets in thy numbers ring,
And joy, not grief, accompany the song.
Converting thus, their courage they beguil'd,
Which else impatient of inactive hours
At long-suspended glory had repin'd.

BOOK VII.

THE ARGUMENT.

MEGISTIAS delivers Melissa's message to Leonidas. Medon, her brother, conducts him to the temple. She furnishes Leonidas with the means of executing a design he had premeditated to annoy the enemy. They are joined by a body of mariners under the command of Æschylus, a celebrated poet and warrior among the Athenians. Leonidas takes the necessary measures; and, observing from a summit of Oeta the motions of the Persian army, expects another attack: this is renewed with great violence by Hyperanthes, Abrocomes, and the principal Persian leaders at the head of some chosen troops.

MEGISTIAS, urging to unwonted speed
His aged steps, by Dithyrambus charg'd
With sage Melissa's words, had now rejoind
The king of Lacedæmon. At his side
Was Maron posted, watchful to receive
His high injunction. In the rear they stood
Behind two thousand Locrians, deep-array'd
By warlike Medon, from Oileus sprung.
Leonidas to them his anxious mind
Was thus disclosing. Medon, Maron, hear.
From this low rampart my exploring eye
But half commands the action, yet hath mark'd
Enough for caution. You barbarian camp,
Immense, exhaustless, deluging the ground
With myriads, still o'erflowing, may consume
By endless numbers, and unceasing toil

The Grecian strength. Not marble is our flesh,
Nor adamant our sinews. Sylvan pow'rs,
Who dwell on Oeta, your superior aid
We must solicit. Your stupendous cliffs
In those loose rocks, and branches' trunks contain

More fell annoyance than the arm of man.

He ended, when Megistias, Virtuous king,
Melissa, priestess of the tuneful nine,
By their behests invites thy honour'd feet
To her chaste dwelling, seated on that hill.
To conference of high import she calls
Thee, first of Grecians. Medon interpos'd.

She is my sister. Justice rules her ways
With piety and wisdom. To her voice
The nations round give ear. The muses breathe
Their inspiration through her spotless soul
Which borders on divinity. She calls
On thee. O truly styl'd the first of Greeks,
Regard her call. Yon cliff's projecting head
To thy discernment will afford a scope
More full, more certain; thence thy skilful eye
Will best direct the fight. Melissa's fire
Was ever present to the king in thought,
Who thus to Medon. Lead, Oileus' son.
Before the daughter of Oileus place
My willing feet. They harken to the cave.
Megistias, Maron follow. Through the rock
Leonidas, ascending to the fane,
Rose like the god of morning from the cell
Of night, when, shedding cheerfulness and day
On bill and vale emblaz'd with dewy gems,
He gladdens nature. Lacedemon's king,
Majestically graceful and serene,
Dispels the rigour in that solemn feat
Of holy sequestration. On the face
Of pensive ey'd religion rapture glows
In admiration of the goldlike man.
Advanc'd Melissa. He her proffer'd hand
In hue, in purity like snow, receiv'd.
A heav'n-illum'd dignity of look
On him the fix'd. Rever'd by all, she spake.

Hail! chief of men, selected by the gods
For purer fame, than Hercules acquir'd.
This hour allows no pause. She leads the king
With Medon, Maron, and Megistias down
A slope, declining to the mossy verge,
Which terminates the mountain. While they pass,
She thus proceeds. These marble masses view,
Which lie dispers'd around you. They were hewn

From yonder quarry. Note those pond'rous beams,
The sylvan offspring of that hill. With these
At my request th' Amphictyons from their seat
Of gen'ral council piously decreed
To raise a dome, the ornament of Greece.
Observe those wither'd firs, those mould'ring
oaks,

Down that declivity, half-rooted, bent,
Inviting human force—Then look below.
There lies Thermopylæ. I see, exclaims
The high-conceiving hero. I recal
Thy father's words and forecast. He presag'd,
I should not find his daughter's counsel vain.
He to accomplish what thy wisdom plans,
Hath amplest means supply'd. Go, Medon, bring

The thousand peasants from th' Ctean vale, Detach'd. Their leader Melibæus bring.
Fly, Maron. Ev'ry instrument provide
To fell the trees, to drag the massy beams,
To lift the broad-hewn-fragments. Are not these
For sacred use reserv'd, Megistias said?
Can these be wielded by the hand of Mars
Without pollution? In a solemn tone
The priestess answer'd. Rev'rend man, who bear'st

Pontific wreaths, and thou, great captain, hear.
Forbear to think that my unprompted mind,
Calm and sequester'd in religion's peace,
Could have devis'd a stratagem of war;
Or, unpermitted, could resign to Mars
These rich materials, gather'd to restore
In strength and splendour yon decrepid walls,
And that time-shaken roof. Rejecting sleep,
Last night I lay, contriving swift revenge
On these Barbarians, whose career profane
O'erturns the Grecian temples, and devotes
Their holy bow'rs to flames. I left my couch,
Long ere the sun his orient gates unbarr'd.
Beneath yon beach my pensive head reclin'd.
The rivulets, the fountains, warbling round,
Attracted slumber. In a dream I saw
Calliope. Her sisters, all with harps,
Were rang'd around her; as their Parian forms
Show in the temple. Dost thou sleep, she said?
Melissa, dost thou sleep? The barb'rous host Approaches Greece. The first of Grecians comes
By death to vanquish. Priestess, let him hurl
These marble heaps, these consecrated beams,
Our fane itself to crush the impious ranks.
The hero summon to our sacred hill.
Reveal the promis'd succour. All is due
To liberty against a tyrant's pride.
She struck her shell. In concert full reply'd
The fister lyres. Leonidas they sung
In ev'ry note and dialect yet known,
In measures new, in language yet to come.

She finish'd. Then Megistias. Dear to heav'n,
By nations honour'd, and in tow'ring thought
O'er either sex pre-eminent, thy words
To me a soldier and a priest suffice.
I hesitate no longer. But the king,
Wrapt in ecstatic contemplation, stood,
Revolving deep an answer, which might suit
His dignity and hers. At length he spake.

Not Lacedemon's whole collected state
Of senate, people, ephori, and kings,
Not the Amphictyons, whose convention holds
The universal majesty of Greece,
E'er drew such reverence, as thy single form,
O all-surpassing woman, worthy child
Of time-renown'd Oileus. In thy voice
I hear the goddess, Liberty. I see
In thy sublimity of look and port
That daughter bright of Eleutherian Jove.
Me thou hast prais'd. My conscious spirit feels,
That not to triumph in thy virtuous praise
Were want of virtue. Yet, illustrious dame,
Were I assur'd, that oracles delude;
That, unavailing, I should spill my blood;
That all the muses of subjected Greece
Hereafter would be silent, and my name
Be ne'er transmitted to recording time;

There is in virtue for her sake alone,
 What should uphold my resolution firm.
 My country's laws I never would survive.
 Mov'd at his words, reflecting on his fate,
 She had relax'd her dignity of mind,
 Had sunk in sadness; but her brother's helm
 Before her beams. Relumining her night,
 He through the cave like Heiferus ascends,
 Th' Oilean hinds conducting to achieve
 The enterprise, the counsels. Now her ear
 Is pierc'd by notes, shrill sounding from the vault.
 Upstarts a diff'rent band, alert and light,
 Athenian sailors. Long and separate files
 Of lusty shoulders, eas'd by union, bear
 Thick, well-compacted cables, wont to heave
 The resist anchor. To a naval pipe,
 As if one soul invigorated all,
 And all compos'd one body, they had trod
 In equal paces, mazy, yet unbroke
 Throughout their passage. So the spinal strength
 Of some portentous serpent, whom the heats
 Of Libya breed, indissolubly knit,
 But flexible, a-crofs the sandy plain,
 Or up the mountain draws his spotted length,
 Or where a winding excavation leads
 Through rocks abrupt and wild. Of stature large,
 In arms, which show'd simplicity of strength,
 No decoration of redundant art,
 With sable horse-hair, floating down his back,
 A warrior moves behind. Compos'd in gait,
 Austerely grave and thoughtful, on his shield
 The democratic majesty he bore
 Of Athens. Carv'd in emblematic bras,
 Her image stood with Pallas by her side,
 And trampled under each victorious foot
 A regal crown, one Persian, one usurp
 By her own tyrants on the well-fought plain
 Of Marathon confounded. He commands
 These future guardians of their country's weal,
 Of gen'ral Greece the bulwarks. Their high deeds
 From Artemisium, from th' empurpled shores
 Of Salamis renown shall echo wide;
 Shall tell posterity in latest times,
 That naval fortitude controuls the world.
 Swift Maron, following, brings a vig'rous band
 Of Helots. Ev'ry instrument they wield
 To delve, to hew, to heave; and active last Bounds Melibœus, vigilant to urge
 The tardy forward. To Laconia's king
 Advanc'd th' Athenian leader, and began:
 Thou godlike ruler of Eurotas, hail!
 Thee by my voice Themistocles salutes,
 The admiral of Athens. I conduct
 By public choice the squadron of my tribe,
 And Æschylus am call'd. Our chief hath giv'n
 Three days to glory on Eubœa's coast
 Whose promontories almost rise to meet
 Thy ken from Oeta's cliffs. This morning saw
 The worsted foe, from Artemisium driv'n,
 Leave their disabled ships, and floating wrecks
 For Grecian trophies. When the fight was clos'd,
 I was detach'd to bring th' auspicious news,
 To bid thee welcome. Fortunate my keel
 Hath swiftly borne me. Joyful I concur
 In thy attempt. Appris'd by yonder chiefs,
 Who met me landing, instant from the ships

A thousand gallant mariners I drew,
 Who till the setting sun shall lend their toil.
 Themistocles and thou accept my heart,
 Leonidas reply'd, and closely strain'd
 The brave, the learn'd Athenian to his breast.
 To envy is ignoble, to admire
 Th' activity of Athens will become
 A king of Sparta, who like thee condemn'd
 His country's sloth. But Sparta now is arm'd.
 Thou shalt commend. Behold me station'd here
 To watch the wild vicissitudes of war,
 Direct the course of slaughter. To this post
 By that superior woman I was call'd.
 By long protracted fight left fainting Greece
 Should yield, outnumber'd, my enlighten'd soul
 Through her, whom heav'n enlightens, hath devis'd
 To whelm the num'rous, persevering foe
 In hideous death, and signalize the day
 With horrors new to war. The muses prompt
 The bright achievement. Lo! from Athens smiles
 Minerva too. Her swift, auspicious aid
 In thee we find, and these, an ancient race,
 By her and Neptune cherish'd. Straight he meets
 The gallant train, majestic with his arms
 Outstretch'd, in this applauding train he spake:
 O lib'ral people, earliest arm'd to shield
 Not your own Athens more, than gen'ral Greece,
 You best deserve her gratitude. Her praise
 Will rank you foremost on the rolls of fame.
 They hear, they gaze, revering and rever'd.
 Fresh numbers muster, rushing from the hills,
 The thickets round. Melissa, pointing, spake:
 I am their leader. Native of the hills
 Are these, the rural worshippers of Pan,
 Who breathes an ardour through their humble minds
 To join your warriors. Vassals these, not mine,
 But of the muses, and their hallow'd laws,
 Administer'd by me. Their patient hands
 Make culture smile, where nature seems to chide;
 Nor wanting my instructions, or my pray'rs,
 Fertility they scatter by their toil
 Around this aged temple's wild domain.
 Is Melibœus here! Thou fence secure
 To old Oileus from the cares of time,
 Thrice art thou welcome. Useful, wise, belov'd,
 Where'er thou sojournest, on Oeta known,
 As oft the bounty of a father's love
 Thou on Melissa's solitude dost pour,
 Be thou director of these mountain hinds.
 Th' important labour to inspiring airs
 From flutes and harps in symphony with hymns
 Of holy virgins, ardent all perform,
 In bands divided under diff'rent chiefs.
 Huge timbers, blocks of marble to remove.
 They first attempted; then assembled stones
 Loose in their beds, and wither'd trunks, uptora
 By tempests; next dismember'd from the rock
 Broad, rugged fragments; from the mountains hew'd
 Their venerable firs, and aged oaks,
 Which, of their branches by the lightning bar'd,
 Presented still against the blasting flame
 Their hoary pride unshaken. These the Greeks,
 But chief th' Athenian mariners, to force
 Uniting skill, with massy leavers heave,

With strong-knit cables drag : till, now dispos'd,
Where great Leonidas appoints, the piles
Nod o'er the Streights. This new and sudden scene

Might lift imagination to relief,
That Orpheus and Amphion from their beds
Of ever blooming asphodel had heard
The muses call; had brought their fabled harps,
At whose mellifluous charm once more the trees
Had burst their fibrous bands, and marbles leap'd
In rapid motion from the quarry's womb,
That day to follow harmony in aid
Of gen'rous valour. Fancy might discern
Cerulean Tethys, from her coral grot
Emerging, seated on her pearly car,
With Nereids, floating on the surge below,
To view in wonder from the Malian bay
The Attic sons of Neptune; who forsook
Their wooden walls to range th' Ætean crags,
To rend the forests, and disjoin the rocks.

Meantime a hundred sheep ate slain. Their limbs

From burning piles fume grateful. Bounty spreads
A decent board. Simplicity attends.
Then spake the priestesses. Long-enduring chiefs,
Your efforts, now accomplish'd, may admit
Reflection due to this hard labour'd train,
Due to yourselves. Her hospitable smile
Wins her well-chosen guests, Laconia's king,
Her brother, Maron, Æschylus divine
With Acarnania's priest. Her first commands
To Melibœus sedulous and blithe
Distribute plenty through the toiling crowd.
Then, skreen'd beneath close umbrage of an oak,
Each care-divested chief the banquet shares.

Cool breezes, whisp'ring, flutter in the leaves,
Whose verdure, pendent in an arch, repel
The west'ring sun's hot glare. Favonius bland
His breath impregnates with exhaling sweets
From flow'ry beds, whose scented clusters deck
The gleaming pool in view. Fast by, a brook
In limpid lampes over native steps
Attunes his cadence to sonorous strings,
And liquid accents of Melissa's maids
The floating air in melody respire.
A rapture mingles in the calm repast.
Uprises Æschylus. A goblet full
He grasps. To those divinities, who dwell
In yonder temple, this libation first,
To thee, benignant hostess, next I pour,
Then to thy fame, Leonidas. He said.
His breast, with growing heat distended, prompts
His eager hand, to whose expressive sign
One of the virgins cedes her sacred lyre.
Their choral song complacency restrains.
The soul of music, bursting from his touch,
At once gives birth to sentiment sublime.

O Hercules, and Perseus, he began,
Star-spangled twins of Leda, and the rest
Of Jove's immediate seed, your splendid acts
Mankind protected, while the race was rude;
While o'er the earth's unciviliz'd extent
The savage monster, and the ruffian sway'd,
More savage still. No policy, nor laws
Had fram'd societies. By single strength
A single ruffian, or a monster fell.
The legislator rose. Three lights in Greece,

Lycurgus, Solon and Zaleucus blaz'd.
Then, substituting wisdom, Jove profuse
Of his own blood no longer, gave us more
In discipline and manners, which can form
A hero like Leonidas, than all
The god-begotten progeny before.
The pupils next of Solon claim the muse.
Sound your hoarse conchs, ye Tritons. You beheld

The Atlantæan shape of slaughter wade
Through your astonish'd deeps, his purple arm
Uplifting high before th' Athenian line.
You saw bright conquest, riding on the gale,
Which swell'd their sails; saw terror at their helms

To guide their brazen beaks on Asia's pride.
Her adamantine grapple from their decks
Fate threw, and ruin on the hostile fleet
Inextricably fasten'd. Sound, ye nymphs
Of Oeta's mountains, of her woods and streams,
Who hourly witness to Melissa's worth,
Ye oreads, dryads, naiads, found her praise.
Proclaim Zaleucus by his daughter grac'd
Like Solon and Lycurgus by their sons.

Laconia's hero, and the priestess bow'd
Their foreheads grateful to the bard sublime.
She, rising, takes the word. More sweet thy lyre
To friendship's ear, than terrible to foes
Thy spear in battle, though the keenest point,
Which ever pierc'd Barbarians. Close we here
The song and banquet. Hark! a distant din
From Asia's camp requires immediate care.

She leads. Along the rocky verge they pass.
In calm delight Leonidas surveys
All in the order, which he last assign'd;
As o'er Thermopylæ beneath he cast
A wary look. The mountain's furthest crag
Now reach'd, Melissa to the king began:

Observe that space below, dispers'd in dales,
In hollows, winding through dissever'd rocks.
The slender outlet, skreen'd by yonder shrubs,
Leads to the pass. There stately to my view
The martial queen of Caria yester sun,
Descending, show'd. Her loudly I reprovd.
But she, devoted to the Persian king,
In ambush there preserv'd his flying host.
She last retreated; but, retreating, prov'd
Her valour equal to a better cause.
Again I see the heroine approach.

Megistias then. I see a powerful arm,
Sustaining firm the large, emblazon'd shield,
Which, fashion'd first in Caria, we have learn'd
To imitate in Greece. Sublime her port
Bespeaks a mighty spirit. Priestess, look.
An act of piety she now performs,
Directing those, perhaps her Carian band,
To bear dead brethren from the bloody field.
Among the horsemen an exalted form
Like Demaratus strikes my searching eye.
To me, recalling his transcendent rank
In Sparta once, he seems a languid sun,
Which dimly sinks in exhalations dark,
Enveloping his radiance. While he spake,
Intent on martial duty Medon views
The dang'rous thicket; Lacedæmon's chief,
Around the region his consid'rate eye
Extending, marks each movement of the foe.

Th' imperial Persian from his lofty car
 Had in the morning's early conflict seen
 His vanquish'd army, pouring from the streights
 Back to their tents, and o'er his camp dispers'd
 In confederation; as a river bursts
 Impetuous from his fountain, then, enlarg'd,
 Spreads a dead surface o'er some level marsh.
 Th' astonish'd king thrice started from his seat;
 Shame, fear and indignation rent his breast;
 As ruin irresistible were near
 To overwhelm his millions. Haste, he call'd
 To Hyperanthes, haste and meet the Greeks.
 Their daring rage, their insolence rebel.
 From such dishonour vindicate our name.

His royal brother through th' extensive camp
 Obedient mov'd. Deliberate and brave,
 Each active prince from ev'ry tent remote,
 The hardiest troops he summon'd. Caria's queen,
 To Hyperanthes bound by firm esteem
 Of worth, unrivall'd in the Persian court,
 In solemn pace was now returning slow
 Before a band, transporting from the field
 Their slain companions to the sandy beach.

She stoop'd, and thus address'd him. Learn, O prince,

From one, whose wishes on thy merit wait,
 The only means to bind thy gallant brow
 In fairest wreathes. To break the Grecian line
 In vain ye struggle, unarray'd and lax,
 Depriv'd of union. Try to form one band
 In order'd ranks, and emulate the foe.
 Nor to secure a thicket next the pass
 Forget. Selected numbers station there.
 Farewell, young hero. May thy fortune prove Unlike to mine. Had Asia's millions spar'd
 One myriad to sustain me, none had seen
 Me quit the dang'rous contest. But the head
 Of base Argestes on some future day
 Shall feel my treasure'd vengeance. From the fleet
 I only stay, till burial rites are paid
 To these dead Carians. On this fatal strand
 May Artemisia's grief appease your ghosts,
 My faithful subjects, sacrific'd in vain.

The hero grateful and respectful heard,
 What soon his warmth neglected at the sight
 Of spears, which flam'd innumerable round.
 Beyond the rest in lustre was a band,
 The satellites of Xerxes. They forsook
 Their constant orbit round th' imperial throne
 At this dread crisis. To a myriad fix'd,
 From their unchanging number they deriv'd
 The title of Immortals. Light their spears;
 Set in pomegranates of resplendent gold.
 Or burnish'd silver, were the slender blades.
 Magnificent and stately were the ranks.
 The prince, commanding mute attention, spake.

In two divisions part your number, chiefs.
 One will I lead to onset. In my ranks
 Abrocomes, Hydernes shall advance,
 Pandates, Mindus, Intaphernes brave
 To wrest this short-liv'd victory from Greece.
 Thou, Abradates, by Solarnes join'd,
 Orontes and Mazæus, keep the rest
 From action. Future succour they must lend,
 Should envious fate exhaust our num'rous files.
 For, O pure Mithra, may thy radiant eye
 Ne'er see us, yielding to ignoble flight,

The Persian name dishonour. May the acts
 Of our renown'd progenitors, who, led
 By Cyrus, gave one monarch to the east,
 In us revive. O think, ye Persian lords,
 What endless infamy will blast your names;
 Should Greece, that narrow portion of the earth,
 Your pow'r defy: when Babylon hath low'r'd
 Her tow'ring crest, when Lydia's pride is quell'd
 In Cræsus vanquish'd, when her empire lost
 Ecbatana deplores. Ye chosen guard,
 Your king's immortal bulwark, O reflect,
 What deeds from your superior swords he claims.
 You share his largest bounty. To your faith,
 Your constancy and prowess he commits
 His throne, his person, and this day his fame.

They wave their banners, blazing in the sun,
 Who then three hours tow'rd Hesperus had driv'n
 From his meridian height. Amid their shouts
 The hoarse-responding billows are not heard.
 Of diff'rent nations, and in diff'rent garb,
 Innumeros and vary'd like the shells,
 By restless Tethys scatter'd on the beach,
 O'er which they trod, the multitude advanc'd,
 Straight by Leonidas descri'd. The van
 Abrocomes and Hyperanthes led,
 Pandates, Mindus. Violent their march
 Sweeps down the rocky, hollow-sounding pass.
 So, where th' unequal globe in mountains swells,
 A torrent rolls his thund'ring surge between
 The steep-erected cliffs; tumultuous dash
 The waters, bursting on the pointed crags:
 The valley roars; the marble channel foams.
 Th' undaunted Greeks immoveably withstand
 The dire encounter. Soon th' impetuous shock
 Of thousands and of myriads shakes the ground.
 Stupendous scene of terror! Under hills,
 Whose sides, half-arching, o'er the hosts project,
 The unabating fortitude of Greece
 Maintains her line, th' untrain'd Barbarians charge
 In savage fury. With inverted trunks,
 Or bent obliquely from the shagged ridge,
 The silvan horrors overshadow the fight.
 The clanging trump, the crash of mingled spears,
 The groan of death, and war's discordant shouts
 Alarm the echoes in their neighb'ring caves;
 Woods, cliffs and shores return the dreadful sound.

BOOK VIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

HYPERANTHES discontinuing the fight, while he waits for reinforcements, Teribazus, a Persian remarkable for his merit and learning, and highly beloved by Hyperanthes, but unhappy in his passion for Ariana, a daughter of Darius, advances from the rest of the army to the rescue of a friend in distress, who lay wounded on the field of battle. Teribazus is attacked by Diophantus, the Mantinean, whom he overcomes; then engaging with Dithyrambus, is himself slain. Hyperanthes hastens to his succour. A general battle ensues, where Diomedon distinguishes his valour. Hyperanthes and Abrocomes, partly by their own efforts, and partly by the perfidy of the Thebans, who desert the line, being on the point of forcing the Grecians, are repulsed by the Lacedæmoni-ans. Hyperanthes composes a select body out of the Persian standing forces, and, making an improvement in their discipline, renews the attack; upon which Leonidas changes the disposition of his army. Hyperanthes and the ablest Persian generals are driven out of the field, and several thousands of the Barbarians, circumvented in the pass, are entirely destroyed.

AMID the van of Persia was a youth,
 Nam'd Teribazus, not for golden stores,
 Not for wide pastures, travers'd o'er by herds,
 By fleece-abounding sheep, or gen'rous steeds,
 Nor yet for pow'r, nor splendid honours fam'd.
 Rich was his mind in ev'ry art divine;
 Through ev'ry path of science had he walk'd,
 The votary of wisdom. In the years,
 When tender down invests the ruddy cheek,
 He with the Magi turn'd the hallow'd page
 Of Zoroastres. Then his tow'ring thoughts
 High on the plumes of contemplation soar'd.
 He from the lofty Babylonian fane
 With learn'd Chaldeans trac'd the heav'nly sphere,
 There number'd o'er the vivid fires, which gleam
 On night's bespangled bosom. Nor unheard
 Were Indian sages from sequester'd bow'rs,
 While on the banks of Ganges they disclos'd
 The pow'rs of nature, whether in the woods,
 The fruitful glebe, or flow'r, the healing plant,
 The limpid waters, or the ambient air,
 Or in the purer element of fire.
 The realm of old Sesostris next he view'd,
 Mysterious Egypt with her hidden rites
 Of Isis and Osiris. Last he fought
 Th' Ionian Greeks, from Athens sprung, nor pass'd
 Miletis by, which once in rapture heard
 The tongue of Thales, nor Priene's walls,
 Where wisdom dwelt with Bias, nor the feat
 Of Pittacus, rever'd on Lesbian shores.
 Th' enlighten'd youth to Susa now return'd,
 Place of his birth. His merit soon was dear
 To Hyperanthes. It was now the time,
 That discontent and murmur on the banks
 Of Nile were loud and threat'ning. Chembes
 there

The only faithful stood, a potent lord,
 Whom Xerxes held by promis'd nuptial ties
 With his own blood. To this Egyptian prince
 Bright Ariana was the destin'd spouse,
 From the same bed with Hyperanthes born.
 Among her guards was Teribazus nam'd
 By that fond brother, tender of her weal.

Th' Egyptian boundaries they gain. They hear
 Of insurrection, of the Pharian tribes
 In arms, and Chembes in the tumult slain.
 They pitch their tents, at midnight are assail'd,
 Surpris'd, their leaders massacred, the slaves
 Of Ariana captives borne away,
 Her own pavilion forc'd, her person seiz'd
 By ruffian hands: when timely to redeem
 Her and th' invaded camp from further spoil
 Flies Teribazus with a rally'd band,
 Swift on her chariot seats the royal fair,
 Nor waits the dawn. Of all her menial train
 None, but three female slaves are left. Her guide,
 Her comforter and guardian fate provides
 In him, distinguish'd by his worth alone,
 No prince, nor satrap, now the single chief
 Of her surviving guard. Of regal birth,

But with excelling graces in her soul,
 Unlike an eastern princess she inclines
 To his consoling, his instructive tongue
 An humbled ear. Amid the converse sweet
 Her charms, her mind, her virtues he explores,
 Admiring. Soon is admiration chang'd
 To love; nor loves he sooner, than despairs.
 From morn till ev'n her passing wheels he guards
 Back to Euphrates. Often, as the mounts,
 Or quits the car, his arm her weight sustains
 With trembling pleasure. His assiduous hand
 From purest fountains wafts the living flood.
 Nor seldom by the fair one's soft command
 Would he repose him, at her feet reclin'd;
 While o'er his lips her lovely forehead bow'd,
 Won by his grateful eloquence, which sooth'd
 With sweet variety the tedious march,
 Beguiling time. He too would then forget
 His pains a while, in raptures vain entranc'd,
 Delusion all, and fleeting rays of joy,
 Soon overcast by more intense despair;
 Like wint'ry clouds, which, op'ning for a time,
 Tinge their black folds with gleams of scatter'd
 light,

Then, swiftly closing, on the brow of morn
 Condense their horrors, and in thickest gloom
 The ruddy beauty veil. They now approach
 The tow'r of Belus: Hyperanthes leads.
 Through Babylon an army to chastise
 The crime of Egypt. Teribazus here
 Parts from his princess, marches bright in steel
 Beneath his patron's banner, gathers palms
 On conquer'd Nile. To Susa he returns,
 To Ariana's residence, and bears
 Deep in his heart th' immedicable wound.
 But unreveal'd and silent was his pain;
 Nor yet in solitary shades he roam'd,
 Nor shun'd resort: but o'er his sorrows cast
 A sickly dawn of gladness, and in smiles
 Conceal'd his anguish; while the secret flame
 Rag'd in his bosom, and its peace consum'd:
 His soul still brooding o'er these mournful thoughts.

Can I, O Wisdom, find relief in thee,
 Who dost approve my passion? From the snares
 Of beauty only thou wouldst guard my heart.
 But here thyself art charm'd; where softness,
 grace,

And ev'ry virtue dignify desire.
 Yet thus to love, despairing to possess,
 Of all the torments, by relentless fate
 On life inflicted, is the most severe:
 Do I not feel thy warnings in my breast;
 That flight alone can save me? I will go Back to the learn'd Chaldeans, on the banks
 Of Ganges seek the sages; where to heav'n
 With thee my elevated soul shall tow'r.
 O wretched Teribazus! all conspires
 Against thy peace. Our mighty lord prepares
 To overwhelm the Grecians. Ev'ry youth
 Is call'd to war; and I, who lately pois'd
 With no inglorious arm the soldier's lance,
 Who near the side of Hyperanthes fought,
 Must join the throng. How therefore can I fly
 From Ariana, who with Asia's queens
 The splendid camp of Xerxes must adorn?
 Then be it so. Again I will adore
 Her gentle virtues. Her delightful voice,
 Her gracious sweetness shall again diffuse

Resistless magic through my ravish'd heart;
Till passion, thus with double rage inflam'd,
Swells to distraction in my tortur'd breast,
Then—but in vain through darkness do I search
My fate—Despair and fortune be my guides.

The day arriv'd, when Xerxes first advanc'd
His arms from Susa's gates. The Persian dames,
So were accustom'd all the eastern fair,
In sumptuous cars accompany'd his march,
A beauteous train, by Ariana grac'd.
Her Teribazus follows, on her wheels
Attends and pines. Such woes oppresses the youth,
Oppress, but not enervate. From the van
He in this second conflict had withstood
The threaten'ing frown of adamantine Mars,
He singly, while his bravest friends recoil'd.
His manly temples no tiara bound.
The slender lance of Asia he disdain'd,
And her light target. Eminent he tow'r'd
In Grecian arms the wonder of his foes;
Among th' Ionians were his strenuous limbs
Train'd in the gymnastic school. A fulgent casque
Enclos'd his head. Before his face and chest
Down to the knees an ample shield was spread.
A pond'rous spear he shook. The well-aim'd point

Sent two Phliansians to the realms of death
With four Tegæans, whose indignant chief,
Brave Hegesander, vengeance breath'd in vain,
With screaming wounds repuls'd. Thus far un-match'd;

His arm prevail'd; when Hyperanthes call'd
From fight his fainting legions. Now each band
Their languid courage reinforc'd by rest.
Meantime with Teribazus thus confer'd.
Th' applauding prince. Thou much deserving youth,

Had twenty warriors in the dang'rous van
Like thee maintain'd the onset, Greece had wept
Her prostrate ranks. The weary'd fight awhile
I now relax, till Abradates strong,
Orontes and Mazæus are advanc'd.
Then to the conflict will I give no pause.
If not by prowess, yet by endless toil
Successful numbers shall exhaust the foe.

He said. Immers'd in sadness, scarce reply'd,
But to himself complain'd the am'rous youth.

Still do I languish, mourning o'er the fame,
My arm acquires. Tormented heart! thou feat
Of constant sorrow, what deceitful smiles
Yet canst thou borrow from unreal hope
To flatter life? at Ariana's feet
What if with supplicating knees I bow,
Implore her pity, and reveal my love.
Wretch! canst thou climb to yon effulgent orb,
And share the splendours, which irradiate heav'n?
Dost thou aspire to that exalted maid,
Great Xerxes' sister, rivalling the claim
Of Asia's proudest potentates and kings?
Unless within her bosom I inspir'd
A passion fervent, as my own, nay more,
Such, as dispelling ev'ry virgin fear,
Might, unrestrain'd, disclose its fond desire,
My love is hopeless; and her willing hand,
Should she bestow it, draws from Asia's lord
On both perdition. By despair benumb'd,
His limbs their action lose. A wish for death
O'ercasts and chills his soul. When sudden cries

From Ariannes rouse his drooping pow'r
Alike in manners they of equal age
Were friends, and partners in the glorious toil
Of war. Together they victorious chas'd
The bleeding sons of Nile, when Egypt's pride
Before the sword of Hyperanthes fell.
That lov'd companion Teribazus views
By all abandon'd, in his gore outstretch'd
The victor's spoil. His languid spirit starts;
He rushes ardent from the Persian line;
The wounded warrior in his strong embrace
He bears away. By indignation flung,
Fierce from the Grecians Diophantus lends
A loud defiance. Teribazus leaves
His rescu'd friend. His manly shield he rears;
High-brandishing his formidable spear,
He turns intrepid on th' approaching foe.
Amazement follows. On he strides, and shakes
The plumed honours of his shining crest.
Th' ill-fated Greek awaits th' unequal fight,
Pierc'd in the throat, with sounding arms he falls.
Through ev'ry file the Mantineans mourn.
Long on the slain the victor fix'd his sight
With these reflections. By thy splendid arms
Thou art a Greek of no ignoble rank.
From thy ill fortune I perhaps derive
A more conspicuous lustre—What if heav'n
Should add new victims, such as thou, to grace
My undervaluing hand? who knows, but the Might smile upon my trophies. Oh! vain thought!
I see the pride of Asia's monarch swell
With vengeance fatal to her beauteous head.
Disperse, ye phantom hopes. Too long, torn heart,

Hast thou with grief contented. Lo! I plant
My foot this moment on the verge of death,
By fame invited, by despair impell'd
To pass th' irremovable bound. No more
Shall Teribazus backward turn his step,
But here conclude his doom. Then cease to heave,
Thou troubled bosom, ev'ry thought be calm
Now at th' approach of everlasting peace.

He ended; when a mighty foe drew nigh,
Not less, than Dithyrambus. Ere they join'd,
The Persian warrior to the Greek began:

Art thou th' unconquerable chief, who mow'd
Our battle down? That eagle on thy shield
Too well proclaims thee. To attempt thy force
I rashly purpos'd. That my single arm
Thou deign'st to meet, accept my thanks, and know,

The thought of conquest less employs my soul,
Than admiration of thy glorious deeds,
And that by thee I cannot fall disgrac'd.

He ceas'd. These words the Thespian youth return'd:

Of all the praises from thy gen'rous mouth
The only portion, my desert may claim,
Is this my bold adventure to confront Thee, yet unmatch'd. What Grecian hath not mark'd

Thy flaming steel? from Asia's boundless camp
Not one hath equall'd thy victorious might.
But whence thy armour of the Grecian form?
Whence thy tall spear, thy helmet? Whence the weight
Of that strong shield? Unlike thy eastern friends,
If thou be'st some fugitive, who, lost

To liberty and virtue, art become
A tyrant's vile stipendiary, that arm,
That valour thus triumphant I deplore,
Which after all their efforts and success
Deserve no honour from the gods, or men.

Here Teribazus in a sigh rejoin'd,
I am to Greece a stranger, and a wretch
To thee unknown, who courts this hour to die,
Yet not ignobly, but in death to raise
My name from darkness, while I end my woes.

The Grecian then: I view thee, and I mourn.
A dignity, which virtue only bears,
Firm resolution, seated on thy brow,
Though grief hath dimm'd thy drooping eye, demand

My veneration: and whatever be
The malice of thy fortune, what the cares,
Infesting thus thy quiet, they create
Within my breast the pity of a friend.
Why then, constraining my reluctant hand
To act against thee will thy might support
Th' unjust ambition of malignant kings,
The foes to virtue, liberty and peace?
Yet free from rage, or enmity I lift
My adverse weapon. Victory I ask.
Thy life may fate for happier days reserve.

This said, their beaming lances they pretend,
Of hostile hate, or fury both devoid,
As on the Ithmian, or Olympic sands
For fame alone contending. Either host,
Pois'd on their arms, in silent wonder gaze.
The fight commences. Soon the Grecian spear,
Which all the day in constant battle worn,
Unnumber'd shields and corselets had transfix'd,
Against the Persian buckler, shiv'ring, breaks,
Its master's hand disarming. Then began
The sense of honour, and the dread of shame
To swell in Dithyrambus. Undismay'd,
He grappled with his foe, and instant seiz'd
His threat'ning spear, before th' uplifted arm
Could execute the meditated wound.
The weapon burst between their struggling grasp.
Their hold they loosen, bare their shining swords.
With equal swiftness to defend, or charge,
Each active youth advances and recedes.
On ev'ry side they traverse. Now direct,
Obliquely now the wheeling blades descend.
Still is the conflict dubious; when the Greek,
Dissembling, points his falchion to the ground,
His arm depressing, as o'ercome by toil:
While with his buckler cautious he repels
The blows, repeated by his active foe.
Greece trembles for her hero. Joy pervades
The ranks of Asia; Hyperanthes strides
Before the line, preparing to receive
His friend triumphant: while the wary Greek Calm and defensive bears th' assault. At last,
As by th' incautious fury of his strokes,
The Persian swung his cov'ring shield aside,
The fatal moment Dithyrambus seiz'd.
Light darting forward with his feet outstretch'd,
Between th' unguarded ribs he plung'd his steel.
Affection, grief, and terror, wing the speed
Of Hyperanthes. From his bleeding foe
The Greek retires, not distant, and awaits
The Persian prince. But he with wat'ry cheeks
In speechless anguish clasps his dying friend;
From whose cold lip with interrupted phrase

These accents break: O dearest, best of men!
Ten thousand thoughts of gratitude and love
Are struggling in my heart—O'erpow'ring fate
Denies my voice the utterance—O my friend!
O Hyperanthes! Hear my tongue unfold
What, had I liv'd, thou never should'st have known.

I lov'd thy sister. With despair I lov'd.
Soliciting this honourable doom,
Without regret in Persia's fight and thine
I fall. Th' inexorable hand of fate
Weighs down his eyelids, and the gloom of death
His fleeting light eternally o'er shades.
Him on Choaspes o'er the blooming verge
A frantic mother shall bewail; shall strew
Her silver tresses in the crystal wave:
While all the shores re-echo to the name
Of Teribazus lost. Th' afflicted prince,
Contemplating in tears the pallid corse,
Vents in these words the bitterness of grief:

Oh, Teribazus! Oh! my friend, whose loss
I will deplore for ever. Oh! what pow'r,
By me, by thee offended, clos'd thy breath
To Hyperanthes in distrust unkind!
She should, she must have lov'd thee—Now no
more

Thy placid virtues, thy instructive tongue
Shall drop their sweetness on my secret hours.
But in complaints doth friendship waste the time,
Which to immediate vengeance should be giv'n.

He ended, rushing furious on the Greek;
Who while his gallant enemy expir'd,
While Hyperanthes tenderly receiv'd
The last embraces of his gasping friend,
Stood nigh, reclin'd in sadness on his shield,
And in the pride of victory repin'd.
Unmark'd, his foe approach'd. But forward sprung
Diomedon. Before the Theban youth
Aloft he rais'd his targe, and loudly thus:

Hold thee Barbarian, from a life more worth,
Than thou and Xerxes with his host of slaves.

His words he seconds with his rapid lance.
Soon a tremendous conflict had ensu'd;
But Iutaphernes, Mindus, and a crowd
Of Persian lords, advancing, fill the space
Betwixt th' encount'ring chiefs. In mutual wrath,
With fruitless efforts they attempt the fight.
So rage two bulls along th' opposing banks
Of some deep flood, which parts the fruitful mead.
Defiance thunders from their angry mouths
In vain: in vain the furrow'd sod they rend;
Wide rolls the stream, and intercepts the war.

As by malignant fortune, if a drop
Of moisture mingles with a burning mass
Of liquid metal, instant show'rs of death
On ev'ry side th' exploding fluid spreads;
So disappointment irritates the flame
Of fierce Plataea's chief, whose vengeance bursts
In wide destruction. Embas, Dauceus fall,
Aræus, Ochos, Mendus, Artias die;
And ten most hardy of th' immortal guard,
To shivers breaking on the Grecian shield
Their gold-cambellish'd weapons, raise a mound
O'er thy pale body, O in prime destroy'd,
Of Asia's garden once the fairest plant,
Fall'n Teribazus! Thy distracted friend
From this thy temporary tomb is dragg'd
By forceful zeal of satraps to the shore;

Where then the brave Abrocomes arrang'd
The succours new, by Abradates brought,
Orontes and Mazæus. Turning swift,
Abrocomes inform'd his brother thus:

Strong reinforcement from th' immortal guard
Pandates bold to Intaphernes leads,
In charge to harass by perpetual toil
Those Grecians next the mountain. Thou unite
To me thy valour: Here the hostile ranks
Lefs stable seem. Our joint impression try;
Let all the weight of battle here impend.
Rouse, Hyperanthes. Give regret to winds.
Who hath not lost a friend this direful day?
Let not our private cares assist the Greeks,
Too strong already; or let sorrow act
Mourn and revenge. These animating words
Send Hyperanthes to the foremost line:
His vengeful ardour leads. The battle joins.

Who stemm'd this tide of onset? Who inbru'd
His shining spear the first in Persian blood?
Eupalamus. Artermbarcs he flew,
With Derdas fierce, whom Caucasus had rear'd
On his tempestuous brow, the savage fons
Of violence and rapine. But their doom
Fires Hyperanthes, whose vindictive blade
Arrests the victor in his haughty course.
Beneath the strong Abrocomes o'erwhelm'd,
Melissus swells the number of the dead.
None could Mycænæ boast of prouder birth,
Than young Melissus, who in silver mail
The line embellish'd. He in Cirrha's mead,
Where high Parnassus from his double top
O'er shades the Pythian games, the envy'd prize
Of fame obtain'd. Low sinks his laurel'd head
In death's cold night; and horrid gore deforms
The graceful hair. Impatient to revenge
Aristobulus strides before the van.
A storm of fury darkens all his brow.
Around he rolls his gloomy eye. For death
Is Alyattes mark'd, of regal blood,
Deriv'd from Cræsus, once imperial lord
Of nations. Him the nymphs of Halys wept;
When, with delusive oracles beguill'd
By Delphi's god, he pass'd their fatal waves
A mighty empire to dissolve: nor knew
Th' ill-destin'd prince, that envious fortune watch'd
That direful moment from his hand to wrest
The sceptre of his fathers. In the shade
Of humble life, his race on Timolus' brow
Lay hid; till, rous'd to battle, on this field
Sinks Alyattes, and a royal breed,
In him extint forever. Lycis dies,
For boist'rous war ill-chosen. He was skill'd
To tune the lulling flute, and melt the heart;
Or with his pipe's awak'ning strain allure
The lovely dames of Lydia to the dance.
They on the verdant level graceful mov'd;
In vary'd measures; while the cooling breeze
Beneath their swelling garments wanton'd o'er.
Their snowy breasts, and smooth Cayster's stream,
Soft-gliding, murmur'd by. The hostile blade
Draws forth his entrails. Prone he falls. Not long
The victor triumphs. From the prostrate corse
Of Lycis, while, insulting, he extracts
The recking weapon, Hyperanthes' steel
Invades his knee, and cuts the sinewy cords.
The Mycænæans with uplifted shields,
Corinthians and Phlians close around

The wounded chieftain. In redoubled rage
The contest glows. Abrocomes incites
Each noble Persian. Each his voice obeys.
Here Abradates, there Mazæus press,
Orontes and Hydarnes. None retire
From toil, or peril. Urg'd on ev'ry side,
Mycænæ's band to fortune leave their chief.
Despairing, raging, desitute he stands,
Prompt on his spear. His wound forbids retreat.
None but his brother, Eumenes, abides
The dire extremity. His studded orb
Is held defensive. On his arm the sword
Of Hyperanthes rapidly descends.
Down drops the buckler, and the sever'd hand
Religins its hold. The unprotected pair
By Asia's hero to the ground are swept;
As to a reaper crimson poppies low'r
Their heads luxuriant on the yellow plain.
From both their breasts the vital currents flow,
And mix their streams. Elate the Persians pour
Their numbers, deep'ning on the foe dismay'd.
The Greeks their station painfully maintain.
This Anaxander saw, whose faithless tongue
His colleague Leontiades bespake:

The hour is come to serve our Persian friends.
Behold, the Greeks are press'd. Let Thebes retire,
A bloodless conquest yielding to the king.
This said, he drew his Thebans from their post,
Not with unpunish'd treachery. The lance
Of Abradates gor'd their soul retreat;
Nor knew the Asian chief, that Asia's friends
Before him bled. Meantime, as mighty Jove,
Or he more ancient on the throne of heav'n,
When from the womb of Chaos dark the world
Emerg'd to birth, where'er he view'd the jar
Of atoms yet discordant and unform'd,
Confusion thence with pow'rful voice dispell'd,
Till light and order universal reign'd;
So from the hill Leonidas survey'd
The various war. He saw the Theban rout;
That Corinth, Phlius and Mycænæ look'd
Afrighted backward. Instantly his charge
Is borne by Maron, whom obedience wings,
Precipitating down the sacred cave,
That Sparta's ranks, advancing, should repair
The disunited phalanx. Ere they move,
Dienees inspires them. Fame, my friends,
Calls forth your valour in a signal hour.
For you this glorious crisis she reserv'd.
Laconia's splendour to assert. Young man,
Son of Megistias, follow. He conducts
Th' experienc'd troop. They lock their shields, and, wedg'd

In dense arrangement, repossess the void,
Left by the faithless Thebans, and repulse
Th' exulting Persians. When, with efforts vain,
These oft renew'd the contest, and recoil'd,
As oft confounded with diminish'd ranks;
Lo! Hyperanthes blush'd, repeating late
The words of Artemisia. Learn, O chiefs,
The only means of glory and success.
Unlike the others, whom we newly chas'd,
These are a band selected from the Greeks,
Perhaps the Spartans; whom we often hear
By Demaratus prais'd. To break their line
In vain we struggle, unarray'd and lax,
Depriv'd of union. Do not we preside
O'er Asia's armies, and our courage boast,

Our martial art above the vulgar herd?
Let us, ye chiefs, attempt in order'd ranks
To form a troop, and emulate the foe.

They wait not dubious. On the Malian shore
In gloomy depth a column soon is form'd
Of all the nobles, Abradates strong,
Orontes bold, Mazæus, and the might
Of brave Abrocomes, with each, who bore
The highest honours, and excell'd in arms;
Themselves the lords of nations, who before
The throne of Xerxes tributary bow'd.
'To these succeed a chosen number, drawn
From Asia's legions, vaunted most in fight;
Who from their kind perpetual stipends share;
Who, station'd round the provinces, by force
His tyranny uphold. In ev'ry part
Is Hyperanthes active, ardent seen
Throughout the huge battalion. He adjusts
Their equal range, then cautious, left on march
Their unaccustom'd order should relax,
Full in the centre of the foremost rank
Orontes plants, committing to his hand
Th' imperial standard; whose expanded folds
Glow'd in the air, presenting to the sun
The richest dye of Tyre. The royal bird
Amid the gorgeous tincture shone express'd
In high embroider'd gold. The wary prince
On this conspicuous, leading sign of war
Commands each satrap, posted in the van,
'To fix his eye regardful, to direct
By this alone his even pace and slow,
Retiring, or advancing. So the star,
Chief of the spangles on that fancy'd bear,
Once an Idæan nymph, and nurse of Jove,
Bright Cynosura to the Boreal pole
Attracts the sailor's eye; when distance hides
The headland signals, and her guiding ray,
New-ris'n, she throws. The hero next appoints,
That ev'ry warrior through the length'ning files,
Observing none but those before him plac'd,
Shall watch their motions, and their steps pursue.
Nor is th' important thicket next the pass
Forgot. Two thousand of th' immortal guard
That station seize. His orders all perform'd,
Close by the standard he assumes his post.
Intrepid thence he animates his friends.

Heroic chieftains, whose unconquer'd force
Rebellious Egypt, and the Libyan felt,
Think what the splendour of your former deeds
From you exacts. Remember, from the great
Illustrious actions are a debt to fame.
No middle path remains for them to tread,
Whom the hath once ennobled. Lo! this day
By trophies new will signalize your names,
Or in dishonour will for ever cloud.

He said, and vig'rous all to fight proceed.
As when tempestuous Eurus stems the weight
Of western Neptune, struggling through the streights,
Which bound Alcides' labours, here the storm
With rapid wing reverberates the tide;
There the contending surge with furrow'd tops
To mountains swells, and, whelming o'er the beach
On either coast, impels the hoary foam
On Mauritanian and Iberian straits:
Such is the dreadful onset. Persia keeps
Her foremost ranks unbroken, which are fill'd
By chosen warriors; while the numerous crowd,

Though still promiscuous pouring from behind,
Give weight and pressure to th' embattled chiefs,
Despising danger. Like the mural strength
Of some proud city, bulwark'd round, and arm'd
With rising tow'rs to guard her wealthy stores,
Immoveable, impenetrable stood
Laconia's ferry'd phalanx. In their face
Grim tyranny her threat'ning fetters shakes,
Red havoc grants insatiable his jaws.
Greece is behind, intrusting to their swords
Her laws, her freedom, and the sacred urns
Of their forefathers. Present now to throught
Their altars rise, the mansions of their birth,
Whate'er they honour, venerate, and love.

Bright in the Persian van th' exalted lance
Of Hyperanthes flam'd. Beside him press'd
Abrocomes, Hydarnes, and the bulk
Of Abradates terrible in war.
Firm, as a Memphian pyramid, was seen
Dienees; while Agis close in rank
With Menalippus, and the added strength
Of dauntless Maron, their connect'd shields
Upheld. Each unrelax'd array maintains
The conflict undecided; nor could Greece
Repel the adverse numbers, nor the weight
Of Asia's band select remove the Greeks.

Swift from Laconia's king, perceiving soon
The Persian's new arrangement, Medon flew,
Who thus the staid Dienees address'd:
Leonidas commands the Spartan ranks
To measure back some paces. Soon, he deems,
The unexperic'd foes in wild pursuit
Will break their order. Then the charge renew.

This heard, the signal of retreat is giv'n.
The Spartans seem to yield. The Persians stop.
Astonishment restrains them, and the doubt
Of unexpected victory. Their sloth
Abrocomes awakens. By the sun
They fly before us. My victorious friends,
Do you delay to enter Greece. Away,
Rush on intrepid. I already hear
Our horse, our chariots, thund'ring on her plains.
I see her temples wrapt in Persian fires.

He spake. In hurry'd violence they roll
Tumultuous forward. All in headlong pace
Disjoin their order, and the line dissolve.
This when the sage Dienees descries,
The Spartans halt, returning to the charge
With sudden vigour. In a moment pierc'd
By his resistless steel, Orontes falls,
And quits th' imperial banner. This the chief
In triumph waves. The Spartans press the foe.
Close-wedg'd and square, in slow, progressive pace,
O'er heaps of mangled carcases and arms
Invincible they tread. Composing flutes
Each thought, each motion harmonize. No rage
Untunes their souls. The phalanx yet more deep
Of Medon follows; while the lighter bands
Glide by the flanks, and reach the broken foe.
Amid their flight what vengeance from the arm
Of Alpheus falls? O'er all in swift pursuit
Was he renown'd. His active feet had match'd
The son of Pelus in the dusty course;
But now the wrongs, the long-remember'd wrongs
Of Polydorus animate his strength
With tenfold vigour. Like th' empurpled moon,
When in eclipse her silver disk hath lost
The wonted light, his buckler's polish'd face

Is now obscur'd; the figur'd bosses drop
 In crimson, spouting from his deathful strokes.
 As, when with horror wing'd, a whirlwind rends
 A shatter'd navy; from the ocean cast,
 Enormous fragments hide the level beach;
 Such as dejected Persia late beheld
 On Theffaly's unnavigable strand:
 Thus o'er the champain satraps lay bestrewn
 By Alpheus, persevering in pursuit
 Beyond the pass. Not Phœbus could inflict
 On Niobè more vengeance, when, incens'd
 By her maternal arrogance, which scorn'd
 Latona's race, he twang'd his ireful bow,
 And one by one from youth and beauty hurl'd
 Her sons to Pluto; nor severer pangs
 That mother felt, than pierc'd the gen'rous soul
 Of Hyperanthes, while his noblest friends
 On ev'ry side lay gasping. With despair
 He still contends. Th' immortals from their stand Behind th' entangling thicket next the pass
 His signal rouses. Ere they clear their way,
 Well-caution'd Medon from the close defile
 Two thousand Lœcrians pours. An aspect new
 The fight assumes. Through implicated shrubs
 Confusion waves each banner. Falchions, spears
 And shields are all encumber'd, till the Greeks
 Had forc'd a passage to the yielding foe.
 Then Médon's arm is felt. The dreadful boar,
 Wide-wasting once the Calydonian fields,
 In fury breaking from his gloomy lair,
 Rang'd with lefs havoc through unguarded folds,
 Than Médon, sweeping down the glitt'ring files,
 So vainly styl'd immortal. From the cliff
 Divine Melissa, and Laconia's king,
 Enjoy the glories of Oilcus' son.
 Fierce Alpheus too, returning from his chase,
 Joins in the slaughter. Ev'ry Persian falls.

To him the Locrian chief. Brave Spartan, thanks.

Through thee my purpose is accomplish'd full.
 My phalanx here with level'd rows of spears
 Shall guard the shatter'd bushes. Come what may
 From Asia's camp, th' assailable, flank'd and driv'n
 Down yonder slope, shall perish. Gods of Greece,
 You shall behold your fanes profusely deck'd
 In splendid off'rings from barbarian spoils,
 Won by your free-born supplicants this day.

This said, he forms his ranks. Their threatening points
 Glean through the thicket, whence the shiv'ring foci

Avert their sight, like passengers dismay'd,
 Who on their course by Nile's portentous banks
 Descry in ambush of perfidious reeds
 The crocodile's fell teeth. Contiguous lay Thermopylæ. Dienece's secur'd
 The narrow mouth. Two lines the Spartans show'd,

One tow'rd the plain observ'd the Persian camp;
 One, led by Agis, fac'd th' interior pass.

Not yet discourag'd, Hyperanthes strives
 The scatter'd host to rally. He exhorts,
 Entreats, at length indignant thus exclaims.

Degen'rate Persians! to sepulchral dust
 Could breath return, your fathers from the tomb
 Would utter groans, inglorious, do ye leave
 Behind you Persia's standard to adorn
 Some Grecian temple? Can your splendid cars,

Voluptuous couches, and delicious boards,
 Your gold, your gems, ye satraps, be preserv'd
 By cowardice and flight? The enunch slave
 Will scorn such lords, your women lothe your beds.

Few hear him, fewer follow; while the fight
 His unabating courage oft renews,
 As oft repuls'd with danger: till, by all
 Deserted, mixing in the gen'ral rout,
 He yields to fortune, and regains the camp.
 In short advances thus the dying tide
 Beats for a while against the shelving strand,
 Still by degrees retiring, and at last
 Within the bosom of the main subsides.

Though Hyperanthes from the fight was driv'n,
 Close to the mountain, whose indented side
 There gave the widen'd pass an ample space
 For numbers to embattle, still his post
 Bold Intaphernes underneath a cliff
 Against the firm Plataean line maintain'd.
 On him look'd down Leonidas like death,
 When, from his iron cavern call'd by Jove,
 He stands gigantic on a mountain's head;
 Whence he commands th' affrighted earth to quake,
 And, crags and forests in his direful grasp,
 High-wielding, dashes on a town below,
 Whose deeds of black impiety provoke
 The long-enduring gods. Around the verge
 Of Oeta, curving to a crescent's shape,
 The marbles, timbers, fragments, lay amass'd.
 The Helots, peasants, mariners, attend
 In order nigh Leonidas. They watch
 His look. He gives the signal. Rous'd at once
 The force, the skill, activity and zeal
 Of thousands are combin'd. Down rush the piles.
 Trees, roll'd on trees, with mingled rock descend;
 Unintermitted ruin. Loud resound
 The hollow trunks against the mountain's side.
 Swift bounds each craggy mass. The foes below
 Look up aghast, in horror shrink and die.
 Whole troops, o'erwhelm'd beneath th' enormous load,

Lie hid and lost, as never they had known
 A name or being. Intaphernes clad
 In regal splendour, progeny of kings,
 Who rul'd Damascus, and the Syrian palms,
 Here slept for ever. Theufands of his train
 In that broad space the ruins had not reach'd.
 Back to their camp a passage they attempt
 Through Lacedemon's line. Them Agis stopp'd.
 Before his powerful arm Pandates fell,
 Sofarmes, Tachos. Menalippus dy'd
 His youthful steel in blood. The mightier spear
 Of Maron pierc'd battalions, and enlarg'd
 The track of slaughter. Backward turn'd the rout,
 Nor found a milder fate. Th' unwear'd swords
 Of Dithyrampus and Diomedon,
 Who from the hill are wheeling on their flank,
 Still flash tremendous. To the shore they fly,
 At once envelop'd by successive bands
 Of diff'rent Grecians. From the gulf profound
 Perdition here inevitable frowns,
 While there, encircled by a grove of spears,
 They stand devoted hecatombs to Mars.
 Now not a moment's interval delays
 Their gen'ral doom; but down the Malian steep
 Prone are they hurry'd to th' expanded arms
 Of horror, rising from the oozy deep,

And grasping all their numbers as they fall.
The dire confusion like a storm invades
The chafing surge. Whole troops Bellona rolls
In one vast ruin from the craggy ridge.
O'er all their arms, their ensigns, deep-ingulf'd,
With hideous roar the waves for ever close.

BOOK IX.

THE ARGUMENT.

NIGHT coming on, the Grecians retire to their tents. A guard is placed on the Phocian wall under the command of Agis. He admits into the camp a lady, accompanied by a single slave, and conducts them to Leonidas; when she discovers herself to be Ariana, sister of Xerxes and Hyperanthus, and sues for the body of Teribazus; which being found among the slain, she kills herself upon it. The slave who attended her proves to be Polydorus, brother to Alpheus and Maron, and who had been formerly carried into captivity by a Phœnician pirate. He relates, before an assembly of the chiefs, a message from Demaratus to the Spartans, which discloses the treachery of the Thebans, and of Epialtes, the Malian, who had undertaken to lead part of the Persian army through a pass among the mountains of Oeta. This information throws the council into a great tumult, which is pacified by Leonidas, who sends Alpheus to observe the motions of these Persians, and Dieneceus with a party of Lacedæmonians to support the Phocians, with whom the defence of these passages in the hills had been intrusted. In the mean time, Agis sends the bodies of Teribazus and Ariana to the camp of Xerxes.

In sable vesture, spangled o'er with stars,
The night assum'd her throne. Recall'd from war,

Their toil, protracted long, the Greeks forget,
Dissolv'd in silent slumber all, but those
Who watch th' uncertain perils of the dark,
A hundred warriors. Agis was their chief.
High on the wall intent the hero sat.
Fresh winds across the undulating bay
From Asia's host the various din convey'd
In one deep murmur, swelling on his ear.
When by the sound of footsteps down the pass
Alarm'd, he calls aloud. What feet are these
Which beat the echoing pavement of the rock?
Reply, nor tempt inevitable fate.

A voice reply'd. No enemies we come,
But crave admittance in an humble tone.

The Spartan answers. Through the midnight shade

What purpose draws your wand'ring steps abroad?
To whom the stranger. We are friends to Greece.

Through thy assistance we implore access
To Lacedæmon's king. The cautious Greek
Still hesitates; when musically sweet
A tender voice his wond'ring ear allures.

O gen'rous warrior, listen to the pray'r
Of one distress'd, whom grief alone hath led Through midnight shades to these victorious tents,
A wretched woman, innocent of fraud,

The chief, descending, through th' unfolded gates

Upheld a flaming torch. The light disclos'd
One first in servile garments. Near his side
A woman graceful and majestic stood,
Not with an aspect, rivalling the pow'r
Of fatal Helen, or th' ensnaring charms
Of love's soft queen, but such as far surpass'd,
Whate'er the lily, blending with the rose,
Spreads on the cheek of beauty soon to fade;
Such as express'd a mind by wisdom rul'd,
By sweetness temper'd; virtue's purest light
Illumining the countenance divine:

Yet could not soften rig'rous fate, nor charm
Malignant fortune to revere the good;
Which oft with anguish rends a spotless heart,
And oft associates wisdom with despair.

In courteous phrase began the chief humane.
Exalted fair, whose form adorns the night,
Forbear to blame the vigilance of war.
My slow compliance to the rigid laws
Of Mars impute. In me no longer pause
Shall from the presence of our king withhold
This thy apparent dignity and worth.

Here ending, he conducts her. At the call
Of his lov'd brother from his couch arose
Leonidas. In wonder he survey'd
Th' illustrious virgin, whom his presence aw'd.
Her eye submissive to the ground declin'd
In veneration of the godlike man.
His mien, his voice, her anxious dread dispel,
Benevolent and hospitable thus.

Thy looks, fair stranger, amiable and great,
A mind delineate, which from all commands
Supreme regard. Relate, thou noble dame,
By what relentless destiny compell'd,
Thy tender feet the paths of darkness tread;
Rehearse th' afflictions, whence thy virtue mourns.

On her vast cheek a sudden blush arose
Like day, first dawning on the twilight pale;
When, wrapt in grief, these words a passage found.

If to be most unhappy, and to know
That hope is irrecoverably fled;
If to be great and wretched may deserve
Compassion from the brave; behold,
Thou glorious leader of unconquer'd bands,
Behold, descended from Darius' loins,
Th' afflicted Ariana; and my pray'r
Accept with pity, nor my tears disdain.
First, that I lov'd the best of human race,
Heroic, wife, adorn'd by ev'ry art,
Of shame unconscious doth my heart reveal.
This day, in Grecian arms conspicuous clad,
He fought, he fell. A passion, long conceal'd,
For me, alas! within my brother's arms
His dying breath resigning, he disclos'd.
Oh! I will stay my sorrows! will forbid
My eyes to stream before thee, and my breast,
O'erwhelm'd by anguish, will from sighs restrain!
For why should thy humanity be griev'd
At my distress? why learn from me to mourn
The lot of mortals, doom'd to pain and woe.
Hear then, O king, and grant my sole request,
To seek his body in the heaps of slain.

Thus to the hero said the royal maid,
Resembling Ceres in majestic woe,
When supplicating Jove from Stygian gloom,
And Pluto's black embraces to redeem

Her lov'd and lost Proserpina. A while
On Ariana fixing stedfast eyes,
These tender thoughts Leonidas recall'd.

Such are thy sorrows, O for ever dear,
Who now at Lacedæmon dost deplore
My everlasting absence. Then aside
He turn'd and sigh'd. Recov'ring, he address'd
His brother. Most beneficent of men,
Attend, assist this princefs. Night retires
Before the purple-winged morn. A band
Is call'd. The well-remember'd spot they find,
Where Teribazus from his dying hand
Dropt in their sight his formidable sword.
Soon from beneath a pile of Asian dead
They draw the hero, by his armour known.

Then, Ariana, what transcending pangs
Were thine! what horrors! In thy tender breast
Love still was mightiest, On the bosom cold
Of Teribazus, grief-distracted maid,
Thy beauteous limbs were thrown. Thy snowy hue
The clotted gore disfigur'd. On his wounds
Loose flow'd thy hair; and, bubbling from thy eyes,

Impetuous sorrow lav'd th' empurpled clay.
When forth in groans these lamentations broke.

O torn for ever from these weeping eyes!
Thou, who despairing to obtain a heart,
Which thou most lov'd thee, didst untimely yield
Thy life to fate's inevitable dart—
For her, who now in agony reveals
Her tender passion, who repeats her vows
To thy deaf ear, who fondly to her own
Unites thy cheek insensible and cold.
Alas! do those unmoving, ghastly orbs
Perceive my gushing sorrow! Can that heart
At my complaint dissolve the ice of death
To share my suff'rings! Never, never more
Shall Ariana bend a list'ning ear
To thy enchanting eloquence, nor feast
Her mind on wisdom from thy copious tongue!
Oh! bitter, insurmountable distress!

She could no more. Invincible despair
Suppress'd all utterance. As a marble form,
Fix'd on the solemn sepulchre, inclines
The silent head in imitated woe
O'er some dead hero, whom his country lov'd;
Entranc'd by anguish, o'er the breathless clay
So hung the princefs. On the gory breach,
Whence life had issu'd by the fatal blow,
Mute for a space and motionless she gaz'd;
When thus in accents firm. Imperial pomp,
Foe to my quiet, take my last farewell.
There is a state, where only virtue holds
The rank supreme. My Teribazus there
From his high order must descend to mine.

Then with no trembling hand, no change of look,

She drew a poniard, which her garment veil'd;
And instant sheathing in her heart the blade,
On her slain lover silent sunk in death.
The unexpected stroke prevents the care
Of Agis, pierc'd by horror and distress,
Like one, who, standing on a stormy beach,
Beholds a found'ring vessel, by the deep
At once engulf'd; his pity feels and mourns,
Depriv'd of pow'r to save: so Agis view'd
The prostrate pair. He dropp'd a tear, and thus.

Oh! much lamented! Heavy on your heads
Hath evil fall'n, which o'er your pale remains Commands this sorrow from a stranger's eye.
Illustrious ruins! May the grave impart
That peace which life deny'd! and now receive
This pious office from a hand unknown.

He spake, unclasping from his shoulders broad
His ample robe. He strew'd the waving folds
O'er each wan visage, turning then, address'd
The slave, in mute dejection standing near.

Thou, who attendant on this hapless fair,
Hast view'd this dreadful spectacle, return.
These bleeding relics bear to Persia's king,
Thou with four captives, whom I free from bonds.

Art thou a Spartan, interrupts the slave?
Dost thou command me to return, and pine
In climes unblest by liberty, or laws?
Grant me to see Leonidas. Alone
Let him decide, if wretched, as I seem,
I may not claim protection from this camp:

Whoe'er thou art, rejoins the chief, amaz'd;
But not offended, thy ignoble garb
Conceal'd a spirit, which I now revere.
Thy countenance demands a better lot
Than I, a stranger to thy hidden worth,
Unconsciously offer'd. Freedom dwells in Greece,
Humanity and justice. Thou shalt see
Leonidas their guardian. To the king
He leads him straight, presents him in these words.
In mind superior to the base attire,
Which marks his limbs with shame, a stranger comes;

Who thy protection claims. The slave subjoins.
I stand thy suppliant now. Thou soon shalt learn,

If I deserve thy favour. I request
To meet th' assembled chieftains of this host.
Oh! I am fraught with tidings, which import
The weal of ev'ry Grecian. Agis, swift,
Appointed by Leonidas, convenes
The different leaders. To the tent they speed.
Before them call'd, the stranger thus began.

O Alpheus! Maron! Hither turn your sight,
And know your brother. From their seats they start.

From either breaks in-ecstasy the name
Of Polydorus. To his dear embrace
Each fondly strives to rush; but he withstands:
While down his cheek a flood of anguish pours
From his dejected eyes, in torture bent
On that vile garb, dishonouring his form.
At length these accents, intermix'd with groans,
A passage found, while mute attention gaz'd.

You first should know, if this unhappy slave
Yet merits your embraces. Then approach'd
Leonidas. Before him all recede,
Ev'n Alpheus' self, and yields his brother's hand,
Which in his own the regal hero press'd.
Still Polydorus on his gloomy front
Repugnance stern to consolation bore;
When thus the king with majesty benign.

Lo! ev'ry heart is open to thy worth.
Injurious fortune, and ensheathing time,
By servitude and grief severely try
A lib'ral spirit. Try'd, but not subdu'd,
Do thou appear. Whatever be our lot,
Is Heav'n's appointment. Patience best becomes
The citizen and soldier. Let the fight

Of friends and brethren dissipate thy gloom.

Of men the gentlest, Agis too advanc'd,
Who with increas'd humanity began.

Now is thy native liberty secure,
Smile on thy pass'd affliction, and relate
What chance restores thy merit to the arms
Of friends and kindred. Polydorus then.

I was a Spartan. When my tender prime
On manhood border'd, from Laconia's shores,
Snatch'd by Phœnician pirates, I was sold
A slave, by Hyperanthes bought, and giv'n
To Ariana. Gracious was her hand.

But I remain'd a bondman, still estrang'd
From Lacedemon. Demaratus oft
In friendly sorrow would my lot deplore;
Nor less his own ill-fated virtue mourn'd,
Lost to his country in a servile court,
The centre of corruption; where in smiles
Are painted envy, treachery, and hate,
With rankling malice; where alone sincere
The dissolute seek no disguise: where those,
Possessing all, a monarch can bestow,

Are far less happy, than the meanest heir
To freedom, far more grovelling than the slave,
Who serves their cruel pride. Yet here the sun
Ten times his yearly circle hath renew'd,
Since Polydorus hath in bondage groan'd.
My bloom is pass'd, or, pining in despair,
Untimely, wither'd. I at last return

A messenger of fate, who tidings bear
Of desolation. Here he paus'd in grief
Redoubled; when Leonidas. Proceed.
Should from thy lips inevitable death
To all be threaten'd, thou art heard by none,
Whose dauntless hearts can entertain a thought,
But how to fall the noblest. Thus the king.
The rest in speechless expectation wait.
Such was the solemn silence, which o'erspread
The shrine of Ammon, or Dodona's shades,
When anxious mortals from the mouth of Jove
Their doom explor'd. Nor Polydorus long
Suspends the counsel, but resumes his tale.

As I this night accompany'd the steps
Of Ariana, near the pass we saw
A restless form, now traversing the way,
Now as a statue, rivetted by doubt,
Then on a sudden starting, to renew
An eager pace. As nearer we approach'd,
He by the moon, which glimmer'd on our heads,
Descri'd us. Straight advancing, whither bent
Our midnight course, he ask'd. I knew the voice
Of Demaratus. To my breast I clasp'd
The venerable exile, and reply'd.
Laconia's camp we seek. Demand no more.
Farewell. He wept. Be heav'n thy guide, he said,
Thrice happy Polydorus. Thou again
May'st visit Sparta, to these eyes deny'd.
Soon as arriv'd at those triumphant tents,
Say to the Spartans from their exil'd king,
Although their blind credulity depriv'd
The wretched Demaratus of his home;
From ev'ry joy secluded, from his wife,
His offspring torn, his countrymen, and friends,
Him from his virtue they could ne'er divide.
Say, that ev'n here, where all are kings, or slaves,
Amid the riot of flagitious courts,
Not quite extint his Spartan spirit glows,
Though grief hath dimm'd its fires. Rememb'ring this,

Report, that newly to the Persian host
Return'd a Malian, Epialtes nam'd,
Who, as a spy, the Grecian tents had sought.
He to the monarch magnify'd his art,
Which by delusive eloquence had wrought
The Greeks to such despair; that ev'ry band
To Persia's sov'reign standard would have bow'd;
Had not the spirit of a single chief,
By fear unconquer'd, and on death resolv'd,
Restor'd their valour: therefore would the king
Trust to his guidance a selected force,
They soon should pierce th' unguarded bounds of Greece

Through a neglected aperture above,
Where no Leonidas should bar their way:
Meantime by him the treach'rous Thebans sent Assurance of their aid. Th' assenting prince
At once decreed two myriads to advance
With Hyperanthes. Ev'ry lord besides,
Whom youth, or courage, or ambition warm,
Rous'd by the traitor's eloquence, attend
From all the nations with a rival zeal
To enter Greece the foremost. In a sigh
He clos'd—like me. Tremendous from his seat
Uprose Diomedon. His eyes were flames.
When swift on trembling Anaxander broke
These ireful accents from his livid lips.

Yet ere we fall, O traitor! shall this arm
To hell's avenging furies sink thy head.
All now is tumult. Ev'ry bosom swells
With wrath untam'd, and vengeance. Half unsheath'd,

Th' impetuous falchion of Platœa flames.
But, as the Colchian sorcerers, renown'd
In legends old, or Circé, when they fram'd
A potent spell, to smoothness charm'd the main,
And lull'd Æolian rage by mystic song;
Till not a billow heav'd against the shore,
Nor ev'n the wanton-winged zephyr breath'd
The lightest whisper through the magic air:
So when thy voice, Leonidas, is heard,
Confusion listens; ire in silent awe
Subsides. Withhold this rashness, cries the king.
To proof of guilt let punishment succeed.
Not yet barbarian shouts our camp alarm.
We still have time for vengeance, time to know,
If menac'd ruin we may yet repel,
Or how most glorious perish. Next arose
Dienece, and thus th' experienc'd man.

Ere they surmount our fences, Xerxes' troops
Must learn to conquer, and the Greeks to fly.
The spears of Phocis guard that secret pass.
To them let instant messengers depart,
And note the hostile progress. Alpheus here.
Leonidas, behold! my willing feet
Shall to the Phocians bear thy high commands;
Shall climb the hill to watch th' approaching foe.

Thou active son of valour, quick returns
The chief of Lacedemon, in my thoughts
For ever present, when the public weal
Requires the swift, the vigilant, and bold.
Go climb, surmount the rock's aerial height.
Observe the hostile march. A Spartan band,
Dienece, provide. Thyself conduct
Their speedy succour to our Phocian friends.

The council rises. For his course prepar'd,
While day, declining, prompts his eager feet,
O Polydorus! Alpheus thus in haste,
Long lost, and late recover'd, we must part

Again, perhaps for ever. Thou return
To kiss the sacred soil which gave thee birth,
And calls thee back to freedom. Brother dear,
I should have fights to give thee—but farewell.
My country chides me, loit'ring in thy arms.

This said, he darts along, nor looks behind,
When Polydorus answers. Alpheus; no.
I have the marks of bondage to craze.
My blood must wash the shameful stain away.

We have a father, Maron interpos'd.
Thy unexpected presence will revive
His heavy age, now childless and forlorn.

To him the brother with a gloomy frown.
Ill should I comfort others. View these eyes.
Faint is their light; and vanish'd was my bloom
Before its hour of ripeness. In my breast
Grief will retain a mansion, nor by time
Be dispossest. Unceasing shall my soul
Brood o'er the black remembrance of my youth,
In slavery exhausted. Life to me
Hath lost its favour. Then in fullen woe
His head declines. His brother pleads in vain.

Now in his view Dienees appear'd
With Sparta's band. Immoveable his eyes
On them he fix'd, revolving these dark thoughts.

I too, like them, from Lacedemon spring,
Like them instructed once to poison the spear,
To lift the pond'rous shield. Ill-destin'd wretch!
Thy arm is grown enervate, and would sink
Beneath a buckler's weight. Malignant fates!
Who have compell'd my free-born hand to change
The warrior's arms for ignominious bonds;
Would you compensate for my chains, my shame,
My ten years anguish, and the fell despair,
Which on my youth have prey'd; relenting once,
Grant I may bear my buckler to the field,
And, known a Spartan, seek the shades below.

Why, to be known a Spartan, must thou seek
The shades below? Impatient Maron, spake.
Live, and be known a Spartan by thy deeds;
Live, and enjoy thy dignity of birth;
Live, and perform the duties which become
A citizen of Sparta. Still thy brow
Frowns gloomy, still unyielding. He, who leads
Our band, all fathers of a noble race,
Will ne'er permit thy barren day to close
Without an offspring to uphold the state.

He will, replies the brother in a glow,
Prevailing o'er the paleness of his cheek,
He will permit me to complete by death
The measure of my duty; will permit
Me to achieve a service, which no hand
But mine can render, to adorn his fall
With double lustre, strike the barb'rous foe
With endless terror, and avenge the shame
Of an enslav'd Lacedonian. Closing here
His words mysterious, quick he turn'd away
To find the tent of Agis. There his hand
In grateful sorrow minister'd her aid;
While the humane, the hospitable care
Of Agis, gently by her lover's corse
On one sad bier the pallid beauties laid
Of Ariana. He from bondage freed
Four eastern captives, whom his gen'rous arm
That day had spar'd in battle; then began This solemn charge. You, Persians, whom my sword
Acquir'd in war, unransom'd, shall depart.

To you I render freedom, which you sought
To wrest from me. One recompence I ask,
And one alone. Transport to Asia's camp
This bleeding prince. Bid the Persian king
Weep o'er this flow'r, untimely cut in bloom.
Then say, th' all-judging pow'rs have thus ordain'd.
Thou, whose ambition o'er the groaning earth
Leads desolation; o'er the nations spreads
Calamity and tears; thou first shalt mourn,
And through thy house destruction first shall range.
Dismiss'd, they gain the rampart, where our guard

Was Dithyrambus posted. He perceiv'd
The mournful bier approach. To him the fate
Of Ariana was lightly told.
He met the captives with a moisten'd eye,
Full bent on Teribazus, sigh'd and spake.

O that, assuming with those Grecian arms
A Grecian spirit, thou in scorn hadst look'd
On princes! Worth like thine, from slavish courts
Withdrawn, had ne'er been wasted to support
A king's injustice. Then a gentler lot
Had bless'd thy life, or dying, thou hadst known
How sweet is death for liberty. A Greek
Affords these friendly wishes, though his head
Had lost the honours, gather'd from thy fall,
When fortune favour'd, or propitious Jove
Smil'd on the better cause. Ill-fated pair,
Whom in compassion's purest dew I lave,
But that my hand infix'd the deathful wound,
And must be grievous to your loathing shades,
From all the neighb'ring valleys would I hurl
Their fairest growth, to srew your herc with flow'rs.

Yet, O accept these tears and pious pray'rs!
May peace surround your ashes! May your shades
Pass o'er the silent pool to happier seats!

He ceas'd in tears. The captives leave the wall,
And slowly down Thermopylæ proceed.

BOOK X.

THE ARGUMENT.

MEDON convenes the Locrian commanders, and harangues them; repairs at midnight to his sister Melissa in the temple, and receives from her the first intelligence, that the Persians were in actual possession of the upper Streights, which which had been abandoned by the Phocians.
Melibœus brings her tidings of her father's death. She strictly enjoins her brother to preserve his life by a timely retreat, and recommends the enforcement of her advice to the prudence and zeal of Melibœus. In the morning the bodies of Teribazus and Ariana are brought into the presence of Xerxes, soon after a report had reached the camp, that great part of his navy was shipwrecked. The Persian monarch, quite dispirited, is persuaded by Argestes to send an ambassador to the Spartan king. Argestes himself is deputed, who, after revealing his embassy in secret to Leonidas, is by him led before the whole army, and there receives his answer.
Alpheus returns, and declares, that the enemy was master of the passages in the hills, and would arrive at Thermopylæ the next morning; upon which Leonidas offers to send away all the troops, except his three hundred Spartans; but

Diomedon, Demophilus, Dithyrambus, and Megistias, refuse to depart: then to relieve the perplexity of Medon on this occasion, he transfers to him the supreme command, dismisses Argestes, orders the companions of his own fate to be ready in arms by sunset, and retires to his pavilion.

THE Grecian leaders, from the council ris'n,
Among the troops dispersing, by their words,
Their looks undaunted warm the coldest heart
Against new dangers threat'ning. To his tent
The Locrian captains Medon swift convenes,
Exhorting thus, O long approv'd my friends,
You, who have seen my father in the field
Triumphant, bold assailants of my arm
In labours not inglorious, who this day
Have rais'd fresh trophies, be prepar'd. If help
Be further wanted in the Phocian camp,
You will the next be summon'd. Locris lies
To ravage first expos'd. Your ancient fame,
Your goddesses, your priestess's half-ador'd,
The daughter of Oileus, from your swords
Protection claim against an impious foe.

All anxious for Melissa, he dismiss'd
Th' applauding veterans; to the sacred cave
Then hasten'd. Under heav'n's night-shaded cope
He mus'd. Melissa in her holy place,
How to approach with inauspicious steps,
How to accost, his pensive mind revolv'd:
When Mycon, pious vassal of the fane,
Descending through the cavern, at the sight
Of Medon stopp'd, and thus. Thy presence, lord,
The priestess calls. To Lacedemon's king
I bear a message, suff'ring no delay.

He quits the chief, whose rapid feet ascend,
Soon enter'ing, where the pedestal displays
Thy form, Calliopè sublime. The lyre,
Whose accents immortality confer,
Thy fingers seem to wake. On either side,
The snowy glofs of Parian marble shows
Four of thy sisters through surrounding shade.
Before each image is a virgin plac'd.
Before each virgin dimly burns a lamp,
Whose livid spires just temper with a gleam
The dead obscurity of night. Apart
The priestess thoughtful sits. Thus Medon breaks
The solemn silence. Anxious for thy state,
Without a summons to thy pure abode,
I was approaching. Deities, who know
The present, past, and future, let my lips,
Unblam'd, have utterance. Thou, my sister, hear.
Thy breath let wisdom strengthen. Impious foes
Through Oeta now are passing. She replies.

Are passing, brother! Thy, alas! are pass'd,
Are in possession of the upper Streight.
Hear in thy turn. A dire narration hear.
A favour'd goat, conductor of my herd,
Stray'd to a dale, whose outlet is the post
To Phocian's left, and penetrates to Greece.
Him Mycon following by a hostile band,
Light-arm'd forerunners of a num'rous host,
Was seiz'd. By fear of menac'd torments forc'd,
He show'd a passage up that mountain's side,
Whose length of wood o'er shades the Phocian land.
To dry and sapless trunks in different parts
Fire, by the Persians artfully apply'd,
Soon grew to flames. This done, the troop re-turn'd,

Vol. XI.

Detaining Mycon: Now the mountain blaz'd.
The Phocians, ill-commanded, left their post, Alarm'd, confus'd. More distant ground they chose.

In blind delusion forming there, they spread
Their inefficual banners to repel
Imagin'd peril from those fraudulent lights,
By stratagem prepar'd. A real foe
Meantime secur'd the undefended pass.
This Mycon saw. Escaping thence to me,
He by my orders hastens to inform Leonidas. She pans'd. Like one, who sees
The forked lightning into shivers rive
A knotted oak, or crumble towers to dust,
Aghast was Medon; then recover'ing, spake.
Thou boasted glory of the Oilean house,
If e'er thy brother bow'd in rev'rence due
To thy superior virtues, let his voice
Be now regarded. From th' endanger'd fane,
My sister, fly. Whatever be my lot,
A troop select of Locrians shall transport
Thy sacred person, where thy will ordains.

Think not of me, returns the dame. To Greece
Direct thy zeal. My peasants are conven'd,
That by their labour, when the fatal hour
Requires, with massy fragments I may bar
That cave to human entrance. Best belov'd
Of brothers, now a serious ear incline.
A while in Greece to fortune's wanton gale
His golden banner shall the Persian king,
Deluded, wave. Leonidas, by death
Preserving Sparta, will his spirit leave
To blast the glittering pageant. Medon, live
To share that glory. Thee to perish here,
No law, no oracle enjoins. To die,
Uncall'd, is blameful. Let thy pious hand
Secure Oileus from barbarian force.
To Sparta mindful of her noble host
Intra't his rev'rend head. Th' assembl'd hinds, Youths, maidens, wives, with nurselings at their breasts,

Around her now in consternation stood,
The women weeping, mute, aghast the men.
To them she turns. You never, faithful race,
Your priestess's shall forsake. Melissa here,
Despairing never of the public weal,
For better days in solitude shall wait,
Shall cheer your sadness. My prophetic soul
Sees through time's cloud the liberty of Greece
More stable, more effulgent. In his blood
Leonidas cements th' unshaken base
Of that strong tow'r, which Athens shall exalt
To cast a shadow o'er the eastern world.

This utter'd, tow'rd the temple's inmost seat
Of sanctity her solemn step she bends,
Devout, enraptur'd. In their dark'ning lamps
The pallid flames are fainting. Dim through mists
The morning peeps. An awful silence reigns.
While Medon pensive from the fane descends,
But instant reappears. Behind him close
Treads Melibœus, through the cavern's mouth,
Ascending pale in aspect, not unlike
What legends tell of spectres, by the force
Of necromantic sorcery constrain'd; [join'd,
Through earth's dark bowels, which the spell dis-
They from death's mansion in reluctant spelt
Rose to divulge the secrets of their graves,
Or mysteries of fate. His cheerful brow,

L I

O'erclouded, paleness on his healthful cheek,
A dull, unwonted heaviness of pace
Portend disastrous tidings. Medon spake.

Turn, holy sister. By the gods below'd,
May they sustain thee in this mournful hour.
Our father, good Oileus is no more.

Rehearse thy tidings, swain. He takes the word.
Thou wast not present when his mind, out-stretch'd

By zeal for Greece, transported by his joy
To entertain Leonidas, refus'd
Due rest. Old age his ardour had forgot,
To his last waking moment with his guest
In rapt'rous talk redundant. He at last,
Compos'd and smiling in th' embrace of sleep,
To Pan's protection at the island fane
Was left. He wak'd no more. The fatal news
To you discover'd, from the chiefs I hide.

Melissa heard, inclin'd her forehead low
Before th' insculptur'd deities. A sigh
Broke from her heart, these accents from her lips.

The full of days and honours through the gate
Of painless slumber is retir'd. His tomb
Shall stand among his fathers, in the shade
Of his own trophies. Placid were his days,
Which flow'd through blessings: As a river pure,
Whose sides are flow'ry, and whose meadows fair,
Meets in his course a subterranean void;
There dips his silver head, again to rise,
And, rising, glide through flow'rs and meadows
new:

So shall Oileus in those happier fields,
Where never tempests roar, nor humid clouds
In mists dissolve, nor white-descending flakes
Of winter violate th' eternal green;
Where never gloom of trouble shades the mind,
Nor gust of passion heaves the quiet breast,
Nor dews of grief are sprinkled. Thou art gone,
Host of divine Leonidas on earth,
Art gone before him to prepare the feast,
Immortalizing virtue. Silent here,
Around her head she wraps her hallow'd pall.
Her prudent virgins interpose a hymn,
Not in a plaintive, but majestic flow,
To which their fingers, sweeping o'er the chords,
The lyre's full tone attemper. She unveils,
Then with a voice, a countenance compos'd.

Go, Medon, pillar of th' Oilean house.
New cares, new duties claim thy precious life.
Perform the pious obsequies. Let tears,
Let groans be absent from the sacred dust,
Which Heav'n in life so favour'd, more in death.
A term of righteous days, an envy'd urn
Like his, for Medon is Melissa's pray'r.
Thou, Melibœus, cordial, high in rank
Among the prudent, warn and watch thy lord.
My benediction shall reward thy zeal.

Sooth'd by the blessings of such perfect lips,
They both depart. And now the climbing sun
To Xerxes' tent discover'd from afar
The Persian captives with their mournful load.
Before them rumour through her sable trump
Breathes lamentation. Horror lends his voice
To spread the tidings of disastrous fate
Along Spercheos. As a vapour black,
Which from the distant, horizontal verge
Ascending, nearer still and nearer bends
To higher lands its progress, there condens'd,

Throws darkness o'er the valleys, while the face
Of nature saddens round; so step by step,
In motion flow th' advancing bier diffus'd
A solemn sadness o'er the camp. A hedge
Of trembling spears on either hand is form'd.
Tears underneath his iron-pointed cone
The Scædian drops. The Cæpian savage feels
His heart transpierc'd, and wonders at the pain.
In Xerxes' presence are the bodies plac'd,
Nor he forbids. His agitated breast
All night had weigh'd against his future hopes
His present losses, his defeated ranks,
By myriads thinn'd, their multitude abash'd,
His fleet thrice worsted, torn by storms, reduc'd
To half its number. When he slept, in dreams
He saw the haggard dead, which floated round
Th' adjoining strands. Disasters new their ghosts
In fullen frowns, in surill upbraidings bode.
Thus, ere the gory bier approach'd his eyes,
He in dejection had already lost
His kingly pride, the parent of disdain,
And cold indifference to human woes.
Not ev'n beside his sister's nobler corse
Her humble lover could awake his scorn.
The captives told their piteous tale. He heard;
He felt a while compassion. But ere long
Those traces vanish'd from the tyrant's breast.
His former gloom redoubles. For himself
His anxious bosom heaves, oppress'd by fear,
Left he with all his splendour should be cast
A prey to fortune. Thoughtful near the throne
Laconia's exile waits, to whom the king.

O Demaratus, what will fate ordain?
Lo, fortune turns against me! What shall check
Her further malice, when her daring stride
Invades my house with ravage, and profanes
The blood of great Darius. I have sent
From my unguarded side the chosen band,
My bravest chiefs to pass the desert hill;
Have to the conduct of a Malian spy
My hopes intrusted. May not there the Greeks
In opposition more tremendous still,
More ruinous than yester sun beheld,
Maintain their post invincible, renew
Their stony thunder in augmented rage,
And send whole quarries down the craggy steep
Again to crush my army? Oh, unfold
Thy secret thoughts, nor hide the harshlest truth!
Say, what remains to hope? The exile here.

Too well, O monarch, do thy fears preface,
What may befall thy army! If the Greeks,
Arrang'd within Thermopylæ, a pass
Accessible and practis'd, could repel
With such destruction their unnumber'd foes;
What scenes of havoc may untrdden paths,
Confin'd among the craggy hills, afford?

Lost in despair, the monarch silent sat.
Not less unmann'd than Xerxes, from his place
Uprose Argestes; but concealing fear,
These artful words deliver'd. If the king
Propitious wills to spare his faithful bands,
Nor spread at large the terrors of his pow'r;
More gentle means of conquest than by arms,
Nor less secure may artifice supply.
Renown'd Darius, thy immortal fire
Bright in the spoil of kingdoms, long in vain
The fields of proud Euphrates with his host
O'erspread. At length, confiding in the wiles

Of Zopyrus, the mighty prince subdu'd
The Babylonian ramparts. Who shall count
The thrones and states, by stratagem o'erturn'd?
But if corruption join her pow'rful aid,
Not one can stand. What race of men possess
That probity, that wisdom, which the veil
Of craft shall never blind, nor proffer'd wealth,
Nor splendid pow'r seduce? O Xerxes! born
To more than mortal greatness, canst thou find
Through thy unbounded sway no dazzling gift,
Which may allure Leonidas? Dispel
The cloud of sadness from those sacred eyes.
Great monarch, proffer to Laconia's chief,
What may thy own magnificence declare,
And win his friendship. O'er his native Greece
Invest him sov'reign. Thus procure his sword
For thy succeeding conquests. Xerxes here,
As from a trance awak'ning, swift replies.

Wife are thy dictates. Fly to Sparta's chief.
Argestes, fall before him. Bid him join
My arms, and reign o'er ev'ry Grecian state.

He scarce had finish'd, when in haste approach'd
Artuchus. Startled at the ghastly sight
Of death, that guardian of the Persian fair
Thus in a groan. Thou deity malign,
O Arimanius, what a bitter draught
For my sad lips thy cruelty hath mix'd!
Is this the flow'r of women, to my charge
So lately giv'n? Oh princess! I have rang'd
The whole Sperchean valley, woods, and caves,
In quest of thee, found here a lifeless corse.
Astonishment and horror lock my tongue.

Pride now reviving in the monarch's breast,
Dispell'd his black despondency a while,
With gall more black effacing from his heart
Each merciful impression. Stern he spake.

Remove her, satrap, to the female train.
Let them the due solemnities perform.
But never she, by Mithra's light I swear,
Shall sleep in Susa with her kindred dust;
Who by ignoble passions hath debas'd
The blood of Xerxes. Greece beheld her shame;
Let Greece behold her tomb. The low-born slave,
Who dar'd to Xerxes' sister lift his hopes,
On some bare crag expose. The Spartan here.

My royal patron, let me speak—and die,
If such thy will. This cold, disfigur'd clay
Was late thy soldier, gallantly who fought,
Who nobly perish'd, long the dearest friend
Of Hyperanthes, hazarding his life
Now in thy cause. O'er Persians thou dost reign;
None more than Persians, venerate the brave.

Well hath he spoke, Artuchus firm subjoins.
But if the king his rigour will inflict
On this dead warrior—Heav'n o'erlook the deed,
Nor on our heads accumulate fresh woes!
The shatter'd fleet, th' intimidated camp,
The band select, through Octa's dang'rous wilds
At this dread crisis struggling, must obtain
Support from Heav'n, or Asia's glory falls.

Fell pride, recoiling at these awful words
In Xerxes' frozen bosom, yields to fear,
Resuming there the sway. He grants the corse
To Demaratus. Forth Artuchus moves
Behind the bier, uplifted by his train.

Argestes, parted from his master's side,
Ascends a car; and speeding o'er the beach,
Sees Artemisia. She the ashes pale

Of slaughter'd Carians on the pyre consum'd,
Was then collecting for the fun'ral wafe
In exclamation thus. My subjects lost
On earth, descend to happier climes below—
The fawning, dastard counsellors, who left
Your worth deserted in the hour of need,
May kites disfigure, may the wolf devour—
Shade of my husband, thou salute in smiles
These gallant warriors, faithful once to thee,
Nor less to me. Thy tidings will report
Of Artemisia, to revive thy love—
May wretches like Argestes never clasp Their wives, their offspring! Never greet their homes!

May their unbury'd limbs dismiss their ghosts
To wait for ever on the banks of Styx!

Then, turning tow'rd her son. Come, virtuous boy,

Let us transport these relics of our friends
To yon tall bark, in pendent sable clad.
They, if her keel be destin'd to return,
Shall in paternal monuments repose.
Let us embark. Till Xerxes shuts his car
To false Argestes; in her vessel hid,
Shall Artemisia's gratitude lament
Her boupeuous sov'reign's fate. Leander, mark.
The Doric virtues are not eastern plants.
Them foster still within thy gen'rous breast,
But keep in covert from the blaze of courts;
Where flattery's guile in oily words profuse,
In action tardy, o'er th' ingenuous tongue,
The arm of valour, and the faithful heart
Will ever triumph. Yet my soul enjoys
Her own preface, that destiny reserves
An hour for my revenge. Concluding here,
She gains the fleet. Argestes sweeps along
On rapid wheels from Artemisia's view,
Like night, proteſtress foul of heinous deeds,
With treason, rape, and murder at her heel,
Before the eye of morn retreating swift
To hide her loathsome visage. Soon he reach'd
Thermopyla; descending from his car,
Was led by Dichyrambus to the tent
Of Sparta's ruler. Since the fatal news
By Mÿcon late deliver'd, he apart
With Polydorus had consulted long
On high attempts; and now sequester'd, sat
To ruminate on vengeance. At his feet
Prone fell the satrap, and began. The will
Of Xerxes bends me prostrate to the earth,
Before thy presence. Great and matchless chief,
Thus says the lord of Asia. Join my arms;
Thy recompense is Greece. Her fruitful plains,
Her gen'rous steeds, her flocks, her numerous towns,

Her sons, I render to thy sov'reign hand.
And, O illustrious warrior, heed my words!
Think on the bliss of royalty, the pomp
Of courts, their endless pleasures, trains of slaves,
Who restless watch for thee, and thy delights:
Think on the glories of unrivall'd sway.
Look on th' Ionic, on th' Eolian Greeks.
From them their phantom liberty is flown;
While in each province, rais'd by Xerxes' pow'r,
Some favour'd chief presides; exalted state,
Ne'er giv'n by envious freedom. On his head
He bears the gorgeous diadem; he sees
His equals once in adoration stoop

Beneath his footstool. What superior beams
Will from thy temples blaze, when gen'ral Greece,
In noblest states abounding, calls thee lord,
Thee only worthy. How will each rejoice
Around thy throne, and hail th' auspicious day,
When thou, distinguish'd by the Persian king,
Didst in thy sway consenting nations bless,
Didst calm the fury of unsparring war,
Which else had delug'd all with blood and flames.

Leonidas replies not, but commands
The Theſſian youth, still watchful near the tent,
To summon all the Grecians. He obeys.
The king up rises from his seat, and bids
The Persian follow. He, amaz'd, attends,
Surrounded soon by each assembling band;
When thus at length the godlike Spartan spake :

Here, Persian, tell thy embassy. Repeat,
That to obtain my friendship Asia's prince
To me hath proffer'd sov'reignty o'er Greece.
Then view these bands, whose valour shall preserve
That Greece unconquer'd, which your king be-flows;

Shall strew your bodies on her crimson'd plains:
The indignation, painted on their looks,
Their generous scorn may answer for their chief.
Yet from Leonidas, thou wretch, inur'd
To vassalage and baseness, hear. The pomp,
The arts of pleasure in despotic courts
I spurn abhorrent. In a spotless heart
I look for pleasure. I from righteous deeds
Derive my splendour. No adoring crowd,
No purple slaves, no mercenary spears
My state embarrass. I in Sparta rule
By laws, my rulers, with a guard unknown
To Xerxes, public confidence and love.
No pale suspicion of th' empoison'd bowl,
Th' assassin's poniard, or provok'd revolt
Chafe from my decent couch the peace, deny'd
To his resplendent canopy. Thy king,
Who hath profan'd by proffer'd bribes my ear,
Dares not to meet my arm. Thee, trembling slave,
Whose embassy was treason, I despise,
And therefore spare. Diomedon subjoins :

Our marble temples these Barbarians waste,
A crime less impious, than a bare attempt
Of sacrilege on virtue. Grant my suit,
Thou living temple, where the goddess dwells.
To me consign the caiffiv. Soon the winds
Shall parch his limbs on Oeta's tallest pine.

Amidst his fury suddenly return'd
The speed of Alpheus. All, suspended, fix'd
On him their eyes impatient. He began :

I am return'd a messenger of ill.
Close to the passage, op'ning into Greece,
That post committed to the Phocian guard,
O'erhangs a bushy cliff. A station there
Behind the shrubs by dead of night I took,
Though not in darkness. Purple was the face
Of heav'n. Beneath my feet the valleys glow'd.
A range immense of wood-invested hills,
The boundaries of Greece, were clad in flames;
An act of froward chance, or crafty foes
To cast dismay. The crackling pines I heard;
Their branches sparkled, and the thickets blaz'd.
In hillocks embers rose. Embody'd fire,
As from unnumber'd furnaces, I saw
Mount high through vacant trunks of headless
oaks,

Broad-bas'd, and dry with age. Barbarian helms,
Shields, javelins, fabres, gleaming from below,
Full soon discover'd to my tortur'd sight
The freights in Persia's pow'r. The Phocian chief,

Whate'er the cause, relinquishing his post,
Was to a neighb'ring eminence remov'd;
There by the foe neglected, or contemn'd,
Remain'd in arms, and neither fled, nor fought.
I stay'd for day's spring. Then the Persians mov'd.
To-morrow's sun will see their numbers here.

He said no more. Unutterable fear
In horrid silence wraps the list'ning crowd,
Aghast, confounded. Silent are the chiefs,
Who feel no terror; yet in wonder fix'd,
Thick-wedg'd, enclose Leonidas around,
Who thus in calmest elocution spake :

I now behold the oracle fulfill'd.
Then art thou near, thou glorious, sacred hour,
Which shalt my country's liberty secure.
Thrice hail! thou solemn period. Thee the tongues
Of virtue, fame and freedom shall proclaim,
Shall celebrate in ages yet unborn.

Thou godlike offspring of a godlike fire,
To him my kindest greetings, Medon, bear.
Farewell, Megistias, holy friend and brave.
Thou too, experienc'd, venerable chief,
Demophilus, farewell. Farewell to thee,
Invincible Diomedon, to thee,

Unequall'd Dithyrambus, and to all,
Ye other dauntless warriors, who may claim
Praise from my lips, and friendship from my heart,
You after all the wonders, which your swords
Have here accomplish'd, will enrich your names
By fresh renown. Your valour must complete
What ours begins. Here first th' astonish'd foe
On dying Spartans shall with terror gaze,
And tremble while he conquers. Then, by fate
Led from his dreadful victory to meet
United Greece in phalanx o'er the plain,
By your avenging spears himself shall fall.

Forth from the assembly strides Plataea's chief.
By the twelve gods, enthron'd in heav'n supreme;
By my fair name, unfully'd yet, I swear,
Thine eye, Leonidas, shall ne'er behold
Diomedon forsake thee. First, let strength
Desert my limbs, and fortitude my heart.

Did I not face the Marathonian war?
Have I not seen Thermopylae? What more
Can fame bestow, which I should wait to share?
Where can I living, purchase brighter praise,
Than dying here? What more illustrious tomb
Can I obtain, than bury'd in the heaps
Of Persians, fall'n my victims, on this rock
To lie distinguish'd by a thousand wounds?

He ended; when Demophilus, O king
Of Lacedaemon, pride of human race,
Whom none e'er equal'd, but the seed of Jove,
Thy own forefather, number'd with the gods,
Lo! I am old. With fault'ring steps I tread
The prone descent of years. My country claim'd
My youth, my ripeness. Feeble age but yields
An empty name of service. What remains
For me unequal to the winged speed
Of active hours, which court the swift and young?
What eligible wish can wisdom form,
But to die well? Demophilus shall close
With thee, O hero, on this glorious earth

His eve of life. The youth of Thespia next Address'd Leonidas. O first of Greeks,
 Me too think worthy to attend thy fame
 With this most dear, this venerable man,
 For ever honour'd from my tend'rest age,
 Ev'n till on life's extremity we part.
 Nor too aspiring let my hopes be deem'd;
 Should the Barbarian in his triumph mark
 My youthful limbs among the gory heaps,
 Perhaps remembrance may unnerve his arm
 In future fields of contest with a race,
 To whom the flow'r, the blooming joys of life
 Are less alluring than a noble death.

To him his second parent. Wilt thou bleed,
 My Dithyrambus? But I here withhold
 All counsel from thee, who art wise as brave.
 I know thy magnanimity. I read
 Thy gen'rous thoughts. Decided is thy choice.
 Come then, attendants on a godlike shade,
 When to th' Elysiac anarchy of Greece
 Defends her great protector, we will show
 To Harmatides an illustrious son,
 And no unworthy brother. We will link
 Our shields together. We will press the ground,
 Still undivided in the arms of death.
 So if th' attentive traveller we draw
 To our cold reliques, wond'ring, shall he trace
 The diff'rent scene, then pregnant with applause,
 O wife old man, exclaim, the hour of fate
 Well didst thou choose; and, O unequal'd youth,
 Who for thy country didst thy bloom devote,
 May'st thou remain for ever dear to fame!
 May time rejoice to name thee! O'er thy urn
 May everlasting peace her pinion spread.

This said, the hero with his lifted shield
 His face o'er shades; he drops a secret tear:
 Not this a tear of anguish, but deriv'd
 From fond affection, grown mature with time,
 Awak'd a manly tenderness alone,
 Unmix'd with pity, or with vain regret.

A stream of duty, gratitude, and love,
 Flow'd from the heart of Harmatides' son,
 Addressing straight Leonidas, whose looks
 Declar'd unspeakable applause. O king
 Of Lacedemon, now distribute praise
 From thy accusom'd justice, small to me,
 To him a portion large. His guardian care
 His kind instruction, his example train'd
 My infancy, my youth. From him I learn'd
 To live unsported. Could I less than learn
 From him to die with honour? Medon hears.
 Shook by a whirlwind of contending thoughts
 Strong heaves his manly bosom, under awe
 Of wise Melissa, torn by friendship, fir'd
 By such example high. In dubious state
 So rolls a vessel, when th' inflated waves
 Her planks assail, and winds her canvass rend;
 The rudder labours, and requires a hand
 Of firm, delib'rate skill. The gen'rous king
 Perceives the hero's struggle, and prepares
 To interpose relief; when instant came Dieneces before them. Short he spake:

Barbarian myriads through the secret pass
 Have enter'd Greece. Leonidas, by morn
 Expect them here. My slender force I spar'd,
 There to have died was useless. We return
 With thee to perish. Union of our strength
 Will render more illustrious to ourselves,
 And to the foe more terrible our fall.

Megistias last accosts Laconia's king.
 Thou, whom the gods have chosen to exalt
 Above mankind in virtue and renown,
 O call not me presumptuous, who implore
 Among these heroes thy regardful ear.
 To Lacedemon I a stranger came,
 There found protection. There to honours rais'd,
 I have not yet the benefit repaid.
 That now the gen'rous Spartans may behold
 In me their large beneficence not vain,
 Here to their cause I consecrate my breath.

Not so, Megistias, interpos'd the king.
 Thou and thy son retire. Again the peer:
 Forbid it, thou eternally ador'd,
 O Jove, confirm my persevering soul!
 Nor let me these auspicious moments lose,
 When to my bounteous patrons I may show,
 That I deserv'd their favour. Thou, my child,
 Dear Menalippus, heed the king's command,
 And my paternal tenderness revere.
 Thou from these ranks withdraw thee, to my use
 Thy arms surrend'ring. Fortune will supply
 New proofs of valour. Vanquish then, or find
 A glorious grave; but spare thy father's eye
 The bitter anguish to behold thy youth
 Untimely bleed before him. Grief suspends
 His speech, and interchangeably their arms
 Impart the last embraces. Either weeps,
 The hoary parent, and the blooming son.

But from his temples the pontific wreath
 Megistias now unloosens. He resigns
 His hallow'd vestments; while the youth in tears
 The helmet o'er his parent's snowy locks,
 O'er his broad chest adjusts the radiant mail.
 Dicineces was nigh. Oppress'd by shame,
 His downcast visage Menalippus hid
 From him, who cheerful thus: Thou need'st not blush.

Thou hear'st thy father and the king command
 What I suggest'd, thy departure hence.
 Train'd by my care, a soldier thou return'st.
 Go, practise my instructions. Oft in fields
 Of future conflict may thy prowess call
 Me to remembrance. Spare thy words. Farewell!

While such contempt of life, such servid zeal
 To die with glory animate the Greeks,
 Far diff'rent thoughts possess Argestes' soul.
 Amaze and mingled terror chill his blood.
 Cold drops, distill'd from ev'ry pore, bedew
 His shiv'ring flesh. His bosom pants. His knees
 Yield to their burden. Ghastly pale his cheeks,
 Pale are his lips and trembling. Such the minds
 Of slaves corrupt; on them the beautiful face
 Of virtue turns to horror. But these words
 From Lacedemon's chief the wretch relieve:

Return to Xerxes. Tell him, on this rock
 The Grecians faithful to their trust await
 His chosen myriads. Tell him, thou hast seen
 How far the lust of empire is below
 A freeborn spirit; that my death, which seals
 My country's safety is indeed a boon,
 His folly gives a precious boon, which Greece
 Will by perdition to his throne repay.

He said. The Persian hastens through the pass,
 Once more the stern Diomedon arose.
 Wrath overcast his forehead while he spake:

Yet more must stay and bleed. Detested Trebes
 Ne'er shall receive her traitors back. This spot
 Shall see their perfidy aton'd by death,

Ev'n from that pow'r, to which their abject hearts
Have sacrific'd their faith. Nor dare to hope,
Ye vile deserters of the public weal,
Ye coward slaves, that mingled in the heaps
Of gen'rous victims to their country's good,
You shall your shame conceal. Whoe'er shall pass
Along this field of glorious slain, and mark
For veneration ev'ry nobler corse;
His heart, though warm in rapturous applause,
A while shall curb the transport to repeat
His execrations o'er such impious heads,
On whom that fate, to others yielding fame,
Is infamy and vengeance. Dreadful thus
On the pale Thebans sentence he pronounc'd,
Like Rhadamanthus from th' infernal seat
Of judgment, which inexorably dooms
The guilty dead to ever-during pain;
While Phlegethon his flaming volumes rolls
Before their sight, and ruthless furies shake
Their hissing serpents. All the Greeks assent
In clamours, echoing through the concave rock.
Forth Anaxander in th' assembly stood,
Which he address'd with indignation feign'd:

If yet your clamours, Grecians, are allay'd,
Lo! I appear before you to demand,
Why these my brave companions, who alone
Among the Thebans through dissuading crowds
Their passage forc'd to join your camp, should bear
The name of traitors? By an exil'd wretch
We are traduc'd, by Demaratus, driv'n
From Spartan confines, who hath meanly sought
Barbarian courts for shelter. Hath he drawn
Such virtues thence, that Sparta, who before
Held him unworthy of his native sway,
Should trust him now, and doubt auxiliar friends?
Injurious men! We scorn the thoughts of flight.
Let Asia bring her numbers; unconstrain'd,
We will confront them, and for Greece expire.

Thus in the garb of virtue he adorn'd
Necessity. Laconia's king perceiv'd
Through all its fair disguise the traitor's heart.
So, when at first, rank'd in science rude
Rever'd the moon, as bright in native beams,
Some sage, who walk'd with nature through her
By wisdom led, discern'd the various orb, [works,
Dark in itself, in foreign splendours clad.

Leonidas concludes. Ye Spartans, hear;
Hear you, O Grecians, in our lot by choice
Partakers, destin'd to enrol your names
In time's eternal record, and enhance
Your country's lustre: lo! the noontide blaze
Inflames the broad horizon. Each retire;
Each in his tent invoke the pow'r of sleep
To brace his vigour, to enlarge his strength
For long endurance. When the sun descends,
Let each appear in arms. You, brave allies
Of Corinth, Phlius, and Mycenæ's towers,
Arcadians, Locrians, must not yet depart.
While we repose, embattled wait. Retreat
When we our tents abandon. I resign
To great Oileus' son supreme command.
Take my embraces, Æschylus. The fleet
Expects thee. To Theinistocles report,
What thou hast seen and heard. O, thrice farewell!
Th' Athenian answer'd: To yourselves, my friends,
Your virtues immortality secure,
Your bright examples victory to Greece.

Retaining these injunctions, all dispers'd;

While in his tent Leonidas remain'd
Apart with Agis, whom he thus bespake:
Yet in our fall the pond'rous hand of Greece
Shall Asia feel. This Persian's welcome tale
Of us, inextricably doom'd her prey,
As by the force of forcibly will wrap
Security around her, will suppress
All sense, all thought of danger. Brother, know,
That soon as Cynthia from the vault of heav'n
Withdraws her shining lamp, through Asia's host
Shall massacre and desolation rage.
Yet not to base associates will I trust
My vast design. Their perfidy might warn
The unsuspecting foe, our fairest fruits
Of glory thus he wither'd. Ere we move,
While on the solemn sacrifice intent,
As Lacedemon's ancient laws ordain,
Our prayers we offer to the tuneful nine,
Thou whisper through the willing ranks of Thebes
Slow and in silence to disperse and fly.

Now left by Agis, on his couch reclin'd,
The Spartan king thus meditates alone:

My fate is now impending. O my soul,
What more auspicious period could'st thou choose
For death, than now, when beating high in joy,
Thou tell'st me I am happy? If to live,
Or die, as virtue dictates, be to know
The purest bliss; if the her charms displays
Still lovely, still unfading, still serene
To youth, to age, to death: whatever be
Those other climes of happiness unchang'd,
Which Heav'n in dark futurity conceals,
Still here, O virtue, thou art all our good!
Oh, what a black, unspeakable reverse
Must the unrighteous, must the tyrant prove?
What in the struggle of departing day,
When life's last glimpse, extinguishing, presents
Unknown, inextricable gloom? But how Can I explain the terrors of a breast,
Where guilt resides? Leonidas, forego
The horrible conception, and again
Within thy own felicity retire;
Bow grateful down to him, who form'd thy mind
Of crimes unfruitful, never to admit
The black impression of a guilty thought.
Else could I fearless by deliberate choice
Relinquish life? 'This calm from minds deprav'd
Is ever absent. Oft in them the force
Of some prevailing passion for a time
Suppresses fear. Precipitate they lose
The sense of danger; when dominion, wealth,
Or purple pomp, enchant the dazzled sight,
Pursuing still the joys of life alone.

But he, who calmly seeks a certain death,
When duty only, and the gen'ral good
Direct his courage, must a soul possess,
Which all content deducing from itself,
Can, by unerring virtue's constant light
Discern, when death is worthy of his choice.

The man, thus great and happy in the scope
Of his large mind, is stretch'd beyond his date.
Ev'n on this shore of being; he in thought
Supremely bless'd, anticipates the good
Which late posterity from him derives.

At length the hero's meditations close.
The swelling transport of his heart subsides
In soft oblivion; and the silken plumes
Of sleep envelop his extended limbs.

BOOK XI.

THE ARGUMENT.

Leonidas, rising before sun-set, dismisses the forces under the command of Medon; but observing a reluctance in him to depart, reminds him of his duty, and gives him an affectionate farewell. He then relates to his own select band a dream, which is interpreted by Megistias, arms himself, and marches in procession with his whole troop to an altar, newly raised on a neighbouring meadow; there offers a sacrifice to the muses: he invokes the assistance of those goddesses; he animates his companions; then, placing himself at their head, leads them against the enemy in the dead of the night.

THE day was closing. Agis left his tent.
He sought his godlike brother. Him he found Stretch'd o'er his tranquil couch. His looks re-tain'd

The cheerful tincture of his waking thoughts
To gladden sleep. So smile soft evening skies,
Yet streak'd with ruddy light, when summer's suns

Have veil'd their beaming foreheads. Transport fill'd

The eye of Agis. Friendship swell'd his heart.
His yielding knee in veneration bent.

The hero's hand he kiss'd, then fervent thus:
O excellence ineffable, receive

This secret homage; and may gentle sleep,
Yet longer seal thine eyelids, that, unblam'd,
I may fall down before thee. He concludes
In adoration of his friend divine,
Whose brow the shades of slumber now forsake.
So, when the rising sun resumes his state,
Some white-rob'd magnus on Euphrates side,
Or Indian seer on Ganges prostrate falls—
Before th' emerging glory, to salute
That radiant emblem of th' immortal mind.

Uprize both heroes. From their tents in arms Appear the bands elect. The other Greeks

Are filing homeward. Only Medon stops.
Melissa's dictates he forgets a while.

All inattentive to the warning voice
Of Melibœus, earnest he surveys
Leonidas. Such constancy of zeal
In good Oileus' offspring brings the fire
To full remembrance in that solemn hour,
And draws these cordial accents from the king:

Approach me, Locrian. In thy look I trace
Consummate faith and love. But, vers'd in arms,
Against thy gen'ral's orders would'st thou stay?
Go, prove to kind Oileus, that my heart
Of him was mindful, when the gates of death
I barr'd against his son. Yon gallant Greeks,
To thy commanding care from mine transferr'd,
Remove from certain slaughter. Last repair
To Lacedæmon. Thither lead thy fire.
Say to her senate, to her people tell,
Here didst thou leave their countrymen and king
On death resolv'd, obedient to the laws.

The Locrian chief, restraining tears, replies:
My fire, left slumbering in the island-fane,
Awoke no more. Then joyful I shall meet

Him soon, the king made answer. Let thy worth
Supply thy father's. Virtue bids me die, Thee live. Farewell. Now Medon's grief, o'er-aw'd

By wisdom, leaves his long-suspended mind
To firm decision. He departs, prepar'd
For all the duties of a man, by deeds
To prove himself the friend of Sparta's king,
Melissa's brother, and Oileus' son.

The gen'rous victims of the public weal,
Assembled now, Leonidas salutes,
His pregnant soul disturb'dning. O thrice hail!
Surround me, Grecians; to my words attend.
This evening's sleep no sooner press'd my brows,
Than o'er my head the empyreal form
Of heav'n-enthron'd Alcides was display'd.
I saw his magnitude divine. His voice
I heard, his solemn mandate to arise.
I rose. He bade me follow. I obey'd.
A mountain's summit, clear'd from mist, or cloud,

We reach'd in silence. Suddenly the howl
Of wolves and dogs, the vulture's piercing shriek,
The yell of ev'ry beast and bird of prey
Discordant grated on my ear. I turn'd.
A surface hideous, delug'd o'er with blood,
Beyond my view illimitably stretch'd,
One vast expanse of horror. There supine,
Of huge dimension, cov'ring half the plain,
A giant corse lay mangled, red with wounds,
Deliv'd in th' enormous flesh, which, bubbling, fed

Ten thousand thousand grisly beaks and jaws,
Insatiably devouring. Mute I gaz'd;
When from behind I heard a second sound
Like surges, tumbling o'er a craggy shore.
Again I turn'd. An ocean there appear'd
With riven keels and shrouds, with shiver'd oars,
With arms and welt'ring carcasses betwewn
Innumerable. The billows foam'd in blood.
But where the waters, unobserv'd before,
Between two adverse shores, contracting, roll'd
A stormy current, on the beach forlorn
One of majestic stature I descri'd
In ornaments imperial. Oft he bent
On me his clouded eyeballs. Oft my name
He founded forth in execrations loud;
Then rent his splendid garments; then his head
In rage divested of its graceful hairs.
Impatient now he ey'd a slender skiff,
Which, mounted high on boistrous waves, approach'd.

With indignation, with reluctant grief
Once more his sight reverting, he embark'd
Amid the perils of the frowning deep.
O thou, by glorious actions rank'd in heav'n,
I here exclaim'd, instruct me. What produc'd
This desolation? Hercules reply'd:
Let thy astonish'd eye again survey
The scene; thy soul abhor'd. I look'd. I saw
A land, where plenty with disporting hands
Pour'd all the fruits of Amalthea's horn;
Where bloom'd the olive; where the clust'ring
vine

With her broad foliage mantled ev'ry hill;
Where Ceres with exuberance enrob'd
The pregnant bosoms of the fields in gold

Where spacious towns, whose circuits proud contain'd

The dazzling works of wealth along the banks
Of copious rivers show'd their stately tow'rs,
The strength and splendour of the peopled land.
Then in a moment clouds obscur'd my view;
At once all vanish'd from my waking eyes.

Thrice I salute the omens, loud began
The sage Megistias. In this mystic dream
I see my country's victories. The land,
The deep shall own her triumphs; while the tears
Of Asia and of Libya shall deplore

Their offspring, cast before the vulture's beak,
And ev'ry monstrous native of the main.

Those joyous fields of plenty picture Greece,
Enrich'd by conquest, and barbarian spoils.
He, whom thou saw'st, in regal vesture clad,
Print on the sand his solitary step,
Is Xerxes, foil'd and fugitive. So spake
The rev'rend augur. Ev'ry bosom felt Enthusiastic rapture, joy beyond
All sense, and all conception, but of those,
Who die to save their country. Here again
Th' exulting band Leonidas address'd.

Since happiness from virtue is deriv'd,
Who for his country dies, that moment proves
Most happy, as most virtuous. Such our lot.
But go, Megistias. Instantly prepare
The sacred fuel, and the victim due;
That to the muses (so by Sparta's law
We are enjoin'd) our offerings may be paid,
Before we march. Remember, from the rites
Let ev'ry sound be absent; not the pipe,
Not ev'n the music-breathing flute be heard.
Meantime, ye leaders, ev'ry band instruct
To move in silence. Mindful of their charge
The chiefs depart. Leonidas provides
His various armour. Agis close attends,
His best assistant. First a breastplate arms
The spacious chest. O'er this the hero spreads
The mailed cuirass, from his shoulders hung.
A shining belt infolds his mighty loins.
Next on his stately temples he erects
The plumed helm; then grasps his pond'rous shield:

Where nigh the centre on projecting brass
Th' inimitable artist had emboss'd
The shape of great Alcides; whom to gain
Two goddesses contended. Pleasure here
Won by soft wiles th' attracted eye; and there
The form of virtue dignify'd the scene.
In her majestic sweetness was display'd
The mind sublime and happy. From her lips
Seem'd eloquence to flow. In look serene,
But fix'd intensely on the son of Jove,
She wav'd her hand; where, winding to the skies,
Her paths ascended. On the summit stood,
Supported by a trophy near to heav'n,
Fame, and pretended her eternal trump.
The youth attentive to her wisdom own'd
The prevalence of virtue; while his eye,
Fill'd by that spirit, which redeem'd the world
From tyranny and monsters, darted flames;
Not undecry'd by pleasure, where she lay
Beneath a gorgeous canopy. Around
Were flowrets strewn, and wantonly in rills
A fountain meander'd. All relax'd her limbs;

Nor wanting yet solicitude to gain,
What lost she fear'd, as struggling with despair,
She seem'd collecting ev'ry pow'r to charm:
Excess of sweet allurements she diffus'd
In vain. Still virtue sway'd Alcides' mind.
Hence all his labours. Wrought with vary'd art,
The shield's external surface they enrich'd.

This portraiture of glory on his arm
Leonidas displays, and, tow'ring, strides
From his pavilion. Ready are the bands.
The chiefs assume their station. Torches blaze
Through ev'ry file. All now in silent pace
To join in solemn sacrifice proceed.
First Polydorus bears the hallow'd knife,
The sacred salt and barley. At his side
Diomedon sustains a weighty mace.
The priest, Megistias, follows like the rest
In polish'd armour. White as winter's fleece,
A fillet round his shining helm reveals
The sacerdotal honours. By the horns,
Where laurels twine, with Alpheus Maron leads
The consecrated ox. And lo! behind,
Leonidas advances. Never he

In such transcendent majesty was seen,
And his own virtue never so enjoy'd.
Successive move Dienece's the brave,
In hoary state Demophilus, the bloom
Of Dithyrambus, glowing in the hope
Of future praise, the generous Agis next
Serene and graceful, last the Theban chiefs,
Repining, ignominious: then slow march
The troops all mute, nor shake their brazen arms.

Not from Thermopylae remote the hills
Of Oeta, yielding to a fruitful dale,
Within their side, half-circling, had enclos'd
A fair expanse in verdure smooth. The bounds
Were edg'd by wood, o'erlook'd by snowy cliffs,
Which from the clouds bent frowning. Down a rock

Above the loftiest summit of the grove
A tumbling torrent wore the shagged stone;
Then, gleaming through the intervals of shade,
Attain'd the valley, where the level stream
Diffus'd refreshment. On its banks the Greeks
Had rais'd a rustic altar, fram'd of turf.
Broad was the surface, high in piles of wood,
All interspers'd with laurel. Purer deem'd,
Than river, lake, or fountain, in a vase
Old Ocean's briny element was plac'd
Before the altar; and of wine unmix'd
Capacious goblets stood. Megistias now
His helm unloos'd. With his snowy head,
Uncover'd, round the solemn pile he trod.
He shook a branch of laurel, scatt'ring wide
The sacred moisture of the main. His band
Next on the altar, on the victim strew'd
The mingled salt and barley. O'er the horns
Th' inverted chalice, foaming from the grape,
Discharg'd a rich libation. Then approach'd
Diomedon, Megistias gave the sign.
Down sunk the victim by a deathful stroke,
Nor groan'd. The augur bury'd in the throat
His hallow'd steel. A purple current flow'd.
Now smok'd the structure, now it flamm'd abroad
In sudden splendour. Deep in circling ranks
The Grecians press'd. Each held a sparkling brand;

The beaming lances intermix'd; the helms,
The burnish'd armour multiply'd the blaze.
Leonidas drew nigh. Before the pile
His feet he planted. From his brows remov'd,
The casque to Agis he consign'd, his shield,
His spear to Dithyrambus; then, his arms
Extending, forth in supplications broke.

Harmonious daughters of Olympian Jove,
Who, on the top of Helicon ador'd,
And high Parnassus, with delighted ears
Bend to the warble of Castalia's stream,
Or Aganippe's murmur, if from thence
We must invoke your presence; or along
The neighb'ring mountains with propitious steps
If now you grace your consecrated bow'rs,
Look down, ye muses; nor disdain to stand
Each an immortal witness of our fate.
But with you bring fair Liberty, whom Jove,
And you must honour. Let her sacred eyes
Approve her dying Grecians; let her voice
In exultation tell the earth and heav'ns,
These are her sons. Then strike your tuneful strings.

Record us guardians of our parent's age,
Our matron's virtue, and our children's bloom,
The glorious bulwarks of our country's laws,
Who shall ennoble the historian's page,
Shall on the joyous festival inspire
With loftier strains the virgin's choral song.
Then, O celestial maids, on yonder camp
Let night sit heavy. Let a sleep like death
Weigh down the eye of Asia. O infuse
A cool, untroubled spirit in our breasts,
Which may in silence guide our daring-feet,
Controul our fury, nor by tumult wild
The friendly dark affright; till dying groans
Of slaughter'd tyrants into horror wake
The midnight calm. Then turn destruction loose.
Let terror, let confusion rage around,
In one vast ruin heap the barb'rous ranks,
Their horse, their chariots. Let the spurning steed
Inbrue his hoofs in blood, the shatter'd cars
Crush with their brazen weight the prostrate necks
Of chiefs and kings, encircled, as they fall,
By nations slain. You, countrymen and friends,
My last commands retain. Your gen'ral's voice
Once more salutes you, not to rouse the brave,
Or minds, resolv'd and dauntless, to confirm.
Too well by this expiring blaze I see
Impatient valour flash from ev'ry eye.
O temper well that ardour, and your lips
Close on the rising transport. Mark, how sleep
Hath folded millions in his black embrace.
No sound is wafted from th' unnumber'd foe.
The winds themselves are silent. All conspires
To this great sacrifice, where thousands soon
Shall only wake to die. Their crowded train
This night perhaps to Pluto's dreary shades
Ev'n Xerxes' ghost may lead, unless reserv'd
From this destruction to lament a doom
Of more disgrace, when Greece confounds that power,

Which we shall shake. But look, the setting moon
Shuts on our darksome paths her waning horns.
Let each his head distinguish by a wreath
Of well-earn'd laurel. Then the victim share,
Then crown the goblet. Take your last repast;

With your forefathers, and the heroes old
You next will banquet in the bleis'd abodes.

Here ends their leader. Through th' encircling crowd

The agitation of their spears denotes
High ardour. So the spiry growth of pines
Is rock'd, when Æolus in eddies winds
Among their stately trunks on Pelion's brow.
The Acarnanian fear distributes swift
The sacred laurel. Snatch'd in eager zeal,
Around each helm the woven leaves unite
Their glossy verdure to the floating plumes.
Then is the victim portion'd. In the bowl
Then flows the vine's empurpled stream. Aloof
The Theban train in wan dejection mute
Brood o'er their shame, or cast affrighted looks
On that determin'd courage, which, unmov'd
At fate's approach, with cheerful lips could taste
The sparkling goblet, could in joy partake
That last, that glorious banquet. Ev'n the heart
Of Anaxander had forgot its wiles,
Dissembling fear no longer. Agis here,
Regardful ever of the king's command,
Accoits the Theban chiefs in whispers thus:

Leonidas permits you to retire.
While on the rites of sacrifice employ'd,
None heed your motions. Separate and fly
In silent pace. This heard, th' inglorious troop,
Their files dissolving, from the rest withdraw.
Unseen they moulder from the host like snow,
Fred from the rigour of constringing frost;
Soon as the sun exerts his orient beam,
The transitory landscape melts in rills
Away, and structures, which delude the eye,
Insensibly are lost. The solemn feast
Was now concluded. Now Laconia's king
Had reassum'd his arms. Before his step
The crowd roll backward. In their gladden'd sight

His crest, illumind by uplifted brands,
Its purple splendour shakes. The tow'ring oak
Thus from a lofty promontory waves
His majesty of verdure. As with joy
The sailors mark his heav'n-ascending pride,
Which from afar directs their foamy course
Along the pathless ocean; so the Greeks
In transport gaze, as down their op'ning ranks
The king proceeds: from whose superior frame
A soul like thine, O Phidias, might conceive
In Parian marble, or effulgent brass
The form of great Apollo; when the god,
Won by the pray'rs of man's afflicted race,
In arms forsook his lucid throne to pierce
The monster Python in the Delphian vale.
Close by the hero Polydorus waits
To guide destruction through the Asian tents:
As the young eagle near his parent's side
In wanton flight essays his vig'rous wing,
Ere long with her to penetrate the clouds,
To dart impetuous on the fleecy train,
And dye his beak in gore; by Sparta's king
The injur'd Polydorus thus prepares
His arm for death. He feasts his angry soul
On promis'd vengeance. His impatient thoughts
Ev'n now transport him furious to the seat
Of his long sorrows, not with fetter'd hands,
But now once more a Spartan with his spear,

His shield restor'd, to lead his country's bands,
 And with them devastation. Nor the rest
 Neglect to form. Thick-rang'd, the helmets blend
 Their various plumes, as intermingling oaks
 Combine their foliage in Dodona's grove;
 Or as the cedars on the Syrian hills
 Their shady texture spread. Once more the king,
 O'er all the phalanx his confid'rate view
 Extending, through the ruddy gleam descries
 One face of gladness; but the godlike van
 He most contemplates: Agis, Alpheus there,
 Megistias, Maron with Platæa's chief,
 Dienece, Demophilus are seen
 With Thespiæ's youth: nor they their steady sight
 From his remove, in speechless transport bound
 By love, by veneration; till they hear
 His last injunction. To their diff'rent posts
 They separate. Instant on the dewy turf
 Are cast th' extinguish'd brands. On all around
 Drops sudden darkness, on the wood, the hill,
 The snowy ridge, the vale, the silver stream.
 It verg'd on midnight. Tow'rd the hostile camp
 In march compos'd and silent down the pass
 The phalanx mov'd. Each patient bosom hush'd
 Its straggling spirit, nor in whispers breath'd
 The rapt'rous ardour, virtue then inspir'd.
 So lowering clouds along th' ethereal void
 In slow expansion from the gloomy north
 A while suspend their horrors, destin'd soon
 To blaze in lightnings, and to burst in storms.

BOOK XII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Leonidas and the Grecians penetrate through the Persian camp to the very pavilion of Xerxes, who avoids destruction by flight. The barbarians are slaughtered in great multitudes, and their camp is set on fire. Leonidas conducts his men in good order back to Thermopylæ, engages the Persians, who were descended from the hills, and after numberless proofs of superior strength and valour, sinks down covered with wounds, and expires the last of all the Grecian commanders.

ACROSS th' unguarded bound of Asia's camp
 Slow pass the Grecians. Through unnum'roustents,
 Where all is mute and tranquil, they pursue
 Their march sedate. Beneath the leaden hand
 Of sleep lie millions motionless and deaf,
 Nor dream of fate's approach. Their wary foes,
 By Polydorus guided, still proceed.
 Ev'n to the centre of th' extensive host
 They pierce unseen; when lo! th' imperial tent
 Yet distant rose before them. Spreading round
 Th' august pavilion, was an ample space
 For thousands in arrangement. Here a band
 Of chosen Persians, watchful o'er the king,
 Held their nocturnal station. As the hearts
 Of anxious nations, whom th' unsparring sword,
 Or famine threaten, tremble at the sight
 Of fear engender'd phantoms in the sky,
 Aerial hots amid the clouds array'd,
 Portending woe and death; in the Persian guard
 In equal consternation now descry'd
 The glimpse of hostile armour. All disband,
 As if auxiliar to his favour'd Greeks

Pan held their banner, scatt'ring from its folds
 Fear and confusion, which to Xerxes couch
 Swift-winged, fly; thence shake the gen'ral camp,
 Whose numbers issue naked, pale, unarm'd,
 Wild in amazement, blinded by dismay,
 To ev'ry foe obnoxious. In the breasts
 Of thousands, gor'd at once, the Grecian steel
 Reeks in destruction. Deluges of blood
 Float o'er the field, and foam around the heaps
 Of wretches, slain unconscious of the hand,
 Which wastes their helpless multitude. Amazè,
 Affright, distraction from his pillow chase
 The lord of Asia, who in thought beholds
 United Greece in arms. Thy lust of pow'r!
 Thy hope of glory! whither are they flown
 With all thy pomp? In this disastrous hour
 What could avail the immeasurable range
 Of thy proud camp, save only to conceal
 Thy trembling steps, O Xerxes, while thou fly'st?
 To thy deserted couch with other looks
 With other steps Leonidas is nigh.
 Before him terror strides. Gigantic death,
 And desolation at his side attend.

The vast pavilion's empty space, where lamps
 Of gold shed light and odours, now admits
 The hero. Ardent throngs behind him press,
 But miss their victim. To the ground are hurl'd
 The glitt'ring ensigns of imperial state.
 The diadem, the sceptre, late ador'd [see Through boundless kingdoms, underneath their
 In mingled rage and scorn the warriors crush
 A sacrifice to freedom. They return
 Again to form. Leonidas exalts,
 For new destruction his resistless spear;
 When double darkness suddenly descends.
 The clouds, condensing, intercept the stars.
 Black o'er the furrow'd main the raging east
 In whirlwinds sweeps the surge. The coasts re-

sound.

The cavern'd rocks, the crashing forests roar.
 Swift through the camp the hurricane impells
 Its rude career; when Asia's numbers, veil'd
 Amid the shelt'ring horrors of the storm,
 Evade the victor's lance. The Grecians halt;
 While to their gen'ral's pregnant mind occurs
 A new attempt and vast. Perpetual fire
 Before the tent of Xerxes from the hour,
 He lodg'd his standards on the Malian plains,
 Had shone. Among his Magi to adore
 Great Hormazes was the monarch wont
 Before the sacred light. Huge piles of wood
 Lay nigh, prepar'd to feed the constant flame.
 On living embers these are cast. So wills
 Leonidas. The phalanx then divides.
 Four troops are form'd, by Dithyrambus led,
 By Alpheus, by Diomedon. The last Himself conducts. The word is giv'n. They seize

The burning fuel. Sparkling in the wind,
 Destructive fire is brandish'd. All, enjoin'd
 To reassemble at the regal tent,
 By various paths the hostile camp invade.

Now devastation, unconfin'd, involves
 The Malian fields. Among Barbarian tents
 From diff'rent stations fly consuming flames.
 The Greeks afford no respite; and the storm
 Exasperates the blaze. To ev'ry part
 The conflagration like a sea expands,

One waving surface of unbounded fire.
In ruddy volumes mount the curling flames
To heav'n's dark vault, and paint the midnight clouds.

So, when the north emits his purpled lights,
The undulated radiance, streaming wide,
As with a burning canopy invests
Th' ethereal concave. Oeta now disclos'd
His forehead, glitt'ring in eternal frost;
While down his rocks the foamy torrents shone.
Far o'er the main the pointed rays were thrown;
Night snatch'd her mantle from the ocean's breast;
The billows glimmer'd from the distant shores.

But lo! a pillar huge of smoke ascends,
Which overshades the field. There horror, there Leonidas prebides. Command he gave
To Polydorus, who, exulting, show'd
Where Asia's horse, and warlike cars possess'd
A crowded station. At the hero's nod
Devouring Vulcan riots on the stores
Of Ceres, empty'd of the ripen'd grain,
On all the tribute from her meadows brown,
By rich Thessalia render'd to the scythe.

A flood of fire envelopes all the ground.
The cordage bursts around the blazing tents.
Down sink the roofs on suffocated throngs,
Close-wedg'd by fear. The Lybian chariot burns.
Th' Arabian camel, and the Persian steed
Bound through a burning deluge. Wild with pain
They shake their singed manes. Their maddening hoofs

Dash through the blood of thousands, mix'd with flames,
Which rage, augmented by the whirlwind's blast.

Meantime the scepter'd lord of half the globe
From tent to tent precipitates his flight.
Dispers'd are all his satraps. Pride herself
Shuns his dejected brow. Despair alone
Waits on th' imperial fugitive, and shows,
As round the camp his eye, distracted, roves,
No limits to destruction. Now is seen
Aurora, mounting from her eastern hill
In rosy sandals, and with dewy locks.
The winds subside before her; darkness flies;
A stream of light proclaims the cheerful day,
Which sees at Xerxes' tent the conqu'ring bands,
All reunited. What could fortune more
To aid the valiant, what to gorge revenge?

Lo! desolation o'er the adverse host
Hath empty'd all her terrors. Ev'n the hand
Of languid slaughter dropt the crimson steel;
Nor nature longer can sustain the toil
Of unremitted conquest. Yet what pow'r
Among these sons of liberty reviv'd
Their drooping warmth, new-strung their nerves, recall'd

Their weary'd swords to deeds of brighter fame?
What, but th' inspiring hope of glorious death
To crown their labours, and th' auspicious look
Of their heroic chief, which, still unchang'd,
Still in superior majesty declar'd,
No toil had yet relax'd his matchless strength,
Nor worn the vigour of his godlike soul.

Back to the pass in gentle march he leads
Th' embattled warriors. They behind the shrubs,
Where Medon sent such numbers to the shades,
In ambush lie. The tempest is o'erblown.
Soft breezes only from the Malian wave

O'er each grim face, besmear'd with smoke and gore,

Their cool refreshment breathe. The healing gale,
A crystal rill near Octa's verdant feet
Dispel the languor from their harass'd nerves, Fresh brae'd by strength returning. O'er their heads

Lo! in full blaze of majesty appears
Melissa, bearing in her hand divine
Th' eternal guardian of illustrious deeds,
The sweet Phœbean lyre. Her graceful train
Of white-rob'd virgins, seated on a range
Half down the cliff, o'ershadowing the Greeks,
All with concordant strings, and accents clear
A torrent pour of melody, and swell
A high, triumphal, solemn dirge of praise,
Anticipating fame. Of endless joys
In blest'd Elysium was the song. Go, meet
Lycurgus, Solon and Zaleucus sage,
Let them salute the children of their laws.
Meet Homer, Orpheus and th' Aescræan bard,
Who with a spirit, by ambrosial fow
Refin'd, and more exalted, shall contend
Your splendid fate to warble through the bow'rs
Of amaranth and myrtle ever young
Like your renown. Your ashes we will cull.

In yonder fane deposited, your urns
Dear to the muses shall our lays inspire.
Whatever off'rings, genius, science, art
Can dedicate to virtue, shall be yours,
The gifts of all the muses, to transmit
You on th' enliven'd canvass, marble, brass,
In wisdom's volume, in the poet's song,
In ev'ry tongue, through ev'ry age and clime,
You of this earth the brightest flow'rs, not crop't,
Transplanted only to immortal bloom
Of praise with men, of happiness with gods.

The Grecian valour on religion's flame
To ecstasy is wafted. Death is nigh.
As by the graces fashion'd, he appears
A beauteous form. His adamant gate
Is half unfolded. All in transport catch
A glimpse of immortality. Elate
In rapturous delusion they believe,
That to behold and solemnize their fate
The goddesses are present on the hills
With celebrating lyres. In thought serene
Leonidas the kind deception blest'd,
Nor undeceiv'd his soldiers. After all
Th' incessant labours of the horrid night,
Through blood, through flames continu'd, he prepares

In order'd battle to confront the pow'rs
Of Hyperanthes from the upper heights.

Not long the Greeks in expectation wait
Impatient. Sudden with tumultuous shouts
Like Nile's rude current, where in deaf'ning roar
Prone from the steep of Elephantis falls
A sea of waters, Hyperanthes pours
His chosen numbers on the Grecian camp
Down from the hills precipitant. No foes
He finds. The Thebans join him. In his van
They march conductors. On, the Persians roll
In martial thunder through the founding pass.
They issue forth impetuous from its mouth.
That moment Sparta's leader gave the sign;
When, as th' impulsive ram in forceful sway
O'erturns a nodding rampart from its base,

And strews a town with ruin, so the band
Of ferry'd heroes down the Malian steep,
Tremendous depth, the mix'd battalions swept
Of Thebes and Persia. There no waters flow'd.
Abrupt and naked all was rock beneath.
Leonidas, incens'd, with grappling strength
Dash'd Anaxander on a pointed crag;
Compos'd, then gave new orders. At the word
His phalanx, wheeling, penetrates the pass.
Astonish'd Persia stops in full career.
Evn Hyperanthes shrinks in wonder back.
Confusion drives fresh numbers from the shore.
The Malian ooze o'erwhelms them. Sparta's

king

Still presses forward, till an open breadth
Of fifty paces yields his front extent
To proffer battle. Hyperanthes soon
Recalls his warriors, dissipates their fears.
Swift on the great Leonidas a cloud [close.
Of darts is show'r'd. Th' encount'ring armies

Who first, sublimest hero, felt thy arm?
What rivers heard along their echoing banks
Thy name, in curses sounded from the lips
Of noble mothers, wailing for their sons?
What towns with empty monuments were fill'd
For those, whom thy unconquerable sword
This day to vultures cast? First Bessus died,
A haughty satrap, whose tyrannic sway
Despoil'd Hyrcania of her golden sheaves,
And laid her forests waste. For him the bees
Among the branches interwove their sweets;
For him the fig was ripen'd, and the vine
In rich profusion o'er the goblet foam'd.
Then Dimis bled, on Hermes' side he reign'd;
He long assiduous, unavailing woo'd
The martial queen of Caria. She disdain'd
A lover's soft complaint. Her rigid ear
Was fram'd to watch the tempest, while it rag'd,
Her eye accusom'd on the rolling deck
To brave the turgid billow. Near the shore
She now is present in her pinnace light.
The spectacle of glory crowds her breast
With diff'rent passions. Valiant, she applauds
The Grecian valour; faithful, she laments
Her sad presage of Persia; prompts her son
To emulation of the Greeks in arms,
And of herself in loyalty. By fate
Is she reserv'd to signalize that day
Of future shame, when Xerxes must behold
The blood of nations overflow his decks,
And to their bottom tinge the briny floods
Of Salamis; whence she with Asia flies,
She only not inglorious. Low reclines
Her lover now, on Hermes to repeat
Her name no more, nor tell the vocal groves
His fruitless sorrows. Next Maduces fell,
A Paphlagonian. Born amid the sound
Of chafing surges, and the roar of winds,
He o'er th' inhospitable Euxine foam
Was wont from high Carambis' rock to ken
Ill-fated keels, which cut the Pontic stream,
Then with his dire associates through the deep
For spoil and slaughter guide his savage prow.
His dogs will rend ashore. From Medus far,
Their native current, two bold brothers died,
Sifamnes and Tithraustes, potent lords
Of rich domains. On these Mithrines gray,
Cilician prince, Lilaus, who had left

The balmy fragrance of Arabia's fields
With Babylonian Tenagon expir'd.

The growing carnage Hyperanthes views
Indignant, fierce in vengeful ardour strides
Against the victor. Each his lance pretends;
But Asia's numbers interpose their shields,
Solicitous to guard a prince rever'd:
Or thither fortune whirlm'd the tide of war,
His term protracting for augmented fame.
So two proud vessels, lab'ring on the foam,
Present for battle their destructive beaks;
When ridgy seas, by hurricanes upturn,
In mountainous commotion dash between,
And either deck, in black'ning tempests veil'd,
Waft from its distant foe. More fiercely burn'd
Thy spirit, mighty Spartan. Such dismay
Relax'd thy foes, that each Barbarian heart
Resign'd all hopes of victory. The steeds
Of day were climbing their meridian height.
Continu'd shouts of onset from the pass
Resounded o'er the plain. Artuchus heard.
When first the spreading tumult had alarm'd
His distant quarter, starting from repose,
He down the valley of Spercheos rush'd
To aid his regal master. Asia's camp
He found the seat of terror and despair.
As in some fruitful clime, which late hath known
The rage of winds and floods, although the storm

Be heard no longer, and the deluge fled,
Still o'er the wasted region nature mourns
In melancholy silence; through the grove
With prostrate glories lie the stately oak,
Th' uprooted elm and beach; the plain is spread
With fragments, swept from villages o'erthrown.
Around the pastures flocks and herds are cast
In dreary piles of death: so Persia's host
In terror mute one boundless scene displays
Of devastation. Half-devour'd by fire,
Her tall pavilions, and her martial cars
Deform the wide encampment. Here in gore
Her princes welter, nameless thousands there,
Not victims all to Greeks. In gasping heaps Barbarians, mangled by Barbarians, show'd
The wild confusion of that direful night;
When, wanting signals, and a leader's care,
They rush'd on mutual slaughter. Xerxes' tent
On its exalted summit, when the dawn
First streak'd the orient sky, was wont to bear
The golden form of Mithra, clos'd between
Two lucid crystals: This the gen'ral host
Observ'd, their awful signal to arrange
In arms complete, and numberless to watch
Their monarch's rising. This conspicuous blaze
Artuchus places in th' accustomed feat.
As, after winds have ruffled by a storm
The plumes of darkness, when her welcome face
The morning lifts serene, each wary swain
Collects his flock dispers'd; the neighing steed,
The herds forsake their shelter: all return
To well-known pastures, and frequented streams:
So now this cheering signal on the tent
Revives each leader. From inglorious flight
Their scatter'd bands they call, their wonted
ground

Resume, and hail Artuchus. From their swarms
A force he culls. Thermopylae he seeks.
Fell shouts in horrid dissonance precede.

His phalanx swift Leonidas commands
 To circle backward from the Malian bay.
 Their order changes. Now, half-orb'd, they stand
 By Oeta's fence protected from behind,
 With either flank united to the rock.
 As by th' excelling architect dispos'd
 To shield some haven, a stupendous mole,
 Fram'd of the grove and quarry's mingled strength,
 In ocean's bosom penetrates afar:
 There, pride of art, immoveable it looks
 On Eolus and Neptune; there defies
 Those potent gods combin'd: unyielding thus,
 The Grecians stood a solid mass of war
 Against Artuchus, join'd with numbers new
 To Hyperanthes. In the foremost rank
 Leonidas his dreadful station held.
 Around him soon a spacious void was seen
 By flight, or slaughter in the Persian van.
 In gen'rous shame and wrath Artuchus burns,
 Discharging full at Lacedemon's chief
 An iron-studded mace. It glanc'd aside,
 Turn'd by the massy buckler. Prone to earth
 The latrap fell. Alcander aim'd his point,
 Which had transfix'd him prostrate on the rock,
 But for th' immediate succour, he obtain'd
 From faithful soldiers, lifting on their shields
 A chief below'd. Not such Alcander's lot.
 An arrow wounds his heart. Supine he lies,
 The only Theban, who to Greece preserv'd
 Unviolated faith. Physician sage,
 On pure Cithæron healing herbs to cull
 Was he accusom'd, to expatiate o'er
 The Heliconian pastures, where no plants
 Of poison spring, of juice salubrious all,
 Which vipers, winding in their verdant track,
 Drink and expel the venom from their tooth,
 Dipt in the sweetness of that soil divine.
 On him the brave Artontes sinks in death,
 Renown'd through wide Bithynia, ne'er again
 The clam'rous rites of Cybelé to share;
 While echo murmurs through the hollow caves
 Of Berecynthian Dindymus. The strength
 Of Alpheus sent him to the shades of night.
 Ere from the dead was disengag'd the spear,
 Huge Abradates, glorying in his might,
 Surpassing all of Cissian race, advanc'd
 To grapple; planting firm his foremost step,
 The victor's throat he grasp'd. At Nemea's games
 The wrestler's chaplet Alpheus had obtain'd.
 He summons all his art. Oblique the stroke
 Of his swift foot supplants the Persian's heel.
 He, falling, clings by Alpheus' neck, and drags
 His foe upon him. In the Spartan's back
 Enrag'd Barbarians fix their thronging spears.
 To Abradates' chest the weapons pass;
 They rivet both in death. This Maron sees,
 This Polydorus, frowning. Victims, strewn
 Before their vengeance, hide their brother's corse.
 At length the gen'rous blood of Maron warms
 The sword of Hyperanthes. On the spear
 Of Polydorus falls the pond'rous ax
 Of Scian Mardus. From the yielding wood
 The steely point is sever'd. Undismay'd,
 The Spartan stoops to rear the knotted mace,
 Left by Artuchus; but thy fatal blade,
 Abrocomes, that dreadful instant watch'd
 To rend his op'ning side. Unconquer'd still,
 Swift he discharges on the Scian's front

A pond'rous blow, which burst the scatter'd brain.
 Down his own limbs meantime a torrent flows
 Of vital crimson. Smiling, he reflects
 On sorrow finish'd, on his Spartan name,
 Renew'd in lustre. Sudden to his side
 Springs Dithyrambus. Through th' uplifted arm
 Of Mindus, pointing a malignant dart
 Against the dying Spartan, he impell'd
 His spear. The point with violence unspent,
 Urg'd by such vigour, reach'd the Persian's throat;
 Above his corselet. Polydorus stretch'd
 His languid hand to Thespia's friendly youth,
 Then bow'd his head in everlasting peace.
 While Mindus, waded by his streaming wound,
 Beside him faints and dies. In flow'ring prime
 He, lord of Colchis, from a bride was torn
 His tyrant's hasty mandate to obey.
 She tow'rd the Euxine sends her plaintive sighs;
 She woos in tender piety the winds:
 Vain is their favour; they can never breathe
 On his returning sail. At once a crowd
 Of eager Persians seize the victor's spear.
 One of his nervous hands retains it fast.
 The other bares his falchion. Wounds and death
 He scatters round. Sofarmes feels his arm
 Lopt from the shoulder. Zatis leaves entwin'd
 His fingers round the long-disputed lance.
 On Mardon's reins descends the pond'rous blade,
 Which half divides his body. Pheron strides
 Across the pointed ash. His weight o'ercomes
 The weary'd Thespian, who resigns his hold;
 But cleaves th' elate barbarian to the brain.
 Abrocomes darts forward, shakes his steel,
 Whose lightning threatens death. The wary Greek
 Wards with his sword the well-directed stroke,
 Then, closing, throws the Persian. Now what aid
 Of mortal force, or interposing heav'n
 Preserves the eastern hero? Lo! the friend
 Of Peribazus. Eager to avenge
 That lov'd, that lost companion, and defend
 A brother's life, beneath the sinewy arm,
 Outstretch'd, the sword of Hyperanthes pass'd
 Through Dithyrambus. All the strings of life
 At once relax; nor fame, nor Greece demand
 More from his valour. Prostrate now he lies.
 In glories, ripen'd on his blooming head.
 Him shall the Thespian maidens in their songs
 Record once loveliest of the youthful train,
 The gentle, wise, beneficent and brave,
 Grace of his lineage, and his country's boast,
 Now fall'n. Elysium to his parting soul
 Uncloses. So the cedar, which supreme
 Among the groves of Libanus hath tow'r'd,
 Uprooted, low'rs his graceful top, preserv'd
 For dignity of growth some royal dome,
 Or heav'n-devoted fabric to adorn.
 Diomed bursts forward. Round his friend
 He heaps destruction. Troops of wailing ghosts
 Attend thy shade, fall'n hero! Long prevail'd
 His furious arm in vengeance uncontrol'd;
 Till four Assyrians on his shelving spear,
 Ere from a Cissian prostrate body freed,
 Their pond'rous maces all discharge. It broke.
 Still with a shatter'd truncheon he maintains Unequal fight. Impetuous through his eye

The well aim'd fragment penetrates the brain
 Of one bold warrior; there the splinter'd wood,
 Infix'd, remains. The hero last unsheaths
 His falchion broad. A second fees aghast
 His entrails open'd. Sever'd from a third,
 The head, steel cas'd descends. In blood is roll'd
 The grizly beard. That effort breaks the blade
 Short from its hilt. The Grecian stands disarm'd.
 The fourth, Astaspes, proud Chaldean lord,
 Is nigh. He lifts his iron-plated mace.
 This, while a cluster of auxiliar friends
 Hang on the Grecian shield, to earth depre's'd,
 Loads with unerring blows the batter'd helm;
 Till on the ground Diomedon extends
 His mighty limbs. So waken'd by the force
 Of some tremendous engine, which the hand
 Of Mars impels, a citadel, high-tow'r'd,
 Whence darts, and fire, and ruins, long have aw'd
 Begirding legions, yields at last, and spreads
 Its disuniting ramparts on the ground;
 Joy fills th' assailants, and the battle's tide [thus Whelms o'er the widening breach: the Persian
 O'er the late-fear'd Diomedon advanc'd
 Against the Grecian remnant: when behold
 Leonidas. At once their ardour froze.
 He had a while behind his friends retir'd,
 Oppres'd by labour. Pointless was his spear,
 His buckler cleft. As, overworn by storms,
 A vessel steers to some protecting bay;
 Then, soon as timely gales inviting, curl
 The azure floods, to Neptune shows again
 Her masts apparel'd fresh in shrouds and sails,
 Which court the vig'rous wind: So Sparta's king,
 In strength repair'd, a spear and buckler new Presents to Asia. From her bleeding ranks
 Hydarnes, urg'd by destiny, approach'd.
 He, proudly vaunting, left an infant race,
 A spouse lamenting on the distant verge
 Of Bactrian Ochus. Victory in vain
 He, parting promis'd. Wanton hope will sport
 Round his cold heart no longer. Grecian spoils,
 Imagin'd triumphs, pictur'd on his mind,
 Fate will erase for ever. Through the targe,
 The thick-mail'd corselet his divided chest
 Of bonny strength admits the hostile spear.
 Leonidas draws back the steely point,
 Bent and enfeebled by the forceful blow.
 Meantime within his buckler's rim unseen,
 Amphistreus stealing, in th' unguarded flank
 His dagger struck. In slow effusion ooz'd
 The blood, from Hercules deriv'd; but death
 Not yet had reach'd his mark. Th' indignant
 king
 Gripes irresistibly the Persian's throat.
 He drags him prostrate. False, corrupt, and base,
 Fallacious, fell, pre-eminent was he
 Among tyrannic fatraps. Phrygia pin'd
 Beneath th' oppression of his ruthless sway.
 Her soil had once been fruitful. Once her towns
 Were populous and rich. The direful change
 To naked fields and crumbling roofs declar'd
 Th' accus'd Amphistreus govern'd. As the spear
 Of Tyrian Cadmus rivetted to earth
 The pois'nous dragon, whose infectious breath
 Had-blasted all Bœotia; so the king,
 On prone Amphistreus trampling, to the rock
 Nails down the tyrant, and the fractur'd staff

Leaves in his panting body. But the blood,
 Great hero, dropping from thy wound, revives
 The hopes of Persia. Thy unyielding arm
 Upholds the conflict still. Against thy shield
 The various weapons fliver, and thy feet
 With glitt'ring points surround. The Lydian
 sword,

The Persian dagger leave their shatter'd hilts;
 Bent is the Cassian scimitar: the lance,
 The javelin, dart, and arrow all combine
 Their fruitless efforts. From Alcides sprung,
 Thou stand'st unshaken like a Thracian hill,
 Like Rhodope, or Hæmus; where in vain
 The thund'ring plants his livid bolt; in vain
 Keen-pointed lightnings pierce th' incrust'd snow;
 And winter, beating with eternal war,
 Shakes from his dreary wings discordant storms,
 Chill fleet, and clatt'ring hail. Advancing bold,
 His rapid lance Abrocomes in vain
 Aims at the forehead of Laconia's chief.
 He, not unguarded, rears his active blade
 Athwart the dang'rous blow, whose fury wastes
 Above his crest in air. Then swiftly wheel'd,
 The pond'rous weapon cleaves the Persian's knee Sheer through the parted bone. He sidelong falls.

Crush'd on the ground beneath contending feet,
 Great Xerxes' brother yields the last remains
 Of tortur'd life. Leonidas persists;
 Till Agis calls Dienece, alarms
 Demophilus, Megistias: they o'er piles
 Of Allarodian and Saferian dead
 Haste to their leader: They before him raise
 The brazen bulwark of their massy shields.
 The foremost rank of Asia stands and bleeds;
 The rest recoil: but Hyperanthes swift
 From band to band his various host pervades,
 Their drooping hopes rekindles, in the brave
 New fortitude excites: the frigid heart
 Of fear he warms. Astaspes first obeys,
 Vain of his births, from ancient Belus drawn,
 Proud of his wealthy stores, his stately domes,
 More proud in recent victory: his might
 Had foil'd Plataea's chief. Before the front
 He strides impetuous. His triumphant mace
 Against the brave Dienece he bends.
 The weighty blow bears down th' opposing shield,
 And breaks the Spartan's shoulder. Idle hangs
 The weak defence, and loads th' inactive arm,
 Depriv'd of ev'ry function. Agis bares
 His vengeful blade, At two well levell'd strokes
 Of both his hands, high brandishing the mace,
 He mutilates the foe. A Sacian chief
 Springs on the victor. Jaxartes' banks
 To this brave savage gave his name and birth.
 His look erect, his bold deportment spoke
 A gallant spirit, but untam'd by laws,
 With dreary wilds familiar, and a race
 Of rude barbarians, horrid, as their clime.
 From its direction glanc'd the Spartan spear,
 Which, upward borne, o'erturn'd his iron cone.
 Black o'er his forehead fall the naked locks;
 They aggravate his fury: while his foe
 Repeats the stroke, and penetrates his chest.
 Th' intrepid Sacian through his breast and back
 Receives the girding steel. Along the staff
 He writhes his tortur'd body; in his grasp

A barbed arrow from his quiver shakes ;
Deep in the streaming throat of Agis hides
The deadly point ; then grimly smiles and dies.

From him fate hastens to a nobler prey,
Dieneces. His undefended frame
The shield abandons, sliding from his arm.
His breast is gor'd by javelins. On the foe
He hurls them back, extracted from his wounds.
Life, yielding slow to destiny, at length
Forfakes his riven heart ; nor less in death
Thermopylæ he graces, than before
By martial deeds and conduct. What can stem
The barb'rous torrent ? Agis bleeds. His spear
Lies useless, irrecoverably plung'd
In Jaxares' body. Low reclines
Dieneces. Leonidas himself,
O'erlabour'd, wounded with his dinted sword
The rage of war can exercise no more.
One last, one glorious effort age performs.
Demophilus, Megistias join their might.
They check the tide of conquest ; while the spear
Of slain Dieneces to Sparta's chief
The fainting Agis hears. The pointed ash,
In that dire hand for battle rear'd anew,
Blasts ev'ry Persian's valour. Back in heaps
They roll confounded, by their gen'ral's voice
In vain exhorted longer to endure
The ceaseless waste of that unconquer'd arm.
So, when the giants from Olympus chas'd
Th' inferior gods, themselves in terror slunn'd
Th' incessant streams of lightning, where the hand
Of heav'n's great father with eternal might Sustain'd the dreadful conflict. O'er the field
A while Bellona gives the battle rest ;
When Thespia's leader and Megistias drop
At either side of Lacedemon's king.
Beneath the weight of years and labour bend
The hoary warriors. Not a groan molests
Their parting spirits ; but in death's calm night
All silent sink each venerable head :
Like aged oaks, whose deep-descending roots
Had pierc'd resistless through a craggy slope ;
There during three long centuries have brav'd
Malignant Eurus, and the boisterous north ;
Till bare and sapless by corroding time
Without a blast their mossy trunks recline
Before their parent hill. Not one remains,
But Agis, near Leonidas, whose hand
The last kind office to his friend performs,
Extracts the Saccian's arrow. Life, releas'd,
Pours forth in crimson floods. O Agis, pale
Thy placid features, rigid are thy limbs ; [veal
They lose their graces. Dimm'd, thy eyes re-
The native goodness of thy heart no more.
Yet other graces spring. The noble corse
Leonidas surveys. A pause he finds
To mark, how lovely are the patriot's wounds,

And see those honours on the breast he lov'd
But Hyperanthes from the trembling ranks
Of Asia tow'rs, inflexibly resolv'd
The Persian glory to redeem, or fall.
The Spartan, worn by toil, his languid arm
Uplifts once more. He waits the dauntless prince.
The heroes stand adverse. Each a while Restrains his valour. Each, admiring, view
His godlike foe. At length their brandish'd points
Provoke the contest, fated soon to close
The long-continu'd horrors of the day.
Fix'd in amaze and fear, the Asian throng,
Unmov'd and silent on their bucklers pause.
Thus on the wastes of India, while the earth
Beneath him groans, the elephant is seen,
His huge proboscis writhing, to defy
The strong rhinoceros, whose pond'rous horn
Is newly whetted on a rock. Anon
Each hideous bulk encounters. Earth her groan
Redoubles. Trembling, from their covert gaze
The savage inmates of surrounding woods
In distant terror. By the vary'd art
Of either chief the dubious combat long
Its great event retarded. Now his lance
Far through the hostile shield Laconia's king
Impell'd. Aside the Persian swung his arm.
Beneath it pass'd the weapon, which his targe
Encumber'd. Hopes of conquest and renown
Elate his courage. Sudden he directs
His rapid javelin to the Spartan's throat.
But he his wary buckler upward rais'd,
Which o'er his shoulder turn'd the glancing steel ;
For one last effort then his scatter'd strength
Collecting, level'd with resistless force
The massive orb, and dash'd its brazen verge
Full on the Persian's forehead. Down he sunk,
Without a groan expiring, as o'erwhelm'd
Beneath a marble fragment, from his seat
Heav'd by a whirlwind, sweeping o'er the ridge
Of some aspiring mansion. Gen'rous prince !
What could his valour more ? His single might
He match'd with great Leonidas, and fell
Before his native bands. The Spartan king
Now stands alone. In heaps his slaughter'd friends,
All stretch'd around him lie. The distant foes
Show'r on his head innumerable darts.
From various sluices gush the vital floods ;
They stain his fainting limbs. Nor yet with pain
His brow is clouded ; but those beauteous wounds,
The sacred pledges of his own renown,
And Sparta's safety, in serene joy
His closing eye contemplates. Fame can twine
No brighter laurels round his glorious head ;
His virtue more to labour fate forbids,
And lays him now in honourable rest
To seal his country's liberty by death.

MISCELLANIES.

POEM ON SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

To Newton's genius and immortal fame,
 Th' advent'rous muse with trembling pinions soars.
 Thou, heav'nly truth, from thy seraphic throne
 Look favourable down, do thou assist
 My lab'ring thought, do thou inspire my song.
 Newton, who first th' Almighty's works display'd,
 And smooth'd that mirror, in whose polish'd face
 The great Creator now conspicuous shines;
 Who open'd nature's adamantine gates,
 And to our minds her secret powers expos'd;
 Newton demands the muse; his sacred hand
 Shall guide her infant steps; his sacred hand
 Shall raise her to the Heliconian height,
 Where, on its lofty top enthron'd, her head
 Shall mingle with the stars. Hail nature, hail,
 O goddess, handmaid of th' ethereal power,
 Now lift thy head, and to th' admiring world
 Show thy long hidden beauty. Thee the wife
 Of ancient fame, immortal Plato's self,
 The Stagyrice, and Syracusan sage,
 From black obscurity's abyss to raise,
 (Drooping and mourning o'er thy wondrous works)
 With vain inquiry sought. Like meteors these
 In their dark age bright sons of wisdom shone:
 But at thy Newton all their laurels fade,
 They shrink from all the honours of their names.
 So glimm'ring stars contract their feeble rays,
 When the swift lustre of Aurora's face Flows o'er the skies, and wraps the heav'ns in light.

The Deity's omnipotence, the cause,
 Th' original of things long lay unknown.
 Alone the beauties prominent to sight
 (Of the celestial power the outward form)
 Drew praise and wonder from the gazing world.
 As when the deluge overspread the earth,
 Whilst yet the mountains only rear'd their heads
 Above the surface of the wild expanse,
 Whelm'd deep below the great foundations lay,
 Till some kind angel at heav'n's high command
 Roll'd back the rising tides, and haughty floods,
 And to the ocean thunder'd out his voice:
 Quick all the swelling and imperious waves,
 The foaming billows and obscuring surge,
 Back to their channels and their ancient seats
 Recoil affrighted: from the darksome main
 Earth raises smiling, as new-born, her head,
 And with fresh charms her lovely face arrays.
 So his extensive thought accomplish'd first
 The mighty task to drive th' obstructing mists
 Of ignorance away, beneath whose gloom
 Th' unshrouded majesty of nature lay.
 He drew the veil and swell'd the spreading scene.

How had the moon around th' ethereal void
 Rang'd, and eluded lab'ring mortals care,
 Till his invention trac'd her secret steps,
 While she inconstant with unsteady rein
 Through endless mazes and meanders guides
 In its unequal course her changing car:
 Whether behind the sun's superior light
 She hides the beauties of her radiant face,
 Or, when conspicuous, smiles upon mankind,
 Unveiling all her night-rejoicing charms.
 When thus the silver-tressed moon dispels
 The frowning horrors from the brow of night,
 And with her splendours cheers the fullen gloom,
 While sable-mantled darkness with his veil
 The visage of the fair horizon shades,
 And o'er nature spreads his raven wings;
 Let me upon some unfrequented green
 While sleep sits heavy on the drowsy world,
 Seek out some solitary peaceful cell,
 Where darksome woods around their gloomy brows
 Bow low, and ev'ry hill's pretended shade
 Obscures the dusky vale, there silent dwell,
 Where contemplation holds its still abode,
 There trace the wide and pathless void of heav'n,
 And count the stars that sparkle on its robe.
 Or else in fancy's wild'ring mazes lost
 Upon the verdure see the fairy elves
 Dance o'er their magic circles, or behold,
 In thought enraptur'd with the ancient bards,
 Medea's baleful incantations draw
 Down from her orb the paly queen of night.
 But chiefly Newton let me soar with thee,
 And while surveying all yon starry vault
 With admiration I attentive gaze,
 Thou shalt descend from thy celestial seat,
 And waft aloft my high-aspiring mind,
 Shalt show me there how nature has ordain'd
 Her fundamental laws, shalt lead my thought
 Through all the wand'rings of th' uncertain moon,
 And teach me all her operating powers.
 She and the sun with influence conjoint
 Wield the huge axle of the whirling earth,
 And from their just direction turn the poles,
 Slow urging on the progress of the years.
 The constellations seem to leave their seats,
 And o'er the skies with solemn pace to move.
 You, splendid rulers of the day and night,
 The seas obey, at your resistless sway
 Now they contract their waters, and expose
 The dreary desert of old ocean's reign.
 The craggy rocks their horrid sides disclose;
 Trembling the sailor views the dreadful scene,
 And cautiously the threat'ning ruin shuns.
 But where the shallow waters hide the sands,
 There ravenous destruction lurks conceal'd,

There the ill-guided vessel falls a prey,
 And all her numbers gorge his greedy jaws.
 But quick returning see th' impetuous tides
 Back to th' abandon'd shores impell the main.
 Again the foaming seas extend their waves,
 Again the rolling floods embrace the shores,
 And veil the horrors of the empty deep.
 Thus the obsequious seas your power confess,
 While from the surface healthful vapours rise,
 Plenteous throughout the atmosphere diffus'd,
 Or to supply the mountain's heads with springs,
 Or fill the hanging clouds with needful rains,
 That friendly streams, and kind refreshing show'rs,
 May gently lave the sun-burnt thirsty plains,
 Or to replenish all the empty air
 With wholesome moisture to increase the fruits
 Of earth, and bless the labours of mankind.
 O Newton, whither flies thy mighty soul,
 How shall the feeble muse pursue through all
 The vast extent of thy unbounded thought,
 That even seeks th' unseen recesses dark
 To penetrate of Providence immense.
 And thou the great Dispenser of the world
 Propitious, who with inspiration taught'st
 Our greatest bard to send thy praises forth;
 Thou, who gav'st Newton thought; who smil'd'st serene,

When to its bounds he stretch'd his swelling soul;
 Who still benignant ever blest his toil,
 And deign'd to his enlight'ned mind t' appear
 Confess'd around th' interminated world:
 To me, O thy divine infusion grant
 (O thou in all so infinitely good).
 That I may sing thy everlasting works,
 Thy unexhausted store of providence,
 In thought effulgent and resounding verse.
 O could I spread the wond'rous theme around,
 Where the wind cools the oriental world,
 To the calm breezes of the Zephyr's breath,
 To where the frozen hyperborean blasts,
 To where th' boist'rous tempest-leading fourth
 From their deep hollow caves send forth their forms.

Thou still indulgent Parent of mankind,
 Left humid emanations should no more
 Flow from the ocean, but dissolve away
 Through the long series of revolving time;
 And lest the vital-principle decay,
 By which the air supplies the springs of life;
 Thou hast the fiery visag'd comets form'd
 With vivifying spirits all replete,
 Which they abundant breathe about the void,
 Renewing the prolific soul of things.
 No longer now on thee amaz'd we call,
 No longer tremble at imagin'd ills,
 When comets blaze tremendous from on high,
 Or when extending wide their flaming trains
 With hideous grasp the skies engirdle round,
 And spread the terrors of their burning locks.
 For these through orbits in the length'ning space
 Of many tedious rolling years complete
 Around the sun move regularly on;
 And with the planets in harmonious orbs,
 And mystic periods their obeisance pay
 To him majestic Ruler of the skies
 Upon his throne of circled glory fixt.
 He or some god conspicuous to the view.

VOL. XI.

Or else the substitute of nature seems,
 Guiding the courses of revolving worlds.
 He taught great Newton the all-potent laws
 Of gravitation, by whose simple power
 The universe exists. Nor here the sage
 Big with invention still renewing staid.
 But, O bright angel of the lamp of day,
 How shall the muse display his greatest toil?
 Let her plunge deep in Aganippe's waves,
 Or in Castalia's ever-flowing stream,
 That reinspired she may sing to thee,
 How Newton dar'd advent'rous to unbraide
 The yellow tresses of thy shining hair.
 Or didst thou gracious leave thy radiant sphere,
 And to his hand thy lucid splendours give,
 T' unweave the light-diffusing wreath, and part
 The blended glories of thy golden plumes?
 He with laborious, and unerring care,
 How diff'rent and imbodied colours form
 Thy piercing light, with just distinction found.
 He with quick light pursu'd thy darting rays,
 When penetrating to th' obscure recess
 Of solid matter, there periscuous saw,
 How in the texture of each body lay
 The power that separates the diff'rent beams.
 Hence over nature's unadorned face
 Thy bright diversifying rays dilate
 Their various hues: and hence when vernal rains
 Descending swift have burst the low'ring clouds,
 Thy splendours through the dissipating mists
 In its fair vesture of unnumber'd hues
 Array the show'ry bow. At thy approach
 The morning risen from her pearly couch
 With rosy blushes decks her virgin cheek;
 The ev'ning on the frontispiece of heav'n
 His mantle spreads with many colours gay;
 The mid-day skies in radiant azure clad,
 The shining clouds, and silver vapours rob'd
 In white transparent intermixt with gold,
 With bright variety of splendour clothe
 All the illuminated face above.
 When hoary-headed winter back retires
 To the chill'd pole, there solitary sits
 Encompass'd round with winds and tempests bleak,
 In caverns of impenetrable ice,
 And from behind the dissipated gloom
 Like a new Venus from the parting surge
 The gay-apparell'd spring advances on;
 When thou in thy meridian brightness sitt'st,
 And from thy throne pure emanations flow
 Of glory bursting o'er the radiant skies:
 Then let the muse Olympus' top ascend,
 And o'er Thessalia's plain extend her view,
 And count, O Tempe, all thy beauties o'er.
 Mountains, whose summits grasp the pendent clouds,
 Between their wood-invelop'd slopes embrace
 The green-attired vallies. Every flow'r
 Here in the pride of bounteous nature clad,
 Smiles on the bosom of th' enamell'd meads,
 Over the smiling lawn the silver floods
 Of fair Peneus gently roll along,
 While the reflected colours from the show'rs,
 And verdant borders pierce the limpid waves,
 And paint with all their variegated hue
 The yellow sands beneath. Smooth gliding
 The waters hasten to the neighbouring sea.
 Still the pleas'd eye the floating plain pursues.

M m

At length, in Neptune's wide dominion lost,
 Surveys the shining billows, that arise
 Apparell'd each in Phœbus' bright attire:
 Or from afar some tall majestic ship,
 Or the long hostile lines of threaten'g fleets,
 Which o'er the bright uneven mirror sweep,
 In dazzling gold and waving purple deck'd;
 Such as of old, when haughty Athens pour
 Their hideous froot and terrible array
 Against Pallene's coast extended wide,
 And with tremendous war and battle stern
 The trembling walls of Potidæashook.
 Crested with pendants curling with the breeze
 The upright masts high bristle in the air,
 Aloft exalting proud their gilded heads.
 The silver waves against the painted prows
 Raise their resplendent bosoms, and impearl
 The fair vermilion with their glitt'ring drops:
 And from on board the iron-clothed host
 Around the main a gleaming horror casts;
 Each flaming buckler like the mid-day sun,
 Each plumed helmet like the silver moon,
 Each moving gauntlet like the lightning's blaze,
 And like a star each brazen pointed spear.
 But, lo! the sacred high-erected fane,
 Fair citadels, and marble-crowned towers,
 And sumptuous palaces of stately towns
 Magnificent arise, upon their heads
 Bearing on high a wreath of silver light.
 But see my muse the high Pierian hill,
 Behold its shaggy locks and airy top,
 Up to the skies th' imperious mountain heaves;
 The shining verdure of the nodding woods.
 See where the silver Hippocrene flows,
 Behold each glitt'ring rivulet and rill.
 Through mazes wander down the green descent,
 And sparkle through the interwoven trees,
 Here rest a while and humble homage pay,
 Here, where the sacred genius, that inspir'd
 Sublime Mæonides and Pindar's breast,
 His habitation once was fam'd to hold.
 Here thou, O Homer, offer'dst up thy vows;
 Thee, the kind muse Calliopæa heard,
 And led thee to the empyrean seats,
 There manifested to thy hallow'd eyes
 The deeds of gods; thee wise Minerva taught
 The wondrous art of knowing human kind;
 Harmonious Phœbus tun'd thy heav'nly mind,
 And swell'd to rapture each exalted sense;
 Even Mars the dreadful battle-ruling god,
 Mars taught thee war, and with his bloody hand
 Instructed thine, when in thy sounding lines
 We hear the rattling of Bellona's car,
 The yell of discord, and the din of arms,
 Pindar, when mounted on his fiery steed,
 Soars to the sun, opposing eagle-like
 His eyes undazzled to the fiercest rays,
 He firmly feated, not like Glaucus' son,
 Strides his swift-winged and fire-breathing horse,
 And borne aloft strikes with his ringing hoofs
 The brazen vault of heav'n, superior there
 Looks down upon the stars, whose radiant light
 Illuminates innumerable worlds,
 That through eternal orbits roll beneath.
 But thou all hail immortalized son
 Of harmony, all hail thou Thracian bard,
 To whom Apollo gave his tuneful lyre:

O might'st thou, Orpheus, now again revive,
 And Newton should inform thy list'ning ear
 How the soft notes, and soul-inchanting strains
 Of thy own lyre were on the wind convey'd.
 He taught the muse, how found progressive floats
 Upon the waving particles of air,
 When harmony in ever-pleasing strains,
 Melodious melting at each lulling fall,
 With soft alluring penetration steals
 Through the enraptur'd ear to inmost thought,
 And folds the senses in its silken bands.
 So the sweet music, which from Orpheus' touch
 And fam'd Amphion's, on the sounding string
 Arose harmonious, gliding on the air,
 Pierc'd the tough bark'd and knotty-ribbed woods,
 Into their saps soft inspiration-breath'd,
 And taught attention to the stubborn oak.
 Thus when great Henry, and brave Marlborough led
 Th' embattled numbers of Britannia's sons,
 The trumpet, that swells th' expanded cheek of fame,
 That adds new vigour to the gen'rous youth,
 And rouses sluggish cowardice itself,
 The trumpet with its Mars-inciting voice
 The winds broad breast impetuous sweeping o'er Fill'd the big note of war. Th' inspired host
 With new-born ardour press the trembling Gaul;
 Nor greater throngs had reach'd eternal night,
 Not if the fields of Agincourt had yawn'd
 Exposing horrible the gulf of fate;
 Or roaring Danube spread his arms abroad,
 And overwhelm'd their legions with his floods.
 But let the wand'ring muse at length return;
 Nor yet, angelic genius of the sun,
 In worthy lays her high-attempting song
 Has blazon'd forth thy venerated name.
 Then let her sweep the loud-sounding lyre
 Again, again o'er each melodious string
 Teach harmony to tremble with thy praise.
 And still thine ear, O favourable grant,
 And she shall tell thee, that whatever charms,
 Whatever beauties bloom on nature's face,
 Proceed from thy all-influencing light.
 That when arising with tempestuous rage,
 The north impetuous rides upon the clouds
 Dispersing round the heav'n's obstructive gloom,
 And with his dreaded prohibition stays
 The kind effusion of thy genial beams;
 Pale are the rubies on Aurora's lips,
 No more the roses blush upon her cheeks,
 Black are Peneus' streams and golden sands
 In Tempe's vale dull melancholy sits,
 And every flower reclines its languid head.
 By what high name shall I invoke thee, say,
 Thou life-infusing deity, on thee
 I call, and look propitious from on high,
 While now to thee I offer up my prayer.
 O had great Newton, as he found the cause,
 By which found rolls through th' undulating air,
 O had he, baffling time's restless power,
 Discover'd what that subtle spirit is,
 Or whatsoe'er diffusive else is spread
 Over the wide-extended universe,
 Which causes bodies to reflect the light,
 And from their straight direction to divert
 The rapid beams, that through their surface pierce.

But since embrac'd by th' icy arms of age,
And his quick thought by time's cold hand con-
geal'd,

Ev'n Newton left unknown this hidden power;
Thou from the race of human kind select
Some other worthy of an angel's care,
With inspiration animate his breast,
And him instruct in these thy secret laws.
O let not Newton, to whose spacious view,
Now unobstructed, all th' extensive scenes
Of the ethereal ruler's works arise;
When he beholds this earth be late adorn'd,
Let him not see philosophy in tears,
Like a fond mother solitary sit,
Lamenting him her dear, and only child.
But as the wise Pythagoras, and he,
Whose birth with pride the fam'd Abdera boasts,
With expectation having long survey'd
This spot their ancient feat, with joy beheld
Divine philosophy at length appear
In all her charms majestically fair,
Conducted by immortal Newton's hand:
So may he see another sage arise,
That shall maintain her empire: then no more
Imperious ignorance with haughty sway
Shall stalk rapacious o'er the ravag'd globe:
Then thou, O Newton, shalt protect these lines,
The humble tribute of the grateful muse;
Ne'er shall the sacrilegious hand despoil
Her laurell'd temples, whom his name preserves:
And were she equal to the mighty theme,
Futurity should wonder at her song;
Time should receive her with extended arms,
Seat her conspicuous in his rolling car,
And bear her down to his extremest bound.

Fables with wonder tell how Terra's sons
With iron force unloos'd the stubborn nerves
Of hills, and on the cloud-inshrouded top
Of Pelion Ossá pil'd. But if the vast Gigantic deeds of savage strength demand
Astonishment from men, what then shalt thou,
O what expressive rapture of the soul,
When thou before us, Newton, dost display
The labours of thy great excelling mind;
When thou unveilest all the wondrous scene,
The vast idea of th' eternal King,
Not dreadful bearing in his angry arm
The thunder hanging o'er our trembling heads;
But with th' effulgency of love replete,
And clad with power, which form'd th' extensive heavens.

O happy he, whose enterprising hand
Unbars the golden and relucid gates
Of th' empyrean dome, where thou enthron'd
Philosophy art seated. Thou sustain'd
By the firm hand of everlasting truth
Despise all the injuries of time:
Thou never know'st decay when all around,
Antiquity obscures her head. Behold
Th' Egyptian towers, the Babylonian walls,
And Thebes with all her hundred gates of brass,
Behold them scatter'd like the duit abroad.
Whatever now is flourishing and proud,
Whatever shall, must know devouring age.
Euphrates' stream, and seven-mouthed Nile,
And Danube, thou that from Germania's soil
To the black Euxine's far remotest shore,

O'er the wide bounds of mighty nations sweep'st
In thunder loud thy rapid floods along.
Ev'n you shall feel inexorable time;
To you the fatal day shall come; no more
Your torrents then shall shake the trembling
ground,

No longer then to inundations swol'n
Th' imperious waves the fertile pastures drench,
But shrunk within a narrow channel glide;
Or through the year's reiterated course
When time himself grows old, your wond'rous
streams

Loft ev'n to memory shall lie unknown
Beneath obscurity, and chaos whelm'd.
But still thou sun illuminatest all
The azure regions round, thou guidest still
The orbits of the planetary spheres;
The moon still wanders o'er her changing course,
And still, O Newton, shall thy name survive
As long as natu^r's hand directs the world,
When ev'ry dark obstruction shall retire,
And ev'ry secret yield its hidden store,
Which thee dim-sighted age forbade to see,
Age that alone could stay thy rising soul.
And could mankind among the fixed stars,
E'en to th' extremest bounds of knowledge reach,
To those unknown innumerable suns, [worlds,
Whose light but glimmers from those distant
Ev'n to those utmost boundaries, those bars
That shut the entrance of th' illumin'd space
Where angels only tread the vast unknown,
Thou ever should'st be seen immortal there:
In each new sphere, each new-appearing sun,
In farthest regions at the very verge
Of the wide universe shoul'dst thou be seen.
And lo, th' all-potent goddess nature takes
With her own hand thy great, thy just reward
Of immortality; aloft in air
See the displays, and with eternal grasp
Upreads the trophies of great Newton's fame.

LONDON:

OR, THE PROGRESS OF COMMERCE.

YE northern blasts, and (a) Eurus, wont to sweep
With redest pinions o'er the furrow'd waves,
A while suspend your violence, and wait
From sandy (b) Wefer and the broad mouth'd Elbe
My freighted vessels to the destin'd shore,
Safe o'er th' unruffled main; let every thought,
Which may disquiet, and alarm my breast,
Be absent now; that disposse's'd of care,
And free from every tumult of the mind,
With each disturbing passion hush'd to peace,
I may pour all my spirit on the theme,
Which opens now before me, and demands
The loftiest strain. The eagle, when he tow'ra
Beyond the clouds, the fleecy robes of heaven,
Disdains all objects but the golden sun,
Full on th' effulgent orb directs his eye,
And sails exulting through the blaze of day;
So, while her wing attempts the boldest flight,
Rejecting each inferior theme of praise,
Thee, ornament of Europe, Albion's pride,

(a) The east wind.

(b) Bremen is situated on the Wefer, and Hamburg's on the Elbe.

Fair seat of wealth and freedom, thee my muse
 Shall celebrate, O London: thee hail.
 Thou lov'd abode of commerce, last retreat,
 Whence she contemplates with a tranquil mind
 Her various wanderings from the fated hour,
 That she abandon'd her maternal clime;
 Neptunian commerce, whom Phœnice bore,
 Illustrious nymph, that nam'd the fertile plains
 Along the founding main extended far,
 Which flowery Carmel with its sweet perfume,
 And with its cedars Libanus o'er shades:
 Her from the bottom of the wat'ry world,
 As once the flood, in radiant beauties grac'd,
 To mark the heaving tide, the piercing eye
 Of Neptune view'd enamour'd: from the deep
 The god ascending rushes to the beach,
 And clasps the affrighted virgin. From that day,
 Soon as the paly regent of the night
 Nine times her monthly progress had renew'd
 Through heaven's illumina'd vau'. Phœnice, led
 By shame, once more the sea-worn margin fought:
 There pac'd with painful steps the barren sands,
 A solitary mourner, and the furge,
 Which gently roll'd beside her, now no more
 With placid eyes beholding, thus exclaim'd:
 Ye fragrant shrubs and cedars, lofty shade,
 Which crown my native hills, ye spreading palms,
 That rise majestic on these fruitful meads,
 With you who gave the lost Phœnice birth,
 And you, who bear th' endearing name of friends,
 Once faithful partners of my chaster hours,
 Farewell! To thee, perfidious god, I come,
 Bent down with pain and anguish on thy sands,
 I come thy suppliant: death's all I crave;
 Bid thy devouring waves inwrap my head,
 And to the bottom whelm my cares and shame!

She ceas'd, when sudden from th' enclosing deep
 A crystal car emerg'd, with glitt'ring shells,
 Cull'd from their oozy beds by Tethys' train,
 And blushing coral deck'd, whose ruddy glow
 Mix'd with the wat'ry lustre of the pearl.
 A smiling band of sea-born nymphs attend,
 Who from the shore with gentle hands convey
 The fear-subdu'd Phœnice, and along
 The lucid chariot place. As there with dread
 All mute, and struggling with her painful throes
 She lay, the winds by Neptune's high command
 Were silent round her; not a zephyr dar'd
 To wanton o'er the cedar's branching top.
 Nor on the plain the stately palm was seen
 To wave its graceful verdure; o'er the main
 No undulation broke the smooth expanse,
 But all was hush'd and motionless around,
 All but the lightly-sliding car, impell'd
 Along the level azure by the strength
 Of active Tritons, rivalling in speed
 The rapid meteor, whose sulphureous train
 Glides o'er the brow of darkness, and appears
 The livid ruins of a falling star.

Beneath the Lybian skies, a blissful isle,
 By (c) Triton's floods encircled, Nyfa lay.
 Here youthful nature wanton'd in delights,
 And here the guardians of the bounteous horn,
 While it was now the infancy of time,
 Nor yet th' uncultivated globe had learn'd

To smile, (d) Eucarpé, (e) Dapsiléa dwelt,
 With all the nymphs, whose sacred care had nurs'd
 The eldest Bacchus. From the flow'ry shore
 A turf-clad valley opens, and along
 Its verdure mild the willing feet allures;
 While on its sloping sides ascends the pride
 Of hoary groves, high-arching o'er the vale
 With day-rejecting gloom. The solemn shade
 Half round a spacious lawn at length expands,
 (f) Clos'd by a tow'ring cliff, whose forehead glows

With azure, purple, and ten thousand dyes,
 From its resplendent fragments beaming round;
 Nor less irradiate colours from beneath
 On every side an ample grot reflects,
 As down the perforated rock the sun
 Pours his meridian blaze! I rever'd abode
 Of Nyfa's nymphs, with every plant attir'd,
 That wears undying green, refresh'd with rills
 From ever-living fountains, and enrich'd
 With all Pomona's bloom: unfading flowers
 Glow on the mead, and spicy shrubs perfume
 With unexhausted sweets the cooling gale,
 Which breathes incessant there; while every bird
 Of tuneful note his gay or plaintive song
 Blends with the warble of meandering streams,
 Which o'er their pebbled channels murmur
 The fruit-invested hills, that rise around, [lave
 The gentle Nereids to this calm recess
 Phœnice bear; nor Dapsiléa bland,
 Nor good Eucarpé, studious to obey
 Great Neptune's will, their hospitable care
 Refuse; nor long Lucina is invoc'd.
 Soon as the wondrous infant sprung to day,
 Earth rock'd around; with all their nodding
 woods,

And streams reverting to their troubled source,
 The mountain shook, while Lybia's neighb'ring
 god,
 Mysterious Ammon, from his hollow cell
 With deep resounding accent thus to heaven,
 To earth, and sea, the mighty birth proclaim'd:
 A new-born power behold! whom fate hath
 The god's imperfect labour to complete [call'd
 This wide creation. She in lonely sands
 Shall bid the tower-encircled city rise,
 The barren sea shall people, and the wilds
 Of dreary nature shall with plenty clothe;
 She shall enlighten man's unletter'd race,
 And with endearing intercourse unite
 Remotest nations, scorcht'd by sultry furs,
 Or freezing near the snow-incrusted pole:
 Where'er the joyous vine disdains to grow,
 The fruitful olive, or the golden ear;
 Her hand divine, with interposing aid
 To every climate shall the gifts supply
 Of Ceres, Bacchus, and (g) the Athenian maid;
 The graces, joys, emoluments of life
 From her exhaustless bounty all shall flow.

The heavenly prophet ceas'd. Olympus heard.
 Straight from their star-bespangled thrones descend

(d) Fruitfulness. (e) Plenty.

(f) This whole description of the rock and grotto is taken from Diod. Siculus, lib. 3. pag. 202.

(g) Minerva, the tutelary goddess of the Athenians, to whom she gave the olive.

(c) Triton, a river and lake of ancient Lybia.

On blooming Nyfa a celestial band
The ocean's lord to honour in his child;
When o'er his offspring smiling thus began
The trident-ruler: Commerce be thy name:
To thee I give the empire of the main,
From where the morning breathes its eastern gale,
To th' undiscover'd limits of the west,
From chilling Boreas to extremest south
Thy fire's obsequious billows shall extend Thy universal reign. Minerva next
With wisdom blest'd her, Mercury with art,
(b) The Lemnian god with industry, and last
Majestic Phœbus, o'er the infant long
In contemplation pausing, thus declar'd
From his enraptur'd lip his matchless boon:

Thou' divine invention I endow,
That secret wonder, goddess, to disclose,
By which the wife, the virtuous, and the brave,
The heaven-taught poet and exploring sage
Shall pass recorded to the verge of time.

Her years of childhood now were number'd o'er,
When to her mother's natal foil repair'd
The new divinity whose parting step
Her sacred nurses follow'd, ever now
To her alone inseparably join'd;
Then first deserting their Nyseian shore
To spread their hoarded blessings round the world;
Who with them bore the unexhausted horn
Of ever-smiling plenty Thus adorn'd,
Attended thus, great goddess, thou began'st
Thy all enlivening progress o'er the globe,
Then rude and joyless, destin'd to repair
The various ills which earliest ages ru'd
From one, like thee, distinguish'd by the gifts
Of heaven, Pandora, whose pernicious hand
From the dire vase releas'd th' imprison'd woes.

Thou' gracious commerce, from his cheerless caves

In horrid rocks and solitary woods,
The helpless wand'rer, man forlorn and wild
Didst charm to sweet society; didst cast
The deep foundations, where the future pride
Of mightiest cities rose, and o'er the main
Before the wond'ring Nereids didst present
The surge-dividing keel, and stately mast,
Whose canvass wings, distending with the gale,
The bold Phœnician through Alcides' straits
To northern Albion's tin-embowell'd fields,
And oft beneath the sea-obscuring brow
Of cloud envelop'd Teneriff convey'd.
Next in sagacious thought th' ethereal plains
Thou trod'st, exploring each propitious star
The danger-braving mariner to guide;
Then all the latent and mysterious powers
Of number didst unravel: last to crown
Thy bounties, goddess, thy unrivall'd toils
For man, still urging thy inventive mind,
Thou gav'st him (i) letters; there imparting all,
Which lifts the ennobled spirit near to heaven,
Laws, learning, wisdom, nature's works reveal'd
By godlike fages, all Minerva's arts,
Apollo's music, and th' eternal voice

Of virtue sounding from the historic roll,
The philosophic page, and poet's song.

Now solitude and silence from the shores
Retreat on pathless mountains to reside,
Barbarity is polish'd, infant arts
Bloom in the desert, and benignant peace
With hospitality begin to sooth
Unsocial rapine, and the thirst of blood;
As from his tumid urn when Nilus spreads
His gen'ral tides abroad, the favour'd soil
That joins his fruitful border, first imbibes
The kindly stream: anon the bounteous god
His waves extends, embracing Egypt round,
Dwells on the teeming champain, and endows
The sleeping grain with vigour to attire
In one bright harvest all the Pharian plains:
Thus, when Pygmalion from Phœnician Tyre
Had banish'd freedom, with disdainful steps
Indignant commerce, turning from the walls
Herself had rais'd, her welcome sway enlarg'd
Among the nations, spreading round the globe
The fruits of all its climes; (k) Cœcropsian oil,
The Thracian vintage, and Panchaïan gums,
Arabia's spices, and the golden grain,
Which old Osiris to his Egypt gave,
And Ceres to (l) Sicania. Thou didst raise
Th' Ionian name, O commerce, thou the domes
Of sumptuous Corinth, and the ample round
Of Syracuse didst people.—All the wealth
Now thou assemblest from Iberia's mines,
And golden-channell'd Tagus, all the spoils
From fair (m) Trinacria waisted, all the powers
Of conquer'd Afric's tributary realms
To fix thy empire on the Lybian verge,
Thy native tract; the nymphs of Nyfa hail
Thy glad return, and echoing joy resounds
O'er Triton's sacred waters, but in vain:
The irreversible decrees of heaven

To far more northern regions had ordain'd
Thy lasting seat; in vain th' imperial port
Receives the gather'd riches of the world:
In vain whole climates bow beneath its rule;
Behold the toil of centuries to Rome
Its glories yield, and mould'ring leaves no trace
Of its deep-rooted greatness; thou with tears
From thy extinguish'd Carthage didst retire,
And these thy perish'd honours long deplore.
What though rich (n) Gades, what though polish'd
Rhodes,

With Alexandria, Egypt's splendid mart, [towers,
The learn'd (o) Massylians, and (p) Ligurian
What though the potent Hæcæatic league,
And Venice, mistress of the Grecian isles,
With all the Ægean floods, a while might sooth
The sad remembrance; what though led through climes

And seas unknown, with thee th' advent'rous sons

(k) Athenian. Athens was call'd Cœcrops, from Cœcrops, its first king.

(l) Sicily.

(m) Another name of Sicily, which was frequently ravaged by the Carthaginians.

(n) Cadix.

(o) Marseilles, a Grecian colony, the most civilized as well as the greatest trading city of ancient Gaul.

(p) Genoa.

(b) Vulcan, the tutelary deity of Lemnos.

(i) Here the opinion of Sir Isaac Newton is followed, that letters were first invented amongst the trading parts of the world.

(q) Tagus pass'd the stormy cape, which braves
The huge Atlantic; what though Antwerp grew
Beneath thy smiles, and thou propitious there
Didst shower thy blessings with unsparing hands:
Still on thy grief-indented heart impress'd
The great Amilcar's valour, still the deeds
Of Asdrubal and Mago, still the loss
Of thy unequal, Annibal, remain'd:
Till from the sandy mouths of echoing Rhine,
And sounding margin of the Scheldt and Maese,
With sudden roar the angry voice of war
Alarm'd thy languor; wonder turn'd thy eye.
Lo! in bright arms a bold militia stood,
Arrang'd for battle: from afar thou saw'st
The snowy ridge of Appenine, the fields
Of wild Calabria, and Pyrene's hills,
The Guadiana, and the Duro's banks,
And rapid Ebro gath'ring all their powers
To crush this daring populace. The pride
Of fiercest kings with more inflam'd revenge
Ne'er menac'd freedom; nor since dauntless
Greece,

And Rome's stern offspring none hath e'er surpass'd
The bold (r) Batavian in his glorious toil
For liberty, or death. At once the thought
Of long-lamented Carthage flies thy breast,
And ardent, goddess, thou dost speed to save
The generous people. Not the vernal showers,
Distilling copious from the morning clouds,
Descend more kindly on the tender flower,
New-born and opening on the lap of spring,
Than on this rising state thy cheering smile,
And animating presence; while on Spain,
Prophetic thus, thy indignation broke:

Insatiate race! the shame of polish'd lands!
Disgrace of Europe! for inhuman deeds
And insolence renew'd! what demon led
Thee first to plough the undiscover'd furge,
Which lav'd an hidden world? whose malice taught

Thee first to taint with rapine, and with rage,
With more than savage thirst of blood the arts,
By me for gentlest intercourse ordain'd,
For mutual aids, and hospitable ties
From shore to shore? Or, that pernicious hour,
Was heaven disgust'd with its wondrous works,
That to thy fell exterminating hand
Th' immense Peruvian empire it resign'd,
And all, which lordly (s) Montezuma sway'd?
And com'st thou, strengthen'd with the shining flores

Of that gold teeming hemisphere, to waste
The smiling fields of Europe, and extend
Thy bloody shackles o'er these happy seats
Of liberty? Presumptuous nation, learn,
From this dire period shall thy glories fade,
Thy slaughter'd youth shall fatten Belgium's sands
And victory against her Albion's cliffs
Shall see the blood empurpl'd ocean dash
Thy weltering hosts, and stain the chalky shore:
Ev'n thou, whom now thy impious pride would bind

(g) The Portuguese discovered the Cape of Good Hope in 1487.

(r) The Dutch.

(s) Montezuma, emperor of Mexico.

In servile chains, hereafter shall support [hand
Thy weaken'd throne; when heaven's afflicting
Of all thy power despoils thee, when alone
Of all, which e'er hath signaliz'd thy name,
Thy insolence and cruelty remain.

Thus with her clouded visage, wrapt in frowns,
The goddess threaten'd, and the daring train
Of her untam'd militia, torn with wounds,
Despising fortune, from repeated foils
More fierce, and braving famine's keenest rage,
At length through deluges of blood she led
To envied greatness; ev'n while clamorous Mars
With loudest clangor bade his trumpet shake
The Belgian champain, she their standard rear'd
On tributary Java, and the shores
Of huge Borneo; thou, Sumatra, heard'st
Her naval thunder, Ceylon's trembling sons
Their fragrant stores of cinnamon resign'd,
And odour-breathing Ternate and Tidore
Their spicy groves. And O whatever coast
The Belgians trace, where'er their power is spread
To hoary Zembla, or to Indian fens,
Still thither be extended thy renown,
O William, pride of Orange, and ador'd
Thy virtues, which disdain life, or wealth,
Or empire, whether in thy dawn of youth,
Thy glorious noon of manhood, or the night,
(t) The fatal night of death, no other care
Besides the public own'd. And dear to fame
Be thou harmonious (u) Douza; every muse,
Your laurel strow around this hero's urn,
Whom fond Minerva grac'd with all her arts,
Alike in letters and in arms to shine,
A dauntless warrior, and a learned bard.
Him Spain's surrounding host for slaughter
mark'd,

With massacre yet reeking from the streets
Of blood-stain'd Harlem: he on Leyden's tow'rs,
With famine his companion, wan, subdu'd
In outward form, with patient virtue stood
Superior to despair; the heavenly nine
His suffering soul with great examples cheer'd
Of memorable bards, by Mars adorn'd
With wreaths of fame; (x) Oeagrus' tuneful son,
Who with melodious praise to noblest deeds
Charm'd the Iölichian heroes, and himself

With animating verse the Spartan hopes;

were, Lord have mercy upon this people.

man of his time. He commanded in Leyden when it was so obstinately besieged by the Spaniards in 1570.

from Iolkos, a town in Thessalia.

(y) When the Spartans were greatly distressed in the Messenian war, they applied to the Athenians for a general, who sent them the poet Tyrtæus.

(z) Æschylus, one of the most ancient tragic poets, who signalized himself in the battles of Marathon and Salamis.

(a) Sophocles commanded his countrymen the Athenians, in several expeditions.

Whole sacred brows the tragic ivy twin'd,
Mix'd with the warrior's laurel; all furpafs'd
By Douza's valour: and the generous toil,
His and his country's labours soon receiv'd
Their high reward, when favouring commerce rais'd

Th' invincible Batavians, till, rever'd
Among the mightiest on the brightest roll
Of fame they shone, by splendid wealth and power
Grac'd and supported; thus a genial soil
Diffusing vigour though the infant oak,
Affords it strength to flourish, till at last
Its lofty head, in verdant honours clad,
It rears amidst the proudest of the grove.

Yet here th' eternal fates thy last retreat
Deny, a mightier nation they prepare
For thy reception, sufferers alike
By th' unremitted insolenace of power
From reign to reign, nor less than Belgium known
For bold contention oft on crimson fields,
In free-tongu'd senates oft with nervous laws
To circumscribe, or conquering to depose
Their scepter'd tyrants: Albion sea-embac'd,
The joy of freedom, dread of treacherous kings,
The destin'd mistress of the subject main,
And arbitress of Europe, now demands
Thy presence, goddess. It was now the time,
Ere yet perfidious Cromwell dar'd profane
The sacred senate, and with impious feet
Tread on the powers of magistrates and laws,
While every arm was chill'd with cold amaze,
Nor one in all that dauntless train was found
To pierce the russian's heart; and now thy name
Was heard in thunder through th' affrighted shores
Of pale Iberia, of submissive Gaul,
And Tagus, trembling to his utmost source.

O ever faithful, vigilant, and brave,
Thou bold assertor of Britannia's fame,
Unconquerable Blake: propitious heaven
At this great era, and (b) the sage decree
Of Albion's senate, perfecting at once,
What by (c) Eliza was so well begun,
So deeply founded, to this favour'd shore
The goddess drew, where grateful she bestow'd
Th' unbounded empire of her father's floods,
And chose thee, London, for her chief abode,
Pleas'd with the silver Thames, its gentle stream,
And smiling banks, its joy-diffusing hills,
Which clad with splendour, and with beauty
grac'd,

O'erlook his lucid bosom; pleas'd with thee,
Thou nurse of arts, and thy industrious race;
Pleas'd with their candid manners, with their free
Sagacious converse, to inquiry led,
And zeal for knowledge; hence the opening mind
Reigns its errors, and unseals the eye
Of blind opinion; merit hence is heard
Amidst its blushes, dawning arts arise,
The gloomy clouds, which ignorance or fear
Spread o'er the paths of virtue are dispell'd,
Servility retires, and every heart
With public cares is warm'd; thy merchants
hence,

(b) The act of navigation.

(c) Queen Elizabeth was the first of our princes, who gave any considerable encouragement to trade.

Illustrious city, thou dost raise to fame:
How many names of glory may'st thou trace
From earliest annals down to (d) Barnard's times!
And, O! if like that eloquence divine,
Which forth for commerce, for Britannia's rights,
And her insulted majesty he pour'd,
These humble meafures flow'd, then too thy walls
Might undigrac'd resound thy poet's name,
Who now all-fearful to thy praise attunes
His lyre, and pays his grateful song to thee,
Thy votary, O commerce! Gracious power,
Continue still to hear my vows, and bless
My honourable industry, which courts
No other smile but thine; for thou alone
Can'st wealth bestow with independence crown'd:
Nor yet exclude contemplative repose,
But to my dwelling grant the solemn calm
Of learned leisure, never to reject
The visitation of the tuneful maids,
Who seldom deign to leave their sacred haunts,
And grace a mortal mansion; thou divide
With them my labours; pleasure I resign,
And, all devoted to my midnight lamp,
Ev'n now, when Albion o'er the foaming breast
Of groaning Tethys spreads its threat'ning fleets,
I grasp the founding shell, prepar'd to sing
That hero's valour, who shall best confound
His injur'd country's foes; ev'n now I feel
Celestial fires descending on my breast,
Which prompt thy daring suppliant to explore,
Why, though deriv'd from Neptune, though rever'd

Among the nations, by the gods endow'd,
Thou never yet from eldest times hast found
One permanent abode; why oft expell'd
Thy favour'd seats, from clime to clime hast borne
Thy wandering steps; why London late hath seen
(Thy lov'd, thy last retreat), desponding care
O'ercloud thy brow: O listen, while the muse,
Th' immortal progeny of Jove, unfolds
The fatal cause. What time in Nyssa's cave
Th' ethereal train, in honour to thy fire,
Shower'd on thy birth their blended gifts, the power

Of war was absent; hence, unblest'd by Mars,
Thy sons relinquish'd arms, on other arts
Intent, and still to mercenary hands
The sword intrusting, vainly deem'd, that wealth
Could purchase lasting safety, and protect Unwarlike freedom; hence the Alps in vain
Were pass'd, their long impenetrable snows,
And dreary torrents; twoln with Roman dead,
Astonish'd (e) Trebia overflow'd its banks
In vain, and deep-dy'd Trasimenus roll'd
Its crimson waters; Canna's signal day
The fame alone of great Amilcar's son
Enlarg'd, while still undisciplin'd, dismay'd,
Her head commercial Carthage bow'd at last
To military Rome: th' unalter'd will
Of Heaven in every climate hath ordain'd,
And every age, that empire shall attend
The sword, and steel shall ever conquer gold.

(d) Sir John Barnard.

(e) Trebia, Trasimenus lacus, and Canna, famous for the victories gained by Annibal over the Romans.

Then from thy sufferings learn; th' auspicious hour
Now smiles; our wary magistrates have arm'd
Our hands; thou, goddess, animate our breasts
To cast inglorious indolence aside,
That once again, in bright battalions rang'd,
Our thousands and ten thousands may be seen
Their country's only rampart, and the dread
Of wild ambition. Mark the Swedish hind;
He, on his native soil should danger lowr,
Soon from the entrails of the dusky mine
Would rise to arms; and other fields and chiefs
With Helsingburg (f) and Steinboch soon would share

The admiration of the northern world:
Hælvétia's hills behold, th' ærial seat
Of long-supported liberty, who thence,
Securely resting on her faithful shield,
The warrior's corselet flaming on her breast,
Looks down with scorn on spacious realms, which groan

In servitude around her, and her sword
With dauntless skill high brandishing, defies
The Austrian eagle, and imperious Gaul:
And O! could those ill-fated shades arise,
Whose valiant ranks along th' ensanguin'd dust
Of (g) Newbery lay crowded, they could tell,
How their long-matchless cavalry, so oft
O'er hills of slain by ardent Rupert led,
Whose dreaded standard victory had wav'd,
Till then triumphant, there with noblest blood
From their gor'd squadrons dy'd the resolute spear
Of London's firm militia; and resign'd
The well-disputed field; then, goddess, say,
Shall we be now more timid; when behold,
The black'ning storm now gathers round our heads,

And England's angry genius sounds to arms?
For thee, reitember, is the banner spread;
The naval tower to vindicate thy rights
Will sweep the curling foam: the thund'ring bomb
Will roar; and startle in the deepest grots
Old Nereus' daughters; with combustion stor'd,
For thee our dire volcanos of the main,
Impregnated with horror, soon will pour
Their flaming ruin round each hostile fleet:
Thou then, great goddess, summon all thy powers,
Arm all thy sons, thy vassals, every heart

(f) Helsingburg, a small town in Schonem, celebrated for the victory which Count Steinboch gained over the Danes, with an army, for the most part composed of Swedish peasants, who had never seen an enemy before; it is remarkable, that the defeated troops were, as complete a body of regular forces as any in all Europe.

(g) The London train'd-band, and auxiliary regiments (of whose inexperience of danger, or any kind of service, beyond the easy practice of their postures in the Artillery-ground, had till then too cheap an estimation), behaved themselves to wonder; and were, in truth, the preservation of that army that day. For they stood as a bulwark and rampire to defend the rest; and when their wings of horse were scattered and dispersed, kept their ground so steadily, that though Prince Rupert himself led up the choice horse to charge them, and endured the storm of small shot, he could make no impression on their stand of pikes; but was forced to wheel about. Clarend. book 7. page 347.

Inflame: and you, ye fear-disclaiming race;
Ye mariners of Britain, chosen train
Of liberty and commerce, now no more
Secrete your generous valour; hear the call
Of injur'd Albion; to her foes present
Those daring bosoms, which alike disdain
The death-disp'nd cannon, and the rage
Of warring tempests, mingling in their strife
The seas and clouds: though long in silence, hush'd
Hath slept the British thunder; though the pride
Of weak Iberia hath forgot the roar;
Soon shall her ancient terrors be recall'd,
When your victorious shouts afright her shores:
None now ignobly will your warmth refrain,
Nor hazard more indignant valour's curse,
Their country's wrath, and time's eternal scorn;
Then bid the furies of Bellona wake,
And silver-mantled peace with welcome steps
Anon shall visit your triumphant isle.
And that perpetual safety may possess
Our joyous fields, thou, genius, who presid'st
O'er this illustrious city, teach her sons
To wield the noble instruments of war;
And let the great example soon extend
Through every province, till Britannia sees
Her docile millions fill the martial plain:
Then, whatsoe'er our terrors now suggest
Of desolation, and th' invading fure;
Though with his mastly trident Neptune heav'd
A new-born isthmus from the British deep,
And to its parent continent rejoind'
Our chalky shore; though Mahomet could league
His powerful crescent with the hostile Gaul,
And that new Cyrus of the conquer'd east,
Who now in trembling vassalage unites
The Ganges and Euphrates, could advance
With his auxiliar host; our warlike youth
With (h) equal numbers, and with keener zeal
For children, parents, friends, for England fir'd,
Her fertile glebe, her wealthy towns, her laws,
Her liberty, her honour, should sustain
The dreadful onset, and resistless break
Th' immense array; thus ev'n the lightest thought
E'er to invade Britannia's calm repose,
Must die the moment, that auspicious Mars
Her sons shall bless with discipline and arms;
That exil'd race, in superstition nurs'd,
The servile pupils of tyrannic Rome,
With distant gaze despairing, shall behold
The guarded splendours of Britannia's crown;
Still from their abdicated sway estrang'd;
With all th' attendance on despotic thrones,
Priests, ignorance, and bonds; with watchful step
Gigantic terror, striding round our coast,
Shall shake his Gorgon agis, and the hearts
Of proudest kings appal; to other shores
Our angry fleets, when insolence and wrongs
To arms awaken our vindictive power,
Shall bear the hideous waste of ruthless war;
But liberty, security, and fame,
Shall dwell for ever on our chosen plains.

(h) If the computation, which allots near two millions of fighting men to this kingdom may be relied on; it is not easy to conceive, how the united force of the whole world could assemble together, and subsist in an enemy's country greater numbers, than they would find opposed to them here.

ADMIRAL HOSIER'S GHOST.

As near Porto-Bello lying
 On the gently-swelling flood,
 At midnight with streamers flying
 Our triumphant navy rode;
 There while Vernon sat all-glorious
 From the Spaniards' late defeat:
 And his crews, with shouts victorious,
 Drank success to England's fleet:

On a sudden, shrilly sounding,
 Hideous yells and shrieks were heard;
 Then each heart with fear confounding,
 A sad troop of ghosts appear'd,
 All in dreary hammocks shrouded,
 Which for winding-sheets they wore,
 And with looks by sorrow clouded
 Frowning on that hostile shore.

On them gleam'd the moon's wan lustre,
 When the shade of Hosier brave
 His pale bands was seen to muster,
 Rising from their wat'ry grave:
 O'er the glimmering wave he hy'd him,
 Where the Burford rear'd her sail,
 With three thousand ghosts besides him,
 And in groans did Vernon hail.

Heed, O heed, our fatal story,
 I am Hosier's injur'd ghost,
 You, who now have purchas'd glory
 At this place where I was lost;
 Though in Porto-Bello's ruin
 You now triumph free from fears,
 When you think on our undoing,
 You will mix your joy with tears.

See these mournful spectres weeping
 Ghastly o'er this hated wave,
 Whose wan cheeks are stain'd with weeping;
 These were English captains brave:
 Mark those numbers pale and horrid,
 Those were once my sailors bold,
 Lo, each hangs his drooping forehead,
 While his dismal tale is told.

I, by twenty sail attended,
 Did this Spanish town affright;
 Nothing then its wealth defended
 But my orders not to fight:

O! that in this rolling ocean
 I had cast them with disdain,
 And obey'd my heart's warm motion,
 To have quell'd the pride of Spain;

For resistance I could fear none,
 But with twenty ships had done
 What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
 Hast achiev'd with six alone.
 Then the Bastimentos never
 Had our foul dishonour seen,
 Nor the sea the sad receiver
 Of this gallant train had been.

Thus, like thee, proud Spain dismaying,
 And her galleons leading home,
 Though condemn'd for disobeying,
 I had met a traitor's doom.
 To have fallen, my country crying
 He has play'd an English part,
 Had been better far than dying
 Of a griev'd and broken heart.

Unrepining at thy glory,
 Thy successful arms we hail;
 But remember our sad story,
 And let Hosier's wrongs prevail.
 Sent in this foul clime to languish,
 Think what thousands fell in vain,
 Wasted with disease and anguish,
 Not in glorious battle slain.

Hence with all my train attending
 From their oozy tombs below,
 Through the hoary foam ascending,
 Here I feed my constant woe:
 Here the Bastimentos viewing,
 We recal our shameful doom,
 And our plaintive cries renewing,
 Wander through the midnight gloom.

O'er these waves for ever mourning
 Shall we roam depriv'd of rest,
 If to Britain's shores returning
 You neglect my just request;
 After this proud foe subduing,
 When your patriot friends you see,
 Think on vengeance for my ruin,
 And for England sham'd in me.

THE LIFE OF SHAW.

CUTHBERT SHAW was born at Ravenworth, near Richmond in Yorkshire, in 1738 or 1739. His father was by trade a shoemaker, in low circumstances.

He was first put to school at Kirkbyhill, near Ravenworth; but he was soon removed to Scorton, five miles from Richmond; where, after having gone through a common course of education, he was appointed usher.

Some time after, he became usher to the grammar-school at Darlington, under Mr. Metcalf; where he published his first poem, in 1756, called Liberty, humbly inscribed to the Right Honourable the Earl of Darlington, 4to.

While he resided at Darlington, he began to show that negligence of the dictates of prudence, and the rules of economy, which marked his future life, inasmuch that he was obliged to quit his employment, and the country; and with nothing but his talents came in quest of fortune to London.

The exact time of his arrival in London has not been ascertained; but report says, that his first employment was writing paragraphs and essays for the newspapers.

In the spring 1760, he was at St. Edmond's-Bury, probably a member of the Norwich Company of Comedians, and published under the name of W. Seymour, Odes on the Four Seasons, 4to, the production of his early youth.

In the summer of that year, he joined the hasty raised company with which Mr. Foote opened the Hay-Market with "The Minor," a play that was acted with uncommon success, thirty-eight nights, and in which Shaw performed the part of Sir George Wealthy.

The winter of that year, he passed either in Ireland or in some country company, and in summer 1761, performed at Drury-Lane, then opened by Mr. Foote, and Mr. Murphy.

On the 19th of October he appeared at Covent Garden in the character of Ofmyn in "Zara," but with so little success, that he never was permitted to perform any more, till the 14th May, when he personated Pierre in "Venice Preserved," for his own benefit.

He possessed but few requisites for the stage, except figure; and from this time seems to have abandoned a profession from which he was likely to derive neither profit nor reputation.

In 1762, he resumed the pen, and the poetical war kindled by Churchill, raging at that juncture with great violence, he wrote a satire, called The Four Farling Candles, 4to, in which he attacked Lloyd, Churchill, and Colman; with whom he thought proper to join Shirley; though with little apparent propriety. This performance was executed with considerable spirit, and obtained so much notice as to encourage him to proceed as an author. The following lines applied to the celebrated author of the "Rosciad," are enough to make every discerning reader pronounce him utterly destitute of candour, and justly chargeable with that very mean abuse of which he accuses the poet he has taken upon him to correct for the same offence.

When a rough unwieldy wight
Turns bard, infus'd by nought but spite;
Though here and there a stolen thought
May prove the blockhead not untaught,
Yet by his awkward hobbling gait,
We easily discern the cheat;

And in each spleen-fraught line can trace,
His want of genius, as of grace.

The success of this satire produced "An Epistle to the Author of the Four Farthing Candles," 4to, by the author of the "Rosciad of Covent Garden;" a performance of no value.

In 1766, he made Churchill amend for the unjustifiable severity with which he had treated him in his Four Farthing Candles, by making him the hero of a mock-heroic poem called The Race, by Mercurius Spur, Esq. with notes by Faustinus Scriblerus, 4to, in which he characterised the chief poets, booksellers, printers, and reviewers, of that period; and some of them with great severity.

This poem was eagerly read, and republished and enlarged in 1767; with an Address to the Critics, in which he alludes to his early propensity to poetry, in the following lines:

Where Pegasus, who ambled at fifteen,
No longer sporting on the rural green,
Rampant breaks forth, now flies the peaceful plains,
And bounds impetuous, heedless of the reins;
O'er earth's vast surface madly scours along,
Nor spares a critic, gaping in the throng.

It appears from this performance, that he had by this time no want of confidence in his powers. He had learned to deal his satire about with no unsparing hand; and if it was not felt by the parties against whom it was directed, it was owing to no lenity or forbearance in the satirist.

About this time he wrote an Account of the virtues of the Beaume de Vie, a then popular medicine, and was admitted as a partner to a proportion of the profits arising from it.

He had hitherto led, if not a profligate, at least a dissipated life. He now seemed sensible of it himself, and soon afterwards married an amiable and accomplished young woman, of a good family, it would seem, against the wishes of her friends.

For a short time he had the care of the present Earl of Chesterfield, then an infant, to instruct him in the first rudiments of learning.

He also printed proposals for publishing a collection of his poems by subscription; but this was never executed, and he returned the money he had received.

In 1768, he had the affliction to lose his wife, in child-bed, of her first child; and on this melancholy occasion, wrote his celebrated performance, intitled, A Monody to the Memory of a young Lady, by an afflicted Husband, 4to, 1768.

The child, which was a daughter, lived but a short time after its mother, and he again lamented his second loss, in strains not inferior to the former, in an Evening Address to a Nightingale.

The publication of his Monody occasioned some severe lines in a newspaper, which were imputed to Langhorne, who had then experienced a similar affliction, and produced a paper war between the two poets, that was conducted with great liberality on both sides.

It introduced him also, from congeniality of affliction, to the notice of Lyttleton, who extolled the author in the highest terms; but he derived no other advantage from his acquaintance.

In these exquisite poems are many allusions to the misery of their author, independent of the circumstances which gave rise to them. He was at this period afflicted with disease, which put on its most disgraceful and offensive form; and as he had possessed no small portion of vanity about his person, this alteration added pungency to his affliction.

He, however, continued to write, and having espoused from inclination, the principles of the party in opposition to the Court, in 1769, he published Corruption, a Satire, inscribed to the Right Honourable Richard Grenville, Earl Temple, 4to. In the dedication he speaks of himself in the following manly, interesting, and energetic lines, which cannot be read without powerfully awakening the sympathy of benevolence, and the flame of patriotism.

For me, long lost to all the world holds dear,
No hopes can flatter, and no suns can cheer;
Sickness and sorrow with united rage,
In early youth have wreak'd the ills of age;

This all my wish—(since earthly joys are flown)
 To sigh unseen—to live and die unknown :
 To break the tenor of this sad repose,
 Say what could rouse me but my country's woes?
 But thus to see vice stalk in open day,
 With shameless front, and universal sway!
 To view proud villains drive the gilded car,
 Deck'd with the spoils and ravages of war!
 Whose ill-got wealth shifted from hand to hand,
 With vice and want have delug'd all the land ;
 'Tis satire's only to avenge the cause,
 On those that scape from Tyburn and the laws ;
 Drag forth each knave conspicuous and confessed,
 And hang them high—as scare-crows for the rest !
 Let this grand object claim my every care,
 And chase the sullen demon of despair,
 (When passion fires us for the public weal,
 For private griefs 'twere infamous to feel)
 Till my full heart, disburden'd of its freight,
 No more shall swell and heave beneath the weight ;
 This dueous tribute to my country paid,
 Welcome pale sorrow and the silent shade !
 From glory's standard yet should all retire,
 And none be found to fan the generous fire ;
 No patriot soul to justify the song,
 And urge its precepts on the slumbering throng ;
 In vain to virtue have I form'd the strain,
 An angel's tongue might plead her cause in vain.
 Some lone retreat I'll seek unknown to fame,
 Nor hear the very echo of their shame ;
 Conscience shall pay me for the world's neglect,
 And Heav'n approve what mortals dare reject.

He afterwards is supposed to have written many political as well as poetical performances, and is known to have been a contributor, if not the editor of "The Freeholder's Magazine," 1770, in which the unfortunate Chatterton was for some time engaged.

One of his last pieces was an elegy on the death of Charles Yorke, the Lord Chancellor, which was generally suspected to have been suppressed on the Hardwicke family's paying a sum of money to him ; and it has been insinuated, that it was written with that view ; but the pride of genius, and that delicacy of sentiment which taste and reading inspire, discountenance the opinion.

At length, overwhelmed with complicated distress, he died at his house in Titchfield-street, Oxford-market, Sept. 1. 1771, in the 43d year of his age.

His Monody to the Memory of a Young Lady, and Evening Address to a Nightingale, have been frequently reprinted in the poetical Miscellanies. His Race has been reprinted in the 2d volume of the third edition of Dilly's "Repository," 1790. They are now, with some shorter pieces, reprinted from the "European Magazine," for 1786, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry. Copies of his Liberty, Odes on the Four Seasons, Four Farthing Candles, and Corruption, which have not been reprinted, though they highly merit republication, could not be obtained for the use of this edition.

Shaw has unhappily added another name to the catalogue, already too numerous, of men of genius, who would have arisen to a more illustrious reputation, had their talents been accompanied with an uniform attention to the common maxims of prudence. His character was compounded of good qualities, and of defects ; of tenderness, generosity, and probity, to be commended ; and of extravagance, vanity, and imprudence, to be avoided. His chief fault, from which most of his other faults proceeded, was an utter neglect of economy. His disposition was friendly, affectionate, and social. In the domestic relations, his conduct was truly amiable and exemplary.

As a poet, the variety of his compositions evince the versatility of his genius. In the province of humour and of satire, he has been excelled by many of his poetical contemporaries, particularly Lloyd and Churchill ; but in poetical feeling, striking touches of nature, and pathetic tenderness, he is inferior to no writer of ancient or modern times. His Monody and Address to a Nightingale, far transcend the "Monody" of Lyttleton, and the "Elegies" of Langhorne and Scott, on similar occasions. The exquisite tenderness which runs through the whole of the Monody, renders it one of the most affecting poems in the English language. The measure of the Address is irregular, like that of Dryden's immortal "Ode," Milton's "Lycidas," Lyttleton's "Monody," &c. which sufficiently demonstrates that regularity of metre is not essential to poetical excellence. With these poems every body is greatly pleased; because they have beauties in them which affect every body. In the Monody, Emma's dying farewell is particularly pathetic. But it is needless to point out those strokes of pathos which cannot escape observation. True taste will ever approve of poetry which is written from the heart; for it will ever feel the force of its productions.

It is unpleasant to turn from the voice of genius to the clamours of faction, and to leave the strains of poetry and nature for the uproar of strife and opposition. In his Race, however we may admire the accuracy of observation, happy vein of humour, poignancy of satire, facility of expression, and harmony of numbers. The design and tendency of the poem cannot be commended. Compositions of this class, as they gratify malignity, are usually read with great avidity, on their first appearance, but without uncommon merit, they quickly sink into oblivion. Even the "Dunciad," of which the Race is an imitation, is read perhaps with less delight than any other work of its celebrated author; nor should we resort at all to the "Temple of Dullness," to contemplate the characters of Curll, Theobald, &c. could we not also feast on the dispute of the "Virtuosos" before the throne of the goddess. As a work of wit and ingenious satire, the Race may afford entertainment to those who care little about many of the characters who are whimsically made to contend for pre-eminence of fame, by running:

Prove by their heels the prowess of the head.

Among the competitors, Dr. Johnson appears with peculiar distinction; and is dismissed with a just and elegant eulogium. His portrait is drawn with the pencil of Churchill. The candour which breathes in the following apostrophe to Vanity, will be generally allowed as an apology for the petulance and presumption of the satirist:

Oh Vanity! whose far extended sway
Nations confess, and potentates obey;
How vast thy reign!—Say where, Oh! where's the man,
His own defects who boldly dares to scan,
Just to himself?—Ev'n now, while I incline
To paint the votaries kneeling at thy shrine,
Whilst others follies freely I impart,
Thy power resistless flutters round my heart,
Prompts me this common weakness to disclose,
(Myself the very coxcomb I expose)
And ah! too partial to my lays and me,
My kind—yet cruel friends—soon shall you see
The cutpurit-muse, whose idle sportive vein,
No views can bias, and no fears restrain;
Dragg'd without mercy to that awful bar,
Where spleen with genius holds eternal war,
And there her final ruin to fulfil,
Condemn'd by butchers pre-resolv'd to kill.
In vain her youth shall for compassion plead,
Even for a syllable, the wretch shall bleed;
And spite of all the friendship you can show,
Be made a public spectacle of woe.

MONODY

TO THE MEMORY OF A YOUNG LADY.

YET do I live! O how shall I sustain
This vast unutterable weight of woe?
This worse than hunger, poverty, or pain,
Or all the complicated ills below—
She, in whose life my hopes were treasur'd all,
Is gone—for ever fled—
My dearest Emma's dead;
These eyes, these tear-swoln eyes beheld her fall:
Ah no—she lives on some far happier shore,
She lives—but (cruel thought) she lives for me no
more.

I, who the tedious absence of a day
Remov'd, would languish for my charmer's
sight,
Would chide the lingering moments for delay,
And fondly blame the slow return of night;
How, how shall I endure
(O misery past a cure) !
Hours, days, and years, successively to roll,
Nor ever more behold the comfort of my soul?

Was she not all my fondest wish could frame?
Did e'er mind so much of heaven partake?
Did she not love me with the purest flame,
And give up friends and fortune for my sake?
Though mild as evening skies,
With downcast, streaming eyes,
Stood the stern frown of supercilious brows,
Deaf to their brutal threats, and faithful to her vows.

Come then, some muse, the saddest of the train,
(No more your bard shall dwell on idle lays)
Teach me each moving melancholy strain,
And O discard the pageantry of phrase:
Ill suit the flowers of speech with woes like mine!
Thus, haply, as I paint
The source of my complaint,
My soul may own the impassion'd line;
A flood of tears may gush to my relief,
And from my swelling heart discharge this load of grief.

Forbear, my fond officious friends, forbear
To wound my ears with the sad tales you tell;
"How good she was, how gentle, and how fair!"
In pity cease—alas! I know too well:
How in her sweet expressive face
Beam'd forth the beauties of her mind,
Yet heighten'd by exterior grace
Of manners most engaging, most refin'd:
No piteous object could she see,
But her soft bosom shar'd the woe,
Whilst smiles of affability
Endear'd whatever boon she might bestow.
Whate'er the emotions of her heart,
Still shone conspicuous in her eyes,
Stranger to every female art,
Alike to feign, or to disguise:
And O the boast how rare!
The secret in her faithful breast repos'd,
She ne'er with lawless tongue disclos'd,
In sacred silence lodg'd inviolate there.
O feeble words—unable to express
Her matchless virtue, or my own distress!

Relentless death! that, steel'd to human woe,
With murderous hands deals havoc on mankind,
Why (cruel!) strike this deprecated blow,
And leave such wretched multitudes behind?
Hark! groans come wing'd on every breeze!
The sons of grief prefer their ardent woe;
Oppress'd with sorrow, want, or dire disease,
And supplicate thy aid, as I do now:
In vain—Perverse, still on the unweeting head
'Tis thine thy vengeful darts to shed;
Hope's infant blossoms to destroy,
And drench in tears the face of joy.
But oh, fell tyrant! yet expect the hour
When virtue shall renounce thy power;
When thou no more shalt blot the face of day,
Nor mortals tremble at thy rigid sway,
Alas! the day—where'er I turn my eyes,
Some sad memento of my loss appears;
I fly the fatal house—suppress my sighs,
Resolv'd to dry my unavailing tears:
But, ah! In vain—no change of time or place
The memory can efface

Of all that sweetness, that enchanting air,
Now lost; and nought remains but anguish and despair.

Where were the delegates of Heaven, oh where!

Appointed virtue's children safe to keep!

Had innocence or virtue been their care,

She had not dy'd, nor had I liv'd to weep:

Mov'd by my tears, and by her patience mov'd,

To see her force the endearing smile,
My sorrows to beguile,

When torture's keenest rage the prov'd;

Sure they had warded that untimely dart,

Which broke her thread of life, and rent a husband's heart.

How shall I e'er forget that dreadful hour,

When, feeling death's restless power,

My hand the press'd, wet with her falling tears,

And thus, in faltering accents, spoke her fears!

" Ah, my lov'd lord, the transient scene is o'er,

" And we must part (alas!) to meet no more!

" But, oh! if e'er thy Emma's name was dear,

" If e'er thy vows have charm'd my ravish'd ear;

" If, from thy lov'd embrace my heart to gain,

" Proud friends have frown'd, and fortune smil'd

" in vain;

" If it has been my sole endeavour still

" To act in all obsequious to thy will;

" To watch thy very smiles, thy wish to know,

" Then only truly blest when thou wert so:

" If I have deoted with that fond excess,

" Nor love could add, nor fortune make it less;

" If this I've done, and more—oh then be kind

" To the dear lovely babe I leave behind.

" When time my once-lov'd memory shall efface,

" Some happier maid may take thy Emma's place,

" With envious eyes thy partial fondness see,

" And hate it for the love thou bore to me:

" My dearest Shaw, forgive a woman's fears,

" But one word more (I cannot bear thy tears)

" Promise—and I will trust thy faithful vow,

" (Oft have I try'd, and ever found thee true)

" That to some distant spot thou wilt remove

" This fatal pledge of hapless Emma's love,

" Where safe thy blandishments it may partake,

" And, oh! be tender for its mother's sake.

" Wilt thou? —————

" I know thou wilt—sad silence speaks assent,

" And in that pleasing hope thy Emma dies con" tent."

I, who with more than manly strength have bore

The various ills impos'd by cruel fate,

Sustain the firmness of my soul no more,

But sink beneath the weight:

Just Heaven (I cry'd) from memory's earliest day

No comfort has thy wretched suppliant known,

Misfortune still with unrelenting sway

Has claim'd me for her own.

But O—in pity to my grief, restore

This only source of bliss; I ask—I ask no more—

Vain hope—th' irrevocable doom is past,

Ev'n now she looks—the sighs her last—

Vainly I strive to stay her fleeting breath,

And, with rebellious heart, protest against her
' death.

When the stern tyrant clos'd her lovely eyes,

How did I rave, untaught to bear the blow!

With impious wish to tear her from the skies;

How curse my fate in bitterness of woe!

But whither would this dreadful frenzy lead?

Fond man, forbear,

Thy fruitless sorrow spare,

Dare not to talk what Heaven's high will decreed;

In humble reverence kiss th' afflictive rod,

And prostrate bow to an offended God.

Perhaps kind Heaven in mercy dealt the blow,

Some saving truth thy roving soul to teach;

To wean thy heart from grovelling views below,

And point out bliss beyond misfortune's reach:

To show that all the flattering schemes of joy,

Which towering hope so fondly builds in air,

One fatal moment can destroy,

And plunge th' exulting maniac in despair.

Then, O! with pious fortitude sustain

Thy present loss—haply, thy future gain;

Nor let thy Emma die in vain;

Time shall administer its wonted balm,

And hush this storm of grief to no unpleasing calm.

Thus the poor bird, by some disastrous fate

Caught and imprison'd in a lonely cage,

Torn from its native fields, and dearer mate,

Flutters a while, and spends its little rage:

But, finding all its efforts weak and vain,

No more it pants and rages for the plain;

Moping a while, in fullen mood

Droops the sweet mourner—but, ere long,

Prunes its light wings, and pecks its food,

And meditates the song:

Serenely sorrowing, breathes its piteous case,

And with its plaintive warblings saddens all the place.

Forgive me, Heaven—yet—yet the tears will flow,

To think how soon my scene of bliss is past!

My budding joys just promising to blow,

All nipt and wither'd by one envious blast!

My hours, that laughing wont to fleet away,

Move heavily along;

Where's now the sprightly jest, the jocund
song;

Time creeps unconscious of delight:

How shall I cheat the tedious day?

And O—the joyless night!

Where shall I rest my weary head?

How shall I find repose on a sad widow'd bed?

Come, * Theban drug, the wretch's only aid,

To my torn heart its former peace restore;

Thy votary wrapp'd in thy Lethæan shade,

A while shall cease his sorrows to deplore:

Haply when lock'd in sleep's embrace,

Again I shall behold my Emma's face;

Again with transport hear

Her voice soft whispering in my ear;

May steal once more a balmy kiss,

And taste at least of visionary bliss.

But, ah! th' unwelcome morn's obtruding light

Will all my shadowy schemes of bliss depose,

Will tear the dear illusion from my sight,

And wake me to the sense of all my woes:

If to the verdant fields I stray,

Alas! what pleasures now can these convey?

* Laudanum.

Her lovely form pursues where'er I go,
 And darkens all the scene with woe.
 By nature's lavish bounties cheer'd no more,
 Sorrowing I rove,
 Through valley, grot, and grove;
 Nought can their beauties or my ills restore;
 No herb, no plant, can med'cine my disease,
 And my sad sighs are borne on every passing breeze.

Sickness and sorrow hovering round my bed,
 Who now with anxious haste shall bring relief,
 With lenient hand support my drooping head,
 Affuage my pains, and mitigate my grief?
 Should worldly business call away,
 Who now shall in my absence fondly mourn,
 Count every minute of the loitering day,
 Impatient for my quick return?
 Should aught my bosom discompose,
 Who now with sweet complacent air
 Shall smooth the rugged brow of care,
 And soften all my woes?
 Too faithful memory—Cease, O cease—
 How shall I e'er regain my peace?
 (O to forget her)—but how vain each art,
 Whilst every virtue lives imprinted on my heart.

And thou, my little cherub, left behind,
 To hear a father's plaints, to share his woes,
 When reason's dawn informs thy infant mind,
 And thy sweet-lipping tongue shall ask the cause,
 How oft with sorrow shall mine eyes run o'er,
 When, twining round my knees, I trace
 Thy mother's smile upon thy face?
 How oft to my full heart shalt thou restore
 Sad memory of my joys—ah now no more!
 By blessings once enjoy'd now more distress'd,
 More beggar by the riches once possess'd.
 My little darling!—dearer to me grown
 By all the tears thou'st caus'd—(O strange to hear!)

Bought with a life yet dearer than thy own,
 Thy cradle purchas'd with thy mother's bier:
 Who now shall seek, with fond delight,
 Thy infant steps to guide aright?
 She who with doating eyes would gaze
 On all thy little artless ways,
 By all thy soft endearments blest,
 And clasp thee oft with transport to her breast,
 Alas! is gone—Yet shalt thou prove
 A father's dearest, tenderest love;
 And O sweet senseless smiler (envied state!)
 As yet unconscious of thy hapless fate,
 When years thy judgment shall mature,
 And reason shows those ills it cannot cure,
 Wilt thou, a father's grief to assuage,
 For virtue prove the phoenix of the earth?
 (Like her, thy mother dy'd to give thee birth)
 And be the comfort of my age!
 When sick and languishing I lie,
 Wilt thou my Emma's wonted care supply?
 And oft as to thy listening ear
 Thy mother's virtues and her fate I tell,
 Say, wilt thou drop the tender tear,
 Whilst on the mournful theme I dwell?
 Then, fondly stealing to thy father's side,
 Whene'er thou see'st the soft distress'd,
 Which I would vainly seek to hide,
 Say, wilt thou strive to make it less?

To sooth my sorrows all thy cares employ,
 And in my cup of grief infuse one drop of joy?

AN EVENING ADDRESS

TO A NIGHTINGALE.

SWEET bird! that, kindly perching near,
 Pour'st thy plaints melodious in mine ear,
 Not, like base worldlings, tutor'd to forego
 The melancholy haunts of woe,
 Thanks for thy sorrow-soothing strain:—
 For surely thou hast known to prove,
 Like me, the pangs of hapless love,
 Else why so feelingly complain,
 And with thy piteous notes thus sadden all the grove?

Say, dost thou mourn thy ravish'd mate,
 That oft enamour'd on thy strains has hung?
 Or has the cruel hand of fate
 Bereft thee of thy darling young?
 Alas! for both I weep—
 In all the pride of youthful charms,
 A beauteous bride torn from my circling arms!
 A lovely babe that should have liv'd to bless,
 And fill my doating eyes with frequent tears,
 At once the source of rapture and distress,
 The flattering prop of my declining years!
 In vain from death to rescue I essay'd,
 By every art that science could devise,
 Alas! it languish'd for a mother's aid,
 And wing'd its flight to seek her in the skies—
 Then O! our comforts be the same
 At evening's peaceful hour,
 To shun the noisy paths of wealth and fame,
 And breathe our sorrows in this lonely bower.

But why, alas! to thee complain!
 To thee—unconscious of my pain!
 Soon shalt thou cease to mourn thy lot severe,
 And hail the dawning of a happier year:
 The genial warmth of joy-renewing spring
 Again shall plume thy flutter'd wing;
 Again thy little heart shall transport prove,
 Again shall flow thy notes responsive to thy love:

But O for me in vain may seasons roll,
 Nought can dry up the fountain of my tears,
 Deploring still the comfort of my soul,
 I court my sorrows by increasing years.

Tell me, thou siren hope, deceiver, say,
 Where is the promis'd period of my woes?
 Full three long lingering years have roll'd away,
 And yet I weep, a stranger to repose:

O what delusion did thy tongue employ!
 "That Emma's fatal pledge of love,
 "Her last bequest—with all a mother's care,
 "The bitterness of sorrow should remove,
 "The horrors of despair,
 "And cheer a heart long lost to joy!"

How oft, when fondling in mine arms,
 Gazing enraptur'd on its angel face,
 My soul the maze of fate would vainly trace,
 And burn with all a father's fond alarms!
 And O what flattering scenes had fancy feign'd!
 How did I rave of blessings yet in store!
 Till every aching sense was sweetly pain'd,
 And my full heart could bear, nor tongue could utter more.

"Just Heaven, I cry'd"—with recent hopes elate,
 "Yet I will live—will live, though Emma's
 "Dead—
 "So long bow'd down beneath the storms of fate,
 "Yet will I raise my woe-dejected head!
 "My little Emma, now my all,
 "Will want a father's care,
 "Her looks, her wants my rash resolves recal,
 "And for her sake the ills of life I'll bear:
 "And oft together we'll complain,
 "Complaint, the only bliss my foul can know,
 "From me my child shall learn the mournful
 "Strain,
 "And prattle tales of woe;
 "And O! in that auspicious hour,
 "When fate resigns her persecuting power,
 "With dutious zeal her hand shall close,
 "No more to weep—my sorrow-streaming eyes,
 "When death gives misery repose,
 "And opens a glorious passage to the skies."

Vain thought! it must not be—She too is dead—

The flattering scene is o'er,—
 My hopes for ever—ever fled—
 And vengeance can no more—
 Crush'd by misfortune—blasted by disease—
 And none—none left to bear a friendly part!
 To meditate my welfare, health, or ease,
 Or sooth the anguish of an aching heart!
 Now all one gloomy scene, till welcome death,
 With lenient hand (O! falsely deem'd severe)
 Shall kindly stop my grief-exhausted breath,
 And dry up every tear:
 Perhaps, obsequious to my will,
 But, ah! from my affections far remov'd!
 The last sad office strangers may fulfil,
 As if I ne'er had been belov'd;
 As if, unconscious of poetic fire,
 I ne'er had touch'd the trembling lyre;
 As if my niggard hand ne'er dealt relief,
 Nor my heart melted at another's grief.

Yet—while this weary life shall last,
 While yet my tongue can form th' impassion'd
 strain,

In piteous accents shall the muse complain,
 And dwell with fond delay on blessings past:
 For O how grateful to a wounded heart
 The tale of misery to impart!
 From others' eyes bid artless sorrows flow,
 And raise esteem upon the base of woe!
 Even he*, the noblest of the tuneful throng,
 Shall deign my love-lorn tale to hear,
 Shall catch the soft contagion of my song,
 And pay my pensive muse the tribute of a tear

THE RACE,

BY MERCURIUS SPUR, ESQ.

With Notes. By Faustinius Scriblerus.

Acres procurant, magnum spectaculum!

[First published in 1766.]

ADDRESS TO THE CRITICS.

YE puny things, who self-important fit
 The sov'reign arbiters of monthly wit,

* Lord Lyttleton.

Who gnatling-like your stings around dispense,
 And feed on excrements of sickly sense;
 Ye gentle Critics, whom, by Fancy led,
 My Pegasus has kick'd upon the head,
 Who, zealous to decry th' injurious strain,
 While * Common-sense has bled at ev'ry vein;
 Bewilder'd wander on, with idiot-pride,
 Without or wit or grammar for your guide;
 Behold! again I blot th' invenom'd page,
 Come, whet your tiny stings, exhaust your rage:
 Here wreak your vengeance, here exert your skill,
 Let blust'ring Kenrick draw his raven's quill;
 My claims to genius let each dunce disown,
 And damn all strains more favour'd than their own.

Where Pegasus, who ambled at fifteen,
 No longer sporting on the rural green, [plains,
 Rampant breaks forth; now flies the peaceful
 And bounds, impetuous, heedless of the reins,
 O'er earth's vast surface, madly scours along,
 Nor spares a critic gaping in the throng;
 † Truth rides behind, and prompts the wild career;
 And, truth my guardian, what have I to fear?

Oh, Truth! thou sole director of my views,
 Whom yet I love far dearer than the muse!
 Teach me myself in ev'ry sense to know,
 Proof 'gainst th' injurious shafts of friend or foe.
 When smooth-tongu'd flatterers my ears assail,
 May my firm soul disdain the fulsome tale!
 And, ah! from pride thy votive bard defend,
 Though C—n—y smile, or C—d commend!
 Unmov'd by squibs from all the scribbling throng,
 Whom thou proclaim'st the refuse of my song;
 Still may I safe between the danger steer,
 Of Scylla-flatt'ry, and Charybdis-fear!
 Those foes to Genius (should'st thou grant my claim!)

Those wrecks alike of reason and of fame.

THE RACE.

AID me, some honest sister of the Nine,
 Who ne'er paid court at Flatt'ry's sullen shrine,

* In justification of the author's severity, the reader is desired to attend to the Critical Review on the first edition of this Poem, where he will find, comprised in a very narrow compass, a most wonderful variety of nonsense, both literal and metaphorical; where the Race is ingeniously discovered to be an imitation of Pope's Dunciad.—Now, the only circumstance which has the least reference to that poem, is the hero's tumbling into a bog, which is (as it is there acknowledged) an exact imitation of a passage in Homer, and was designed at the same time as a stroke of raillery on one of the instances where that immortal bard has nodded.—'Tis the set of Gentlemen had not eyes to see, and are therefore excusable. Dr. South replied to a gentleman, who remonstrated to him from his bishop, that his sermons were too witty, "Pray present my bumble duty to his lordship, and let him consider, if God Almighty had made him a wit, he could not help "it." These gentlemen certainly cannot help their belping neither genius nor literature; but blockheads may help commencing critics. F. SCRIBLERUS.

† Perhaps some half-witted critic may pertinently inquire, why should truth ride behind, rather than before? Soft and fairly: certainly every man has a right to ride foremost on his own Pegasus.

A youth enlighten with thy keenest fires,
Who dares proclaim what'er the muse inspires.
By squint-ey'd Prejudice, or love inclin'd,
No partial ties shall here enslave the mind:
Though fancy sport in fiction's pleasing guise,
Truth still conspicuous through the veil shall rise;
No bribe or stratagem shall here take place,
Though (strange to tell!)—the subject is a Race.
Unlike the Race which fam'd Newmarket boasts,
Where pimps are peers' companions, whores their toasts,

Where jockey-nobles with groom porters vie,
Who best can hedge a bet, or cog a die.
Nor like the Race, by ancient Homer told,
No spears for prizes, and no cups of gold:
A poets' Race, I sing—a poet's prize,
Who gold (a) and fighting equally despise.
To all the rhyming brethren of the quill
Fame sent her heralds to proclaim her will.
“ Since late her vot'ries in abusive lays
“ Had madly wrangled for the wreath of bays;
“ To quell at once this foul tumultuous heat,
“ The day was fix'd whereon each bard should “ meet.

“ Already had she mark'd the destin'd ground,
“ Where from the goal her eager sons should
“ There, by the hope of future glory led, [bound,
“ Prove by their heels the prowess of the head;
“ And he, who fleetest ran, and first to fame,
“ The chaplet and the victory should claim.”
Swiftspread the grateful news through all the town,
And every scribbler thought the wreath his own.
No corporal defect can now retard
The one-legg'd, short-legg'd, or consumptive bard;
Convinc'd that legs or lungs could make no odds
'T'wixt man and man, where goddesses or gods
Prejudic'd judges; sure to have decreed
To dulness (b) crutches, and to merit speed.

To view the various candidates for fame,
Booksellers, printers, and their devils came.
First Becket and De Hondt came hand in hand,
And next came Nourse and Millar from the Strand;
Here Woodfall—there the keen-ey'd Scott appears,
And Say (c) (oh! wonderful!) with both his ears.
Morley the meagre, with Moran the fat,
And Flexney (d) with a favour in his hat.

(a) The poverty of poets is a well known adage; or, to speak more poetically, their contempt of riches. They also seem providentially in all ages to have possessed the most pacific tempers: no doubt, lest their lives should be endangered, whose labours are so conducive to the amusement of society. Horace confesses himself a coward:

Relicta non bene parmula, &c.

But the moderns are not quite so ingenuous.

(b) The discerning reader will at once be sensible of the necessity of this proviso; otherwise it is to be supposed, a poet with a wooden leg, or any bodily infirmity, would never have started.

(c) Mr. Say's boldness in asserting any thing written in opposition even to the ministerial measures, will render the meaning of this line sufficiently obvious to the intelligent reader.

(d) Alluding to the custom of tenants wearing ribbons in their hats when the squire's horse wins the plate; Mr. Flexney, our hero's publisher, does the same, from a strong presumption of his author's success.

(e) Williams and Kearsley now afresh begin
To curse the cruel walls that held 'em in.
In rage around his shop poor Owen flies,
Daming the Chevalier who clos'd his eyes;
“ Oh! could he see, this day, the glorious strife,
“ He'd grope contented all his future life.”
To Pater-noster-row the tidings reach,
And forth came Johnny Coot and Dryden Leach:
Associates in each cause alike they share,
Ee it to print a primer or Voltaire,
Thus leagu'd, how sweet the friendly pence to earn,

Like gentle Rosencraus and Guildenstern (f)!
But Leach (g) where Churchill came, still cautious
fled,

Skulk'd through the crowd, and trembled for his head.
With his whole length of body scarce a span,
Yet aping all the dignity of man,
Next Vaillant came; erect his dwarfish mien,
He perch'd on horseback, that he might be seen;
And vow'd, with worshipful grimace (h) and din (i),

He'd back the peerless bard (k) of Lincoln's-Inn.
High on a hill, enthron'd in stately pride,
Appear'd the Goddess; while on either side
Stood Vice and Virtue—harbingers of Fame,
This stamps a good, and that an evil name.
On flow'rs thick scatter'd o'er the mossy ground,
The nymphs of Helicon reclin'd around;
Here, while each candidate his claim prefer'd,
In silent state the Goddess fat and hard

Nor far from hence, across the path to Fame,
A horrid ditch appear'd—known by the name
Of Black Oblivion's Gulf. In former days
Here perish'd many a poet and his lays.
Close by the margin of the fable flood,
Reviewers Critical and Monthly stood
In terrible array, who dreadful frown, [down-
And, arm'd with clubs, heze knock poor authors
Merit, alas! with them is no pretence,
In vain the pleas of poesy or sense;
All levell'd here; though some triumphant rise,
Shake off the dirt, and seek their native skies.
But, strange! to Dulness they deny the crown,
And damn ev'n works as stupid as their own!

(e) These two gentlemen, at the time this poem was first published, were imprisoned for publications that were deemed libellous.

(f) Two characters in Hamlet, where one never appears without the other.

(g) From a circumstance, which Mr. Leach has the best reason to remember (as we bald feeling the most perfect of all the senses), the author must allow Mr. Churchill an exception to the general rule of poets being cowards, who, for the most part, are fonder of laying on their blows with a pen than a cudgel; though we must confess it is a very cruel alternative, where a printer must either submit to have his head broke, or run the hazard of losing his ears.

(h) The reader is not to suppose Mr. Vaillant made faces, but only that he assumed the proper air and countenance of a worshipful magistrate.

(i) No inglorious expression, as some may imagine; witness the din of war—the din of arms, &c. therefore proper to be employed in any character of consequence.

(k) A phrase common upon the turf, and consequently very applicable here.

Oh! be this rage for massacre withstood,
Nor thus imbrue your hands in brother's blood!

Foremost, the spite of hell upon his face,
Stood the Therfites of the Critic Race,
Tremendous Hamilton! Of giant-strength,
With Crab-tree staff full twice two yards in length.
(l) Near John o' Groat's thatch'd cot its parent stood

Alone, for many a mile—itselt a wood;
Till Archy spy'd it, yet unform'd and wild,
And robb'd the mother of her tallest child.
Ill-omcn'd birds beheld with dire affright
Their roost despoil'd, and sicken'd at the sight;
The ravens crouk'd, pies chatter'd round his head,
In vain,—he frown'd! the birds in terror fled;
Perch'd on their thistles droop'd the mournful band:
Archy stalk'd off, the crab-tree in his hand.

Clofe wedg'd behind in rank and file were seen,
From Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Aberdeen,
A troop of Lairds with scraps of Latin hung,
Who came to teach John Bull his mother tongue.
Poor John! who must not judge what'er he read.
But wait for sentence from these sons of Tweed.

Now coward Prudence, in the Muse's ear
Whispers—"How dar'st thou, Novice, persevere
' With headlong fury, to destruction prone,
' (m) Rouse sacred Dulness yawning on her throne?
' Thus madly bold, dread'st not the Harpy's
"claw?"

"Thou, scarce a morsel for so vast a maw!
"Soon shalt thou mourn thy ill-starr'd numbers
"curst."

She scorns their malice, let them do their worst.
Where Phœbus casts not an auspicious eye,
The sick'ning numbers of themselves must die;
But where true genius beams conspicuous forth,
The candid few will justify its worth;
Still as it flows increasing in its course,
Till, like a river, with resistless force
Rapid rolls down the torrent of applause;
Then, struck with fear, each puny wretch withdraws,

Meanly disclaims the paths he lately trod,
(n) Belies himself, and humbly licks the rod.

First enter'd in the list the laureat bard,
And thus prefer'd his suit:—"If due reward,
' Goddess ador'd, to merit thou assign,
' Whose verse so smooth, whose claim so just, as ' mine?"

(l) The learned reader will not be surpris'd at this genealogy of the crab-tree stick belonging to so illustrious a character as the printer of the Critical Review.—It is common, and Homer has often done the same, in regard to his hero's swords and spears, &c.

(m) This alludes to a part of their criticism upon the Race above-mentioned, wherein they observe, "the author has attacked booksellers, printers, and even Reviewers"—oh! Presumption! attack Reviewers! a set of gentlemen too!" We acknowledge the justice of this remark, and submit to the lash.

(n) Every ingenious mind must conceive the utmost contempt for modern criticism, by looking back on the treatment of the late Mr. Churchill, where we find the very critics, who, at his first appearance in public, would scarcely allow him the least pretensions to genius, disavowing their former proceedings, and meanly courting his friendship. See the Critical Review about that period.

' To thee my cause I trust; oh, lend me wings,
' Show wit and luck to be consistent things,
' And that he rhymes the best who rhymes for ' kings.'

Lur'd by a sober, honest thirst for fame,
Armstrong appear'd to lay his lawful claim;
Armstrong, whose muse has taught the youth to prove

(o) The sweet economy of health and love.
But, when he saw what spleen each bosom fir'd,
Forth from the field he modestly retired.

Not so repuls'd, nor overaw'd with shame,
Next Hill stood forth, a darling child of Fame;
But, as to Justice, Fame herself must bow,
The poets' bays shall never deck his brow:
Else who, like Hill, can save a sickly age;
Like him arrest the hand of death with sage (p)?
But (q) this the ancients never knew, or sure
They ne'er had died while sage remain'd a cure.
Oh, niatchless Hill! if aught the muse foresee
Of things conceal'd in dark futurity,
Death's triumph by thy skill shall soon be o'er,
Hence dire disease and pain shall be no more;
' 'Tis thine to save whole nations from his maw,
By some new Tincture of a Barley-braw.
He bow'd, and spoke:—"Oh, Goddess, heav'nly
' fair!

' To thy own Hill now show a mother's care;
' If I go unrewarded thence away,
' What bard will court thee on a future day?
' Who toils like me thy temple to unlock,
' By moral essays, rhime, and water-dock?
' With perseverance who like me could write
' Inspector on Inspector, night by night;
' Supplying still, with unexhausted head,
' Till every reader slumber'd as he read?
' No longer then my lawful claim delay.
(p) She smil'd—Hill simper'd, and went pleas'd away.

Next Doddsley spoke:—"A bookfeller and bard
' May sure with justice claim the first regard.
' A double merit's surely his, that's wont
' To make the fiddle, and then play upon't;
' But more, to prove beyond a doubt my claim,
' Behold the work on which I build my fame!

(q) This gentleman has obliged the public with two poetical pieces; the one intitled, "The Economy of Love;" the other, "Health;" in which he has displayed great abilities, both in sentiment and diction.

(p) It is impossible to express the obligations of the public to the author of this discovery. We learn that the ancients had indeed the art of restoring youth, by cutting the party to pieces, and boiling them in a kettle; but certainly the horror of so dismal a process (could the art be revived) might deter a person of a moderate share of courage from receiving the benefit of it. But Dr. Hill has removed the scruples of the most timorous, and has promised all the good effects of so dreadful an experiment, in a discovery both simple and palatable.

(q) A favourite expression of Dr. Hill's, in all his advertisements, is, "the ancients knew this,—the Greeks knew this, &c. &c."

(r) As the reader may perhaps ascertain within himself the future success of Dr. Hill, from the smile of the Goddess, he is desired to suspend his judgment, and consider that there are smiles of contempt as well as of approbation.

Search every tragic scene of Greece and Rome,
 From ancient Sophocles to modern Hume;
 Examine well the conduct, diction, plan,
 And match, then match Clone, if you can.
 A father wretched—husband wretched more,
 A harmless baby welt'ring in its gore;
 Such dire distress as ne'er was seen before!
 Such sad complaints and tears, and heartfelt throes,

Sorrows for wet (s) and dry, such mighty woes,
 Too big for utterance e'en in tragic obs!

Next Smollet came. What author dare resist
 Historian, critic, bard, and novellist?

'To reach thy temple, honour'd Fame,' he cried,
 Where, where's an avenue I have not tried?

But since the glorious present of to-day
 Is meant to grace alone the poet's lay,

My claim I wave to ev'ry art beside,
 And rest my plea upon the Regicide (t).

(u)

But if, to crown the labours of my muse,
 Thou, inauspicious, should'st the wreath refuse,

Whoe'er attempts it in this scribbling age,
 Shall feel the Scottish pow'r's of Critic rage;

Thus spurn'd, thus disappointed of my aim,
 I'll stand a bugbear in the road to Fame;

Each future minion's infant hopes undo,
 And blast the budding honours of his brow.

He said—and, grown with future vengeance big,
 Grimly he shook his scientific wig.

To clinch the cause, and fuel-add to fire,
 Behind came Hamilton, his trusty squire.

A while he paus'd, revolving the disgrace,
 And gath'ring all the horrors of his face;

Then rais'd his head, and turning to the crowd,
 Burst into bellowing terrible and loud.

Hear my resolve, and first by G—I swear—
 By Smollet, and his gods; whoe'er shall dare

With him this day for glorious fame to vie
 Sows'd in the bottom of the ditch shall lie;

And know, the world no other shall confess
 Whilst I have crab-tree, life, or letter-pres's.

Sear'd at the menace, authors fearful grew,
 Poor Virtue trembled, and e'en (y) Vice look'd blue.

Next Wilkes appear'd, vain hoping the reward,
 A glorious patriot, an inglorious bard,

Yet cringing, 'thot far wide of Freedom's mark,
 And rais'd a flame in putting out a spark:

(s) In perusing the above piece, the readers may observe the different effects of grief here mentioned, where one character complains of being drowned in tears, and another that he cannot shed any.

(t) A Tragedy written by Dr. S. and printed by subscription, but never acted. See "Companion to the Playhouse," Vol. I.

(u) The reader is to suppose that these asterisks must certainly mean something of the utmost consequence.—It is exactly of the same kind with the blank page in "Tristram Shandy."

(x) Annuet et totum nutu tremefecit Olympum.

VIRGIL.

(y) As pale is an epithet that characterises the fear of mortals, the author has made use of the Poetica Licentia, in making a goddess turn blue.

Near to the throne, with silent step he came,
 To whisper in her ear his filthy claim;
 But, ruin to his hopes! behind stood near,
 With fix'd attention and a greedy ear,
 A sneaking priest, who heard, and to the crowd
 Blabb'd, with most grievous zeal, the tale aloud.
 The peaceful Nine, whom nothing less could vex,
 Flew on the vile assassin of the sex,
 Disown'd all knowledge of his brutal lays,
 (z) And scratch'd the front intended for the bays.

Here Johnson comes—neblest with outward grace,

His rigid morals stamp'd upon his face,
 While strong conceptions struggle in his brain
 (For even wit is brought to bed with pain).

To view him, porters with their loads would rest,

And babes cling frighted to the nurse's breast.
 With looks convuls'd, he roars in pompous strain,
 And, like an angry lion, shakes his mane.

The Nine, with terror struck, who ne'er had seen
 Aught human with so horrible a mien,
 Debating, whether they should stay or run—
 Virtue steps forth, and claims him for her son.

With gentle speech she warns him now to yield,
 Nor stain his glories in the doubtful field:
 But, wrapt in conscious worth, content sit down,
 Since Fame resolv'd his various pleas to crown,

Though forc'd his present claim to disavow,
 Had long reserv'd a chaplet for his brow.

He bows; obeys—for Time shall first expire,
 Ere Johnson stay, when Virtue bids retire.

Next Murphy silence broke:—'Oh, Goddess
 fair!

'To whom I still prefer my daily pray'r;
 For whose dear sake I've scratch'd my drowsy
 head,

'And robb'd alike the living and the dead;
 Stranger to fear, have plung'd through thick and thin,

'And Fleet-ditch virgins dragg'd to Lincoln's-Inn;
 Smile on my hopes, thy favour let me share,
 And show mankind Hibernia boasts thy care.'

Here stopp'd he, interrupted quick by Jones,
 A poet, rais'd from mortar, brick and stones.

'Goddess,' he cries, 'reject his piteb-patch work,
 (a) He was a butter-seller's boy at Cork;

'On me bestow the prize, on me, who came
 From my dear country in pursuit of fame:

'For thus advis'd Mæcenas (best of men):
 "Jones, drop the trowel, and assume the pen;

"The Muses thrive not in this barren soil,
 Come, seek with me, fair Albion's happier isle;

"There shall the theatres increase thy store,
 And Essex bleed to make thy purse run o'er."

'Thus have I fondly left the mason's care,
 To build imaginary tow'rs 't' th' air;

(z) A poet enamour'd of obvious similes, would certainly have compar'd this action, for the honour of the sex, to an outrage often committed by the female mobility, from a motive still more interesting;—but our author has declined the comparison, out of respect to the virgin-delicacy of the Muses; and the reader will surthmore observe, that their fingers rove no lower than his forehead.

(a) See the "Picklock," a scurrilous poem, N n iii]

Then, since my golden hopes have prov'd a cheat,
(b) Oh, give him Fame, whom Fate forbids to eat;

This, this at least to me forlorn supply,
I'll live contented on a farthing pye.
Next in the train advanc'd a Highland lad,
Array'd in brogues and Caledonian plaid,
Surrounded by his countrymen, while loud
The † British Homer rang through all the crowd.
Then he with nickle pride and uncouth air
His bonnet doff'd, and thus preferr'd his pray'r :

Oh, Fame! regard me with propitious eyes,
Give me to seize this long-contested prize;
In epic lines I shine, the king of verse;
From torn and tatter'd scraps of ancient Erse,
'Tis mine a perfect pile to raise, for all
Must own the wondrous structure of Fingal!
No less a miracle, than if a Turk
A mosaic should raise up of Mosaic work.

Next Mallet came; Mallet who knows each art,
The ear to tickle, and to sooth the heart;
Who, with a goose-quill, like a magic rod,
Transforms a Scottish peer into a god,
Oh! matchless Mallet, by one stroke to clear,
One lucky stroke, four hundred pounds a-year!
I long round a Court poor Gay dependent hung,
(And yet most (c) trimly has the poet sung)
Twice six revolving years vain-hoping past,
And unrewarded went away at last.

Again dame Prudence checks the madd'ning strain,

And thus advises, wisely, though in vain:
" Ah, Spur! enlisted in a luckless cause,
" Who, self despising, seeks for vain applause,
" Thy will how stubborn, and thy wit how small,
" To think a muse can ever thrive on goll!
" Then timely throw thy venom'd shafts aside,
" Choose out some fool blown up with pow'r and
" pride—

" Be flattery thy arrow, this thy butt,
" And praise the devil for his cloven foot."
The counsel's good;—but how shall I subscribe,
Who scorn to flatter, and detest a bribe?

In voice most weak, in sentiment most strong,
Like Milton murder'd in an eunuch's song,
With honesty no malice e'er could shame,
With prejudices hunger ne'er could tame,

(b) It is a mortification to which the professed patrons of merit must ever be liable, to have their benevolence abused, and their hopes deceived;—but great souls have no limits, or rather disdain any, which is well expressed by Voltaire:

Répandez vos bienfaits avec magnificence,
Même au moins vertueux ne les refusez pas,
Ne vous informez pas de leur reconnaissance,
Il est grand, il est beau, de faire des ingrats.

† There is indeed an air of originality, which, to a literary virtuoso, renders Fingal worthy of notice. But I am afraid the North-Britons cannot easily be acquitted of national partiality; who, instead of a bonnet and thistle, which would have been no incompetent reward, have insisted on his right to a crown of laurel.

(c) He told me, once upon a day,
Trim are thy sonnets, gentle Gay. GAY.

With judgment sometimes warp'd, but oft refin'd,
Next Cleland came—the champion of mankind!
Who views, contented with his little state,
Wealth squander'd by the partial hand of fate.
And, whilst dull roguish the joys of life partake,
Lives, a great patriot—on a mutton steak!

Dreaming of genius, which he never had,
Half-wit, half-fool, half-critic, and half-mad;
Seizing, like Shirley, on the poet's lyre,
With all the rage, but not one spark of fire;
Eager for slaughter, and resolv'd to tear
From others' brows that wreath he must not wear,

Next Kenrick came; all-furious, and replete
With brandy, malice, pertness, and conceit.
Unskill'd in classic lore, through envy blind
To all that'sauteous, learned, or refin'd,
For faults alone behold the savage frowl,
With reason's offal glut his rav'ning soul,
Pleas'd with his prey, its inmost blood he drinks,
And mumbles, paws, and turns it—till it stinks.

Erect he stood, nor deign'd one bow to Fame,
Then bluntly thus:— Will Kenrick is my name.
Who are these minions crowding to thy face?
" Poets! 'Phaw! scribblers, impotent and vain;
" The chaplet's mine—I claim it, who inherit
(d) Dennis's rage, and Milbourne's glorious
" spirit."

Struck with amazement, Fame, who ne'er had seen
A face so brazen, and so pert a mien,
Calmly replied, ' Vain-boaster, go thy way,
' And prove more furious and more dull than they.'

Then Brown appear'd—with such an air he mov'd,

And show'd him confident and self-approv'd.
Poor injur'd, honour'd Pope! the bard on thee
(e) Has clapp'd a rusty lock without a key:
Thus, when enraptur'd, we attempt to rove
Through all the sweets of thy Pierian grove,
The gate, alas! is strongly barr'd: and all
That taste the sweets must climb the rugged wall.

Rev'rent he bow'd, and thus address'd the throne:

' One boon, oh! grant me, and the day's my own!
' When the shrill trumpet calls the rival train
' To scour with nimble feet the dusty plain,
' Let not the dread professor Lowth appear
' To freeze thy vot'ry's shiv'ring soul with fear,
' Tear the fine form, perhaps, of all I've writ,
' And drown me in a deluge of his wit.'

Next Vaugh'n appear'd; he smil'd, and strok'd his chin,

And, pleas'd to think his carcase was so thin,
So moulded for the Race, while self-dubb'd worth
Beam'd from his eyes, he hemm'd—and thus held forth:

(d) Dennis and Milbourne, two things called Critics, damned to immortality for being the persecutors of Dryden and Pope.

(e) Alluding to the " Essay on Satire," prefixed to the second volume of Pope's Works, which the reader of no discernment might mistake for the production of that immortal genius, unless he is lucky enough to stumble upon the title-page. It has often been a matter of astonishment, how it came there; as there is no such privilege in Mr. Pope's will, bequeath'd to the editor, together with the property of his works.

Goddeſs, your flave;—'tis true I draw the quill
(f) Sometimes through anger, not to ſhow my ſkill;
' Yet all muſt own, ſpite of the (g) Bear's report,
' There's obvious merit in my keen retort :
' Though Flexncy (oh! his ignorance confound!)
' Sells its contents to grocers by the pound,
' And, deaf to genius, and its pleaſe to fame,
' Puts it to purpoſes—unfit to, name.
' Then, ſince no profit from the muſe I draw,
' You can't reſuſe me praiſe, and ſo your ta—!'
The Goddeſs laugh'd—-and who could well contain,

To ſee ſuch ſoplings ſkip around her ſane?

Next Churchill came—his face proclaim'd a heart,

That ſcorn'd to wear the ſmooth addreſs of art,
Strongly mark'd out that firm unconquer'd ſoul,
Which nought on earth could bias or controul.
He bow'd—when all ſneer at his want of grace (b),
And uncouth form, ill-fuited to the Race;
While he contemptuous ſmil'd on all around,
And thus addreſs'd her in a (i) voice profound:

Goddeſs, theſe gnatlings move not me at all,
' I come by juſt decrees to ſtand or fall.
' When firſt the daring bard aſpires to ſing,
' To check the fallies of his infant wing,
' Critics not only try (your pardon, Fame,
' To you a ſtranger is the critic's name),
' But every blockhead, who pretends to write,
' Would damp his vigour, and retard his flight.
' Critics, oh Fame! are things compos'd between ' The two ingredients, Ignorance and Spleen ;
' Who, like the Daw, would infamouſly tear
' The ſhining plumes they ſee another wear,
' That, thus unfeather'd by theſe wretched elves,
' All may appear as naked as themſelves.
' Hard is the taſk in ſuch a cauſe t' engage ' With fools and knaves eternal war to wage,
' By fears or partial feelings unſubdu'd,
' To hurl defiance at ſo vaſt a crowd;
' To ſtand the teizing of their little ſpleen,
' So oft to clear the witting-crowded ſcene ;
' From vice and folly tear the ſoul diſguiſe,
' And crush at once the hydras as they riſe.
' Yet on I will—unaw'd by ſlavish fears,
' Till gain'd the glorious point, or loſt my ears.'

Next from the temple ſix poetic cubs,
With him whoſe humble muſe delights in ſtrubs,
And commentator Fawkes—let Woty tell,
Alone who ſees, how much he can excel,

(f) (f) Facit Indignatio Verſus.] Let no one pretend to ſay, that even anger has not its good effects, ſince we owe the immortal works both of a Juvenal and a Vaughan to their being rouſed by a ſpirit of reſentment.

(g) A name by which the late Mr. Churchill was diſtinguiſhed, on account, as we ſuppoſe, of the rough manner in which he handled the gentle bards who were ſo unlucky as to come within reach of his poetical paws.

(b) Not ſpiritual grace, but grace in making a bow; or, if the reader muſt be let into the ſecret, the unharmoniouſneſs of his numbers.

(i) Mr. Churchill, as a ſcholar, is here ſuppoſed well acquainted with that general maxim in oratory, Loquere ore rotundo, which is here rendered a voice profound.

Who wipes all doubts from ſacred texts away,
Clear as the ſkies upon a miſty day;
Bard, critic, and divine—with upturn'd eyes
Dejected Virtue to the Goddeſs cries,

" What ways and means for raiſing the ſupplies!"

Awhile demurring who ſhould move the pleaſe,
Fawkes claim'd the right, from having ta'en degrees;

' Combin'd, dear Woty, ſure we ne'er can fail,
' I'll ſpeak—do thou hold up the caſſock's tail.'

He hemm'd—then haw'd—then bow'd, and thus began:

' Oh Fame! propitious view the friendly plan:

' See Law on Goffel, caſt a ſocial look,

' And Moſes ſide with Ijytleton and Coke:

' Let not a partnership, unknown before,

' In vain for favour and the bays implore;

' But guide thy vot'ry's feet acroſs the plain,

' While gentle Woty bears the ſable train;

' And crown'd with conqueſt, amply to reward

' So mean an office in ſo great a bard,

' Six days in ſeven I'll the wreath reſign,

' Only on Sundays be its honours mine.'

Rev'rent he bow'd—then Bickerſtaff advanc'd,

His Sing-Song-Muſe, by vaſt ſucceſs enhanc'd;

Who, when fair Wright, deſtroying Reason's ſence,

Inveigles our applauſe in ſpite of ſenſe,

With ſyren-voice our juſter rage confounds,

And clothes ſweet nonſenſe in deluſive ſounds,

Pertly commends the judgment of the town,

And arrogates the merit as his own;

Talks of his taſte! how well each air was hit!

While printers and their devils praife his wit;

And, wrapp'd in warm ſurtout of ſelf-conceit,

Defies the critics cold, and poet's heat.

He ey'd the rabble round, and thus began:

' Goddeſs! I wonder at the pride of man!

' Fellows, whoſe accents never yet have hung

' On ſkilful Beard's or Brent's harmonious tongue,

' Dare here approach, (k) vo chatter like a parrot,

' (l) But hardly know a ſheep's head from a carrot.

' Whoſe taſteleſs lines ne'er grac'd a royal ſtage,

' Nor charm'd a tuneful crochet-loving age!

' Prove then, oh Goddeſs! to my labours kind,

' And let the ſons of Dulaci lag behind,

' While (i) boity toity, wibiſty friſky, &c.

' On ballad-wings ſpring forth to victory.'

So ſure I—-but juſtice ſtops thee in thy flight,

And damns thy labours to eternal night.

Brands that ſucceſs which boaſts no juſt pretence

To genius, judgment, wit, or common ſenſe;

But who for taſte ſhall dare preſcribe the laws,

Or ſtop the torrent of the mob's applauſe?

In thought (m) ſublim'd, next Elphinton came forth,

And thus harangu'd the Goddeſs on his worth:

' 'Tis mine, oh Fame! full fraught with Attic lore,

' Long-vo pronunciation to reſtore,

' Of letters to reform each vile abuſe,

' And bring the Grecian (n) kappa into uſe.

(k) See Love in a Village, an Opera.

(l) Ibid.

(m) A favourite word of ſibi author. See Education, a Poem.

(n) Mr. Elphinton intends ſortly to lay before the public his reaſons for giving U always the ſound of the ' Tully once more his proper name shall know,

 ' Restor'd its ancient found of Kikero.
 ' First, from my native tongue, 'tis mine ' expel
 ' The superfluities of E (o) and L ;
 ' T' unveil the long-conceal'd recess of truth,
 ' And teach betimes to bend the pliant youth ;
 ' To point the means of proper recreation,
 ' And prove no (o) wobetter equals emulation :

 ' To criticize, instruct, and prove, in metre

 ' Deign then, oh Fame! (t) to satisfy my lore,
 ' Who've written as mortal man ne'er wrote before,
 ' Broke through all pedant rules of mood and
 ' sense,
 ' And nobly soar'd beyond the reach of sense.'
 He bow'd:---then Arne swift bolted through the throng,

Renown'd for all the various pow'rs of song :
 Sweet as the Thracian's, whose melodious woe
 Mov'd the stern tyrant on the shades below ;
 Or that, by which the faithless syren charms,
 And woos the sailor shipwreck'd in her arms :
 Soft as the notes which Phœbus did employ
 To raise the glories of ill-fated Troy ;
 Or those which banish'd Reason could recal,
 And bring the devil cap'ring out of Saul.

But, not contented with his crotchet-praife,
 Lo! he adventures for the poet's bays !
 No more is genius rear'd in classic schools,
 But falls, like fortune, on the head of fools :
 Dull dogmas, thunder'd from the pedant's mouth,
 No more shall tire the ear-belabour'd youth ;
 Since bards now spring without the pains of labring, [ibrasking.]
 Like Arne and Duck, from fiddling and from
 ' Oh, Fame,' he cries, ' with kind attention hear

' Who, not like other infants born or bred,
 ' Sprung forth, like Pallas, from its daddy's head,
 ' On me, then, Fame, oh! let thy favours fall,
 ' And show that Tommy Arne outwits 'em all !'
 Here Fr-----s rais'd his head, though last not least,

A wanton poet, and a solem'n priest ;
 By turns through life each character we mark,
 A priest by day, a poet in the dark ;
 Yet each at will the Proteus can forsake,
 Now politician, now commences rake ;
 Nay worse--(if Fame say true) panders for love,
 And acts the Mercy to a lustful Jove.
 Now grave he fits, and checks th' unhallow'd jest,
 Whilst his sage precepts cool each am'rous breast ;
 Now strips the priests disguise, awakes desire,
 Tells the lewd tale, and fans the dying fire :
 All poz'd, despair his character to paint,
 And wonder how the dev'l they lost the faint !

Next from the different theatres came forth
 A score at least, of self-sufficient worth ;
 Each claims the chaplet, or protests his wrong,
 A prologue this had wrote, and that a song ;
 Forth from the crowd a general hissing flies,
 To see such triflers arrogate the prize ;
 But fully bent this day the Goddes came,
 To hear with patience every coxcomb's claim.

Here endless groups on groups from every street,
 Popes, Shakspereas, Jonsons,---in their own conceit,

With hopes clate advance, and ardour keen,
 Whom not one muse had ever heard or seen ;
 Who still write on, though hooted and disgrac'd,
 And damn the public for their want of taste.

Oh, Vanity! whose far-extended sway
 Nations confess, and potentates obey,
 How vast thy reign!---Say, where, oh! where's the man

His own defects who boldly dares to scan,
 Just to himself!--Ev'n now, whilst I incline
 To paint the vot'ries kneeling at thy shrine,
 Whilst others follies freely impart,
 Thy power resistless flutters round my heart,
 Prompts me this common weakness to disclose,
 ((*) Myself the very coxcomb I expose).
 And, ah! too partial to my lays and me!
 My kind---yet cruel friends---soon shall you see
 The culprit-muse, whose idle sportive vein
 No views can bias, and no fears restrain,
 (Thus female thieves, though threaten'd with disgrace,

Must still be sing'ring dear forbidden lace),
 Dragg'd without mercy to that awful bar
 Where Spleen with Genius holds eternal war ;
 And there, her final ruin to fulfil,
 Condemn'd by butchers, pre-resolv'd to kill,
 In vain her youth shall for compassion plead,
 Ev'n for a syllable the wretch shall bleed,
 And, 'spite of all the friendship you can show,
 Be made a public spectacle of woe. [mute---]
 But hold, though sentenc'd---manners! and be Derrick appears to move his kingly suit.

(*) A very ingenious declaration it must be acknowledged; and I dare venture to pronounce our author the first who ever made it, and in all probability the last who ever will.---The ancients all run into the contrary extreme. .See Horacé, Virgil, Ovid, Lucan, &c. &c.

" Goddeſs, I come not here for fame to vie,
 "(A maſter of the ceremonies I).
 " Since re-enthron'd at Bath I now appear,
 " This day appoint me to that ſtation here;
 " In niceſt order, I'll conſult the whole,
 " All riot and indecency controul,
 " For know, this pigmy (y) frame contains a
 " mighty ſoul!"
 " Nay, let me urge a more important claim,
 " 'Twas I firſt gave the ſtrumpet's (z) liſt to fame,
 " Their age, ſize, qualities, if brown or fair,
 " Whoſe breath was ſweeteſt, whoſe the brighteſt
 " hair,
 " Diſplay'd each various dimple, ſmile, and frown,
 " Pimp-generaliſſimo to all the town!
 " From this what vaſt advantages accrue!
 " Thus each may chooſe the maid of partial hue;
 " Know to whoſe bed he has the beſt pretenſions,
 " And buy the Venus of his own dimenſions.
 " Nor yet a ſtranger to the tuneful nine, [mine];
 " Songs, prologues, and meand'ring odes are
 " Such jeu d'eſprit, as beſt becomes a king,
 " And gentle epigrams—without a ſting;
 " The fam'd Domitian ſtill before my eyes,
 " Who ne'er for paſtime murder'd ought but flies;
 " Nay—let my muſe boaſt gentler ſport than he,
 " Since fly or gnat was never hurt by me,
 " By me, though ſeated in monarchical ſtate,
 " And, ſpite of Harrington, whoſe will is fate."
 Here rais'd the little monarch on his toe,
 And ſmil'd contempt on printers' boys below.
 He ſpoke.—The goddeſs thus reply'd—" My " ſon,

" 'Tis time the buſineſs of the day were done;
 " Enjoy what thou demand'ſt—up yonder tree
 " Climb expeditious, that the crowd may ſee;
 " This flag, the ſignal to begin, hang out,
 " And quell the tumult of the rabble rout. [gaze,
 " But ſtay—methinks, while round the field I
 " Amid the various claimants for the bays,
 " One fav'rite bard eſcapes my notice—ſay,
 " My dear Melpomene, on ſuch a day,
 " Why is not thy beloved Shenſtone here?"
 The muſe was ſilent—fobb'd—and dropp'd a tear.
 And now the trumpet's ſound, by Fame's command,

Proclaims the hour of ſtarting is at hand.
 Now round the goal the various heroes preſs,
 While hope and fear alternately poſſeſs
 Each anxious-breast! in order here they riſe,
 And panting ſtand impatient for the prize:
 Scarce can they wait till Derrick takes his place,
 And waves the flag, as ſignal for the race.
 But, lo!—a crowd upon the plain appear,
 With Deſcaizeau ſlow-pace in the rear!
 Maſon and Thompſon, Ogilvy and Hayes,
 And he whoſe hand has pluck'd a ſprig of bays
 (a) On Rhætia's barren hills—onward they move;
 But now too late their various pow'rs to prove,
 Some future day may fair occaſion yield
 'To weigh their ſev'ral merits in the field:
 For ſee! the bards with expectation riſe,
 Stand ſtrip'd, and ready for the glorious ſtrife;

And monarch Derrick would attempt in vain
 Their furious ardour longer to refrain.

The flag diſplay'd, promiſcuous forth they bound, [ground;

(b) And ſhake with clatt'ring feet the powder'd
 Equal in flight there two diſpute the race,
 With envious ſtrife, and meature pace for pace.
 Straight all is uproar and tumultuous din;
 This tumbles down, another breaks his ſhin; }
 That (c) ſwears his puffing neighbour ſtinks of gin.
 Each jostles each, a wrangling, madding train,
 While loud, To Order, Derrick calls in vain.
 Stuck faſt in mire here ſome deſponding lay,
 And, grinning, yield the glories of the day.
 For, maugre all primeval bards have ſung,
 Steep is the road to Fame, and clogg'd with dung.
 Borne on the wings of Hope now Murphy flies,
 Vain hope! for Fate the wiſh'd-for boon denies;
 Arriv'd, where ſcavengers, the night before,
 Had left their gleanings from the common ſtore,
 With head retort'd, as he fearful ſpy'd
 The giant Churchill thund'ring at his ſide,
 Sudden he tript, and, piteous to tell!
 Prone in the filth the hapleſs poet fell (d).

' Diſtanc'd by G---!' roars out a ruſtic 'ſquire,
 ' He muſt give out, thus ſous'd in dung and mire.'
 Lord M--- replies, I'll hold you ſix to ten,
 ' Spite of the t---d, he'll riſe and run again.'

A burſt of laughter echoes all around, [ground,
 While, ſputt'ring dirt, and ſcrabbling from the
 ' Ceafe, fools, your mirth, nor ſneer at my diſgrace;
 ' This curſed bog, not Churchill, won the race;
 ' And ſure, who ſuch diſaſters can foreſee,
 ' Muſt be a greater conjurer than me.'

While Churchill, careleſs, triumphs in his fall,
 Up to the gulf his jaded rivals crawl;
 Here ſome the watchful harpies on the ſhore
 Plunge in—ah! deſtin'd to return no more!—
 While others wond'ring, view them as they ſink,
 And fear'd, ſtand quiv'ring on the dreadful brink.
 Now rous'd the hero by the trumpet's ſound,
 Turns from his rueful foe, and ſares around;
 No bard he views behind—but all have paſt
 Him, heedleſs of their flight, and now the laſt.

(b) Leſt ſome malevolent critic, reviewing critic, or critical reader (as all readers, now-a-days, are critics), ſhould tax the auhor with plagiarism, he thinks it prudent to enter his caveat, by declaring he bad that famous line of Virgil in his eye,

Quadrupedante putrem ſonitu quatut ungulæ campum,

with this difference, that his animals have four feet, and theſe but two.

(c) Many of our readers cannot but remember, in a late literary quarrel, how the authors attacked one another for frequenting brotels, ſmoking, and dram-drinking, to which this circumſtance alludes.

(d) The very ſame miſfortune happens to Oilean A- jax, in the Iliad, who alſo makes a ſpeech to the ſame effect:

Accurſed Fate, the conqueſt I forego,
 A mortal I, a goddeſs was my foe!
 She urg'd her fav'rite on the rapid way;
 And Pallas, not Ulyſſes, won the day.

A noble precedent, and ſufficient for authorizing ſo low an incident in this poem.

Stung at the thought with double force he springs,
Rage gives him strength, and emulation wings :
The ground regain'd—' Stand clear,' he sternly said,

• Who bars my passage, horror on his head !'
Unhappy Dapper ! doom'd to meet thy fate,
Why heard'st thou not the menace ere too late !
Fir'd with disdain, he spurn'd the witting's breech,
And headlong hurl'd him in Oblivion's ditch ;
Then instant bounding high with all his main,
O'erleap'd its utmost bounds, and scour'd along the plain.

Sour critics, frowning, view'd him as he fled ;
Spite bit her nails, and Dulness scratch'd her head.
The gulf once past, no obstacle remains,
Smooth is the path, 'midst flow'r-enamel'd plains ;
Unrival'd now, with joyful speed he flies,
Performs the destin'd race, and claims the prize.
Fame gives the chaplet, while the tuneful Nine
Th' acknowledg'd victor hail in notes divine.

Smollet stood grumbling by the fatal ditch ;
Hill call'd the Goddess whore, and Jones a bitch ;
Each curs'd the partial judgment of the day,
And, greatly disappointed, sneak'd away.

SONG.

WHEN'E'R to gentle Emma's praise
I tune my soft enamour'd lays,
When on the face so dear I prize,
I fondly gaze with love-sick eyes ;
" Say Damon," cries the smiling fair,
With modest and ingenuous air,
" Tell of this homely frame, the part
To which I owe your vanquish'd heart."

In vain my Emma would I tell
By what thy captive Damon fell ;
The swain who partial charms can see,
May own—but never lov'd like me !
Won by thy form and fairer mind,
So much my wishes are confin'd,
With lover's eyes so much I see,
Thy very faults are charms to me.

Emma to Damon, on finding his addresses not favoured by her friends, on account of his want of fortune.

Forbear, in pity, ah ! forbear
To sooth my ravish'd ear ;
Nor longer thus a love declare,
'Tis death for me to hear.

Too much, alas ! my tender heart
Does to thy suit incline,
Why then attempt to gain by art,
What is already thine ?

O ! let not, like the Grecian dame *,
My hapless fortune prove,
Who languish'd in too fierce a flame,
And died by too much love.

The Author being in company with Emma, and having no opportunity of expressing certain doubts he had conceived of her sincerity, conveys to her the following lines, as a device to know the sentiments of her heart.

* Semele.

Are all my flattering hopes at once betray'd,
And cold and faithless grown my nut-brow'd
maid ;

Have I so long indulg'd the pleasing smart,
And worn thy grateful image next my heart,
And must I thus at once all hopes resign,
When fix'd as fate, I fondly thought thee mine ?
Then go, irresolute—and dare to prove
To please proud friends, a rebel to thy love.

Perhaps, too long accustom'd to obtain,
My flattering views were ever false and vain !
Perhaps my Emma's lips, well skill'd in art,
Late breath'd a language foreign to her heart !
Perhaps the muse profanely does thee wrong,
† Weak my suspicions, and unjust my song !

Which ever is the cause, the truth proclaim,
And to that sentence here affix thy name ;
So shall we both be rescu'd from the fear
Which thou must have to tell, and I to hear ;
If thou art false—the muse shall vengeance take,
And blast the faithless sex, for Emma's sake.
If true—my wounds thy gentle voice shall heal,
And own me punish'd by the pangs I feel.
But O ! without disguise pronounce my fate,
Bless me with love, or curse me with thy hate !
Hearts soft as mine indifference cannot bear ;
Perfect my hopes, or plunge me in despair.

To Emma, doubting the Author's sincerity.

When misers cease to doat on gold,
When justice is no longer sold,
When female tongues their clack shall hush,
When modesty shall cease to blush ;
When parents shall no more controul,
The fond affections of the soul,
Nor force the sad reluctant fair,
Her idol from her heart to tear ;
For sordid interest to engage,
And languish in the arms of age ;
Then in this heart shall falsehood reign,
And pay thy kindness with disdain.
When friends severe as thine shall prove,
Propitious to ingenuous love ;
Bid thee in merit place affiance,
And think they're honour'd by th' alliance ;
And O ! when hearts as proud as mine,
Shall barely kneel at Piutus' shrine,
Forego my modest plea to fame,
Or own dull pow'r's superior claim,
When the bright sun no more shall bring,
The sweet return of annual spring,
When nature shall the change deplore,
And music fill the groves no more ;
Then in this heart shall falsehood reign,
And pay thy kindness with disdain.

But why from dearer objects rove,
Nor draw allusions whence I love ?

When my dear Emma's eyes shall be
As black as jet or ebony,

† After perusing the paper, Emma (as the reader may conjecture from the sequel) returned it to the Author, after having written her name with a pencil at the close of the following line : " Weak my suspicions and unjust my song."

And every froward tooth shall stand,
 As rang'd by Hemet's dext'rous hand;
 When her sweet face, deform'd by rage,
 No more shall every heart engage,
 When her soft voice shall cease to charm,
 Nor malice of its power disarm;
 When manners gentle and refin'd,
 No more speak forth her spotless mind;
 But the perfidious minx shall prove,
 A perjurd traitress to her love;
 Ther—nor till then—shall Damon be False to his vows, and false to thee.

An invitation to Emma, after marriage, to live in the country.

Come my dear girl, let's seek the peaceful vale,
 Where honour, truth, and innocence prevail;
 Let's fly thus curst town—a nest of slaves—
 Where fortune smiles not but on fools or knaves,
 Who merit claim proportion'd to their gold,
 And truth, and innocence, are bought and sold;
 An humble competence we have in store,
 Mere food and raiment— Kings can have no more!
 A glorious patriarchial life we'll lead,
 See the fruits ripen, and the lambkins feed:
 Frequent observe the labours of the spade,
 And joy to see each yearly toil repaid;
 In some sequester'd spot a bower shall stand,
 The fav'rite task of thy lov'd Damon's hand,
 Where the sweet woodbine clasps the curling
 vine,

Emblem of faithful love like your's and mine!
 Here will we sit when evening shades prevail,
 And hear the night-bird tell its plaintive tale,
 Till nature's voice shall summon us away,
 To gather spirits for th' approaching day,
 Then on thy breast I'll lay my weary head,
 A pillow softer than a monarch's bed.

THE SNOW-BALL.

A CANTATA.

RECITATIVE.

As Harriot wanton as the sportive roe,
 Was pelting Strephon with the new-fall'n snow;
 Th' eoa'mour'd youth, who'd long in vain ad-
 mir'd,

By every look and every gesture fir'd,
 While round his head the harmless bullets fly,
 Thus breathes his passion, prefac'd with a sigh.

AIR.

Cease my charmer, I conjure thee,
 Oh! cease this pastime, too severe;
 Though I burn, snow cannot cure me,
 Fix'd is the flame that rages here:
 Snow in thy hand its chillness loses,
 Each flake converts to glowing fire;
 Whilst thy cold breast all warmth refuses,
 Thus I by contraries expire.

RECITATIVE.

A humble distance thus to tell your pain,
 What should you meet but coldness and disdain?
 Reply'd the laughing fair—Observe the snow,
 The sun retir'd, broods o'er the vale below,
 But when approaching near he gilds the day,
 It owns the genial flame and melts away.

AIR.

Whining in this love-sick strain,
 Strephon you will sigh in vain;
 For your passion thus to prove,
 Moves my pity, not my love.
 Phœbus points you to the prize,
 Take the hint, be timely wife,
 Other arts, perhaps, may move,
 And ripen pity into love.

THE AUTHOR'S ADDRESS

EDWARD LOUBON

THE END OF THE WORLD

THE LIFE OF LOVIBOND.

OF the personal history of LOVIBOND, very few particulars are known, and those few have not been collected into a distinct narrative; but have been left to the common fate of oral and detached communication.

The life of a country gentleman, devoting part of his time to literature and poetry, cannot be expected to abound in events that merit extraordinary attention. The natural bent of his mind, and his pursuits, lead him to prefer the scenes of shade and silence; and his character is left to be judged of by posterity, rather from his writings, than from those trivial incidents of life, which he shares in common with the rest of mankind.

Little attention has been bestowed by the anonymous editor of his poems, in transmitting the incidents of his life, or in delineating his most observable particularities; probably because he held them to be little deserving of transmission to posterity.

The present account, therefore, may properly be considered rather as proportioned to the means of information, than to his estimation among his acquaintance, or his rank in poetry and literature.

Edward Lovibond was the son of ——— Lovibond, Esq. a gentleman of fortune, who had an estate in the neighbourhood of Hampton, in Middlesex. The year of his birth is not ascertained.

He received his education at Kingston upon Thames, under the Rev. Mr. Wooddeson, for whom he ever retained the most affectionate regard; and to whom he addressed some Verses after passing through Findon, Sussex, in 1768, and whom he has commemorated in the beautiful poem, on the converting the late Mr. Wooddeson's House at Kingston into a Poor house, &c.

“Mr. Wooddeson” says the editor of his poems, “was, in truth, one of those amiable beings whom none could know without loving. To the abilities of an excellent scholar, was united a mind so candid, so patient, so replete with universal benevolence, that it glowed in every action. His life was an honour to himself, to religion, to human nature. He preserved to his death such a simplicity of manners, as is rarely to be met with. He judged of the world by the standard of his own virtuous heart, and few men who had seen such length of days ever left it so little acquainted with it.”

It is uncertain whether he completed his studies at either of the universities, spent some years on the continent, or was entered in any of the Inns of Court in London; but his writings sufficiently show that he had the advantages of a polite and liberal education.

All that is known with certainty concerning him, is, that he passed the greater part of his life in the neighbourhood of Hampton, where he seems to have divided his time between the occupations of rural economy, the amusements of literature and poetry, and the gaieties of elegant society.

In 1753, when Moore began the periodical paper, called “The World,” and invited the wits of the age to join in it, Lovibond gave it his assistance, in conjunction with the Hon. Horace Walpole, the present Earl of Orford, Lord Chesterfield, Lord Corke, Sir David Dalrymple, afterwards Lord Hailes, Jenyns, Dr. Warton, Mr. Cambridge, &c.

On the 25th July 1754, his Tears of Old May-Day, written on a very remarkable event in our history, the reforming our style or calendar to the general usage of the rest of Europe, was introduced to the public in the 2d number of "The World," and read with universal approbation.

He continued, from time to time, to compose verses, chiefly on such incidents as occasionally arose in those societies of intimate acquaintance which he most frequented; but few of his pieces were prepared for the press by himself.

He died at his house near Hampton, August 25. 1775. He lived greatly beloved by those who best knew him; and died greatly lamented by an extensive and elegant acquaintance.

His poems being dispersed in the hands of his particular friends, for whose amusement and his own they were written; his only brother, Anthony Lovibond Collins, Esq. zealous for the reputation of a brother he affectionately loved, complied with their wishes to have them collected and preserved. The pieces selected by him for that purpose were printed in one volume, 12mo., 1785, with a preface by an anonymous editor, and a few lines inscribed by Miss G——, a very accomplished lady in that neighbourhood, to the memory of Lovibond. "The diffidence of this lady," says the preface, "though possessing the ability of writing with much taste and elegance, hath ever precluded the public from seeing her compositions; but as the author has addressed three of the pieces in this collection to her, under the title, "To Miss G." and as her's in reply, written several years ago, may serve better to elucidate his own, she hath, on this occasion, been pleased to permit them with the same signature, to be inserted with the poems of her deceased friend. They are now, reprinted from the edition, 1785, with some corrections communicated by a friend, in the "Monthly Review" for 1785, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry.

The character of Lovibond seems to have been very amiable and respectable. He possessed the social virtues in an eminent degree. The qualities of his heart and his head were equally remarkable. To the scholar and the wit he added every elegant attainment. His elegance and judgment were universally confessed. "He was an admirable scholar," says the editor of his poems; "of very amiable manners, and of universal benevolence; of which all his writings bear strong testimony."

As a poet, his Tears of Old May-Day, if he had written nothing else, entitles him to very considerable attention. Every part of his works displays the man of taste, the gentleman, and the scholar. He is a pleasing and elegant writer; though not a very animated or first-rate poet. His compositions bear evident traces of ability and ingenuity. They breathe the passions which he felt, and are seldom cold or inanimated. He writes with terseness and neatness; frequently with elevation and spirit. He unites delicacy of wit, and poetic fancy, with a pensive cast of thought, tenderness of sentiment, and a habit of moral reflection. He has more judgment and feeling, than strength of intellect, or fertility of invention. His sentiments are always manly and delicate; his conceptions are sometimes striking and forcible, and frequently distinguished by gay humour, lively wit, and pleasant satire. His diction is chaste and poetical; and his versification is easy and harmonious.

His Tears of Old May-Day, the most poetical and popular of his performances, is introduced by the following humorous paper, explanatory of the subject, in the "The World," No. 82.

"It is a received opinion among the politicians, that the spirit of liberty can never be too active under a constitution like ours. But though no lover of his country would desire to weaken this principle, which has more than once preserved the nation, yet he may lament the unfortunate application of it, when perverted to countenance party violence, and opposition to the most innocent measures of the legislature. The clamour against the alteration of the style seemed to be one of these instances. The alarm was given, and the most fatal consequences to our religion and government were immediately apprehended from it. This opinion gathered strength in its course, and received a tincture from the remains of superstition still prevailing in the counties most remote from town. I know several worthy gentlemen in the west, who lived many months under the daily apprehension of some dreadful visitation from pestilence or famine. The vulgar were almost every where persuaded that nature gave evident tokens of her disapproving these innovations. I do not indeed recollect that any blazing stars were seen to appear upon this occasion, or that armies were observed to be encountering in the skies; people probably concluding, that the great men who pretended to controul the sun in his course, would assume equal authority over the inferior constellations, and not suffer any aerial militia to assemble themselves in opposition to ministerial proceedings.

“The objection to this regulation, as favouring a custom established among Papists, was not heard indeed with the same regard as formerly, when it actually prevented the legislature from passing a bill of the same nature; yet many a president of a corporation club very eloquently harangued upon it, as introductory to the doctrine of transubstantiation, making no doubt that fires would be kindled again at Smithfield before the conclusion of the year. The popular clamour has at last happily subsided, and shared the general fate of those opinions which derive their support from imagination, not reason.

In this exquisite performance, the poet creates in our imagination an ideal personage, in circumstances of distress, which, though imaginary, powerfully awakens all our tendernefs. The attributes of Old May-Day are finely imagined, her character and employments are admirably delineated, and her complaints are expressed with the strongest touches of genuine pathos; the thoughts are elegant and classical; the popular allusions are apposite and beautiful; the natural description is discriminate and graphical; the diction is animated and poetical; and the versification is at once easy and forcible, and flows with a plaintive melody, which has only been surpassed by the inimitable “Church-yard Elegy” of Gray. Thus the tale of this ideal personage comes to us possessed of all those external recommendations, that allure the attention and captivate the heart. The English language probably cannot boast a finer example of the power of poetry, than The Tears of Old May-Day. The happy union which it exhibits of genius and of art, are so truly admirable, that it may be almost pronounced inimitable.

His Julia's printed Letter to Lord B—, does equal credit to his sensibility and genius. It resembles, in its tone and contexture, though the characters of the parties are very different, that of “Eloisa to Abelard.” It is alike descriptive of a feeling mind, agitated with contending passions. We meet with the same smoothness of numbers, vivid colours, energy of sentiment, and warmth of expression. Its principal defect, is the want of variety, both of sentiment and expression.

His elegies abound in tender sentiments and moral reflections, interspersed with the flowers of the imagination, expressed in easy flowing versification, which will be perused with pleasure, though they be not enriched with the poetical elegance of Gray. The elegy on Rural Sports breathes a spirit of humanity and poetry, that does honour both to his heart and his understanding. His Mulberry Tree, an allegorical tale, is equally remarkable for fertility of invention, felicity of expression, and propriety of application. Garrick and Dr. Johnson are characterized with equal happiness and skill. His Odes, though not in the first class of lyric compositions, are written with considerable ardour of spirit, and command of language. The Ode to Captivity is entitled to a greater share of praise for conception and sentiment, than for diction and harmony. His verses on the converting Mr. Wooddeson's House at Kingston, into a Poor-house, deserve great praise, for tenderness of sentiment, and beauty and energy of expression. His lines On Mr. Brown's alterations at Clermont, are sprightly; and the allusion to a fine lady dressed with greater elegance, and less affectation, is well imagined and very happily preserved. Of his amatory poems, the thoughts are pure and simple, and the versification is elegant and easy. His songs, addresses, complimentary verses; and other light and sportive effusions of his muse, will be read with pleasure; but they require no distinct examination or particular criticism.

THE WORKS OF LOVIBOND.

P O E M S.

THE TEARS OF OLD MAY-DAY.

LED by the jocund train of vernal hours
And vernal airs, up rose the gentle May;
Blushing the rose, and blushing rose the flow'rs
That sprung spontaneous in her genial ray.

Her locks with heaven's ambrosial dews were bright,
And am'rous zephyrs flutter'd on her breast:
With ev'ry shifting gleam of morning light,
The colours shifted of her rainbow vest.

Imperial ensigns grac'd her smiling form,
A golden key, and golden wand the bore;
This charms to peace each fullen eastern storm,
And that unlocks the summer's copious store.

Onward in conscious majesty she came,
The grateful honours of mankind to taste:
To gather fairest wreaths of future fame,
And blend fresh triumphs with her glories past.

Vain hope! No more in choral bands unite
Her virgin vot'ries, and at early dawn,
Sacred to May and love's mysterious rite,
Brush the light dew-drops * from the spangled lawn.

To her no more Augusta's † wealthy pride
Pours the full tribute from Potof's mine:
Nor fresh-blown garlands village maids provide,
A purer off'ring at her rustic shrine.

No more the Maypole's verdant height around
To valour's games th' ambitious youth advance;
No merry bells and tabor's sprightlier sound
Wake the loud carol, and the sportive dance.

Sudden in pensive sadness droop'd her head,
Faint on her cheeks the blushing crimson dy'd---
"O! chaste victorious triumphs, whither fled?
"My maiden honours, whither gone?" she cry'd.

* Alluding to the country custom of gathering
May-dew.

† The plate garlands of London.

Ah! once to fame and bright dominion born,
The earth and smiling ocean saw me rise,
With time coeval and the star of morn,
The first, the fairest daughter of the skies.

Then, when at heav'n's prolific mandate sprung
The radiant beam of new-created day,
Celestial harps, to airs of triumph strung,
Hail'd the glad dawn, and angels call'd me
May.

Space in her empty regions heard the sound,
And hills, and dales, and rocks, and vallies rung;
The sun exulted in his glorious round,
And shouting planets in their courses sung.

For ever then I led the constant year;
Saw youth, and joy, and love's enchanting
wiles;
Saw the mild graces in my train appear,
And infant beauty brighten in my smiles.

No winter frown'd. In sweet embrace ally'd,
Three sister seasons danc'd th' eternal green;
And Spring's retiring softness gently vy'd
With Autumn's blush, and Summer's lofty mien.

Too soon, when man profan'd the blessings giv'n
And vengeance arm'd to blot a guilty age,
With bright Aftrea to my native heav'n
I fled, and flying saw the deluge rage;

Saw bursting clouds eclipse the noontide beams,
While founding billows from the mountains
roll'd,
With bitter waves polluting all my streams,
My nectar'd streams, that flow'd on sands of gold.

Then vanish'd many a sea-girt isle and grove,
Their forests floating on the wat'ry plain:
Then, fam'd for arts and laws deriv'd from Jove,
My Atalantis * sunk beneath the main.

* See Plato.
O o iij

No longer bloom'd primæval Eden's bow'rs,
Nor guardian dragons watch'd th' Hesperian
sleep :

With all their fountains, fragrant fruits and flow'rs
Torn from the continent to glut the deep.

No more to dwell in sylvan scenes I deign'd,
Yet oft descending to the languid earth,
With quick'ning pow'rs the fainting ma's sus-
tain'd,

And wak'd her slumb'ring atoms into birth.

And ev'ry echo taught my raptur'd name,
And ev'ry virgin breath'd her am'rous vows,
And precious wreaths of rich immortal fame,
Show'r'd by the muses, crown'd my lofty brows.

But chief in Europe and in Europe's pride,
My Albion's favour'd realms I rose ador'd ;
And pour'd my wealth, to other climes deny'd ;
From Amalthea's horn with plenty stor'd.

Ah ! me ! for now a younger rival claims
My ravi'sh'd honours, and to her belong
My choral dances, and victorious games,
To her my garlands and triumphal song.

O say what yet untasted beauties flow,
What purer joys await her gentler reign ?
Do lilies fairer, vi'lets sweeter blow ?
And warbles Philomela a softer strain ?

Do morning suns in ruddier glory rise ?
Does ev'ning fan her with serener gales ?
Do clouds drop fatness from the wealthier skies,
Or wantons plenty in her happier vales ?

Ah ! no : the blunted beams of dawning light
Skirt the pale orient with uncertain day ;
And Cynthia, riding on the cas of night,
Through clouds embattled faintly wings her way.

Pale, immature, the blighted verdure springs,
Nor mounting juices feed the swelling flow'r ;
Mute all the groves, nor Philomela sings
When silence listens at the midnight hour.

Nor wonder, man, that nature's bashful face,
And op'ning charms her rude embraces fear :
Is she not sprung from April's wayward race,
The sickly daughter of th' unrip'n'd year ?

With show'rs and sunshine in her sickle eyes,
With hollow smiles proclaiming treach'rous peace,

With blushes, hatb'ring, in their thin disguise,
The blaits that riot on the Spring's increase ?

Is this the fair invested with my spoil
By Europe's laws, and senâtes' stern command ?
Ungen'rous Europe ! let me fly thy soil,
And wa'st my treasures to a grateful land ;

Again revive, on Asia's dropping shore,
My Daphne's groves, or Lycia's ancient plain ;
Again to Afric's sultry sands restore
Embow'ring shades, and Lybian Ammon's fane :

Or haste to northern Zembla's savage coast,
There hush to silent elemental strife ;

Brood o'er the regions of eternal froit,
And swell her barren womb with heat and life.

Then Britain—Here she ceas'd. Indignant grief,
And parting pangs her fault'ring tongue sup-prest :

Veil'd in an amber cloud she sought relief,
And tears and silent anguish told the rest.

DEDICATION

To the Rev. Mr. Wooddeson, of Kingston upon Thames, and the Ladies of his Neighbourhood.

O THOU who sit'st in academic schools,
Lest teaching than inspiring ancient art,
Thy own example nobler than your rules,
Thy blameless life, best lesson for the heart.

And ye, who dwell in peaceful groves around,
Whose voice, whose verse enchants, harmonious maids !

Who mix the lyre with harps of Cambrian strain ;
A mournful muse, ah ! shelter in your shades !

Nor you she rivals, nor such magic strain
As rescu'd Eloïse from oblivion's sleep ;
Enough, if one the meekest of your train,
Poor Julia ! cries,—and turns aside to weep !—

JULIA'S PRINTED LETTER

TO LORD B——

—AND dar'st thou then, insulting lord, demand
A friendly answer from this trembling hand ?
Perish the thought ! shall this unguarded pen
Still trust its frailties with the frauds of men ?
To one, and one alone, again impart
The soft effusions of a melting heart !—
No more thy lips my tender page shall stain,
And print false kisses, dream't sincere in vain ;
No more thy eyes with sweet surprisè pursue,
Love's secret myteries there unveil'd to you.
Demand'st thou still an answer ?—let it be
An answer worthy vengeance, worthy me !—
Hear it in public characters relate
An ill star'd passion, and capricious fate !
Yes, public let it stand ;—to warn the maid
From her that fell, less vanquish'd than betray'd :
Guiltless, yet doom'd with guilty pangs to groan,
And expiate other's treasons, not her own :
A race of shame in honour's paths to run,
Still virtue's follower, yet by vice undone ;
Such free complaint to injur'd love belongs,
Yes, tyrant, read, and know me by my wrongs ;
Know thy own treacheries, bard'to general
view,

Yes, traitor, read, and reading tremble too !

What vice would perpetrate and fraud disguise,
I come to blaze it to a nation's eyes ;
I come—ah ! wretch thy swelling rage controul,
Was he not once the idol of thy soul ?—
True,—by his guilt thy tortur'd bosom bleeds,
Yet spare his blushes, for 'tis love that pleads :—
Respecting him, respect thy infant flame,
Proclaim the treason, hide the traitor's name !—

Enough to honour and revenge be giv'n,
This truth reserve for conscience and for heav'n!

Talk'st thou, ingrate, of friendship's holy pow'rs?
What binds the tiger, and the lamb be ours!
This cold, this frozen bosom, can'st thou dream
Senseless to love, will soften to esteem?
What means thy proffer'd friendship?—but to prove [love—

Thou wilt not hate her, whom thou can'st not Remember thee!—repeat that sound again!
My heart applauding echoes to the strain;
Yes, till this heart forgets to beat, and grieve,
Live there thy image—but detested live!
Still swell my rage—unchecked by time or fate,
Nor waken memory but to kindle hate!—

Enter thy treacherous bosom, enter deep,
Hear conscience call, while flatt'ring passions
sleep!—

Impartial search, and tell thy boasted claim
To love's indulgence and to virtuous fame!
Where harbour honour, justice, faith, and truth,
Bright forms, whose dazzling semblance caught my youth.

How could I doubt what fairest seem'd and best
Should build its mansion in a noble breast?
How doubt such generous virtues lodg'd in thine
That felt them glowing, tender maid, in mine?
Boast not of trophies from my fall achiev'd,
Boast not, deceiver, in this soul deceiv'd;
Easy the traitor wins an open heart,
Artless itself, and unsuspecting art:
Not by superior wiles, successful proves,
But fond credulity in her that loves.—

Blush, shameless grandeur, blush!—shall Britain's peer,

Daring all crimes, not dare to be sincere?—
His fraud in virtue's fairest likeness paint,
And hide his nobleness in base constraint.
What charms were mine to tempt thy guilty fires!
What wealth, what honours from illustrious fires!
Can virtue's simple spoils adorn thy race?
Shall annals mark a village maid's disgrace?
Ev'n the sad secret to thyself confid',
Sleeps, nor thou dar'st divulge it to mankind:
When bursting tears my inward anguish speak,
When paleness spreads my sometimes flushing
cheek,

When my frame trembles with convulsive strife,
And spirits flutter on the verge of life,
When to my heart the ebbing pulse is driv'n,
And eyes throw faint accusing beams to heav'n,
Still from the world those swelling sighs suppress,
Those sorrows streaming in one faithful breast;
Explain to her, from others hide thy care, [spair,
Thought nature's weakness, and not love's de-
The sprightly youth in gloomy languor pine,
My portion misery, yet not triumph thine—
Ah! whence derives thy sex its barbarous powers
To spoil the sweetness of our virgin hours?

Why leave me not, where first I met your eye,
A simple flower to bloom in shades, and die?
Where sprightly morn on downy pinions rose,
And evening lull'd me to a deep repose?
Sharing pure joys, at least divine content,
The choicest treasure for mere mortals meant.
Ah! wherefore poisoning moments sweet as these,
Essay on me thy fatal arts to please?

Destin'd, if prosperous, for sublimer charms,
To court proud wealth, and greatness to thy arms
How many a brighter, many a fairer dame,
Fond of her prize had fann'd thy sickle flame?
With livelier moments sooth'd thy vacant mind?
Easy possess'd thee, easy too resign'd—
Chang'd but her object, passion's willing slave,
Nor felt a wound to fester to the grave—
Oh! had I, conscious of thy fierce desires,
But half consenting, star'd contagious fires,
But half reluctant, heard thy vows explain'd,
This vanquish'd heart had suffer'd, not com-plain'd—

But ah, with tears and crowded sighs to sue
False passion's dress in colours meant for true;
Artful assume confusion's sweet disguise,
Meet my coy virtues with dejected eyes,
Steal their sweet language that no words impart,
And give me back an image of my heart.

This, this was treachery, fated best to share
Hate from my bosom, and from thine despair—
Yet unrelenting still the tyrant cries,
Heedless of pity's voice and beauty's sighs,
“That pious frauds the wisest, best, approve,
“And Heav'n but smiles at perjuries in love.”—
No—'tis the villain's plea, his poor pretence,
To seize the trembling prey that wants defence.

No—'tis the base sensation cowards feel,
The wretch that trembles at the brave man's steel;

Fierce and undaunted to a sex appears
That breathes its vengeance but in sighs and tears,
That helpless sex, by nature's voice address'd
To lean its weakness on your firmer breast,
Protection pleads in vain—th' ungenerous slave
Insults the virtue he was born to save.

What! shall the lightest promise lips can feign
Bind man to man in honour's sacred chain?
And oaths to us not sanctify th' accord,
Not Heav'n attested, and Heav'n's awful Lord?
Why various laws for beings form'd the same?
Equal from one indulgent hand we came,
For mutual bliss that each assign'd its place,
With manly vigour temp'ring female grace,
Depriv'd our gentler intercourse, explain
Your solitary pleasures' sullen reign;
What tender joys sit brooding o'er your store,
How sweet ambition's slumbers gorg'd with gore!
'Tis our's th' unocial passions to controul,
Pour the glad balm that heals the wounded soul;
From wealth, from power's delusive restless dreams
To lure your fancy to diviner themes—
Confess at length your fancied rights you draw
From force superior, and not nature's law:
Yet know; by us those boasted arms prevail,
By native gentleness, not man we fail;
With brave revenge a tyrant's blood to spill
Possessing all the power—we want the will.

Still if you glory in the lion's force,
Come, nobly emulate that lion's course!
From guarded herds he vindicates his prey;
Not lurks in fraudful thickets from the day;
While man, with snares to cheat, with wiles perplex,

Weakens already weak too soft a sex;
In laws, in customs, fashion's fetters binds,
Relaxes all the nerves that brace our minds,

Then, lordly savage, rends the captive heart
First gain'd by treachery, then tam'd by art.—

Are these reflections then that love inspires?
Is bitter grief the fruit of fair desires?
From whose example could I dream to find
A claim to curse, perhaps to wrong mankind?
Ah! long I strove to burst th' enchanting tie,
And form'd resolves, that ev'n in forming die;
Too long I linger'd on the shipwreck'd coast,
And ey'd the ocean where my wealth was lost!
In silence wept, scarce venturing to complain,
Still to my heart dissembled half my pain—
Ascrib'd my sufferings to its fears, not you;
Beheld you treacherous, and then wish'd you true;
Sooth'd by those wishes, by myself deceiv'd,
I fondly hop'd, and what I hop'd believ'd.—
Cruel! to whom? Ah! whither should I flee,
Friends, fortune, fame, deserted all for thee!
On whom but you my fainting breath repose?
With whom but you deposit all its woes?—
To whom but you explain its stifled groan?
And live for whom? but love and you alone?
What hand to probe my bleeding heart be found?
What hand to heal?—but his that gave the wound?—

O dreadful chaos of the ruin'd mind!
Lost to itself, to virtue, humankind!
From earth, from heaven, a meteor flaming wide,
Link'd to no system, to no world ally'd;
A blank of nature, vanish'd every thought
That nature, reason, that experience taught,
Past, present, future trace, alike destroy'd,
Where love alone can fill the mighty void:
That love on unreturning pinions flown
We grasp a shade, the noble substance gone—
From one ador'd and once adoring, dream
Of friendship's tenderness—ev'n cold esteem
(Humble our vows) rejected with disdain,
Ask a last conference, but a parting strain,
More suppliant still, the wretched suit advance,
Plead for a look, a momentary glance,
A letter, token—on destruction's brink
We catch the feeble plank of hope, and sink.—

In those dread moments, when the hov'ring flame
Scarce languish'd into life, again you came,
Pursued again a too successful theme,
And dry'd my eyes, with your's again to stream;
When treach'rous tears your venial faults con-
fess'd,

And half dissembled, half excus'd the rest,
To kindred griefs taught pity from my own,
Sighs I return'd, and echo'd groan for groan;
Yourself reproaches flinging mine, approv'd,
And much I credited, for much I lov'd.

Not long the soul this doubtful dream prolongs,
If prompt to pardon, not forget its wrongs,
It scorns the traitor, and with conscious pride
Scorns a base self, deserting to his side;
Great by misfortune, greater by despair,
Its heaven once lost, rejects an humbler care,
To drink the dregs of languid joys disdain,
And flies a passion but perceiv'd from pains;
Too just the rights another claims to steal,
Too good its feelings to with virtue feel,
Perhaps too tender or too fierce, my soul
Disclaiming half the heart, demands the whole.—

I blame thee not, that, fickle as thy race,
New loves invite thee, and the old efface,
That cold, insensible, thy soul appears
To virtue's smiles, to virtue's vail tears;
But ah! an heart whose tenderness you knew,
That offer'd heaven, but second vows to you,
In fond presumption that securely play'd,
Securely slumber'd in your friendly shade,
Whose every weakness, every sigh to share,
The powers that haunt the perjurd, heard you swear;

Was this an heart you wantonly resign'd
Victim to scorn, to ruin, and mankind?
Was this an heart—O shame of honour, truth,
Of blushing candour, and ingenious youth!
What means thy pity? what can it reiterate
The grave that yawns till general doom's no
more,

As soon shall quicken, as my torments cease,
Rock'd on the lap of innocence and peace,
As smiles and joy this pensive brow invade,
And smooth the traces by affliction made;
Flames once extinguish'd virtue's lamp divine,
And visits honour, a deserted shrine!
No, wretch, too long on passion's ocean tost,
Not heaven itself restores the good you lost;
The form exists not that thy fancy dream'd,
A fiend pursues thee that an angel seem'd;
Impassive to the touch of reason's ray
His fairy phantom melts in clouds away;
Yet take my pardon in my last farewell,
The wounds you gave, ah cruel! never feel!
Fated like me to court and curse thy fate,
To blend in dreadful union love and hate;
Chiding the present moment's slumb'ring haste,
To dread the future, and deplore the past;
Like me condemn th' effect, the cause approve,
Renounce the lover, and retain the love.
Yes, love—ev'n now in this ill-fated hour,
An exile from thy joys, I feel thy power.
The sun to me his noontide blaze that shrouds
In browner horrors than when veil'd in clouds,
The moon, faint light that melancholy throws,
The streams that murmur, yet not court repose,
The breezes sickening with my mind's disease,
And vallies laughing to all eyes but these,
Proclaim thy absence, love, whose beam alone
Lighted my morn with glories not its own.
O thou of generous passions purest, best!
Soon as thy flame shut rapture to my breast,
Each pulse expanding, trembled with delight,
And aching vision drank thy lovely light,
A new creation brighten'd to my view,
Nurs'd in thy smiles the social passions grew,
New strung, the thrilling nerves harmonious
rose,

And beat sweet unison to others woes,
Slumb'ring no more a Lethe's lazy flood
In generous currents swell'd the sprightly blood,
No longer now to partial streams confin'd,
Spread like an ocean, and embrac'd mankind,
No more centering in itself the blaze
The soul diffus'd benevolence's rays,
Kindled on earth, pursued the ethereal road,
In hallow'd flames ascended to its God.—
Yes, love, thy star of generous influence cheers
Our gloomy dwelling in this vale of tears.

What! if a tyrant's blasting hand destroys
Thy swelling blossoms of expected joys,
Converts to poison what for life was given,
Thy manna dropping from its native heaven,
Still love victorious triumphs, still confess
The noblest transport that can warm the breast;
Yes traitor, yes, my heart to nature true,
Adores the passion, and detests but you.

ON REBUILDING COMBE-NEVILLE,

Near Kingston, Surrey, once the Seat of the famous King-making Earl of Warwick, and late in the Possession of the Family of Harvey.

YE modern domes that rise elate
O'er yonder prostrate walls,
In vain your hope to match the state
Of Neville's ancient halls.

Dread mansion! on thy Gothic tower
Were regal standards rais'd;
The rose of York, white virgin flower,
Or red Lancastria's blaz'd.

Warwick, high chief, whose awful word
Or shook, or fix'd the throne,
Spread here his hospitable board,
Or war'd in tilts alone.

When Combe her garter'd knights beheld
On barbed steeds advance,
Where ladies crown'd the tented field,
And love inspir'd the lance.

Historic heralds here array'd
Fair acts in gorgeous style,
But heroes toils were best repay'd
By bashful beauty's smile.—

So flourish'd Combe, and flourish'd long
With lords of bounteous soul;
Her walls still echoed to the song,
And mirth still drain'd her bowl.

And still her courts with footsteps meek
The fainting traveller press'd,
Still misery flush'd her faded cheek
At Harvey's genial feat.—

Lov'd feat, how oft, in childish ease,
Along thy woods I stray'd,
Now vent'rous climb'd embow'ring trees,
Now sported in their shade,

Along the hills the chase I led
With echoing hounds and horns,
And left for thee my downy bed,
Unplanted yet with thorns.

Now, languid with the noontide beams,
Explor'd thy * precious springs
That proudly flow †, like Susa's streams,
To temper cups for kings.

* Hampton-Court Palace is supplied with water from the springs on Combe Hills.

† "There Susa by Choapes' amber stream,
"The drink of none but kings." MILTON.

But soon, inspir'd with nobler powers,
I fought thy awful grove;
There frequent sooth'd my evening hours
That best deceiver love.

Each smiling joy was there, that springs
In life's delicious prime;
There young ambition plum'd his wings,
And mock'd the flight of time.—

There patriot passions fir'd my breast
With freedom's glowing themes,
And virtue's image rose confess
In bright Platonic dreams.—

Ah me! my dreams of harmless youth
No more thy walks invade,
The charm is broke by sober truth,
Thy fairy visions fade.—

No more unfast'nd with fear or guilt
Such hours of rapture smile,
Each airy fabric fancy built
Is vanish'd as thy pile!—

On Lady Pomfret's Presenting the University of Oxford with her Collection of Statues.

WELCOME again the reign of ancient arts!
Welcome fair modern days from Gothic night,
Though late, emerging, sun of science hail!
Whose glorious rays enlighten'd Greece and Rome,
Illustrious nations! their's was empire's feat,
Their's virtue, freedom, each enchanting grace;
Sculpture with them to bright perfection rose,
Sculpture, whose bold Promethæan hand inform'd
The stubborn mass with life—in fretted gold
Or yielding marble, to the raptur'd eye
Display'd the shining conclave of the skies,
And chiefs and sages gave the passions form,
And virtue shape corporeal: taught by her
The obedient brass dissolv'd;
In love's soft fires thy winning charms she stole,
Thou mild retreating Medicean fair.
She mark'd the flowing dryads lighter step,
The panting bosom, garments flowing loose,
And wanton tresses waving to the wind.—
Again by Pomfret's generous care, these stores
Of ancient fame revisit learning's seats,
Their old abode. O reverence learning's seats,
Ye beauteous arts! for know, by learning's
smiles

Ye grew immortal—Know, however fair
Sculpture and painting, fairer poetry
Your elder sister, from the Aonian mount,
Imagination's fruitful realm, supply'd
The rich material of your lovely soil.
Her fairy forms, poetic fancy first
Peopled the hills, and vales, and fabled groves
With shapes celestial, and by fountain side
Saw tauns with wanton satyrs lead the dance
With meek-ey'd naïds; saw your Cyprian queen
Ascending from the ocean's wave;
Poetic fancy in Mæonian song
Pictur'd immortal Jove, ere Phidias' hands
Sublime with all his thunders form'd the god.
Here then uniting with your kindred art,
Majestic Grecian sculpture deign to dwell,

Here shades of Academe again invite,
 Athenian philosophic shades, and here
 Ye Roman forms, a nobler Tyber flows.
 Come, Pomfret, come, of rich munificence
 Partake the fame, though candid blushes rise,
 And modest virtues flunn the blaze of day.
 Pomfret, not all thy honours, splendid train,
 Not the bright coronet that binds thy brow,
 Not all thy lovely offspring, radiant queens
 On beauty's throne, shall consecrate thy praise
 Like science, boasting in thy genial beam
 Increasing stores: in these embowering shades
 Stands the fair tablet of eternal fame;
 There memory's adamant pen records
 Her sons; but each illustrious female's name
 In golden characters engrav'd, defies
 Envy and time, superior to their rage.—
 Pomfret shall live, the generous Pomfret join'd
 With Caroline, and martial Edward's queen,
 And great Eliza, regal names, like thee
 Smiling on arts and learning's sons they reign'd.—
 And see where Westmorland adorns the train
 Of learning's princely patrons! lo, I see
 A new Pantheon rise as that of old
 Famous, nor founded by ignobler hands;
 Though thine, Agrippa, sway'd the helm of Rome:

I see enshrin'd majestic awful forms,
 Chiefs, legislators, patriots, beauties, gods.
 Not him by superstitious fears ador'd
 With barbarous sacrifice and frantic zeal,
 Yet not uncelebrated nor unsung, for oft
 Thou, slumbring Cupid, with inverted torch
 Betokening mildest fires, shall hear the sighs
 Of virtuous love-sick youths. You too shall reign,
 Celestial Venus, though with chaster rites,
 Address'd with vows from purer votaries heard.

ON RURAL SPORTS.

THE sun wakes jocund—all of life, who breathe
 In air, or earth, and lawn, and thicket rove,
 Who swim the surface, or the deep beneath,
 Swell the full chorus of delight and love.

But what are ye, who cheer the bay of hounds,
 Whose levell'd thunder frightens morn's repose,
 Who drag the net, whose hook insidious wounds
 A writhing reptile, type of mightier woes?

I see ye come, and havoc loose the reins,
 A general groan the general anguish speaks,
 The stately stag falls butcher'd on the plains,
 The dew of death hangs clammy on his cheeks.

Ah! see the pheasant fluttering in the brake,
 Green, azure, gold, but undistinguish'd gore!
 Yet spare the tenants of the silver lake!
 —I call in vain—They gasp upon the shore.

A yet ignoble band is guarded round
 With dogs of war—the spurning bull their prize;
 And now he bellows, humbled to the ground;
 And now they sprawl in howlings to the skies.

You too must feel their missile weapon's power,
 Whose clarion charms the midnight's sullen
 air;

Thou the morn's harbinger, must mourn the hour
 * Vigil to fasts, and penitence, and prayer.

Must fatal wars of human avarice, wage
 For milder conflicts, love their palm design'd?
 Now sheath'd in steel, must rival reason's rage,
 Deal mutual death, and emulate mankind?

Are these your sovereign joys, creation's lords?
 Is death a banquet for a godlike soul?
 Have rigid hearts no sympathizing chords
 For concord, order, for th' harmonious whole?

Nor plead necessity, thou man of blood!
 Heaven tempers power with mercy—Heaven revere!

Yet slay the wolf for safety, lamb for food;
 But shorten misery's pangs, and drop a tear!

Ah! rather turn, and breath this evening gale,
 Uninjur'd, and uninjuring nature's peace.
 Come, draw best nectar from the foaming pail,
 Come, pen the fold, and count the flock's increase!

See pasturing heifers with the bull, who wields
 Yet budding horns, and wounds alone the soil!
 Or see the panting spaniel try the fields
 While bursting coveys mock his wanton toil!

Now feel the steed with youth's elastic force
 Spontaneous bound, yet bear thy kind controul;
 Nor mangle all his sinews in the course,
 And fainting, staggering, lash him to the goal!

Now sweetly pensive, bending o'er the stream,
 Mark the gay, floating myriads, nor molest
 Their sports, their slumbers, but inglorious dream
 Of evil fled and all creation blest!

Or else, beneath thy porch, in social joy
 Sit and approve thy infant's virtuous haste,
 Humanity's sweet tones while all employ
 To lure the wing'd domestics to repast!

There smiling see a fop in swelling state,
 The turkey strut with valour's red pretence,
 And duck row on with waddling honest gait,
 And geese mistake solemnity for sense!

While one with front erect in simple pride
 Full firmly treads, his consort waits his call,
 Now deal the copious barley, wast it wide,
 That each may taste the bounty meant for all!

Yon bashful songsters with retorted eye
 Pursue the grain, yet wheel contracted flight,
 While he, the holder sparrow, scorns to fly,
 A son of freedom claiming Nature's right.

Liberal to him; yet still the wasted grain,
 Choicest for those of modest worth, dispense,
 And blessing Heaven that wakes their grateful
 strain,

Let Heaven's best joy be thine, Benevolence!

While flocks soft bleatings, echoing high and clear,
 The neigh of steeds, responsive o'er the heath,
 Deep lowings sweeter melt upon thy ear
 Than screams of terror and the groans of death.

Yet sounds of woe delight a giant brood:
 Fly then mankind, ye young, ye helpless old!

For not their fury, a consuming flood,
Distinguishes the shepherd, drowns the fold.

But loosen once thy gripe, avenging law!
Eager on man, a nobler chafe, they start;
Now from a brother's side a dagger draw,
Now sheath it deeper in a virgin's heart.

See as they reach ambition's purple fruits
Their reeking hands in nation's carnage dyed!
No longer bathing in the blood of brutes,
They swim to empire in a human tide.

But see him, see the fiend that others stung,
With scorpion conscience lash himself, the last!
See festering in the bosom where they sprung
The fury passions that laid nature waste?

Behold the self-tormentor drag his chains,
And weary heaven with many a fruitless groan!
By pining fasts, by voluntary pains,
Revening nature's cause, he pleads his own.

Yet prostrate, suppliant to the throne above,
He calls down heaven in thunders to pursue Heaven's fancied foes—O God of peace and love,

The voice of thunder is no voice from you!

Mistaken mortal! 'tis that God's decree
To spare thy own, nor shed another's blood:
Heaven breathes benevolence, to all, to thee;
Each being's bliss consummates general good.

ODE TO CAPTIVITY.

WRITTEN IN THE LAST WAR.

O STERN captivity! from Albion's land
Far, far, avert the terrors of thy rod!
O wave not o'er her fields thy flaming brand!
O crush not freedom, fairest child of God!—
Bring not from thy Gallic shore
The galling fetters, groaning oar!
Bring not hither virtue's bane,
Thy sister superstition's train!
O spare from sanguine rites the silver floods!
Nor haunt with shapes obscene our unpolluted
woods!—

Is yet too weak, rapacious power, thy throne?
While the chain'd continent thy vassal waits,
The Rhine, the Danube, and the sounding Rhone,
Proclaim thy triumphs through an hundred States.
See Valencia's smiling vales
Court'd for thee by ocean's gales!
Through * yawning vaults on Tagus' streams,
Thine revenge's dagger gleams:
Thy fury bursts on Rome's devoted head,
In vain the Scipios lived, the Decii, Cata bled?
Be these thy bounds—whose laws with monarch's reign,
To this fair isle how impotent thy hate!
Where Pitt, so righteous Heaven and George ordain,
In wisdom guides the thunder of the state.

* The late conspiracy against the Portuguese Government was planned amid the ruins of that unfortunate capital.

That thunder shook on * Afric's shore,
The howling wild where lions roar;
In † western worlds its awful powers
Sunk astonish'd Bourbon's towers;
That thunder sounding o'er the Celtic main,
Roll'd to Lutetia's walls along the affrighted Seine.

Daughters of Albion! strew his paths with flowers,
O wake for him the lute's harmonious chord!
His name be echoed in your festal bowers,
Who guards Britannia from a foreign lord!
Happy fair, who seated far
From haughty conquerors, barbarous war,
Have heard alone in tragic songs
Of cities storm'd and virgins wrongs,
There felt the daughters, parents, consorts groan,
And wept historic woes, unpractis'd in your own?

Have you not heard how Sion's daughters mourn'd
Their prostrate land?—how Greece her victims tore

From flaming altars?—captive queens they turn'd
From Troy reluctant—on the sea-beat shore
Their eyes to heaven were roll'd in vain,
Their eyes—for not the victor's chain
Indulg'd thy privilege, despair!
Their hands to rend their flowing hair;
Behind them Troy a smoking ruin lies,
Before lie unknown seas, and black incumbent
skies.

† "Ye gales!" they cry'd, "ye cruel eastern "gales!

"Adverse to Troy, conspiring with the foe,
"That cager stretch the victor's swelling sails,
"To what unfriendly regions will ye blow?
"Shall we serve on Doric plains?
"Or where in Pithia Pyrrhus reigns?
"Shall Echo catch our captive tales?
"Joyless in the sprightly vales
"Apidanus thy beauteous current laves,
"Say, shall we fit and dream of Simois' fairer
"waves?

"Shall Delos, sacred Delos, hear our woes?
"Where when Latoua's offspring sprung to "birth,
"The palm spontaneous, and the laurel rose,
"O Dian, Dian, on thy hallow'd earth;
"With Delian maids, a spotless band,
"At virtue's altar shall we stand
"And hail thy name with choral joy
"Invok'd in vain for falling Troy?
"Thy shafts victorious shall our songs proclaim,
"When not an arrow fled to spare thy votarie
"shame.

"To Athens, art's fair empire, shall we rove?
"There for some haughty mistress ply the loom,
"With daring fancy paint avenging Jove,
"His forked lightnings flaming through the
"gloom,
"To blast the bold Titanian race:
"Or deaf to nature, must we trace
"In mournful shades our hapless war?
"What art, dread Pallas, to thy car,

IMITATION FROM OSSIAN’S POEMS,

LATELY PUBLISHED BY THE TITLE OF FINGAL,
 &c.

BROWN autumn nods upon the mountain’s head,
 The dark mist gathers; howling winds assail
 The blighted desert; on its mineral bed
 Dark rolls the river through the fullen vale.
 On the hills dejected scene
 The blasted ash alone is seen,
 That marks the grave where Connal sleeps;
 Gather’d into mould’ring heaps
 From the whirlwind’s giddy round,
 Its leaves bestrew the hallow’d ground.
 Across the musing hunter’s lonefome way
 Flit melancholy ghosts, that chill the dawn of day.

Connal, thou slumber’st there, the great, the good!
 Thy long-fam’d ancestors what tongue can trace?

Firm, as the oak on rocky heights, they stood;
 Planted as firm on glory’s ample base.
 Rooted in their native clime,
 Brav’d alike devouring time,
 Full of honours, full of age,
 That lofty oak the winter’s rage
 Rent from the promontory’s brow,
 And death has laid the mighty low.

The mountain’s mourn the consecrated tree;
 His country Connal mourns;—what son shall rival thee?

Here was the din of arms, and here o’erthrown
 The valiant!—mournful are thy wars, Fingal;
 The caverns echo’d to the dying groan,
 The fatal fields beheld the victor fall;
 Tall amidst the host, as hills
 Above their vales and subject rills,
 His arm, a tempest low’ring high,
 His sword, a beam of summer’s sky,
 His eyes, a fiery furnace, glare,
 His voice that shook th’ astonish’d war,
 Was thunder’s found: He smote the trembling foes,
 As sportive infant’s staff the bearded thistle mows.

Onward to meet this hero, like a storm,
 A cloudy storm, the mighty Dargo came;
 As mountain caves, where dusky meteors form
 His hollow eye-balls flash’d a livid flame.

And now they join’d, and now they wield
 Their clashing steel—resounds the field,
 Crimora heard the loud alarms,
 Rinval’s daughter, bright in arms,
 Her hands the bow victorious bear,
 Luxuriant wav’d her auburn hair;
 Connal, her life, her love, in beauty’s pride,
 She follow’d to the war, and fought by Connal’s side.

In wild despair, at Connal’s foe she drew
 The fatal string, impatient flew the dart;
 Ah hapless maid!—with erring course it flew;
 The shaft stood trembling in her lover’s heart.
 He fell—so falls by thunder’s shock
 From ocean’s cliffs the rifted rock.
 That falls and plows the groaning strand—
 He fell by love’s unwilling hand.
 Hapless maid! from eve to day,
 Connal, my love; the breathless lay
 My love, she calls—now rolls her frantic eyes—
 Now bends them sad to earth—she sinks, she faints, she dies.—

Together rest in earth’s parental womb,
 Her fairest offspring; mournful in the vale
 I sit, while, issuing from the moss-grown tomb,
 Your once-lov’d voices seem to swell the gale.—
 Pensive memory wakes her powers,
 Oft recalls your smiling hours
 Of fleeting life, that wont to move
 On downy wings of youth and love;
 The smiling hours no more return;
 —All is hush’d—your silent urn
 The mountain covers with its awful shade,
 Far from the haunts of men in pathless desert laid.

ODE TO YOUTH.

YOUTH, ah stay, prolong delight,
 Close thy pinions stretch’d for flight!
 Youth, disdain silver hairs,
 Autumn’s frowns, and winter’s cares,
 Dwell ’st thou but in dimple sleep,
 In vernal smiles and summer’s cheek?
 On spring’s ambrosial lap thy hands unfold,
 They blossom fresh with hope, and all they touch is gold.

Graver years come sailing by;
 Hark! they call me as they fly;
 Quit, they cry, for nobler themes,
 Statesman, quit thy boyish dreams!
 Tune to crowds thy pliant voice,
 Or flatter thrones, the nobler choice!
 Deserting virtue, yet assume her state;
 Thy smiles, that dwell with love, ah, wed them now to hate!

Or in victory’s purple plain
 Triumph thou on hills of slain!
 While the virgin rends her hair,
 Childless fires demand their heir,
 Timid orphans kneel and weep:
 Or, where the unfortun’d treasures sleep,
 Sit brooding o’er thy cave in grim repose,
 There mock at human joys, there mock at human woes.

Years away! too dear I prize
 Fancy’s haunts, her vales, her skies;

Come, ye gales that swell the flowers,
Wake my soul's expanding powers;
Come, by streams embow'r'd in wood,
Celestial forms, the fair, the good!

With moral charms associate vernal joys!
Pure nature's pleasures these—the rest are fashion's toys.

Come, while years reprove in vain,
Youth, with me, and rapture reign!
Sculpture, painting, meet my eyes,
Glowing still with young surprize!
Never to the virgin's lute
This ear be deaf, this voice be mute!

Come, beauty, cause of anguish, heal its smart,
—Now temperate measures beat, unalter'd else
my heart.

Still my soul, for ever young,
Speak thyself divinely sprung!
Wing'd for heaven, embracing earth,
Link'd to all of mortal birth,
Brute or man, in social chain
Still link'd to all, who suffer pain.

Pursue the eternal law!—one power above
Connects, pervades the whole—that power divine is love.

TO THE THAMES.

NEARER to my grove, O Thames!
Lead along thy sultry streams,
Summer fires the stagnant air,
Come and cool thy bosom there!
Trees shall shelter, zephyrs play,
Odours court thy smiling stay;
There the lily lifts her head,
Fairest child of nature's bed.

Oh Thames! my promise all was vain:
Autumnal storms, autumnal rain
Have spoil'd that fragrance, strip those shades,
Hapless flower! that lily fades.—
What, if chance, sweet evening ray,
Or western gale of vernal day,
Momentary bloom renews,
Heavy with unfertile dews
It bends again, and seems to cry,
“Gale and sunshine, come not nigh!
“Why reclaim from winter's power
“This wither'd stalk, no more a flower!”
Such a flower, my youthful prime,
Chill'd by rigour, fapp'd by time,
Shrinks beneath the clouded storm:
What, if beauty's beaming form,
And Cambrian virgins' vocal air,
Expand to smiles my brow of care:
That beam withdrawn, that melting sound,
The dews of death hang heavier round,
No more to spring, to bloom, to be,
I bow to fate and Heaven's decree.

Come then, Cambrian virgin, come,
With all thy music seek my tomb,
With all thy grace, thy modest state,
With all thy virtues, known too late!
Come, a little moment spare
From pious rites and filial care!
Give my tomb—no heart-felt sigh,
No tear convulsing pity's eye!
Gifts of too endearing name
For you to grant, for me to claim;

But bring the song—whose healing sounds
Were balm to all my festering wounds,
Bring the lyre—by music's power,
My soul entranc'd shall wait the hour,
The dread majestic hour of doom,
When through the grave, and through the gloom
Heaven shall burst in floods of day:
Dazzled with so fierce a ray,
My aching eyes shall turn to view
Its milder beams reflect from you.

TO MISS K—— P——.

GENTLE Kitty, take the lyre
Thy magic hands alone inspire!
But wake not once such swelling chords
As rouse ambition's stormy lords,
Nor airs that jocund tabors play
To dancing youth in shades of May,
Nor songs that shake old Picton's towers,
When feast and music blend their powers!
But notes of mildest accent call,
Of plaintive touch, and dying fall;
Notes to which thy hand, thy tongue,
Thy every tender power is strung.—
Cambrian maid, repeat that strain!
Sooth my widow'd bosom's pain!
Its passions own thy melting tones;
Sighs succeed to bursting groans;
Soft and softer still they flow,
Breathing more of love than wo;
Glistering in my eye appears
A tenderer dew than bitter tears;
Springing hope despair beguiles,
And sadness softens into smiles.

I quit thy lyre—but still the train
Of sweet sensations warms my brain.
What, though social joy and love
Forget to haunt my sullen grove:
Though there my soul, a stagnant flood,
Now flows its own, or others good,
Emblem of yon faded flower,
That, chill'd by frost, expands no more:
The dreary scene yet sometimes closes
When sleep inspires on beds of roses,
Such dear delusions, fairy charms,
As fancy dreams in virtue's arms.
For see, a gracious form is near!
She comes to dry my falling tear.
One pious hand in pity spread,
Supports my else unshelter'd head;
The other waves to chafe away
The spectres haunting all my day:
She calls—above, below, around,
Sweet fragrance breathes, sweet voices sound.—

Such a balm to wounded minds,
Gentle Kitty slumber finds;
Such a change is misery's due—
Who wakes to grief should dream of you.

TO THE SAME.

AH! bow to music, bow my lays
To beauty's noblest art;
To reach the bosom mine the praise,
But thine to melt the heart.

'Tis mine to close affliction's wounds,
To brighten pleasure's eye:

But thine, by sweet-dissolving sounds,
To make it blifs to die.

My notes but kindle cold desire,
Ah, what you feel for me!
Diviner passions thine inspire,
Ah, what I feel for thee!

Affociate then thy voice, thy touch,
O, wed to mine thy powers!
Be such at least, nor blush at such Connubial union ours!

TO THE SAME.

Why, Kitty, with that tender air,
Those eyes to earth inclin'd,
Those timid blushes? why despair
Of empire o'er mankind?

Ah, know, that beauty's funest arms
Are candour, softness, ease!
Your sweet distrust of pleasing charms
Is half the charm to please.—

Respect your own harmonious art!
For love feturest wounds,
Securest takes th' imprison'd heart
Entranc'd by magic sounds!

If flowers of fiction's growth you call
This wreath that truth bestows;
Survey around your Attic wall
Each * pencil'd form that glows.

And ask the youths, what heavenly fair
Their tenderest vows inspires?
If Juno's more than regal air,
Or fierce Minerva's fires?

'Tis bashful Venus they prefer,
Retiring from the view,
And what their lips address to her,
Their bosoms feel for you.

TO THE SAME.

Your bosom's sweet treasures thus ever disclose;
For believe my ingenuous confession,
The veil meant to hide them, but only bestows
A softness transcending expression.

Good Heaven, cries Kitty, what language I hear!
Have I trespass'd on chastity's laws?
Is my tucker's clear muslin indecently clear?
Is it no satin apron, but gauze?

Ah no!—not the least swelling charm is descried
Through the tucker, too bashfully decent;
And your apron hides all that short aprons can hide,
From the fashion of Eve to the present.

The veil, too transparent to hinder the sight,
Is what modesty throws on your mind:
That veil only shades, with a tenderer light,
All the feminine graces behind.

TO THE SAME.

AMIN thy native mountains, Cambrian fair,
Were some lone plant supported by thy care,
Sav'd from the blast, from winter's chilling powers,

In vernal suns, in vernal shades and showers,
By thee reviving: did the favoured tree
Exist, and blossom and mature by thee:
To that selected plant did Heaven dispense,
With vegetable life, a nobler sense:
Would it not bless thy virtues, gentle maid?
Would it not woo thy beauties to its shade?
Bid all its buds in rich luxuriance shoot,
To crown thy summer with autumnal fruit,
Spread all its leaves, a pillow to thy rest,
Give all its flowers to languish on thy breast,
Reject the tendrils of th' uxorious vine,
And stretch its longing arms to circle thine?

Yes; in creation's intellectual reign,
Where life, sense, reason, with progressive chain,
Dividing, blending, form th' harmonious whole:
That plant am I, distinguish'd by a foul.

TO THE SAME.

WITH ANSON'S VOYAGE.

RAPTUR'D traveller, cease the tales
Of Tinian's lawns, Fernandes' vales;
Of isles, centering nature's charms,
Lapt in peaceful Ocean's arms;
Of that Hesperian world, which lies
Beneath the smile of southern skies,
Where zephyr waves unflagging wings,
Where Albion's summers, Latian springs
Join thy autumns, smiling France,
And lead along th' eternal dance!

These enchanting scenes, and all
That wake to form at fancy's call,
And all the sportive pencil traces,
Are feeble types of living graces.
Of moral charms, that mental throne
Unclouded beauty calls her own.
Where all the sun's meridian blaze
Is twilight gloom to virtue's rays.
There, with richer blended sweets,
Wedded Spring her Autumn meets;
There Fernandes' brighter shore,
There a purer Chili's ore,
Fruits and flowers are there combin'd
In fairer Tinian—Kitty's mind.

THE COMPLAINT

OF CAMBRIA TO MISS K— P—,

Setting to Music, and Singing English Verses.
Done into English from the Welch Original.

DEGENERATE maid, no longer ours!
Can Saxon ditties suit thy lyre?
Accents untun'd, that breathe no powers
To melt the soul, or kindle martial fire?

It ill becomes thee to combine
Such hostile airs with notes divine,
In Cambrian shades, the druids hallow'd bounds,
Whose infant voice has lip'd the liquid Celtic sounds.

Revere thy Cambria's flowing tongue!
 Though high-born Hoel's lips are dumb,
 Cadwallo's harp no more is strung,
 And silence sits on soft Lluelyn's tomb:
 Yet songs of British bards remain,
 That, wedded to thy vocal strain,
 Would swell melodious on the mountain breeze,
 And roll on Millford's wave to distant echoing seas.—

O sing thy fires in genuine strains!
 When Rome's resistless arm prevail'd,
 When Edward delug'd all my plains*,
 And all the music of my mountains fail'd;
 When all her flames rebellion spread,
 Firmly they stood—O sing the dead!
 The theme majestic to thy lyre belongs,
 'To Picton's lofty walls, and Cambrian virgins songs.

ON A PRESENT TO THE AUTHOR

OF TWO IMPRESSIONS FROM A FINE ANTIQUE
 SEAL OF THE HEAD OF ALEXANDER;

The one by Lady P——, on Paper, the other by Miss J—— P——, in Wax.

FAIR sculpture of Ammon's young graces!
 My lady with whom shall we tax?
 On paper who marks thy faint traces,
 Which Stella stamps lively in wax?
 Of their hearts they make mutual confession;
 That, cold to emotions once felt,
 The mother's scarce yields to impression—
 The daughter's can soften and melt.

ON THE SUBJECT OF THE MONUMENT
IN ARCADIA.

O YOU, that dwell where shepherds reign,
 Arcadian youths, Arcadian maids,
 To pastoral pipe who danc'd the plain,
 Why pensive now beneath the shades?
 Approach her virgin tomb, they cry,
 Behold the verse inscrib'd above,
 Once too in Arcady was I—
 Behold what dreams are life and love!

ON THE SAME.

SWEET Arcady, where shepherds reign,
 Your simple youths, your simple maids,
 With pastoral dance still cheer the plain,
 Their pastoral pipe still charms the shades:
 This only song still meets our ear,
 It swells the breeze, it fills the grove;
 What joys so sweet as nature's here?
 What joy of nature sweet as love?

HITCHIN CONVENT.

A TALE.

WHERE Hitch's gentle current glides,
 An ancient convent stands,
 Sacred to prayer and holy rites,
 Ordain'd by pious hands.

* Edward I. put to death all the Welch Bards.

Here monks of faintly Benedict
 Their nightly vigils kept,
 And lofty anthems took the choir,
 At hours when mortals slept.
 But Harry's wide-reforming hand
 That sacred order wounded;
 He spoke—from forth their hallow'd walls
 The friars fled confounded.

Then wicked laymen ent'ring in,
 Those cloisters fair profan'd;
 Now riot loud usurps the seat
 Where bright devotion reign'd.
 Ev'n to the chapel's sacred roof,
 Its echoing vaults along,
 Resounds the flute, and sprightly dance,
 And hymeneal song.

Yet fame reports, that monkish shades
 At midnight never fail
 To haunt the mansions once their own,
 And tread its cloisters pale.

One night, more prying than the rest,
 It chanc'd a friar came,
 And enter'd, where on beds of down
 Repos'd each gentle dame.

Here, softening midnight's raven gloom,
 Lay R——e, blushing maid!
 There, wrapt in folds of cypress lawn,
 Her virtuous aunt was laid.

He stop'd, he gaz'd, to wild conceits
 His roving fancy run,
 He took the aunt for Priorefs,
 And R——e for a nun.

It hap'd that R——e's capuchin,
 Across the couch display'd,
 To deem her sister of the veil,
 The holy fire betray'd.

Accosting then the youthful fair,
 His raptur'd accents broke;
 Amazement chill'd the waking nymph;
 She trembled as he spoke.

Hail halcyon days! hail holy nun!
 This wond'rous change explain:
 Again religion lights her lamp,
 Reviews these walls again.

For ever blest the power that check'd
 Reformists' wild disorders,
 Restor'd again the church's lands,
 Reviv'd our sacred orders.

To monks indeed, from Edward's days,
 Belong'd this chaste foundation;
 Yet sister nuns may answer too
 The founder's good donation.

Ah, well thy virgin vows are heard!
 For man were never given
 Those charms, reserv'd to nobler ends,
 Thou spotless spouse of Heaven!

Yet speak what cause from morning mase
 Thy ling'ring steps delays:
 Haste to the deep-mouth'd organ's peal,
 To join thy vocal praise.

Awake thy abbess, sisters all ;
At Mary's holy shrine,
With bended knees and suppliant eyes
Approach, thou nun divine !—

No nun am I, recover'ing cried
The nymph ; no nun, I say,
Nor nun will be, unless this fright
Should turn my locks to gray.

'Tis true, at church I seldom fail
When aunt or uncle leads ;
Yet never rise by four o'clock
To tell my morning beads.

No mortal lover yet, I vow,
My virgin heart has fix'd,
But yet I bear the creature's talk,
Without a grate betwixt.

To Heav'n my eyes are often cast
(From Heav'n their light began),
Yet deign sometimes to view on earth
Its image stamp'd on man.

Ah me ! I fear in borrow'd shape
Thou com'st, a base deceiver ;
Perhaps the devil, to tempt the faith
Of orthodox believer.

For once my hand at masquerade,
A reverend friar pass ;
His form as thine, but holier sounds
The ravish'd faint address.

He told me vows no more were made
To senseless stone and wood,
But adoration paid alone
To saints of flesh and blood.

That rosy cheeks, and radiant eyes,
And tresses like the morn,
Were given to bless the present age,
And light the age unborn :

That maids, by whose obdurate pride
The hapless lover fell,
Were doom'd to never-dying toils
Of leading apes in hell.

Respect the first command, he cried,
Its sacred laws fulfil,
And well observe the precept given
To Moses—" Do not kill."

Thus spoke, ah yet I hear him speak !
My soul's sublime physician ;
Then get thee hence, thy doctrines vile
Would sink me to perdition.

She ceas'd—the monk in shades of night
Confus'dly fled away,
And superstition's clouds dissolv'd
In sense, and beauty's ray.

TO A YOUNG LADY,
A VERY GOOD ACTRESS.

POWERFUL is beauty, when to mortal seats
From Heaven descends the heaven-created good,
When fancy's glance the fairy phantom meets,
Nymph of the shade, or naiad of the flood.

So blooms Celena, daughter of the skies,
Queen of the joys romantic rapture dreams,
Her cheeks are summer's damask rose, her eyes
Steal their quick lustre from the morning's beams.

Her airy neck the shining tresses shade ;
In every wanton curl a Cupid dwells :
To these, distrustful in the graces' aid,
She joins the mighty charms of magic spells.

Man, hapless man in vain destruction flies,
With wily arts th' enchantress nymph pursues ;
To varying forms, as varying lovers rise,
Shifts the bright iris of a thousand hues.

Behold th' austere divine, oppress'd by years,
Colics, and bulk, and tithes engender'd care ;
The fount of woman grates his aching ears,
Of other woman than a scripture fair.

Sudden she comes a Deborah bright in arms,
Or wears the pastoral Rachel's ancient mien ;
And now, as glow gay-flushing eastern charms,
He sighs like David's son for Sheba's queen.

To 'Change the china trader speeds his pace,
Nor heeds the chilly north's unripening dames ;
'Tis her's, with twinkling eyes, and lengthen'd face,
And pigmy foot, to wake forgotten flames.

She oft, in likeness of th' Egyptian crone,
Too well inform'd, relates to wond'ring swains
Their amorous plaints prefer'd to her alone :
Her own relentless breast too well explains.

See, at the manor's hospitable board
Enters a fire, by infant age rever'd ;
From shorten'd tube exhaling fumes afford
The incense bland that clouds his forky beard.

Conundrums quaint, and puns of jocund kind,
With rural ditties, warm th' elated 'quire,
Yet oft sensations quicken in his mind,
Other than ale and jocund puns inspire.

The forms where bloated dropsy holds her seat,
He views, unconscious of magician's guiles,
Nor deems a jaundic'd visage lov'd retreat
Of graces, young desires, and dimpled smiles.

Now o'er the portal of an antique hall
A Grecian form the raptur'd patriot awes,
The hoary bust and brow severe recal
Lycurgus, founder of majestic laws.

A while entranc'd, he dreams of old renown,
And freedom's triumph in Platæan fields,
Then turns--relaxing sees the furrow'd frown,
To melting airs the soften'd marble yields.

I see the lips as breathing life, he cries,
On icy cheeks carnation blooms display'd,
The pensive orbs are pleasure-beaming eyes,
And Sparta's lawgiver a blushing maid.

There, at the curtains of the shudd'ring youth,
Stiff melancholy pale a spectre stands,
Some love-lorn virgin's shade---O ! injur'd truth,
Deserted phantom, and ye plighted hands,

He scarce had utter'd---from his frantic gaze
The vision fades---succeeds a flood of light.

O friendly shadows, veil him as the blaze
Of beauty's sun emerging from the night.

Here end thy triumphs, nymph of potent charms,
The laurell'd bard is Heaven's immortal care;
Him nor illusion's spell nor philtre harms,
Nor music floating on the magic air.

The myrtle wand this arm imperial bears,
Reluctant ghosts and stubborn elves obey:
Its virtuous touch the midnight fairy fears,
And shapes that wanton in Aurora's ray.

I ceas'd; the virgin came in native grace,
With native smiles that strengthen beauty's
chain:

O vain the confidence of mortal race!
My laurell'd head and myrtle wand are vain.

Again wild raptures, kindling passions rise,
As once in Andover's autumnal grove,
When looks that spoke, and eloquence of sighs,
Told the soft mandate of another's love.

TO AN ACCOMPLISHED LADY.

IN THE MANNER OF WALLER.

O NYMPH! than blest Pandora honour'd more,
What gods to grace thee lavish all their store!
We see thy form in awful beauty move,
At once repelling and inviting love;
We see thy mind each bright perfection reach
That genius kindles, and the graces teach:
Pallas, to form that matchless mind, conspires
With wisdom's coolness, temp'ring fancy's fires;
Here, as in Eden's blissful garden, shoot
The tree of knowledge and forbidden fruit.

ADDRESS TO THE THAMES.

O THAMES! thy clear majestic stream
Shall ever flow, my raptur'd theme;
Not because Augusta's pride
Builds her greatness on thy tide,
Court'd by worlds in other oceans found:
Not because proud Cliefden laves
His pendent beeches in thy waves;
Not because thy limpid rills
Reflect on Hampton's towers, or Richmond's hills;
Or Cooper's mountain, by the muses crown'd,
Or catch the blaze from Windsor's beaming star,
Sacred to patriot chiefs, the boast of peace and war:
Nor yet because thy current loves
The haunt of academic groves;
And still with ling'ring fond delay
Through Egham's vales delights to stray,
Once scene of freedom's claims, heroic cares:
But hail thee, Thames! while o'er thy meads
Eliza with Louisa leads
Each winning grace of love and youth,
Ingenuous forms, fair candour and fair truth:
Oh! fan their evening walk with mildest airs;
So Gallic spoils shall crowd thy wealthy side,
And commerce swell her stores with each revolving tide.

VOL. XI.

TO MRS. B——,

READING JULIA WITH TEARS, DURING A HARD FROST.

WHAT, though descending as the dews of morn,
On misery's sighs your tear of virtue waits;
Forget the fallen Julia! you were born
For heart-expanding joys and smiling fates.

To sooth with social pleasures human cares,
To call the muse to Thames's frozen glades,
To wake the slumb'ring spring with vernal airs,
And plant an Eden in December's shades;

To deck, like * Eve, with soft officious haste,
Your banquet, worthwhile of her angel guest;
Amid the flowers that crown the fair repast,
A flower yourself, the fairest of the feast.

There the great giver for his bounties given
Your grateful comfort blessing, blesses too
The sweet dispenser of the gifts of heaven,
In wonder's silent prayer he blesses you:

Your infants there reflecting round the board,
Maternal graces while his eye approves;
One tear to rapture give!—then sit ador'd
The gentle mother of the smiles and loves.

ON MR. BROWN'S

ALTERATIONS AT CLERMONT, RESTORING HILLS, SCOOPING VALLEYS, &c.

AH murmur not, art, at your Brown's innovation,
You are still the fine lady, with less affectation;
And nature, ah! pardon his hand while it dresses
So sweetly, so simply, your features and tresses;
Your soft-swelling bosom not chafely concealing,
Nor faintly disclosing, nor fully revealing;
Ah! pardon his hand, if it haply should venture
In search of coy beauty quite down to the centre.

TO LADY F——,

ON HER MARRIAGE.

THOUGH to Hymen's gay season belong
Light airs, and the raptures of youth;
Yet listen to one sober song;
O listen, fair Stella, to truth.

Farewell to the triumphs of beauty,
To the soft serenade at your bower,
To the lover's idolatrous duty,
To his vigils in midnight's still hour.

To your frowns darting amorous anguish,
To your smiles chasing every care,
To the power of your eyes lively languish,
To each glance waking hope or despair.

Farewell to soft bards, that in heaven
Dipt the pencil to picture your praise,
And blended the colours of even'
With morning's gay opening rays:

They no longer on Thames shall proclaim you
A naiad new sprung from the flood,

* See Milton's Paradise Lost, Book v. from line

Nor to Busby's soft echoes shall name you
Bright Dian, the queen of the wood.

Farewell to love's various season,
Smiling days hung with tempests and night;
But welcome the reign of fair reason,
O! welcome securer delight.

O! welcome, in nature's own dress,
Purest pleasures of gentler kind;
O! welcome the power to bless,
To redeem fortune's wrongs on mankind.

Be a goddess indeed, while you borrow
From plenty's unlimited store,
To gild the wan aspect of sorrow,
To cheer the meek eyes of the poor.

When your virtues shall mix with the skies,
When your beauty, bright phoenix, decays,
In your image new graces shall rise,
And enlighten posterity's days.

Future ages shall trace every air;
Every virtue deriv'd to your blood
Shall remember that Stella was fair,
Shall remember that Stella was good.

SONG.

No gandy Rubens ever dare
With flaunting genius, rosy loves,
To crowd the scene, in sunshine's glare,
Exposing her the muse approves.

Let, chaste Poussin, thy shady stream
Reflect her pensive, tender air;
Let evening veil, with sober beam,
In bashful night the bashful fair.

VERSES

WRITTEN AFTER PASSING THROUGH FINDON,
SUSSEX, 1768.

Addressed to the Rev. Mr. Wooddeson, of Kingston upon Thames.*

WOODDESON! these eyes have seen thy natal earth;
Thy Findon, sloping from the southern downs,
Have blest the roof ennobled by thy birth,
And tufted valley, where no ocean frowns.

Thou wert not born to plow the neighbouring main,
Or plant thy greatness near ambition's throne,
Or count unnumber'd fleeces on thy plain:—
The muses lov'd and nurs'd thee for their own!

And twin'd thy temples here with wreaths of worth,
And fenc'd thy childhood from the blights of
And taught enchanting song, and sent thee forth
To stretch the blessing to an age unborn:

Best blessing!—what is pride's unwieldy state?
What awkward wealth from Indian oceans given?

What monarchs nodding under empires' weight,
If science smile not with a ray from heaven?

* The author of these poems had been educated under this gentleman, for whom he ever retained the most affectionate regard.

Witness yon ruins, Arundel's high tower,
And Bramber, now the bird of night's resort!
Your proud possessors reign'd in barbarous power;
The war their business, and the chase their sport;

Till there a minstrel, to the feast prefer'd,
With Cambrian harp, in Gothic numbers
charm'd,

Enlighten'd chiefs grew virtuous as they heard—
The sun of science in its morning warm'd.—

How glorious, when it blaz'd in Milton's light,
And Shakspeare's flame, to full meridian day!
Yet smile, fair beam! though sloping from that height,

Gild our mild evening with a setting ray.

TO A LADY.

THE simple swain, where Zembla's snows
Arc bound in frozen chains,
Where scarce a smile the sun bestows
To warm the frozen plains;

Not once conceives that sun to rise
With kinder, brighter ray,
Nor southern vales, Hesperian skies,
To bask in smiling day.

As weak my thoughts respecting thee:
Must thou, my better sun,
Because but smiling cold on me,
Be therefore warm to none?

STANZAS.

"Where more is meant than meets the ear."
MILTON.

THE bird of midnight swell'd her throat,
The virgins listen'd round
To sorrow's deeply-warbled note,
To sweet but solemn sound:

When soon the lark ascending high,
In sun-beams idly play'd;
As soon to greet him, see, they fly—
One pensive virgin stay'd.

She stay'd to hear the mourner sing;
The rest, to nature true,
The flutter of the gayer wing
The vacant song pursue.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

Who objected to Sup with a Party of both Sexes, that met at a Coffee-house.

O FAR from Caroline, so soft a maid,
Be cruel coyness, pride, and cold disdain!
Who now of man, the monster man, afraid,
Flies the gay circle of the social train.

Away vain fears! away suspicious dreams,
From beauty, virtue, tenderness, and truth;
From eyes that dawn with wisdom's mildest beams,
From harmless smiles that wait on gentle youth.

Far other years and other nymphs besit
The prudish form, and high forbidding brow;
With others dwell; or frowns or scornful wit,
With nymphs less innocent, less fair than thou:

With her, whose youth, of virtue's mild controul
Impatient, rush'd on wanton wild desires;
Now prayer or scandal eheers the gloomy soul
That pines in secret with forbidden fires:

Or her that triumph'd in her lover's sighs,
As round their brows the willow garlands bend;
She now dejected, now deserted lies,
Without a lover, and without a friend!

Another fate is youthful virtue's share:
Come with the graces, gentle maid, along:
Come, fairest thou among the young and fair,
To lead the dance, or join the virgins' song;

Come listen to the tale that youths complain,
To thousand vows, in amorous sighs address;
Propitious listen to the raptur'd strain,
When chaste majestic passions swell the breast.

Too long exterior charms of radiant eyes,
And blushing cheeks, the captive sense controul;
Thy forms, fair harmony, too long we prize,
Forget the fairer, more harmonious soul!

Too long the lovers for an empty fair
At heedless ease inglorious arts advance;
Enough for them to deck the flowing hair,
Or flutter gaudy with the pride of France.

From worth with beauty nobler lessons taught,
Each youth that languishes, his flame shall prove
By generous action or heroic thought,
And merit fame by arts that merit love.

Shall once again the Grecian lyre be strung,
Restoring Hymen's mild Arcadian reign?
Shall patriot eloquence instruct the tongue,
And spoils be gather'd from the martial plain?

O! far unlike to such celestial flame
The passion kindled from impure desires;
Fatal to friends, to fortune, and to fame,
The momentary flash in night expires.

Love's lambent fire that beams from virtue's rays,
Each fordid passion as it burns, refin'd,
Still bright and brighter with benignant blaze
Embraces friends, a country, human kind.

A DREAM.

With bridal cake beneath her head,
As Jenny prest her pillow,
She dreamt that lovers, thick as hops,
Hung pendent from the willow.

Around her spectres hook their chains,
And goblins kept their station;
They pull'd, they pinch'd her, till she swore
To spare the male creation.

Before her now the buck, the bean,
The squire, the captain trips;
The modest seiz'd her hand to kiss,
The forward seiz'd her lips.

For some she felt her bosom pant,
For some she felt it smart;
To all she gave enchanting smiles,
To one she gave her heart.

She dreamt—(for magic charms prevail'd,
And fancy play'd her farce on)

That, soft reclin'd in elbow chair,
She kiss'd a sleeping parson.

She dreamt—but, O rash muse! forbear,
Nor virgins dreams pursue;
Yet blest above the gods is he
Who proves such visions true.

THE MULBERRY TREE.

A TALE.

FOR London's rich city, two Staffordshire swains, Hight Johnson, hight Garrick, forsaking their plains, [by his tomb

Reach'd Shakspeare's own Stratford, where flows
An Avon, as proudly as Tiber by Rome.

Now Garrick (sweet imp too of nature was he),
Would climb and would eat from his mulberry tree;

Yet as Johnson, less frolic, was taller, was older,
He reach'd the first boughs by the help of his shoulder; [weather,

Where, shelter'd from famine, from bailiffs, and Bards, critics, and players, sat crowded together;
Who devour'd in their reach all the fruit they could meet,

The good, bad, indifferent, the bitter and sweet:
But Garrick climb'd high to a plentiful crop,
Then, heavens! what vagaries he play'd on the top! [tight,

How, now on the loose twigs, and now on the
He stood on his head, and then bolted upright!
All features, all shapes, and all passions he tried;

He danc'd and he strutted, he laugh'd and he cried, [hide!

He presented his face, and he show'd his back—
The noble, the vulgar, flock'd round him to see
What feats he perform'd in the mulberry tree:
He repeated the pastime, then open'd to speak,
But Johnson below mutter'd strophes of Greek,
While Garrick proclaim'd—such a plant never grew,

So foster'd by sunshine, by soil, and by dew.
The palm-trees of Deios, Phœnicia's sweet grove,
The oaks of Dodona, though hallow'd by Jove,
With all that antiquity shows to surpass us, Compar'd to this tree, were mere shrubs of Par-nassus. [laid,

Not the beeches of Mantua, where Tityrus was
Not all Vallombrosa produc'd such a shade,
That the myrtles of France, like the birch of the schools,

Where fit only for rods to whip genius to rules;
That to Stratford's old mulberry, fairest and best,
The cedars of Eden must bow their proud crest:
Then the fruit—like the loaf in the Tub's pleasant tale, [ale---

That was fish, flesh, and custard, good claret and
It compriz'd every flavour, was all, and was each,
Was grape, and was pine-apple, nectarine and peach; [told,

Nay he swore, and his audience believ'd what he
That under his touch it grew apples of gold.—
Now he paus'd!—then recounted its virtues again—
'Twas a wood for all use, bottom, top, bark, and grain:

It would saw into seats for an audience in full pits,

Into benches for judges, episcopal pulpits;

Into chairs for philosophers, thrones too for kings,
 Serve the highest of purposes, lowest of things;
 Make brooms to mount witches; make May-poles
 for May-days,
 And boxes, and ink-stands, for wits and the ladies.—

His speech pleas'd the vulgar, it pleas'd their superiors, [riors,
 By Johnson stopt short,—who his mighty posse-Applied to the trunk—like a Sampson, his haunches
 Shook the roots, shook the summit, shook stem, and shook branches!

All was tremour and shock!—now descended in showers

Wither'd leaves, wither'd limbs, blighted fruits, blighted flowers!

The fragments drew critics, bards, players along,
 Who held by weak branches, and let go the strong;

E'en Garrick had dropt with a bough that was rotten,

But he leapt to a sound, and the slip was forgotten.

Now the plant's close recesses lay open to day,
 While Johnson exclaim'd, stalking stately away,
 Here's rubbish enough, till my homeward return,
 For children to gather, old women to burn;
 Not practis'd to labour, my sides are too sore,
 Till another fit season, to shake you down more.
 What future materials for pruning, and cropping,
 And cleaning, and gleaning, and lopping and topping!

Yet mistake me not, rabble! this tree's a good
 tree,

Does honour, dame nature, to Britain and thee;
 And the fruit on the top,—take its merits in brief,
 Makes a noble desert, where the dinner's roastbeef!

TO A LADY.

YES; wedlock's sweet bands were too blest, in her lover

If virtue her likeness could find,
 What Plato * has fabled, could Julia recover
 Her lost other half, from mankind.

What joy to receive all the good you impart,
 Thy cares on another recline,
 Another's fond bosom, and feel that his heart
 Beats all the same measures with thine!

The features, the virtues of both, in your race,
 How sweet the confusion, enjoy!
 Yet more of thyself in the daughter still trace,
 And more of thy lord in the boy.

Such bliss rivals heaven—yet what grief, what disgrace,

Were riot's low follower thy lot,
 Were he whose loud pleasures are wine and the chase,

All love's silent pleasures forgot!

* Plato's fable is, that man and woman originally were one being, divided afterwards by Jupiter for their punishment; that each part, in perpetual search of the other, never recovers happiness till their reunion.

What misery to hear, without daring reply,
 All folly, all insolence speaks;
 Still calling the tear of reproach to thy eye,
 The flush of disdain to thy cheeks!

Would soft macaronies have judgment to prize,
 Whom arts and whom virtues adorn,
 Who learnt every virtue and art to despise,
 Where Catos and Scipios were born?

Would wealth's drowsy heir, without spark of heaven's fire,

Enshrin'd in his dulness completely,
 Awake to the charmer, her voice, and her lyre,
 Ah! charm they though ever so sweetly!

But what with the gamester, ah! what were thy fate,

What fortune's caprices thy share!
 To sleep upon down under canopied state,
 To wake on the straw of despair!

The timid free-thinker, that only defies
 Those bolts which his Maker can throw;
 Would he, when blaspheming the Lord of the skies,

Yet rev'rence his image below?

Would slaves to a court, or to faction's banditti,
 Thy temperate spirit approve;
 So proud in their chains of the court and the city,
 Disdaining no chains, but of love?

O! mild as the zephyr, like zephyr that throws
 Its sweets on the sweet-breathing May;
 But not on the lap of cold winter bestows,
 What winter will never repay.

So turn thee from folly's cold aspect, ah! turn
 From vice's hard bosom away;
 The wifer and the virtuous thy sweets will return,
 As warm and as grateful as May.

ON A VERY FINE LADY.

FINE B— observes no other rules
 Than those the coterie prize;
 She thinks, whilst lords continue fools,
 'Tis vulgar to be wife:

Thinks rudeness wit in noble dames,
 Adultery, love polite;
 That ducal stars shoot brighter flames
 Than all the host of light.

Yet sages own that greatness throws
 A grace on Spencer's charms;
 On Hagley's verse, on Stanhope's prose,
 And gilded Marlborough's arms.

For titles here their rev'rence ends,
 In general wisdom thinks
 The higher grandeur's scale ascends,
 The lower nature's sinks.

ON AN ASIATIC LADY.

O you who sail on India's wealthy wave,
 Of gems and gold who spoil the radiant east;
 What oceans, say, what isles of fragrance gave
 This fairer treasure to the joyful west?

What banks of Ganges, and what balmy skies
Saw the first infant dawn of those unclouded eyes ?

By easy arts while Europe's beauties reign,
Roll the blue languish of their humid eye ;
Rule willing slaves, who court and kiss the chain,
Self-vanquish'd, helpless to resist or fly ;
Lefs yielding souls confess this eastern fair,
And lightning melts the heart that milder fires would spare.

Of gods, enamour'd with a mortal dame,
Let Grecian story tell—the gifts display
That deck'd Cassandra, and each honour'd name
Lov'd by the god, who guides the golden day :
See ! Asia triumphs in a brighter scene ;
A nobler Phœbus woos her summer's smiling queen.

Sublimèr sense, and sprightlier wit to please,
That Phœbus gave ; he gave the voice and lyre,
That warble sweeter than the spicy breeze,
He gave what charms meridian suns inspire ;
What precious rays from light's pure fountain
istream,
What warm the diamond's blaze and ruby's flaming beam.

TO THE SAME,

ON HER DRESS.

AH envious robe ! to frustrate heaven's intent,
Concealing beauty from the eye of day ;
Beauty to man by gracious nature sent
To cheer the wand'rer on his lonesome way.

One pow'r who wak'd Aurora's smiling light Gave skies their azure, and gave vales their green,

Form'd the quick sense for wonder and delight,
Made eyes to see, and Laura to be seen.

Curs'd be th' eclipse that plunges morn in night,
And jealous clouds that shade the landscape's
scene ;

On envious robes severer curses light,
That veil the beauties of my summer's queen !

Ah Laura ! cruel Laura ! why constrain,
In art's fantastic drapery, nature's ease ?
Why, form'd to empire, empire's arts disdain ?
Why, born for pleasure, still refuse to please ?

Nor yet these folds on folds, this load of dress,
Shall bar approaches to poetic love ;
No—where the graces sport in sweet recess,
'Tis fancy, bold intruder's joy to rove.

Fancy, pursuing where my Laura flies,
With wanton gales forbidden charms reveals,
Betrays her slumbers, and with eager eyes
The panting breast devouring, dreams it feels.

Fancy, indulgent to her votary's prayer,
Shows where, sequester'd from the sultry beam,
The limpid wave but ill conceal'd the fair,
With virgins sporting in her Gange's stream.

TO THE SAME.

AH Laura ! while graces and songs,
While smiles, winning smiles you impart ;
Indulgence but nurses desire,
I sigh for that treasure, your heart.

Yes, take, too presumptuous, she cries,
All that virtue can wish to receive ;
Yes, take all that virtue can grant,
A heart I had never to give.

The maid of the north, like the lake,
That sleeps by her peaceable cot,
Too languishing lives but for one,
Forgetting the world, and forgot.

But born where my Ganges expands,
To no partial channels confin'd,
Unfix'd to no object, I flow
With innocent smiles on mankind.

Our Asia's bright dames, like their sun,
Cheer all with benevolent reign,
Coy moons Europe's daughters but light
A single disconsolate swain.

ON READING THE FOREGOING VERSES.

BY MISS G—.

AH ! Dorimant, victim to love,
Too fatally caught in his wishes,
Can you in fair Laura approve
Those diffusive, those general smiles ?

If inconstancy dwells with that fire
Which the sun-beams of Asia impart,
Can a daughter of Europe desire
To change with your Laura a heart ?

No !—happier the temp'rate mind,
Which, fix'd to one object alone,
To one tender passion confin'd,
Breathes no wishes, no sighs, but for one.—

Such bliss has the maid of the plain,
Though secluded she lives in a cot ;
Yet, rich in the love of her swain,
She's contented, and blesses her lot.—

Ah ! say, if deserving thy heart,
The too undistinguishing fair,
Who to thousands can raptures impart,
And the raptures of thousands can share ?

Ah ! say, does she merit those lays ?
Those lays which true passion define ?—
No—unworthy the fair of thy praise,
Who can listen to any but thine.

REPLY*

TO MISS G—.

SAPPHO, while your muse of fire,
Listening to the vocal spheres,

* The 1st, 2d, and 13th stanzas were not in the copy presented to A. J. S. G—.

Sits and tempers to her lyre
Airs divine for mortal ears:

Viewing higher orbs that glow,
Ever constant, ever true,
Still she dreams to find below
Perfect forms, as heaven and you.

Blame not Asia's fair, who glances
Random smiles in heedless ease,
Shifts at will her wayward fancies,
Pleasing all, whom all can please;

Blame her not—no envied treasure
Is the tender, feeling heart,
Bosoms quick to keener pleasure
Beat, alas! as quick to smart.

Who with eyes that ever languish,
Still to deserts sighs alone?
Who consumes her youth in anguish?
—She who keeps an heart for one.

Tender love repaid with treason,
Fortune's frowns, parental power,
Blast her in the vernal season.
Bend her, unsupported flower.

Happier she, with pliant nature
Fleeting, fickle as the wind;
She, who proving one a traitor,
Turns to meet another kind.

Blame her not—with Asian rovers
What can Asia's fair pursue?
What? but lessons taught by lovers,
Like the traitor, treacherous too.

Why should faith, obsequious duty,
Sooth an eastern tyrant's scorn?
Who but rises joyless beauty
Steals the honey, leaves the thorn.

Sadness sits by Ganges' fountains;
How can echo cheer the vale?
What repeat from fragrant mountains?
What but grief and horror's tale?

What but shrieks of wild despair?
What but shouts that murder sleep?
There the struggling, fainting fair;
There—but see my Sappho weep!

Change the strain!—this mournful measure
Melts, oppresses virtuous hearts—
Sappho, wake thy lyre of pleasure!
Sing of Europe's happier arts!

Sing of all the mingled blessing
Reason, tempering passion, knows;
All the transport of possessing
Unpluck'd beauty's willing rose!

Sing of that resin'd sensation
Mutual melting bosoms prove,
Souls exchang'd, sweet emanation,
Separate being lost in love!

Rapture's tears, voluptuous stream!
Languor stealing sorrow's sighs;
Sing of love—thyself the theme!
Sing of love—thyself the prize!

SONG.

HANG my lyre upon the willow,
Sigh to winds thy notes forlorn;
Or, along the foamy billow
Float the wrecking tempest's scorn.

Sprightly sounds no more it raises,
Such as Laura's smiles approve;
Laura scorns her poet's praises,
Calls his artless friendship love:

Calls it love, that spurning duty,
Spurning nature's chastest ties,
Mocks thy tears, dejected beauty,
Sports with fallen virtue's sighs.

Call it love, no more profaning
Truth with dark suspicion's wound;
Or, my fair, the term retaining,
Change the sense, preserve the sound.

Yes, 'tis love—that name is given,
Angels, to your purest fames:
Such a love as merits heaven,
Heaven's divinest image claims.

LAURA'S ANSWER.

BY MISS G—.

SOON be thy lyre to winds consign'd,
Or hurl'd beneath the raging deep,
For while such strains seduce my mind,
How shall my heart its purpose keep?

Thy artful lays, which artless seem,
With too much fondness I approve;
Ah! write no more on such a theme,
Or Laura's friendship—ends in love.

TO MISS G—.

AU leave, you cry, the harp unstrung,
For fortune shifts her fickle wind:
Resume thy lyre, on willows hung,
To sing the fair, no longer kind.

No—nearer view my alter'd state,
For fear too high, for hope too low;
Beneath the victor's joyful fate,
Yet far above the captive's woe.

The charms of sense no more beguile;
On reason's lap I lay me down:
If claiming now no beauties' smile,
Appears it just to meet their frown?

Light insects, they, of gaudy hues,
Admire the glare of youthful day,
Still bathe in morn's, not evening's dews,
From shades of autumn fleet away.

Behold their train of captains, beaux!
Disdain my breast, disdain to sigh!
To these the fair, the rivals those,
The son of Jove's be my reply:

“ Ah why desert th' Olympic games?
“ Aspire to victory!” Philip cries:

"I come," young Ammon fierce exclaims,
"If kings my rivals, thro' the prize."

Yes, letter'd maid! my soul approve,
The feat no more of vain desires:
Extinguish'd there the flame of love,
Extinguish'd there ambition's fires!

To save from vice, from folly save,
What aid can beauty, power afford!
Unworthy love to call thee slave,
Unworthy crowds to call thee lord!

Pure reason, yes; pure truth—but why,
Ah why! rebellious heart declare,
With flattering pulse and stifled sigh,
That other tenants harbour there?

Go—tranquil hope, by turns to dwell,
Expelling reason pleasures court,
Expelling passion wisdom's cell:
Go—reason's passion's mutual sport.

Vain dreamer!—rather both revere,
But neither's sole dominion own:
When heaven assign'd to each their sphere,
It never meant excluding one:

Excluding which?—objections wait
On vain pretensions either forms;
Alike to life's salubrious state
Ye both are fatal—calms and storms.

TO LAURA,

On her receiving a Myſterious Letter from a Methodiſt Divine.

THE doctor wakes early—half drest in his cassock,
He steals from his consort to write;
She sleeps—and sweet heaven is invoc'd from his hassock
To lengthen the trance of her night.

Now he writes to the fair, with what fervour he pains
Heaven's glory concern'd in her fame;
How he raves upon grace, and the union of saints,
Idolatry, raptures, and flame?

Equivocal priest, lay solemnity by,
Deceiver thyself, or deceiv'd!
When you kneel to the idol of beauty, and sigh,
Are your ardours for heaven believ'd?

Will the heart that is kindled from passions below
Ascend in pure spirit above?
Ah! analyse better, as blended they glow
The flames of religion and love.—

Quit the teacher, my fair one, and listen to me,
A doctor less grave and severe!
Who eternity's joys for the virtuous can see
Consistent with happiness here.

Still reverence, I preach, those endearing relations
Of daughter, of parent, of wife:
Yet I blame not your relish for slighter sensations
That sweeten the medicine of life.

Know, the virtue it cherishes heaven will reward,
But attend to no blasphemous tales,

That the blaze of the Deity shines unimpair'd,
Though human infirmity fails.

Know your God as he is, wife, good, beyond measure,
No tyrant in horrors array'd,
But a father, who smiles on the innocent pleasure
Of amiable creatures he made!—

Still please, and pursue his benevolent ends,
Still enrapture the heart and the ear!
I can swear for myself, and believe for my friends,
Our morals improve as we hear.

If the passions are waken'd by harmony's charm,
Their breezes waft health to the mind;
What our reason but labours, vain toil! to disarm,
By virtue and song are refin'd.

Ah! listen to me, in-whose natural school
Religion leads truth by the hand!—
Who regulates faith by a mystical rule,
But builds his foundation on sand!

By the winds of unreconcil'd principles driven,
Still fluctuates the Methodist's plan;
Now he wishes you chaste for the glory of heaven,
—Now frail—for the pleasure of man.

ON POLITICS.

TO THE SAME.

FROM moments so precious to life,
All politics, Laura, remove;
Ruby lips must not animate strife,
But breathe the sweet language of love.

What is party?—a zeal without science,
A bubble of popular fame,
In nature and virtue's defiance
'Tis reason enslav'd to a name.

'Tis the language of madness, or fashion,
Where knaves only guess what they mean;
'Tis a cloak to conceal private passion,
To indulge, with applause, private spleen.

Can I, plac'd by my Laura, inquire,
If poison or claret put out
Our Churchill's satirical fire,
If Wilkes lives with ears or without?

When you vary your charms with your patches,
To me 'tis a weightier affair,
Than who writes the northern dispatches,
Or sits in the president's chair.

When, by nature and art form'd to please,
You sing, and you talk, and you laugh,
Can I forefeit such raptures as these,
To dream of the chamberlain's staff?

Secure under Brunswick and heaven,
I trust the itate vessel shall ride;
To Bute let the rudder be given,
Or Pitt be permitted to guide.

At Almack's, when the turtle's well drest,
Must I know the cook's country, or starve?
And when George gives us liberty's feast,
Not taste till Newcastle shall carve?

Yet think not that wildly I range,
With no sober system in view;

My notions are fix'd, though they change,
Applied to Great Britain and you.

There, I reverence our bright constitution,
Not heeding what calumny raves,
Yet wish for a new revolution,
Should rulers treat subjects as slaves.

Here, the doctrine of boundless dominion,
Of boundless obedience is mine;
Ah! my fair, to cure schism in opinion,
Confess non-resistance is thine.

TO LAURA.

FAREWELL TO THE ROSE.

Go rose—in gaudy gardens wilt thou bloom,
Far from the silent vale of peace and love?
On fluttering insects lavish waste perfume,
Or deck the sickle wreath that folly wove?
And yet the fragrance of thy evening hour,
Ambrosial odours, yet to me refuse;
To me, who pay thy sweets, ungrateful flower!
With rich returns of incense from the muse?
Who but the muse transplants thee, short-liv'd
rose!
From mortal regions to celestial seats?
By memory's fountain, where thy buds disclose
Eternal beauties, with eternal sweets.

SONG TO ***.

WHAT! bid me seek another fair,
In untry'd paths of female wiles?
And posies weave of other hair
And bask secure in other smiles?
Thy friendly stars no longer prize,
And light my course by other eyes?

Ah no!—my dying lips shall clofe,
Unalter'd love, as faith, professing;
Nor praising him, who life bestows,
Forget who makes that gift a blessing.
My last address to Heav'n is due;
The last but one is all—to you.

On men being deprived, from Custom and Delicacy, of enjoying social Friendship with the Fair Sex.

HAD soft Aspasia's sex been man,
What friendship's holy chains
Had link'd our beings, fortune's plan,
Our pleasures and our pains?

Alike our ruder, milder sports,
Our studies too the same,
Companions both in shades and courts,
In paths of love or fame.

By bright collision, patriot beams
Had flush'd from soul to soul,
And war had seen, in union's streams,
Our tide of glory roll.

There fate, that strikes the noblest breast,
Had surely reverenc'd thine;
The thirsty lance I then had blest
For only wounding mine.

But ah! my sweeter downy hours,
Had I been chang'd, not you;
What tranquil joys, if kinder powers,
Had made me woman too!

Made each the other's softer care,
One table then had fed,
One chamber lodg'd the faithful pair,
Ah do not blush!—one bed.

Both sitting at one busy loom
In nature's vernal bow'r,
Had rivall'd nature's vernal bloom,
Creating both one flow'r.

Both screen'd from summer's sultry view,
In shades by haunted stream,
Had own'd the moral vision true
That youthful poets dream.

Sweet wisdom, couch'd in mystic rhyme,
Yet bending o'er the brook,
Had gather'd morals more sublime
From great creation's book;

And felt our mixing souls refine
In purer wisdom's ray,
The being virtue's friend and thine
Had clear'd our mists away.

My morning incense, ev'ning pray'r,
With thine, had soar'd above,
With thine ascending sweeter there
On wings of song and love.

Vain dreams! for custom's laws, combin'd
With virtue's stern decree,
Divide the beings nature join'd,
Divide my fair from me.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

PAINTING AT THE NEWS OF HER FRIEND'S MISFORTUNES.

AH! maid too gentle, while thy tears deplore
The virtuous exile on a foreign shore,
Thy pulse forgets to beat, thy cheek to glow,
Dim the bright eye, fix'd monument of woe,
Lost every function, vanish'd every sense:
Is this thy lot, divine benevolence?
Approach no more, such bitter anguish, near
So lost a bosom: slow alone the tear,
That dew of heaven, O maid! to heaven allied,
Thy great Redeemer shed for man, and died.
Good angels mourn creation's glories lost,
And mourning please, resemble him the most;
Flow then thy tear, ordain'd by Heaven's decree,
For bliss to others, sweeter bliss to thee!
With pity's pangs her dear sensations feel;
The shaft that wounds thee, drops a balm to heal.
Thy soul expanding, like a vernal flower,
Shall glow the brighter in affliction's shower.
For every tear to suffering virtue given,
Itself approving, and approv'd by Heaven.
Weep then, but weep another's fate alone;
Let smiles be still attendant on thy own!

ON THE DEATH OF AN INFANT.

How blest is he whom nature's gentle hand
Has snatch'd from human life and human woes,

Ev'n in his childish days, ere yet he knew
 Or sin, or pain, or youthful passion's force!
 In earth's soft lap, beneath the flowery turf,
 His peaceful ashes sleep; to heaven ascends
 Th' unspotted soul, declar'd by voice divine
 A guest well pleasing—Then no longer mourn,
 Thou drooping parent, nor bewail him lost—
 In life's first bloom, when infant reason dawn'd,
 And the young mind, unfolding every power,
 Gave promise fair of manhood, transport fill'd
 The mother's bosom, pondering every word
 And action there. She now lamenting loud
 Déplores him, from her vain embraces torn
 By unrelenting fate, and fierce disease;
 Like eastern storms that blast the opening year.

TO MISS N——M,

WRITTEN AT BRIGHTHELMSTONE.

LOVELY N——m! rise, and see
 Modest morn resemble thee!
 Ocean smiles with your repose,
 Come to seas, where Venus rofe!
 Bathing, Dr. Pool observes,
 Braces all the optic nerves.
 "Heavens," she cries, "what idle whim!
 "Youthful eyes are seldom dim;
 "Mine can mark the distant sail,
 "Or lowing herds in Suffex vale;
 "Scarce a spire or cottage smoke,
 "Or cloud embracing mountain oak;
 "An object scarce of land or sea
 "Rises unperceiv'd by me."
 True—but eyes that distant roam,
 Frequent fail for scenes at home.
 Let example make me clearer,
 Place yourself at Shergold's mirror!
 Every mild reflected grace,
 That angel form; that angel face,
 A world of wonders all can view,
 Envy only blind and—you.

TO THE MRS.'S R——S,

WRITTEN AT BRIGHTHELMSTONE.

No, gentle ladies!—he on BRIGHTON'S flood,
 Who deck'd with N——s" name a feeble page?
 For you, the guardians of the fair and good,
 Has arm'd no bitter stings of Satan's rage.
 On impious necks the muse of vengeance treads,
 For shameless folly dips her shafts in gall;
 While, dropping odours on your virtuous heads,
 The dews of praise, a precious ointment, fall.
 Your N——m's mind in every virtue grew,
 In every grace, beneath your sweet controul;
 In genuine lustre were preserv'd by you
 Her polish'd form, reflecting all the soul.
 Her candid smiles, unconscious of their worth,
 Her blush of nature without other dye!
 You taught her modest eyes to love the earth,
 Or soar in flaming rapture to the sky.
 Her, the best gift of Heaven, its gracious love
 Permitted to your guidance—come and share

The joy of virtuous souls, whose toils improve
 The * talents trusted to their fruitful care.
 Come, faithful servants—hear a voice proclaim
 Your hymn of triumph—'tis no song of mine;
 'Tis heaven that calls you to partake your fame,
 With God the giver, and this gift divine.

VERSES

WRITTEN AT BRIGHTHELMSTONE.

HERE Charles lay shelter'd, from this desert shore
 He launch'd the bark, and brav'd the tempest's roar;
 He trusted here the faith of simple swains,
 And ocean; friendlier than the Worcester † plains,
 No beauteous forms, as now, adorn'd it then,
 The downs were pathless, without haunt of men.
 One shepherd wander'd on the lonely hill,
 One village-maid explor'd the distant rill.
 But mark the glittering scenes succeeding these;
 See peopled all the shores, and healing seas;
 Yet, friend to Britain, flows alike the wave
 With India's treasures, and defrauds the grave.
 Had fate now plac'd him on this fairy land,
 The thoughtless Charles had linger'd on the strand,
 Nor danger chill'd, nor high ambition fir'd
 That wanton bosom, by the loves inspir'd:
 His languid sails the monarch here had fur'd,
 Had gain'd a N——m's smile, and lost the world.

TO MISS G——,

FROM BRIGHTHELMSTONE.

COME, Stella, let us climb the heights
 Where purer spirits flow,
 And upward point our mental flights,
 And mock the scenes below.
 And turn no more the giddy rounds
 Of pleasure's wanton chase,
 But range beyond material bounds,
 Eternity, and space!—
 Come, read in ocean's ample page,
 Explain the cause that guides,
 That bridles now, and now to rage
 Precipitates the tides.
 In glory see the planets roll,
 Their laws, their measure, scan,
 Nor there confin'd, explore the soul,
 And liberty, and man!
 On soaring pinions let us shoot,
 Like him, the bird of Jove!
 —"What waste," she cries, "in such pursuit,
 "An age of life and love!
 "With eagle sight and eagle view
 "Let Newton fail the sky!
 "But what am I? or what are you,
 "Philosopher?—a fly!

† Charles the II. after the battle of Worcester, escaped to France in a fishing-boat, from Bright-helmstone.

- " Vain insect! now aloft he springs
 " To drink the liquid light,
 " And quenches now his flagging wings
 " In angry seas and night.
 " Ah fool! to quit his reptile state
 " Amid fresh dews and flowers!
 " Be his the justly purchas'd fate,
 " The sober lesson ours.
 " From clouds descending, let us try
 " What humbler regions give!
 " Let others soar to fall and die!
 " 'Tis ours to creep, and live."

ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING VERSES.

BY MISS G.—

- No more let science tempt thy searching eyes
 Beyond the bounds prescrib'd to mortal fight,
 No more advent'rous mount the lofty skies,
 And daring, penetrate the realms of light.
 With humble mind go trace thy Maker's hand
 In every smiling valley, fertile plain;
 Adore his bounty in the cultur'd land,
 Revere his wisdom in the stormy main!
 Nor thoughtless view the vast tremendous sea,
 Whose course impetuous power divine restrains;
 Whose rushing tide, controul'd by heaven's decree,
 Forbears to violate the flow'ry plains.
 Nor yet confine to these thy wand'ring sight,
 While splendid gems the face of heav'n adorn;
 Nor heedless view the radiant lamps of night,
 Nor heedless view the sun that gilds the morn :
 But turn with praise to him who reigns above,
 Supreme o'er works that speak Almighty
 power;
 O! turn a grateful bosom breathing love,
 And learn the noblest lesson—to adore.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG GENTLE-MAN.

Go, mournful spirit, wing thy dreary way,
 Leave a lov'd mansion, leave the cheerful day;
 A naked wanderer on the winter's wind,
 Ah leave, reluctant, youth and strength behind!
 Not long a wanderer, to that happier shore
 Be heaven thy guide, where mourning is no more!
 In purer mansions, in a form divine,
 Immortal youth, immortal joy, be thine!

INSCRIPTION FOR A FOUNTAIN.

O you, who mark what flowrets gay,
 What gales, what odours breathing near,
 What sheltering shades from summer's ray
 Allure my spring to linger here :
 Yet see me quit this margin green,
 Yet see me deaf to pleasure's call,
 Explore the thirsty haunts of men,
 Yet see my bounty flow for all.

O learn of me --no partial rill,
 No slumbering selfish pool be you;
 But social laws alike fulfil;
 O flow for all creation too!

On the Converting the late Mr. Wooddeson's House, at Kingston, into a Poor-House, and cutting down the great Walk of High Trees before it.

WHERE the broad path-way fronts yon ancient seat,
 Approach not, stranger, with unhallow'd feet,
 Nor mock the spot, unshelter'd now, and bare!
 The grove's old honours rose majestic there:
 Its giant arms extending to defend Thy reverend temple, man's and virtue's friend!
 Secure thy walk that unpierc'd gloom along,
 No storm approach'd to silence Homer's song;
 No beam to wound thy heav'n-directed eye:
 The world's near tumult swept unheeded by.
 Now, low as thine, these towering heads are laid,
 Nor more embower the mansion in their shade,
 Time-honour'd pile! that, owning thee its lord,
 Saw ancient manners, ancient faith, restor'd;
 In renovated youth beheld again
 Saturnian days, the good Eliza's reign.
 With thee too sheltering many an angel guest,
 For what, but heaven, fiercer than thy breath?—
 Blest mansion then, simplicity's abode,
 Where smiling innocence look'd up to God,
 Where nature's genuine graces charm'd the
 heart,
 Or nature, polish'd but by classic art.
 There fancy, warm'd with brightest, chastest
 beams,
 The faint's high rapture, and the poet's dreams,
 While virtue left, delighting there to dwell,
 The penive mountain, and the hermit's cell—
 There the good teacher held by turns to youth
 The blaze of fiction and pure light of truth,
 Who, less by precept than example fir'd,
 Glow'd as he taught, inspiring and inspir'd.
 Nor think, gay travellers, this awful roof
 Echoed no sounds but wisdom's harsh reproof;
 The social board, attendant mirth, was there,
 The smile unconscious of to-morrow's care,
 With every tranquil joy of wedded life,
 The gracious children, and the faithful wife.
 In dance, in song, in harmless sports approv'd,
 There youth has frolic'd, there soft maids have lov'd.
 There one, distinguish'd one—not sweeter blows
 In simpler ornament attir'd, the rose,
 The rose the cull'd to deck the nuptial bower,
 Herself as fair—a transitory flower.—
 Thus a short hour—and woods and turrets fall;
 The good, the great, the beauteous, perish all.
 Another age a gayer race supplies,
 Less awful groves, and gaudier villas rise.
 See wisdom's place usurp'd by folly's sons,
 And scorner's sit on virtue's vacant throne.

See neighbouring Combe's old genius quit its bowers,

Not * Warwick's name preserv'd his Gothic

While yet this humbler pile survives to prove

A mansion worthy of its master's love:

Like him, still, welcomes to its liberal door [poor;

Whom most he honour'd, honouring most the

Like him, the lisping infant's blessing shares,

And age's gratitude in silent prayers,---

While such partake the couch, the frugal feast,

No regal chambers boast an equal guest;

For, gracious Maker, by thy own decree,

Receiving mercy is receiving thee!--

ON THE DEATH OF EDWARD LOVIBOND, ESQ.

BY MISS C-----.

Ah! what avails---that once the muses crown'd
Thy head with laurels, and thy temples bound!
That in that polish'd mind bright genius shone,
That letter'd science mark'd it for her own!
Cold is that breast that breath'd celestial fire!
Mute is that tongue, and mute that tuneful lyre!
O could my muse but emulate thy lays,
Immortal numbers should record thy praise,
Redeem thy virtues from oblivion's sleep,
And o'er thy urn bid distant ages weep!--
Yet though no laureat flowers bestrew thy herse,
Nor pompous sounds exalt the glowing verse,
Sublimer truth inspires this humbler strain,
Bids love lament, and friendship here complain:
Bids o'er thy tomb the muse her sorrows shed,
And weep her genius, number'd with the dead!--

THE LIFE OF PENROSE.

FOR the few particulars which are recorded of the personal history of PENROSE, the world is indebted to his relation, John Petrit Andrews, Esq., the editor of his works, and author of "The History of Great Britain," 3 vols. 4to, 1794-95, and other literary performances.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from the brief "Introduction" of Mr. Andrews, dated "The Grove, Nov 1781," with such additional information as the "Gentleman's Magazine," and other publications, have supplied.

Thomas Penrose was born in 1743. He was the son of the Rev. Mr. Penrose, rector of Newbury in Berkshire, descended from an ancient family in Cornwall; a man of high character and abilities, and beloved and respected by all who knew him.

Being intended for the church, after passing through the usual course of school education in the country; he was entered at Christ Church College, Oxford, where he pursued his studies, for some time, with remarkable success.

In the summer 1762, his eager turn to the naval and military line, overpowering his attachment to his real interest, he left his college, and embarked in the private expedition against Buenos Ayres, in South America, under the command of Captain Macnamara, an adventurer of spirit and experience.

The embarkation was made from the Tagus, Aug. 30. 1762; and the force, partly English, and partly Portuguese, consisted of the Lord Clive of 64 guns; the Ambuscade of 40, on board which Penrose acted as a lieutenant of marines; the Gloria of 38; and some small armed vessels and store-ships. They had on board about 500 soldiers.

The Spaniards having, some time before, taken the Portuguese settlement of Nova Colonia they judged it necessary to begin with the recovery of that settlement before they made any attack upon Buenos Ayres.

Though the enterprize was not without danger, there was great reason to expect success. The ships were in good order, and the men in good spirits. They advanced to the attack with horns sounding and drums beating; and every thing expressed hope and joy.

This gay preparative was followed by a fierce fire, supported on both sides for four hours, at a very small distance, with uncommon resolution; but the spirit and perseverance of the Spaniards, were more than equalled by the British ships, whose fire at length became superior. The Spanish batteries were almost silenced. The English were in expectation of seeing the colours immediately struck, when just as their success seemed certain, by some unknown accident, the Lord Clive took fire. In an instant she was all in a blaze. The same moment discovered the flames, and the impossibility of extinguishing them.

Then was to be seen a most dreadful spectacle. All the sides of the ship were immediately crowded with naked men, who, but a few minutes before, reckoned themselves almost in the assured possession of wealth and conquest, precipitating themselves into the sea, with the melancholy alternative of a death by fire or water. The enemy's fire, which recommenced on this accident, redoubled their distress; and many who might have escaped drowning, perished by the shot. Captain Macnamara was drowned; and of 340 souls, only 78 in all escaped.

The other vessels of the Squadron, far from being able to afford any assistance to the sufferers, were obliged to get off as expeditiously as they could, lest they should have been involved in the same fate,

The Ambuscade with difficulty escaped. She was little better than a wreck. She had sixty shot in her hull, and six feet of water in her hold; and all her rigging was miserably mangled. By exertion of uncommon efforts, they made a shift to get into the Portuguese settlement at Rio Janeiro.

Amidst the preparations for the attack of Nova Colonia, the attention of Penrose was occupied by the tender remembrance of Miss Mary Slocock, of Newbury, the lady whom he afterwards married, to whom, with equal collectedness and tranquillity of mind, he wrote the verses on board the Ambuscade, Jan. 6. 1763:

Amidst this nobly awful scene,
Ere yet fell slaughter's rage begin,
Ere death his conquests swell,
Let me to love this tribute pay,
For Polly frame this parting lay,
Perhaps my last farewell.
For since full low among the dead,
Must many a gallant youth be laid,
Ere this day's work be o'er,
Perhaps even I, with joyful eyes,
That saw this morning's sun arise,
Shall see it set no more.

On leaving the river of Plate, after the unsuccessful attack of Nova Colonia, in which he was wounded, he solaced his sorrow for the melancholy loss of his companions, by inscribing an elegy to the memory of the unfortunate sufferers:

Adieu! ye walls; thou fatal stream farewell,
By war's sad chance, beneath whose muddy waves,
Full many a gallant youth untimely fell,
Full many a Briton found an early grave!
Beneath thy tide, ah! silent now they roll,
Or tread with mangled limbs thy sandy shore:
The trumpet's call no more awakes their soul;
The battle's voice, they now shall hear no more.

Though the Ambuscade escaped, and he recovered from the wound he received in the engagement, yet the hardships which he afterwards sustained in a prize sloop, in which he was stationed, utterly ruined his constitution.

Returning to England, with ample testimonials of his gallantry and good behaviour, he finished, at Hertford College, Oxford, his academical studies; and, having taken orders, accepted the curacy of Newbury, the income of which, by the voluntary subscription of the inhabitants, was considerably augmented.

In 1764, he lamented the loss of a sister, in a pathetic Elegy to the Memory of Miss Mary Penrose, who died, Dec. 18. 1764, in the nineteenth year of her age.

In 1768, he married Miss Slocock of Newbury, whose beauty and accomplishments had made an early impression on his susceptible heart.

In 1774, he published a Sermon, preached at the funeral of the Rev. John Gerec, 4to, which was followed, in 1775, by his Flights of Fancy, 4to; consisting of three short poems, the Helmets, the Carousal of Odin, and Madness; which were read with general approbation.

The year following, he expressed his disapprobation of the conduct of government towards America, in his Address to the Genius of Britain, 4to; in which he requested that power to solicit his Majesty to put an end to our civil dissensions; but it was nothing more than operam atque oleum perdere.

In 1777, he published a Sermon preached on the national fast, 4to, which was the last publication he gave to the world.

After he had continued in the station of a curate about nine years, it seemed as if the clouds of disappointment, which had hitherto overshadowed his prospects, and tinged his poetical essays with gloom, were clearing away; for he was then presented by a friend, who knew his worth, and honoured his abilities, to the rectory of Beckington and Standerwick, in Somersetshire, worth near 500l. per annum. It came, however, too late; for the state of his health, which had been for some time declining, was now such as left little hope, except in the assistance of the waters of Bristol.

Thither he went, and there he died in 1777, in the 36th year of his age; leaving one child, Thomas, admitted on the foundation of Winchester College in 1781.

His Flights of Fancy, and Address to the Genius of Britain, were reprinted, with several pieces, never before printed, in one volume 12mo, under the title of Poems by the Rev. Mr. Thomas Penrose, 1781, with an "Introduction" by James Pettit Andrews, Esq. containing a short account of his life and character. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1781, received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry.

"Mr. Penrose", says Mr. Andrews, who knew him well, "was respected for his extensive erudition, admired for his eloquence, and equally beloved and esteemed for his social qualities. By the poor, towards whom he was liberal to his utmost ability, he was venerated to the highest degree. In oratory and composition, his talents were great. His pencil was ready as his pen; and on subjects of humour, had uncommon merit. To his poetical abilities, the public, by their reception of his Flights of Fancy, &c. gave several favourable testimonies. To sum up the whole, his figure and address were as pleasing as his mind was ornamented.

"Such was Mr. Penrose, to whose memory I pay this just and willing tribute, and to whom I consider it as an honour to be related:

" Multis ille bonis flebilis occidit — Nullis flebilior quam mihi."

Penrose has written but little; but his Flights of Fancy, if he had written nothing else, are sufficient to entitle him to a classical distinction among the poets of our country.

All his compositions bear evident marks of a natural enthusiasm, harmony, and simplicity. But it is in the higher kinds of poetry, which require the most vigorous exertions of fancy, and to which a laboured and artificial diction is best suited, that he chiefly excels. His lyric compositions are characterized by a luxuriance of imagination, a wild sublimity of fancy, and a command of language, which entitle them to rank with the productions of Collins, Gray, and other writers of the same school. They are replete with the same spirit of impersonation, the same animation of sentiment, the same magnificence of phraseology, the same general and expanded description. But they have more of the spirit and manner of Collins than of Gray. They are impregnated with the genuine seeds of poetry; but they have more of the enthusiasm that "delights and chills," than of the "pomp and prodigality of heaven."

His Flights of Fancy consist of three poems. The first is intitled, The Helms, wherein these formidable pieces of ancient armour, are supposed to rise and prognosticate civil dissensions in Britain, in consequence of the disturbances in America. It is written in blank verse, and affords a specimen of considerable strength and harmony in that metre. The general imagery is well conceived, the sentiments are happily suited to the subject, and the expression is often highly poetical. The predominant defect is an obscure magnificence. In the second poem, The Carousal of Odin, we recognize both the spirit and manner of Gray. It is evidently modelled upon his "Norse Odes," and is impregnated with fire and poetical enthusiasm, in an uncommon degree. The last, intitled Madness, is a composition of a superior order, and challenges a comparison with the "Music Ode" of Dryden, the "Passions" of Collins, and the "Bard" of Gray. The disposition is artful and happy. The mind of the reader, after the horror excited by the view of the fettered maniac, is relieved by a tender and pathetic melancholy on beholding the poor, distracted fair. And, again, that melancholy passes into a different, though a kindred pity, occasioned by the circumstances of the mimic monarch, whose disturbing the reveries of the love-lorn maid, produces the finest poetical and dramatic effect. This evinces the poet's taste; for if the disposition had been different, the effect would have been less happy. He is not less fortunate in his description; the maniac appearing first in all the terrible circumstances of his character, and every suggestion of tenderness, and all the sensations of pity called up to qualify the attendant horrors:

No pleasing memory left—forgotten quite
All former scenes of dear delight,
Connubial love—parental joy, &c.

Nothing can be more finely pictured than the subject of the love madness. The whole description maintains the truest propriety, and is executed with the happiest care.

Now, sadly gay, of sorrows past she sings,
Now, pensive, ruminates unutterable things—

is one of those exquisite strokes that only can fall from the pencil of true genius. Equally happy too, is the expression itself, as the idea it conveys.

—————ruminates unutterable things.

It is impossible that the same idea should be so powerfully impressed by any other words.

The fetter'd maniac foams along,
(Rage the burden of his jarring song.)

In rage he grinds his teeth, and rends his streaming hair.

The second line is another instance of excellent and well adapted expression. Had it been smoothed and regularized by the word is, after rage, it would have wanted its present force, its characteristic dissonance, and harshness. The line that follows it is equally excellent. The picture of the Momus of the flighty train, is entitled to great praise.

Merry mischief fills his brain,
Blanket-rob'd, and antic crown'd,
The mimic monarch skips around;
Big with conceit of dignity, he smiles,
And plots his frolics quaint, and unsuspected wiles:

There are many more remarkable beauties in this excellent ode, particularly the description of Devotion's ruin'd child; to which the reader of taste will require no direction.

His Address to the Genius of Britain, is written with a liberal spirit, and contains some pathetic passages and beautiful lines. It is devoted to his patriot feelings, and he delivers his sentiments (which may now be considered as prophetic) with a fervour that leaves no doubt on our minds of the virtue of his intentions. In this performance, there is considerable strength of numbers, of painting, and of fancy.

Of his posthumous poems, it is not to be expected that every piece will be equally correct and finished as it might have been, had he lived to superintend the publication himself. There are, however, several pieces, not unworthy of the same pen, which produced Madness. Of these, not the least beautiful, is the Field of Battle. To the reader of sensibility, it will be needless to point out the particular merit of the following stanzas, describing the distraction of the wife of an officer, in search of her husband, slain in battle.

She prest to hear—she caught the tale—
At every sound her blood congeal'd—
With terror bold—with terror pale,
She sprung to search the fatal field.
O'er the sad scene, in dire amaze
She went—with courage not her own—
On many a corpse she cast her gaze—
And turn'd her ear to many a groan.
Drear anguish urged her to prest
Full many a hand, as wild she mourn'd,
—Of comfort glad, the drear cares,
The damp cold dying hand return'd.

The exquisitely pathetic and natural thought contained in the two last lines, would scarcely have suggested itself to any one who had not been an eye-witness of the affecting scenes, subsequent to a military engagement; and who had not, probably, experienced, from the hand of some expiring friend, a return similar to what he has so feelingly described. The fragment, intitled The Curate, deserves great praise, for happy delineation of character, natural humour, quaint phraseology, tenderness of sentiment, and simplicity of expression. The verses to his wife, on the anniversary of their wedding day, shews the mind of the writer in an amiable point of view. The Hermit's Vision, Mortality, The Justice, Donnington Castle, Poverty, The Harp, are characterized by superior animation of sentiment, fertility of invention, and splendor of diction. Of his Elegies, the general character, both of the sentiments and the language, is tenderness and simplicity; the versification is harmonious, and a general air of classic elegance runs through the whole. His fragments and smaller pieces may be read with pleasure, though they have not a sufficient degree of merit to entitle them to a place among the favoured productions of poetry.

THE WORKS OF PENROSE.

P O E M S, &c.

ADDRESSED TO THREE LADIES.

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVOURITE PARROQUET.

DEEP from your hallow'd, silent shades
Attend, attend, ye tuneful maids ;
Ye muses, haste along.
Inspire the tender, moving lay,
For surely such a mournful day
Demands a serious song.

See where with pity's force oppress'd,
(While rising sorrows heave each breast)
Three gentle sisters weep.
See how they point with streaming eyes.
Where Parroquetta slumb'ring lies,
Her last, eternal sleep.

In vain the pride of beauty's bloom,
The vivid dye, the varied plume
O'er her fair form were spread :
In vain the scarlet's blushing ray,
Bright as the orient beam of day,
Adorn'd her lovely head.

Love, beauty, youth, perfection,---all Together undistinguish'd fall
Before the opposing fates.
The lisping tongue, the silver hairs,
One common ruin overbears,
One common lot awaits.

Then calm, dear maids, your woes to peace,
With unavailing sorrow cease
Your favourite to deplore ;
For know, the time will surely come
When you (though now in beauty's bloom)
When you shall charm no more.

Learn then your moments to employ
In virtuous love, in Hymen's joy,
Ere yet those moments fly ;
For fate has doom'd this lot severe,
The brightest belle, the loveliest fair,
Like parroquettes, must die.

Written Friday Evening, February 5, 1762, in the Cloysters of Christ Church, Oxon ; on being disappointed of going to the Assembly at Newbury, Berks.

Loud howl the winds around this awful pile,
A dusky light the pale-ey'd moon-beams shed ;
While I amid the long-drawn cloyster'd aisle,
Silent and sad the letter'd pavement tread.

Where, low in earth---ah ! never more to rise,
Unnotic'd, unregarded, and unknown,
Full many a shrouded student sleeping lies,
O'er whom still weeps the monumental stone.

Here, as I pace the hallow'd gloom along,
Where at this hour no other foot dares rove,
Quick on my mind what dear ideas throng,
How heaves my heart, and melts with faithful
love.

See, see my Chloe rises to my view,
In all the pride of youth and virtue's charms !
Swift as the winds the fair one I pursue,
But clasp an empty phantom to my arms.

Methinks I see the dance's circling round,
The cheerful music, hark ! methinks, I hear !
The viol sweet, and hautboy's gladfome sound,
And sprightly tabor strike my wond'ring ear.

But ah ! again the pleasing dream is gone ;
Swift as the gales, fee, fee, it flies away ;
And leaves me wretched, darkling, and alone
Amidst this melancholy scene to stray.

O ! hear, ye gods, accept my humble pray'r !
Grant me, O ! grant my heart's fond, best defire ;
Give to my faithful arms, my constant fair ;
Give this---nor wealth, nor honours I require.

TO MISS SLOCOCK.

Written on board the Ambuscade, Jan. 6th 1763, a short Time before the Attack of Nova Colonia do Sacramento, in the river of Plate.

The fates ordain, we must obey ;
This, this is doom'd to be the day ;
The hour of war draws near,
The eager crew with busy care
Their instruments of death prepare,
And banish every fear.

The martial trumpets call to arms,
Each breast with such an ardour warms,
As Britons only know.
The flag of battle waving high,
Attracts with joy each Briton's eye ;
With terror strikes the foe.

Amidst this nobly awful scene,
Ere yet fell slaughter's rage begin,
Ere death his conquests swell,

Let me to love this tribute pay,
For Polly frame the parting lay;
Perhaps my last farewell.

For since full low among the dead,
Must many a gallant youth be laid,
Ere this day's work be o'er:
Perhaps e'en I, with joyful eyes
That saw this morning's sun arise,
Shall see it set no more.

My love that ever burnt so true,
That but for thee no wishes knew;
My heart's fond, best desire!
Shall be remember'd e'en in death,
And only with my latest breath,
With life's last pang expire.

And when, dear maid, my fate you hear,
(Sore love like mine demands one tear, Demands one heart-felt sigh)
My past sad errors, O forgive,
Let my few virtues only live,
My follies with me die.

But, hark! the voice of battle calls;
Loud thund'ring from the tow'ry walls
Now roars the hostile gun,
Adieu, dear maid!--with ready feet,
I go prepar'd the worst to meet,
Thy will, O God, be done!

ELEGY

On leaving the River of Plate, after the unsuccessful Attack of Nova Colonia do Sacramento, by the Lord Clive of 64 Guns, the Ambuscade of 40, and the Gloria of 38; in which the former was unfortunately burnt, with the greatest part of her crew; and the two latter obliged to retire in a very shattered condition.

WHILE the torn vessel stems her lab'ring way,
Ere yon blue hills sink ever from my view;
Let me to sorrow raise the tribute lay;
And take of them my long, my last adieu.

Adieu! ye walls! thou fatal stream farewell;
By war's sad chance beneath whose muddy wave

Full many a gallant youth untimely fell,
Full many a Briton found an early grave.

Beneath thy tide, ah! silent now they roll,
Or strew with-mangled limbs thy sandy shore;
The trumpet's call no more awakes their soul!
The battle's voice they now shall hear no more.

In vain the constant wife and feeble sire,
Expectant wish their lov'd return to see;
In vain their infants' lisping tongues inquire,
And wait the story on their father's knee.

Ah! nought avails their anxious, busy care;
Far, far, they lie, on hostile seas they sell;
The wife's, fire's, infant's joy no more to share,
The tale of glorious deeds no more to tell.

Learn then, ye fair, for others woes to feel,
Let the soft tear bedew the sparkling eye;

When the brave perish for their country's weal,
'Tis pity's debt to heave the heartfelt sigh.

Ah! glorious Drake! far other lot was thine,
Fate gave to thee to quell the hostile pride;
To seize the treasures of Potofi's mine,
And sail triumphant o'er La Plata's tide.

But Providence, on secret wonders bent,
Conceals its purposes from mortal view;
And Heaven no doubt with some allwise intent,
Deny'd to numbers what it gave to few.

ELEGY

TO THE MEMORY OF MISS MARY PENROSE,
Who died December 18th, 1764, in the Nineteenth year of her Age.

HEARD ye the bell from yonder dusky tower?
Deep, deep it tolls the summons of the dead;
And marks with sullen note the solemn hour,
That calls Maria to her earthy bed.

O! come, ye mournful virgin train, attend,
With musing step the hallow'd place draw near,
View there your once-lov'd, happy, blooming
friend,
Now silent, slumb'ring on the sable bier.

Come ye, who join'd in friendship's sacred tie,
With her engag'd in pleasure's guiltless scene;
Who shar'd with her the tender, social joy;
Wove the gay dance, or trod the flow'ry green:

Mark here, O! mark, how chang'd, how alter'd lies [beat high:
The breast that once with youth's warm tide
Read your own fate in her's:--in time be wife,
And from her bright example learn to die.

Like drooping lillies cropt by win'try wind,
For fate has doom'd the hour when die you must,

Must leave the world's fantastic dreams behind,
And sleep, and mingle with your parent dust.

Say, are your forms with youth's soft graces dress'd?
Say, are they ting'd with beauty's brightest bloom?

So once was her's--by you--by all confess'd,
'Till death untimely swept her to the tomb.

Her eyes beam'd out how innocent, how meek!
At whose rebuke vice shrunk abash'd and pale;
Like vernal roses blush'd her modest cheek,
Like them as lovely, and like them as frail.

How was she skill'd the softest breasts to move!
Of hardest hearts the passions rough to bend!
How was she skill'd to win the general love!
How form'd to bless the husband or the friend!

With meek-soul'd charity, with pitying hands,
To misery oft her little store she gave;
Now she herself our flowing tears demands,
And bids our pious drops bedew her grave.

There on her dusty couch in firm repose,
Deaf to our call, the clay-cold slumb'rer lies;
Her beauty faded-like the blasted rose, [eyes.
Mute her sweet tongue, and clos'd her radiant

Full many an hour of agonizing pain
 She, patient sufferer, bore her lot severe;
 Well did the anguish of her soul restrain,
 Nor dropt one female, one repining tear.

'Midst life's last pangs religion lent her aid,
 And wip'd with lenient hand her misty eyes;
 With blest assurance cheer'd the pain-worn maid,
 And bad her hopes high-soaring reach the skies.

There now, enroll'd with heavenly angels bright,
 Whose hallow'd hymns their Maker's glorious raise,
 She shines, resplendent in the blaze of light,
 And swells with raptur'd note the voice of praise.

Look down, blest saint, O! turn a pitying eye!
 If yet in heav'n a brother's name be dear:
 In the dread hour of danger be thou nigh,
 And lead me far from vice's baneful snare.

Teach me, whate'er my future lot shall be,
 To God's just will my being to resign:
 Teach me to sail through life's tempestuous sea;
 And like thy latest parting hour be mine.

TO MY DEAREST WIFE,

ON OUR WEDDING-DAY.

THE happy morn's arriv'd at last,
 That binds our nuptial union fast;
 And knits our plighted vows in one,
 With bonds that ne'er can be undone.
 Can I be backward then, to pay
 The tribute of this joyful day?
 Can I refuse my voice to raise,
 And hymn to God the song of praise?

No—surely gratitude demands
 This humble action from my hands,
 And bids me blest that God who gave
 Safe passage o'er the stormy wave,
 Who turn'd the shafts of war aside,
 And blest'd me with so lov'd a bride.
 O! be that season ne'er forgot,
 When hope itself could flatter not,
 When doubts were all my soul's employ,
 Nor dar'd I paint the present joy.
 But yet, my love, be mine the blame,
 Thy goodness ever was the fame;
 The fault was mine, misguided youth!
 When folly held the place of truth.
 And vice and error's syren smile,
 My artless bosom did beguile.
 What though, by heedless heat misled,
 To war and foreign climes I fled,
 Forsook thy love, and peaceful ease,
 And plough'd, long plough'd the southern seas;
 Yet, though unworthy of thy care,
 Thy kind, dear love pursu'd me there,
 And 'midst the battle's horrid strife,
 Thy tender pray'r preserv'd my life.
 God heard thy pray'rs, my heart's lov'd queen,
 His shield protect'd me unseen,
 His favour kept me safe from harms,
 And lodg'd me in thy faithful arms.
 Be't then my task, with grateful breast
 To hush thy ey'ry care to rest,
 And make thee, while thy love survives,
 The happiest of all happy wives.
 Yes, yes, my dear, the nuptial vow
 Shall ever bind as strong as now;
 My duty I shall ne'er forego,
 No change, no other wish I'll know;
 But still I'll prove to life's last end,
 The kindest husband, truest friend.

THE HELMETS.—CAROUSAL OF ODIN.—MADNESS.—ADDRESS TO THE GENIUS OF BRITAIN.

THE HELMETS,

A FRAGMENT.

The Scene of the following Event is laid in the neighbourhood of Donnington Castle, in a House built after the Gothic taste, upon a spot famous for a bloody encounter between the Armies of Charles and the Parliament.

The Prognostication alludes to Civil Dissention, which some have foretold would arise in England, in consequence of the dispute, with America.

—'T WAS midnight—every mortal eye was clos'd
 Thro' the whole mansion—save an antique crenel's,

That o'er the dying embers faintly watch'd
 The broken sleep (fell harbinger of death)
 Of a sick boteler.—Above indeed
 In a drear gallery (lighted by one lamp
 Whose wick the poor departing Seneschall
 Did closely imitate), pac'd slow and sad
 The village curate, waiting late to thrive
 The penitent when 'wake. Scarce show'd the ray
 To fancy's eye, the pourtray'd characters
 That grac'd the wall.—On this and 'other side
 Suspended, nodded o'er the steeple stair,
 In many a trophy form'd, the knightly groupe

Of helms and targets, gauntlets, maces strong,
And horses' furniture—brave monuments
Of ancient chivalry.—Through the stain'd pane
Low gleam'd the moon—not bright—but of such pow'r

As marked the clouds, black, threatening over head,
Full mischief-fraught;—from these in many a peal
Growl'd the near thunder—flash'd the frequent blaze

Of light'ning blue.—While round the fretted dome
The wind fung furly: with unusual clank
The armour shook tremendous:—On a couch
Plac'd in the oriel*, sunk the churchman down:
For who, alone, at that dread hour of night,
Could bear portentous prodigy?—

“I hear it,” cries the proudly gilded casque (Fill'd by the soul of one, who erst took joy
In slaughterous deeds) “I hear amidst the gale
“The hostile spirit shouting—once—once more
“In the thick harvest of the spears we'll shine—
“There will be work anon.”

“I'm waken'd too,”
Replied the fable helmet (tenanted
By a like inmate) “Hark!—I hear the voice
“Of the impatient ghosts, who straggling range
“Yon summit (crown'd with ruin'd battlements
“The fruits of civil discord), to the din
“The spirits, wand'ring round this Gothic pile,
“All join their yell—the song is war and death—
“There will be work anon.”

“Call armourers, ho!
“Furbish my vizor—close my rivets up—
“I brook no dallying”

“Soft, my hasty friend”
Said the black beaver, “Neither of us twain
“Shall share the bloody toil—War-worn am I, “Bor'd by a bappier mace, I let in fate
“To my once master, since unfought, unus'd
“Penfile I'm fix'd—yet too your gaudy pride
“Has nought to boast,—the fashion of the fight
“Has thrown your gilt, and shady plumes aside
“For modern foppery:—still do not frown,
“Nor lower indignantly your steely brows,
“lore

“Shall trace our sometime merit;—in the eye
“Of antiquary taste we long shall shine:
“And as the scholar marks our rugged front,
“He'll say, this Crestly saw, that Agincourt:
“Thus dwelling on the prowess of his fathers,
“He'll venerate their shell.—Yet, more than this,
“From our inactive station we shall hear
“The groans of butcher'd brothers, shrieking “plaints

“Of ravish'd maids, and matrons' frantic howls,
“Already hov'ring o'er the threaten'd lands
“The famish'd raven snuffs the promis'd feast,
“And horrier crows for blood—'twill flow.”

“Forbid it, Heaven!” [pray'd
“O shield my suffering country!—Shield it,”
The agonizing priest.

THE CAROUSAL OF ODIN.

FILL the honey'd bev'rage high,
Fill the skulls, 'tis Odin's cry:

* Oriel. A projecting window.

Heard ye not the powerful call,
'Thund'ring thro' the vaulted hall?
“Fill the meath, and spread the board,
“Vassals of the grisly lord.”—

The portal hinges grate,—they come—
The din of voices rocks the dome.
In stalk the various forms, and drest
In various armour, various vest,
With helm and morion, targe and shield,
Some quivering launces couch, some biting maces
wield:

All march with haughty step, all proudly shake the crest.

The feast begins, the scull goes round,
Laughter shouts—the shouts resound.
The gust of war subside.—E'en now
The grim thief curls his cheeks, and smooths his rugged brow.

“Shame to your placid front, ye men of “death!”

Cries Hilda, with disorder'd breath.
Hell echoes back her scoff of shame
To the inactive rev'ling champion's name.
“Call forth the song,” she scream'd;—the minstrel's came—

The theme was glorious war, the dear delight
Of shining best in field, and daring most in fight.

“Joy to the soul,” the harpers sung
“When embattl'd ranks among,
“The steel-clad knight, in vigour's bloom,
“ (Banners waving o'er his plume)
“Foremost rides, the flower and boast
“Of the bold determin'd host!”

With greedy ears the guests each note devour'd,
Each struck his beaver down, and grasp'd his faithful sword.

The fury mark'd th' auspicious deed,
And bade the scalds proceed.
“Joy to the soul! a joy divine!
“When conflicting armies join;
“When trumpets clang, and bugles found;
“When strokes of death are dealt around;
“When the sword feasts, yet craves for more;
“And every gauntlet drips with gore.”

The charm prevail'd, uprush'd the madden'd throng,
Panting for carnage, as they foam'd along,
Fierce Odin's self led forth the frantic band,
To scatter havock o'er many a guilty land.

MADNESS.

SWELL the clarion, sweep the string,
Blow into rage the muse's fires!
All thy answers, echo, bring,
Let wood and dale, let rock and valley ring,
'Tis madness' self inspires.

Hail, awful madness, hail!
Thy realm extends, thy powers prevail,
Far as the voyager spreads his ventrous sail,
Nor best nor wisest are exempt from thee;
Folly—folly's only free.

Hark!—To the astonish'd ear
The gale conveys a strange tumultuous sound,
They now approach, they now appear,— Phrenzy leads her chorus near,
And demon's dance around.—

Pride—Ambition idly vain,
 Revenge, and malice swell her train,—
 Devotion warp'd—Affection crost—
 Hope in disappointment lost—
 And injur'd merit, with a downcast eye
 (Hurt by neglect) slow stalking heedless by.
 Loud the shouts of madness rise,
 Various voices, various cries,
 Mirth unmeaning—caufelefs moans,
 Bursts of laughter—heart-felt groans—
 All seem to pierce the skies.—
 Rough as the wint'ry wave, that roars
 On Thule's desert shores,
 Wild raving to the unfeeling air,
 The fetter'd maniac foams along,
 (Rage the burden of his jarring song)
 In rage he grinds his teeth, and rends his streaming hair.
 No pleasing memory left—forgotten quite
 All former scenes of dear delight,
 Connubial love—parental joy—
 No sympathies like these his soul employ,
 —But all is dark within, all furious black despair.
 Not so the love-lorn maid,
 By too much tenderness betray'd;
 Her gentle breast no angry passion fires,
 But slighted vows possess, and fainting, soft de-fires.
 She yet retains her wonted flame,
 All—but in reason, still the same.—
 Streaming eyes,
 Incessant sighs,
 Dim haggard looks, and clouded o'er with care,
 Point out to pity's tears, the poor distracted fair.
 Dead to the world—here fondest wishes crost,
 She mourns herself thus early lost.—
 Now, sadly gay, of sorrows past she sings,
 Now, pensive, ruminates unutterable things.
 She starts—she flies—who dares so rude
 On her quester'd steps intrude?—
 'Tis he—the Momus of the flighty train—
 Merry mischief fills his brain.
 Blanket-rob'd, and antic crown'd,
 The mimic monarch skips around?
 Big with conceit of dignity he smiles,
 And plots his frolic quaint, and unsuspected
 wiles.—
 Laughter was there—but mark that groan,
 Drawn from my inmost soul!
 "Give the knife, Demons, or the poison'd bowl,
 "To finish miseries equal to your own."—
 Who's this wretch, with horror wild!—
 —'Tis devotion's ruin'd child.—
 Sunk in the emphasis of grief,
 Nor can he feel, nor dares he ask relief.—
 Thou, fair religion, wast design'd,
 Duteous daughter of the skies,
 To warm and cheer the human mind,
 To make men happy, good, and wise.
 To point where fits, in love array'd,
 Attentive to each suppliant call,
 The God of universal aid,
 The God, the Father of us all,

First shown by thee, thus glow'd the gracious
 scene,
 'Till superstition, fiend of woe,
 Bade doubts to rise, and tears to flow, [tween.
 And spread deep shades our view and heaven be-
 Drawn by her pencil the Creator stands,
 (His beams of mercy thrown aside)
 With thunder arming his uplifted hands,
 And hurling vengeance wide.
 Hope, at the frown aghast, yet ling'ring, flies,
 And dash'd on terror's rocks, faith's best dependence lies.
 But ah!—too thick they crowd,—too close they throng,
 Objects of pity and affright!—
 Spare farther the descriptive song—
 Nature shudders at the sight.—
 Protract not, curious ears, the mournful tale,
 But o'er the hapless group, low drop compassion's veil.

ADDRESS

TO THE GENIUS OF BRITAIN.

COME, genial spirit, to the earnest call
 Of the true patriot! wheresoe'er thou art,
 O! mark the summons! whether airy borne.
 In hasty progress, pleas'd thou skim'm'st the edge
 Of the white bulwark; from the steepy height
 Kenning the azure wave, thy own domain;
 While on the pebbled shore, scarce heard so high,
 The surf breaks foaming. In the distant view
 Full frequent pass the womby labourers
 Of commerce, or the gaily floating pride
 Of naval armament.—Or whether deep
 In midland occupation glad thou seest
 The various labours of the cheerful loom;
 Or agriculture whistling at the plough.
 Whether the anvil-notes engage thy stay,
 (Though dissonant, yet music to the ear
 Of him who knows his country); or the hum
 Of the thick crowded burse;—come and attend
 To Britain's general good! 'Tis not the shout,
 The din of clamour, drunk with factious rage,
 That hails thee; nor the well dissembling tongue
 Of mask'd sedition, whose envenom'd rant
 Urges the crowd to madness.—Not to these List heedful.—'Tis the cool persuasive voice
 Of reason woos.—Quick then with brightest smiles
 Of mild humanity adorn thy cheek!
 Straight o'er the Atlantic surge, with anxious haste,
 Seek out thy pensive daughter;—once as dear
 And closely twining round thy milky breast,
 As was Augusta's self.—Yet now estrang'd—
 Unhappily estrang'd! O by the hand
 Take the fair mourner; from her tearful eye
 Wipe the dim cloud of sorrow;—to the throne
 Present her reconciling.—'Tis a boon,
 Most glorious boon, that too our latest sons
 Will render thy soft influence doubly dear.
 Look back, unmov'd by prejudice, look back
 To memory's mirror. Pictur'd there we see
 The happy times of concord; when the arm
 Of manufacture ply'd the busy task
 In various employment;—through the eye
 Beam'd cheerfulness, while all around her sons
 Glad industry pour'd forth from plenty's horn
 Abundant wealth; hence to the crowded port

Pafs, thought, and mark the ants of commerce flore
 The spacious hold; light ran the toilsome day,
 Cheer'd by the hope of the honest recompence.
 The bark unmoor'd, see how the festive crew
 Urg'd on her speedy course; not fad to quit
 Their native soil, for in those happier days,
 America was home. There on the shore
 Stood expectation, fricndly by her side
 Smil'd hospitality, with open breast,
 Pleas'd to receive the sea-beat traveller:
 Cherish'd, enrich'd that traveller return'd
 Blessing his double country.—'I hese thy sweats,
 Fraternal intercourse! But ah! how chang'd,
 How sadly chang'd is now the present scene,
 Pregnant with future griefs! In fullen state
 Beneath the gloomy roofs dull silence reigns,
 Which erst in better times, resounded quick
 With strokes of active buiness: at the forge,
 Extinct, in pensive poverty the smith
 Desponding leans, incapable to earn
 The morrow's morsel, while with craving eye
 Look up the wife and child, but look in vain,
 Faint with despair.—O'er the deserted loom
 The spider forms her web, poor evidence
 Of human sloth or want.—Fain would the muse
 Suppress the mournful truth; yet forc'd to tell,
 She weeps while she relates.—How are they fall'n,
 The sons of labour, from their prosp'rous state
 Degraded! How; alas! the crowded jail
 Swarms with inhabitants, that once had hope
 Of fairer evenings to their toilsome morn!
 Fill'd is each cell of sorrow and of pain
 With daily victims:—debtors part, entomb'd
 While living, and condemn'd to linger on
 To life's last ebb, unpit'y'd, unreliev'd:
 Part felons, stamp'd the foes of social life
 By penury's rough hand, and driven to roam
 The spoilers of the wealthy.—To distress
 Abandon'd, scarce the ruin'd mind perceives
 Its own peculiar sorrows; but sinks down
 The creditor's fix'd prey—or to the law
 Submits the needful sacrifice.—Sad fate [boast,
 Of those whom Heav'n design'd their country's
 'The artisans of skill.—Nor on the banks
 Of venerable Thames does woe preside
 Less perilous;—Thames, the prolific fire
 Of Britain's wealth: along his winding shores,
 Unoccupy'd, moor'd to destruct'ive sloth,
 Whole fleets lie perishing, a forest, true,
 But still a blasted forest: gloomy stalks
 The unshipp'd mariner, and meditates
 On foreign service.—Should some child of hope,
 Lur'd by the pleasing retrospect once more
 Spread his broad sail across the well-known sea;
 Should he, amidst the wonders of the deep,
 Give way to fancy's dream; and fondly trust
 To meet his wonted greeting: how recoils
 The visionary voyage!—Not on the beach
 Sit waiting love and amity to grasp
 His hand, and lead him to their open bower.
 No thronging crowds his proffer'd mart attend
 With various traffic:—fled—affrighted—fled,
 Are all the little deities, that once
 Kind, o'er the social and commercial board [pear
 Hung hovering: in their room, sad change [ap-
 Stern resolution, stoic stubbornness,
 And independence;—in his hand each holds
 His weapon, jealous of the passing breeze,

And deaf to ancient friendship.—In this pause,
 This solemn pause, that halts 'tween peace and war.

O fly, blest spirit, in the royal ear
 Whisper forgiveness;—midst the high behests
 Of justice, let our ever-gracious sire
 Forget not mercy;—'tis the brightest gem
 That decks the monarch's crown: nor thou, great George,

Disdain the muse's prayer; most loyal he
 In mild subjection down the side of life,
 Steer her light skiff.—Urg'd by the plaintive call
 Of meek humanity, O! pardon, now
 If warm she pleads her cause.—The savage race,
 That prowls the desert, or that range the wood,
 Are won to tameness by the attentive care
 Of the kind gentle keeper.—Shame not man,
 Nor say his heart's more fell.—'Tis easier far
 To footh by tenderness, than awe by pow'r.
 Quit then the bloody purpose, nor persist
 To conquer, when the field is fairer gain'd
 By reconciling.—To the ungrateful toil
 Commission'd, shuddering beats the soldier's heart.
 Not so, when from the plough in eager haste,
 Rous'd by the call to arms, the shouting bands
 Rush'd emulous, reluctant none, nor held
 By loves or home;—each burning to supply
 The waste of war, and anxious to advance
 The common glory.—Spiritless now and sad
 Embark the destin'd troops: the veteran brave,
 That dauntless bore the variegated woes
 Of long-protracted war:—the veteran brave,
 That won on many a plain the bloody palm
 Of victory, amidst the dying groans
 Of slaughter'd thousands firmly undismay'd,
 Now hangs in tender thought his honest front,
 Averse to slay his brother:—at the word,
 (Awful, yet sacred to his patient ear)
 He lifts indeed the steel, while down his cheek
 The big drop flows, nor more he dreads the wound

That bores his vitals, than the stroke he gives.
 Say, therefore, "Sword, be sheath'd,"—fair in the sky

Now cloudy, then the dawn of joy will spread
 Its warm reviving ray—and every eye
 That's misty now with sorrow, will grow bright,
 And smile away its tears: the sunny beam
 Of mild returning confidence will cheer
 The kindred countries:—Commerce, on her couch
 Now drooping wounded, then will rear her head,
 Charm'd into health:—and from her various store
 Will cull the sweetest flowers, and form a wreath
 To crown the temples of her patriot king.

ESSAY

ON THE CONTRARIETIES OF PUBLIC VIRTUE.

SOCIETY, like thong of leather,
 Fast binds in clusters men together;
 And though it cannot be forgotten,
 That some are ripe, and some are rotten,
 Yet let it still be understood,
 They all promote the general good.
 For this the patriot's fire arises,
 That glows at every trying crisis,

With each inferior strife and stir too,
Whence spring they? but from public virtue.
Though different plans, like streams, 'tis true,
By different rills their course pursue;
Though oft they seem, to mortals blind,
Repugnant to the end design'd,
Appearing, as by error led,
To flow through many a mazy bed;
Yet still at length we see them glide,
Meand'ring to the common tide.

Smile on, ye grave, in deep derision,
I shrink not from my proposition,
But still aver all Britons merit
The praise of patriotic spirit;
As far as e'er their power can reach,
From N--- descending down to Ketch.
That statesmen guard the public weal,
We all must own, for all must feel:
'Tis their's to watch with ardour keen,
And careful drive the grand machine;
To charm the passengers from fretting,
And keep the whole from overletting.
But still inferior hands may bring
Some little help,—may oil a spring,—
May point,—“ There, round that corner turn ye,”
And with the folks a pleasant journey.

All have their use, their's nothing plainer,
From this each traveller's a gainer;
And, though the merits be but few,
Let's give to ev'ry imp his due.
This social fire though all possess,
In some there's nothing blazes less;
So many a close attempt is made,
O'er the bright flame to hold a shade,
To keep their worth from being known,
While conscience hugs itself alone:
As some of alms will never boast,
And look least pleas'd when giving most.

But cynics, spare the odd behaviour,
If well you walk, ne'er blame the pavior.
Should you, when wand'ring in the night,
Some scoundrel urge to set you right.
Now, though he blasts you with a curse,
You'll take the better for the worse,
Nor think the greeting ill bestow'd,
If while he damns, he shows the road;
But straight jog home, no more affronted,
Than if an honest watchman lighted.

Learn then the best to cull from evil,
As saints take warning by the devil,
And,—if the muse, whose judgment nice is,
Shows public good in private vices,
The holiest tongue must cease to stir,
But instant own without demur,
While modest matrons start at Drury,
The thief's as useful as the jury,
Since both the mind strong truths impress on,
And teach the world an awful lesson.
Our various patriots then revere,
Their hearts are sound, though manners queer:
Though some to outward vision seem
To sport in frenzy's antic dream,
The aims of each iaborious elf are,
Intended for the public welfare.
This glorious end alone pursuing,
They, bold like Curtius laugh at ruin;
For this, if we their schemes unravel,
They drink, whore, mortgage, game, and travel.

Enthusiast in the paths of science,
Banks bade the stormy waves defiance;
Fair nature's volume to explore,
He * fought with seas unfaill'd before,
And earn'd, by Argonautic toil,
Fresh honours for his native soil:
Him wisdom lov'd, thus worthy found,
And Britain hail'd him as the crown'd.
But say—“ Can one advent'urers claim
“ Exhaust the trumpet's voice of fame?
“ No garland has my country now,
“ To bind another pilgrim's brow?
“ Be mine the merit,”—Florio cries,
And cross the Channel gaily flies;
Through thick and thin, drives mad and giddy on,
Now here, now there, now in meridian,
(Unless, perchance, when Louis fail),
A meteor—with a fiery tail.
Think you his aim in each manœuvre,
Is but to scare th' astonish'd Louvre?
Ah no!—in all the dissipation
He loves the int'rest of his nation,
And, mindful of the patriot rule,
For our instruction—plays the fool.

Connubial faith,—th' unbroken vow,—
How blest! Who dares to disallow?
Lothario strong in this agrees,
And—urges every wife he sees;
Sure—if the attack should fall upon her,
The sex is happy in her honour,—
And,—if his stratagems surprise her,
Her fall may make th' unsteady wifer.
The husband from his doze may start,
And, though he long disdain'd her heart,
May look the thief with visage fierce on,
Who dar'd defile the slighted person.
“ Draw—draw to set the matter right,”—
But is Lothario wrong to fight?
No,—public virtue swells his veins,
Whoever falls,—his country gains:
This none can doubt, your feelings ask all;
For 'tis a gain to lose a rascal.

When trade unclogg'd can turn its wheels
The influence kind the kingdom feels;
Each hand, in fit degree and measure,
Contributes to the public treasure.
These truths Northumberland convince,
Who lives in just magnificence,
And,—while his bounty wide diffils,
For England's welfare—pays his bills.
But different notions Cotta strike,
For why should patriots judge alike?
It shocks his greatness to describe
How peasants gall the courtier's kibe,
An upstart race, that no one knows,
Who yet have folly to suppose,
That honest wealth is better far
Than guilt and want beneath a star,
“ Let every man preserve his station;
“ What's rule without subordination?”
Till wiser heads confess the flaw,
And plan a sumptuary law,
Impatient some redress to get,
See Cotta plunges into debt,

* “ With such mad seas the daring Gama fought.”
Thompson.

(From baillifs safe)—and much commends
 This practice to his hungry friends;
 So war is wag'd with every trader,
 Dear honour! left the rogues degrade her:
 And what contrivance is more sure
 To humble,—than to keep them poor?
 When in contention sharp of old,
 As legendary tales unfold,
 Two * rival deities defind'
 Their choicest presents to mankind,
 With envy kindling,—warm enforcer!
 This gave an olive, that a courser.

Thus some,—as other plans have mist 'em,
 Revere the vegetable system,
 And think their virtue grounded sure
 In growth of timber; and—manure.
 Hence up the slope plantations spread,
 And crown the hill's once dreary head;
 Hence, downward as the vale descends,
 The harvest ocean wide extends;
 Glad Britain—how these prospects charm her!
 Her medal † decks the patriot farmer,
 Who counts his stock,—and hopes he's shown,
 His country's riches in his own.
 Not so the 'quire of boist'rous spirit,
 Who, studious of equestrian merit,
 To thrifty care makes no pretences,
 But scorns the fields, and breaks the fences.
 Vain may the tenant urge his speeches,
 New till the soil, and mend the breaches,
 Yet no restraint his landlord clogs;
 Devoted as a prey to dogs,
 He hates ignoble frugal ways,
 And—wild in the career of praise,
 Cries, as he spurs his foaming steed;
 "To me Old England owes the breed."

Do various loads the nation press?
 'Tis noble sure to make them less:
 This Vigil does, and labours hard
 To cog the die, or palm the card:
 Profuse in packs, as round they lie,
 He often turns th' applauding eye;—
 And,—though he cheats, thinks nothing of it,
 Since his dear country shares the profit.
 Keen censure then her frown relaxes,
 Without consumption what are taxes?

Taxes! But "why," Therstites growls,
 "Must every bird be stripp'd by owls?
 "Shall two or three, in pamper'd ease,
 "Lay contributions as they please,
 "While all the rest, in station humble,
 "Tame bear the loss,—nor dare to grumble?"
 Peace snarler,—Know, with steady soul
 The patriot can applaud the whole;
 And justly crowns with equal praise
 The man who levies, and who pays.

'Tis true the doctor of finances
 By nostrums oft his fund enhances:
 But then his skill in physic's great,
 He knows the ailments of the state,
 Intent, as suits the fall disaster,
 To cup, prick, purge, or spread a plaster.
 A plethora's now the case, there's needing Strict regimen, and copious bleeding.

He therefore acts the subject best,
 Who scorns the order to contest;
 But claps a calm contented face on,
 And yields the most to fill the baion.
 To give his part, through various stages
 The manufacturer engages;
 And thinks there's merit at his door,
 Whose business feeds the lab'ring poor,
 While to the keen excieman's eyes
 Accumulating duties rise.

"Curse on the drudge's dirty toil,"
 Exclaims my haughty lord of soil,
 (Though oft his title-deeds may rest Safe in the us'ers iron chest);
 "Unpaid till other calls remain,
 "I'll still uphold my menial train;
 "Economy!—'tis base to court her,
 "Each * footman is a state supporter,
 "To baulk the cause a coward's sin is,
 "I'll bravely pay the hundred guineas."
 Deep Bibo soaks, and boasts the reason,
 "Wine's the best antidote to treason,
 "Our bumpers large revenues bring,
 "I drink my claret for my king,"
 Yet still his zeal by far surpasses,
 Who empties first, then breaks the glasses †.

How Fungus glows with patriot pride;
 While credit pours an even tide!
 Thus buoy'd along, through fairy scenes,
 He clubs his share to waste and means;
 At length the dun's incessant clamour
 Dooms every chattel to the hammer;
 Still there's decorum in his fall,
 Since now the ‡ auction closes all.

Smile, Walpole's ghost, untaught to feign,
 For private folly's public gain:
 And bid old Cecil smooth his brow,—
 If England thrives,—no matter how.
 Vespasian thus, the bee of money,
 From every weed could gather honey:
 Though squeamish Titus leer'd and laugh'd,
 The wiser father blest the craft,
 And, when his bags the cash was sure in,
 Ne'er thought the tribute smelt of urine.

THE JUSTICE:

A CANTATA.

RECITATIVE.

COMPOS'N, the justice-sat in easy state,
 A crowd assembling, thunder'd at the gate:
 The porter, to his post accustom'd long,
 First ask'd the cause, then introduc'd the throng:
 'Midst these, a fire enrag'd, two culprits brought,
 Her swelling waist proclaim'd the damsel's fault;
 The young seducer look'd abash'd and pale,
 While thus the father urg'd his angry tale:

SONG.

See that wretch, base ends pursuing,
 Low has brought my child to shame—
 See in her my honour's ruin,
 Death of honour, death of fame!
 Well to match her ripening beauty
 Oft I've form'd the fondest schemes;

* Minerva and Neptune.

† Medals given by the Society for the encouraging Art and Sciences.

* New tax on servants.

† New tax on glass squares.

‡ Ditto on auctions.

But this fall, this breach of duty,
Turns my hopes to idle dreams.—

Curse the traitor's late repenting—
Vengeance, vengeance I demand—
War recruits is ever wanting—
Let him die on foreign land.

RECITATIVE.

He paus'd—for rage his fault'ring voice oppress—
The magistrate the trembling youth address,
Dispell'd his terrors with a rising smile—
And thus the youth began in artless style :

SONG.

If the laws I have offended,
Here for pardon let me sue :
'Twas a crime I ne'er intended,
Love's the only crime I knew.

Love I plead (be this prevailing),
Love early youth begun—
We had never known this failing,
Had yon tyrant made us one.

On our knees we oft have pray'd him,
Oft have own'd our mutual flame :
Wretched, therefore, if we've made him,
On himself must rest the blame.

RECITATIVE.

He spok, and on his partner turn'd his eye,
Who deep enclin'd made this short reply :

AIR.

Gracious Sir, this faithful youth
Well has spok the voice of truth,
Kind dispenser of the laws,
Show compassion to our cause—
Hear me on my bended knee—
Spare his life, and pity me.

RECITATIVE.

The judge not long in useless silence fate,
But instant rose, and thus announc'd their fate :

AIR.

Relentless parent, since to me
Is now referr'd the last decree,
Mark and observe my just command,—
I doom him not to foreign land,
But to a sentence mild and kind—
Be both at Hymen's altar join'd ;
And may their passion ne'er decay,
'Till ebbing life shall sink away.

RECITATIVE.

The list'ning crowd the fair award approv'd,
The youth they favour'd, and the maid they lov'd.
While thanks and praises did their thanks employ,
They thus in chorus testified their joy.

CHORUS.

Happy pair, who thus have found
Friendship, when you fear'd a foe !
While the year revolves around,
May your bliss revolving flow !
Parents, to your children's pleasure,
Be your close attention paid ;

Nor for titles, pomp, or treasure,
Cut the knot that love has made.

And to thee, thou judge of peace,
Our best gratitude is due ;
May each couple love like these—
May each justice act like you !

THE HERMIT'S VISION.

MILDLY beam'd the queen of night,
Sailing through the gay serene :
Silver'd by her modest light,
But faintly shone the solitary scene,
With deep'ning shadows mixt, and glitt'ring breaks between.

High on a clifty steep o'erspread
With many an oak, whose ancient head
Did in its neighbour's top itself inwreath,
And cast an umbered gloom and solemn awe beneath.

High on a clifty steep a hermit sat,
Weighing on his weaned mind
The various turns of mortal fate,
The various woes of human kind ;
Meek pity's pearl oft started in his eye,
And many a prayer he pour'd, and heav'd a frequent sigh.

Silent was all around,
Save when the swelling breeze
Convey'd the half-expiring sound
Of distant waterfalls, and gently-waving trees.

No tinkling folds, no curfew's parting knell
Struck the sequeiter'd anchoret's ear ;
Remote from men he scoop'd his narrow cell,
For much he had endur'd, no more he look'd to fear.

But still, the world's dark tempests past,
What though his skiff was drawn to shore,
And shelter'd in retirement fast,
Yet oft his voyage he'd ponder o'er ;
Oft in reflection life's rough ocean view,
How mount the stormy waves, how hard to struggle through !

Before his sage revolving eyes
Various phantoms seem'd to rise,
Now retreat, and now advance,
And mazy twiné the mystic dance.

Joy led the van, in rapture wild,
Thoughtless of the distant day ;
Sweet complacence, angel mild,
Hied from the frantic pageant far away ;
For she was wisdom's favour'd child,
In revelry untaught to stray.

Joy led the van—her painted vest,
Flowing to th' obsequious wind,
Hope had seiz'd, with flutt'ring breast,
And eager tripp'd behind.

Gay she stepp'd, till busy fear
Whisper'd in her startled ear
" How many a cup is dash'd with gall,
" How many an evil may befall !"

Aghast awhile she heard the ruthless song,
Then faster seiz'd the robe, and hatter danc'd along.

Cloſe love follow'd in the train,
Love, the queen of pleaſing pain:
Placid now in dear delight,
Madd'ning now in deep affright,
And prying keen with jaundic'd eye,
Fierc'd by the ſting of hell-born jealousy.

'Twixt pride and luſt of grandeur led,
Next ambition rear'd her head,
By phrenzy urg'd o'er every bar to riſe,
And ſeize the viſionary prize:
Wild as the ruſh'd, ſhe ſcorn'd to mark the ground,
Yet many a ſlip ſhe made, and many a fall ſhe
found.

Pale as the waning moon,
With tear-ſtain'd cheek and ſtupid gaze,
Withering before life's funny noon,
Grief crept along in ſad amaze,
By many a ſtroke to keenest miſ'ry brought,
Now in a ſhower diſſolv'd, now loſt in inward
thought.

As the roy'd tiger gaunt and fell
Kindles into cruel rage,
With flaſhing glare, and murd'rous yell---
Thus anger paſt th' ideal ſtage,
'Too fierce for wounds or groans to feel,
Onward ſhe ſprung, and ſhook the bloody ſteel.

While far behind, with ſilent pace and ſlow,
Malice was content to go,
Patient the diſtant hour to wait,
And hide with courteous ſmiles the blackeſt hate.
Secret long her wrath ſhe'd keep,
Till time diſarm'd the foe, then drove her poniard deep.

To malice link'd, as tear allied,
Envy march'd with baneful lour;
Detraction halted by her ſide,
Upheld by falſehood's feeble power---

"No more!--no more!" the holy ſeer exclaim'd,
"Paſſions wild," unbroke, untam'd,
"Muſt ſure the human heart o'erthrow,
"And plunge in all the energy of woe.

"Grant then the boon, all-gracious heav'n,
"Let reaſon ever take the helm;
"Left, by unheeded whirlwinds driv'n,
"The pinnacle frail ſome guſt may overwhelm!
"Hang out the friendly lamp, that clear
"From error's peril ſhe may ſafely ſteer;
"Till death ſhall bid each trial ceaſe,
"And moor the ſhatter'd bark in peace!"

THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

Faintly bray'd the battle's roar
Distant down the hollow wind;
Panting terror fled before,
Wounds and death were left behind.

The war-ſiend curs'd the funken day,
That check'd his fierce purſuit too ſoon;

While, ſcarcely lighting to the prey,
Low hung, and lour'd the bloody moon.

The field, ſo late the hero's pride,
Was now with various carnage ſpread;
And floated with a crimſon tide,
That drench'd the dying and the dead.

O'er the ſad ſcene of dreariest view,
Abandon'd all to horrors wild,
With frantic ſtep Maria flew,
Maria, forrow's early child;

By duty led, for every vein
Was warm'd by Hymen's pureſt flame;
With Edgar o'er the wintry main
She, lovely, faithful, wanderer, came.

For well ſhe thought, a friend ſo dear
In darkeſt hours might joy impart;
Her warrior, faint with toil, might cheer,
Or ſooth her bleeding warrior's ſmart.

Though look'd for long---in chill affright,
(The torrent burſting from her eye)
She heard the ſignal for the fight---
While her ſoul trembled in a ſigh---

She heard, and clasp'd him to her breaſt,
Yet ſcarce could urge th' inglorious ſtay;
His manly heart the charm confeſs'd---
Then broke the charm,---and ruſh'd away.

Too ſoon in few---but deadly words,
Some flying ſtraggler breath'd to tell,
That in the foremoſt ſtrife of ſwords
The young, the gallant Edgar fell.

She preſt to hear---ſhe caught the tale---
At every ſound her blood congeal'd;---
With terror bold---with terror pale,
She ſprung to ſearch the fatal field.

O'er the ſad ſcene in dire amaze
She went---with courage not her own---
On many a corſe ſhe caſt her gaze---
And turn'd her ear to many a groan.

Dread anguiſh urg'd her to preſs
Full many a hand, as wild ſhe mourn'd;
---Of comfort glad, the drear careſs
The damp, chill, dying hand return'd.

Her ghafthly hope was well nigh fled---
When late pale Edgar's form ſhe found,
Half-bury'd with the hoſtile dead,
And bor'd with many a griſly wound.

She knew---ſhe ſunk---the night-bird ſcream'd,
---The moon withdrew her troubled light,
And left the fair,---though fall'n the ſeem'd---
To worſe than death---and deepeſt night.

MORTALITY.

'Twas the deep groan of death
That ſtruck th' affrighted ear!
The momentary breeze,---the vital breath
Expiring ſunk!--Let friendſhip's holy tear---
Embaln her dead, as low he lies---
To weep another's fate; oft teaches to be wiſe!

Wisdom! set the portal wide,—
Call the young, and call the vain,
Hither lure presuming pride;
With hope mistrustless at her side,
And wealth, that chance defies, and greedy thirst of gain.

Call the group, and fix the eye,—
Show how awful 'tis to die.—
Show the portrait in the dust:—
Youth may frown—the picture's just,—
And though each nerve resists—yet yield at length they must.

Where's the visage, that awhile
Glow'd with glee and rosy smile?
Trace the corpse,—the likeness seek—
No likeness will you own,
Pale's the once social cheek,
And wither'd round the ghastly bone.

Where are the beamy orbs of sight,
The windows of the soul?
No more with vivid ray they roll—
Their suns are set in night.

Where's the heart, whose vital power
Beat with honest rapture high,—
That joy'd in many a friendly hour,
And gave to mis'ry many a sigh?—
Froze to a stone!—And froze the hand
Whose grasp affection warm convey'd;
Whose bounty fed the suppliant hand,
And nourish'd want with timely aid.

Ah! what remains to bring relief,—
To silence agonizing grief,—
To sooth the breast in tempest tost,
That thrilling wails in vain the dear companion lost?

'Tis the departed worth, though sure
To gash the wound, yet works the cure:—
'Tis merit's gift alone to bloom
O'er the dread horrors of the tomb;
To dry the mourner's pious stream,
And soften sorrow to esteem.

Does ambition toil to raise
Trophies to immortal praise?

Trust not, though strong her passions burn,
Trust not the marble's flattering style,
—Though art's best skill engrave the urn—
Time's cank'ring tooth shall fret the pile.—

FRIENDSHIP.

Disturb'd amidst the gloom of night,
Dark hangs the dew-drop on the thorn;
Till, notic'd by approaching light,
It glitters in the smile of morn.

Morn soon retires, her feeble pow'r
The sun outbeams with genial day,
And gently, in benignant hour,
Exhales the liquid pearl away.

Thus on affliction's sable bed
Deep sorrows rise of saddest hue;
Condensing round the mourner's head,
: They bathe the cheek with chilly dew.

Though pity shows her dawn from heaven,
When kind the points assistance near;
To friendship's sun alone 'tis given
To sooth and dry the mourner's tear.

THE CURATE.

A FRAGMENT.

O'er the pale embers of a dying fire,
His little lampe fed with but little oil,
The curate sate (for scantie was his hire)
And ruminated sad the morrowe's toil.

'Twas Sunday's eve, meet season to prepare
The stated lectures of the coming tyde;
No day of rest to him,—but day of care,
At manie a church to preach with tedious ride.

Before him sprede his various sermons lay,
Of explanation deepe, and sage advice;
The harvest gained from manie a thoughtful day,
The fruit of learninge, bought with heavy price.

On these he cast a fond but tearful eye,
A while he paused, for sorrowe stopp'd his throate,
Arrous'd at lengthe, he heaved a bitter sigh,
And thus complainde, as well indeed he mote:

“ Hard is the scholars lot, condemn'd to fail
“ Unpatroniz'd o're life's tempestuous wave;
“ Clouds blind his sight; nor blows a friendly gale,
“ To waite him to one port—except the grave.

“ Big with presumptive hope, I launch'd my keele,
“ With youthful ardour, and bright science “ fraughte;

“ Unanxious of the pains long doom'd to feel, “ Unthinking that the voyage might end in “ noughte.

“ Pleas'd on the summer sea I daunc'd a while,
“ With gay companions, and with views as fair;
“ Outripp'd by these, I'm left to humble toil,
“ My fondest hope abandon'd in despair.—

“ Had my ambitious mind been led to rise
“ To highest sights, to Croser and to Pall,
“ Scarce could I mourn the missinge of the prize,
“ For soaring wishes well deserve their fall.

“ No tow'ring thoughts like these engag'd my “ breast, [plan]
“ I hop'd (nor blame, ye proud, the lowly
“ Some little cove, some parsonage of rest,
“ The scheme of duty suited to the man;

“ Where, in my narrow sphere secure, at ease,
“ From vile dependence free, I might remain,
“ The guide to good, the counsellor of peace,
“ The friend, the shepherd of the village swain.

“ Yet cruel fate denied the small request,
“ And hound me fast, in one ill-omen'd hour,
“ Beyond the chance of remedie, to rest
“ The slave of wealthie pride and priestlie
“ pow'r.

“ Oft as in russet weeds I scour along,
“ In distant chappells hastilie to pray,
“ By nod scarce noticed of the passing thronge,
“ 'Tis but the curate, every childe will say.

- " Not circumscribed in dignitie alone
 " Do I my rich superior's vassal ride ;
 " Sad penuric, as was in cottage known,
 " With all its frowns, does o'er my roof preside.
- " Ah! not for me the harvest yields its store,
 " The bough-crown'd flock in vain attracts " mine eye ;
 " To labour doom'd, and destin'd to be poor,
 " I pass the field, I hope not envious, by.
- " When at the altar surplice-clad I stand,
 " The bridegroom's joy draws forth the golden
 " fee ;
 " The gift I take, but dare not close my hand ;
 " The splendid present centres not in me."

DONNINGTON CASTLE.

Blow the loud trump of war,—wide to the gale,
 Unfurl the painted banner,—from the breast
 Tear the mild sympathies of charity,
 And fan the battle's fire.—What boots it now
 If Briton fight with Briton!—Is there one
 To whom these shouts give joy? can there be one
 So steel'd, so frantic with envenom'd rage
 Of party feud, as to forego the mark
 Of fair humanity?—Reckless to pluck
 The blossoms from the olive, and dye them red
 Deep in a brother's blood?—If such there be (Cain's heir legitimate) O let him turn
 His fierce eye to the desolated crown
 Of many a batter'd hill,—to many a heap
 Of ruins scatter'd through this worried land,
 Scenes once of civil strife, but now become Familiar to the lowliest village swain.
 If there be one within this fertile vale (Fertile through peace) who yearns for acts of blood,

Direct his view, Divine Benevolence!
 To yonder awful, but instructive pile
 Of grandeur fallen,—on the indented ridge
 Stands eloquent the siege-worn monitor,
 That speaks from every stone;—from ev'ry wound
 That bor'd its strong, yet vain resisting side
 Truth tells a solemn lesson.—To the ear
 Of warm poetic fancy speaks the ghost
 Of Chaucer, prime of bards, who caught the souls
 Of ladies born for love, and e'en could lure
 For some soft season the stout rugged hearts
 That fill'd the steel-clad warriors of his age,
 And made them listen to his siren voice
 Half-angry—yet unwilling to be gone.
 'Tis Chaucer hails, from the drear ivy'd tower,
 The gaze of idle visitants,—but once
 The feat of all the muses,—where his court
 Kept Phœbus, gladden'd at the pow'ful call
 That woo'd him to our Albion:—round him play'd
 Old Comus jocular, with many a glee
 Promoting social laughter;—many a grace
 Stole in amidst the cheerful throng, and sooth'd
 The bashful maiden, while with blushing joy
 She hearken'd to her all-accomplish'd knight.
 Chaucer, the prime of bards!—with festive song
 Oft has he charm'd the variegated group
 Within yon ancient walls,—walls that no more
 Resound with jocund minstrelsy.—The owl
 There shrieks her ominous note, the raven hoarse
 Joins in the horrid discord: direful change:

POVERTY.

Hæ thee hence! thou speære foul,
 Fiend of misery extreme;
 Hence! nor o'er yon dwelling scowl
 With blasting eye, while to thy haggard scream
 The midnight wolf accords his famish'd howl,
 And madd'ning wretches loud in agony blaspheme.

Hence!—from the artless bard keep wide aloof—
 Fly rather to his hated roof,
 Who, deaf to mercy's soft controul,
 Can steel with rugged edge the foul;
 Plund'ring, unmov'd the orphan's cry can hear,
 Or from the widow'd lip the scanty morsel tear:—
 But pass him by, the wooper mild
 Of genius, friend to all, nature's ingenuous child.

Constant toil, and coarsest fare,
 Long indeed the village hind
 In silent apathy may bear,
 While o'er his brow health's rosy wreath is twin'd:
 While his passions sluggish flow,
 Borne on life's pacific round;
 Nor aims his highest wish to know
 Beyond the hamlet's pale, his grandfire's farthest bound.

Yet, rous'd to feeling, much he mourns his lot,
 When the pale visage of disease
 Frowns on his humble cot,
 When sinks his drooping front, and bend his feeble knees.

There, oft, unheeded on the ground,
 May sickness, age, and want be found,
 United all in one forlorn abode,
 Of grief each singly own'd a melancholy load.

From the damp and earthy bed
 The sufferer lifts his aching sight in vain:—
 Despair hangs weeping o'er his head:
 Sad pallet this for ease! sad comforter in pain.

Fly, ye rich, unbidden fly,
 Pour your oil, and pour your wine:
 Wipe from tears the misty eye;
 Charity's a ray divine—
 A ray that lights the soul with brightest beam to shine.

Why withhold the little boon?
 Seems it much, ye sons of wealth,
 Glitt'ring moths of sunny noon—
 Plum'd with gold of joy and health?
 O think! a blast may come, yourselves may perish soon!

Yet, different in this common state,
 What different care attends your happier fate!
 Fading you may sure receive
 All wayward fancy craves, all soothing art can give:

While, with equal wants oppress'd,
 The child of misery heaves his lab'ring breast,
 Cheer'd by no kind assisting powers,
 Scarce with such crumbs sustain'd as hungry health devours.

Melt, in soft compassion melt,
 Ye gentle, wail th' unletter'd peasant poor:
 Yet keener far, as more severely felt,

Does penury haunt th' ill-omen'd scholar's door; [more.
He calls for all your tears; give these, if nothing

Warm'd his soul with genial flame
In youth's gay spring was bid to rise,
To pant for science, thirst for fame,
And hope fair merit's golden prize.

Much he hop'd, for many a tale
Of praise was echo'd to his ear;
Full many a promise (flatt'ring gale)!
Foretold the with'd-for port was near.

A while it blew,---then dy'd away,
Like breezes with declining day,
And left him, wond'ring wretch! forsaken quite,
In poverty's dead calm, and disappointment's night.

What avails th' expanded mind,
Tutor'd in the choicest lore?
The suffering body lags behind,
Nor lets the rising spirit soar:
Call'd home,---what Stoic pride the soul can steel,
When every finew's rack'd, and every nerve must feel?

What avails the glowing heart,
The eye that glistens at distress;
The wish all blessings to impart,
Or make at least a brother's sorrow less?
From trouble's spring the deepest draught he drew,
Who mourns his own hard lot, and weeps for others too.

At the sad mistaken gate, [stand,
When the maim'd veteran takes his suppliant
Struck with the hapless warrior's fate,
Sudden the pitying tenant gives his hand.---
---'Tis empty.---See! his lids o'erflow,
To fend undol'd away the hoary frown of woe.

Love too---for in the lowliest cell
Chaste love with purest flame may dwell---
His love---what forer can befall? [gall.
Is doom'd to four its sweets, and dash his cup with

Before the husband's and the father's eyes
Stormy clouds in prospect rise,
The future orphan's cry, the widow's groan;
These and more he makes his own---
For, ah! the faithless world by him too well is known.

For these the homely robe, the scanty board;
While life in toil is ling'ring on,
The drudge of science may afford:---
But where's the friend will cheer, when that poor life is gone?

No friend may rise, but many a foe
Will deck his visage with a smile,
Will hide in softest words the basest guile,
And, while he soothes the most, will strike the deepest blow.

Hence the pang, and hence the tear,
When his daughter's rip'ning bloom
Swells into agony his fear
Of the fell spoiler's den---fair virtue's early tomb.

THE HARP.

BORNE on fancy's wing along,
High soars the bard's enraptur'd soul:

Round him floats the joy of song,
Round him airs ecstasie roll:
Resistless charm! each swelling vein
Owns the accustom'd flame, and throbs to pour the strain.

Spirit of Ossian!--through the gloom
Of ages deepen'd into night,
See it bursting from the tomb,---
O'er it gleams a holy light!
See! it waves its master-hand; [hand.
Assembling o'er the heath quick glide the minstrel

They wake the sleeping chords!--the magic tone
(That sooth'd the dying warrior's groan,
That lur'd to sing the latest breath,
And mock'd with smiles the frown of death),
Ideal, now renews the powerful spell;
The list'ning shades, a grisly host,
Spring from the narrow cell,
And hail with lengthen'd shout th' enchanter's mighty ghof.

Thine too, Cadwallo! whom to save
In vain the heavenly science fu'd,
Starts from Arvon's rocky grave
With bloody streams embru'd.
Bound in the brotherhood of woe,
The druid choir unites, their tears harmonious
flow.

Wild as they sweep th' aërial lyre,
Arresting fast the passive ear,
Fiercer glows the poet's fire,---
O melody belov'd! O art for ever dear!

Ruthless tyrant,---yield to fate,
Nor folly's scorn, nor rancour's hate,
Though op'ning wide the sluice of gore,
Could quench the skill divine, could drown the mystic lore.

Long!--long indeed 'twas mute! thy feeble prey
Fall'n the hoary minstrels lay:---
While, sick'ning o'er the mournful ground,
The conquer'd hands oft turn'd the ear in vain:
No more was heard the soul-inspiring found,---
---But, faster in despair's sad fetters bound,
Each hung his head amaz'd, and dragg'd the fer-vile chain.

Wint'ry, thus the storm of war
Froze into sloth the captive mind:
Till growing freedom burst the icy bar,
And loos'd the arts that hell for ever strove to bind.

DISAPPOINTMENT.

A FRAGMENT.

So sigh'd Horatio, on a tomb reclin'd,
Beneath a mould'ring chapel's ivy'd wall:
His ruin'd hope o'ergloom'd his sickly mind,
And bade the head to droop---the tear to fall.

Horatio, to whose lot was not deny'd
Keen sensibility with all her woe:
By many a painful test his heart was try'd;
His was the thorn, while others won the rose.

Yet, why should thorns his honest breast invade,
 Since all the charities were fondled there?
 Why should thy feat, benevolence, be made
 The haunt of hapless grief, and pining care?
 Fill'd with an ample soul, that would adorn
 Fair independence, he began his day:
 Full many a promise smil'd upon his morn:
 Morn chang'd to eve—each promise dy'd away.
 He wish'd—nor can you call his wishes bold;
 He hop'd—for sure his friends were not a few;
 He hop'd—for many a flattering tale was told,
 And the safe harbour pointed to his view.
 The soft delusion play'd before his sight,
 Just to mislead—for soon, alas! he found
 His dawn of joy o'ercast with sudden night,
 His air-built vision totter'd to the ground.

THE NAVY.

A FRAGMENT.

Down the variegated side
 Of Edgecombe's far-recorded knoll
 (Joy of nereids, Cornwall's pride),
 Where art extends her mild controul;
 But just to check what nature's liberal hand
 Has spread in gay luxuriance wide,
 Of rocks, dells, groves, a fairy land;
 The muse, astonish'd, trac'd her ling'ring way,
 Unsettled what to leave, and wond'ring where to stay.

FRAGMENT.

SCRANNEL, pipe of scanty tone,
 Yield the prize, and yield it due—
 Pan, if here, must surely own,
 From thee no heavenly rapture grew,—
 Thine's the frolic to advance,
 Rustic joy, and rustic dance.—
 Merry glee, in many a round
 Tripping o'er the daisy'd ground,
 Prais'd thy note, while rival feet
 Strove thy movements fast to meet.

A TALE.

FOUNDED ON AN INCIDENT AT ST. VINCENT'S
 ROCKS. 1779.

HIGH on the cliff's tremendous side,
 That frowning hangs o'er Avon's tide,
 Three ladies chanc'd to stray:
 To pluck the casual flow'rets bent,
 Regardless of the rough ascent,
 They wound their dang'rous way.
 Till, slowly mounted to the height,
 They turn'd their view in wild affright,
 And shudd'ring mark'd the steep:
 O then, what grief bedew'd each eye,
 To think one slip, one step awry,
 Might plunge them in the deep!
 A priest, whom soft emotions press
 To succour damsels in distress,
 That instant trod the shore;
 With happy strength and steady pace,
 Safe to the rock's time-moulder'd base
 Each trembling nymph he bore.
 Learn then this truth—the careless hour
 May seek a gay, but treacherous flower,
 Whose honey turns to gall;

While the kind parson's timely aid
 May rescue many a tott'ring maid,
 And—save from many a fall.

EARLY GRAY HAIRS.

O'ER my head, ev'n yet a boy,
 Care has thrown an early snow—
 Care, be gone!—a steady joy
 Soothes the heart that beats below.

Thus, though Alpine tops retain Endless winter's hoary wreath;
 Vines, and fields of golden grain,
 Cheer the happy sons beneath.

BAGATELLE.

EVERY hour a pleasure dies—
 What is thought, but nurse to sorrow?—
 He that wishes to be wife,
 Lives to day, and mocks to morrow.

ON THE BIRTH-DAY OF MISS S. C.

EXULTING on the balmy gale,
 When Flora wakes the May-dew morn,
 The rose-bud all with rapture hail,
 Sweet glory of the loveliest thorn!
 Each day refines the rich perfume—
 Glad Flora smiles—the zephyr blows—
 While op'ning with a gradual bloom,
 The favourite ripens to a rose.

Thus in our Susan's shape and face,
 Respondent to her angel soul,
 The growth of each attractive grace
 We mark—as annual circles roll.
 Advance, ye years!—and ev'ry charm
 Which Venus boasts, shall sure be given;
 While soft'ring friendship joys to form
 Her mind, the fairest work of Heaven.

VERSES,

*Occasioned by hearing that a Gentleman at the Hot Wells, Bristol, had written Satirical Verses on a Lady.
 1779.*

FOR nobler purposes design'd,
 Than puny war to wage,
 What cause can sink a hero's mind
 To worse than woman's rage?

What female fault can rouse the soul
 To dip the ranc'rous quill?
 How justify th' invenom'd scroll
 One female fame to kill?

If frailty aims the slight offence,
 What man perceives the smart?
 O let not bravery and sense
 Return the feeble dart!

O'er the soft sex love gladly throws
 Its adamantine shield,
 And few are ever known their foes;
 Or try th' inglorious field.

Thus on the form of beauty's queen
 One only Greek was found;
 Rough Diomed, with weapon keen,
 Who dar'd inflict a wound;

THE LIFE OF MICKLE.

SOME particulars of the life of MICKLE were given to the world in the "European Magazine," for 1789, by an intelligent writer, who was his intimate friend, and wrote from personal knowledge.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from the information communicated in the "European Magazine," with the addition of some particulars collected from his correspondence with Lyttleton, inserted in the "Anecdotes" of his life, prefixed to the edition of his poems in 4to, 1794.

William Julius Mickle was born at Langholm, in Dumfries-shire, Sept. 29. 1734. He was the third son of the Rev. Alexander Mickle, minister of Langholm; who resided some time at London, and frequently preached at Watts's meeting-house, and was one of the translators of Bailey's "Dictionary." In 1716, he was presented to the parish of Langholm, by George the First, and about the same time, married the daughter of Mr. Thomas Henderson of Ploughlands, near Edinburgh, by whom he had seven children. He died in 1758.

He received the early part of his education from his father in the country. After his death, he went to Edinburgh, and resided with an aunt, whose husband had been a brewer; who sent him to the High-School in that city.

Early in life he discovered a propensity to poetry; but he often declared that he was by no means attached to his books, until the age of thirteen, when accidentally meeting with Spenser's, "Faery Queene," he became passionately fond of the beautiful imagery of that enchanting writer, and began immediately to imitate him.

At the age of sixteen he quitted the High-School, and was employed to superintend the books of his aunt, who continued her husband's trade.

In October 1755, he commenced business for himself; but the event only added another to the numberless instances which prove that the pursuits of poetry and trade are incompatible; for though, from the extent of his dealings, he paid more duty to the Excise than any brewer in Edinburgh, he was unsuccessful.

Much of his time was probably devoted to study, as he frequently declared, that before he was eighteen years old, he had written two Tragedies, and half an Epic Poem, all which he presently consigned to the flames.

Some of his early performances appeared in the "Scots Magazine," one of which, intitled, On passing through the Parliament Close at Midnight, was afterwards reprinted in the second volume of Donaldson's "Collection of Original Poems by Scotch Gentlemen," 8vo, 1765.

In 1762, he published an ethic poem, intitled Providence, or Arandus and Emilee, 4to, a languid, tedious, and incorrect performance, which, after some unsuccessful attempts, "to alter and shorten" it, was finally abandoned.

In the Spring 1763, he quitted Edinburgh, and went to London, to solicit a commission in the marine service; but in this application he met with a disappointment.

Having a very exalted opinion of Lyttleton, whose character was then high in the literary world, he had sent him a copy of his Providence, previous to his departure from Edinburgh, accompanied with a letter, under the borrowed name of William More, in which he requested his opinion and criticism.

The letter was in a few months afterwards answered in a very polite manner, and a correspondence commenced between the Peer and the Poet; from which he derived no advantage, but the honour of his acquaintance, the communication of his remarks on his writings, and his encouragement to persevere in his poetical studies.

His Pollie, an elegiac Ode, Knowledge, an Ode, Mary Queen of Scot's, an Elegy; were subjected to the revision of Lyttleton, and the two first appear to have received some corrections from his hand.

"I have read," he writes him, July 15. 1763, "with great pleasure, the very beautiful Ode you did me the favour to send me. The correction of a few lines would make it as perfect as any thing of that kind in the English language."

He afterwards writes him, August 28. 1764. "The first of the two Odes has all the merit that just sentiment, fine poetical imagery, elegant diction, and harmonious numbers, can give so trite a subject. There is also in some stanzas a sublimity of thought and expression, which raises it above the ordinary pitch of mere descriptive poetry."

"As to the poem on the death of Mary Queen of Scots," he adds, "I will not criticise any part of it; because I wholly disapprove the subject; poetry should not consecrate what history must condemn; and it is as certain as history can render any fact, that (besides her criminal amours with David Rizzio and Bothwell), she was an accomplice in the murder of the King her husband. Read Thuanus or Hume (who have written her history more truly than Robertson), and you will be inclined to pity, not to praise her; nor will Robertson himself, though he shades her crimes as much as possible, give you such an idea of her, as to make you think her a proper subject for the encomiums of a writer who means to serve the cause of virtue, not of party."

"Though you have disapproved of the Ode on the Queen of Scots," he writes his patron in return, September 3. 1764, "I must think myself very happy in having shown it to your Lordship. Nothing was ever farther from my thoughts, than to vindicate or deny her crimes, and if, while taken up with the subject, I have fallen into what might be looked on as endeavouring to give an amiable cast to her vices; now when your Lordship has been so good as to warn me of it; I can have no reluctance to suppress a piece that was merely a sport of fancy. That Buchanan, Knox, and others, have sometimes forgot the honour of the historian, and indulged the rancour of party, is pretty certain. This, with the greatness of her sufferings (in some instances beyond what the most crooked policy could demand), pleads something in her favour, and it was this that misled me to think of writing an Ode on her death, without sufficiently weighing the propriety of the subject.

"I would fain take this opportunity," he adds, "to mention the plan of a poem, which I have long had some thoughts of. The subject of it, if not the title, to be, The Cave of Desism. Mr. Hume has asserted, that Mahometanism has been more salutary to the world than Christianity. And through all his works, there runs a most disingenuous manner of blending revelations with the fopperies and sinister inventions of men; and in a variety of such ludicrous dresses, he would expose Christianity to the contempt of his reader. Such a conduct, with his shameless assertion, that Polytheism was the first religion of mankind; his malevolence of the Reformation; the nonsense he writes about miracles; together with such like sentiments, from other infidel writers, would furnish out a part or character for the Keeper or Genius of the Cave. The description of the gloomy cave itself, with the vices that shelter in it;—the genius of Mahometanism, with the finest countries lying in ruins behind her;—that of Popery, and that of genuine Christianity introduced as personages, with some proper action, might, I should think, afford materials for a poem of five or six hundred lines, which would fall naturally enough into the manner of Spenser."

In a letter to Lyttleton, dated April 9. 1765, he gives the following account of his pursuits and difficulties. "A situation that would enable me to cultivate the studies to which nature has led my inclination, was all the happiness I ever wished for; but any weak attempt I have made, has neither procured such, nor left much hope of it doing so. To write for the booksellers is what I never will do. Did my fortune enable me to do for myself in trade, I might expect some encouragement under Governor Johnstone, of West Florida, to whose family my father was related; but as I prefer going abroad to any thing I could expect in a counting-house in London, I think I have reason to hope that Major-James Johnstone, brother to the Governor, will befriend me so far, as to procure me, if in his power, some settlement in the East or West-Indies."

"The risk of being cut off by the climate," he adds, in another place, "would no wise deter me from going to Jamaica, did it otherwise appear as the most proper step I could take, in which case your Lordship's recommendation to Beckford, or Fuller, and mentioning me to your brother the Governor, would be every thing I could wish. But as your Lordship likewise mentioned the East-Indies, and as next to a clerkship in some of the public offices at home, I should prefer going thither, so I should be very happy, could any thing be done in it. The Company have many resident clerks, and various places to bestow, and no doubt your Lordship's interest with the Directors would do a great deal."

"In answer to your last letter," Lyttleton writes him, "I can only say that I have no acquaintance with any of the East-India Directors; but if a recommendation to my brother will be of any service to you, I will give it in the manner I mentioned. I have not been able to see either Beckford or Fuller; but it will be time enough to speak to them some time next winter."

"On fuller information," he writes Lyttleton in return, "there is only one consideration that would make me prefer the East to the West-Indies, the returning to England within two years, were I to go Purser of an East-Indiaman; but as that is not my choice, my intentions must settle in the West, whether I shall go, as the best step I can take, with all convenient speed."

"In my last letter to my brother," Lyttleton writes him, Nov. 6. 1765, "I recommended you to him for his favour and countenance, as a man of fine sentiments, and good genius in poetry, if you should come to that island, while he continues there. Wherever you go I wish you health and happiness."

"Your Lordship's kindness," he writes Lyttleton in return, Dec. 6. 1765, "in mentioning me to your brother, lays me under the greatest obligations; but as I would avoid the dangers attending an uncertainty, I some weeks ago accepted an offer of going as a merchant's clerk to Carolina."

"Thus ended his correspondence with Lyttleton: and though the only fruits of patronage he experienced were, his correcting his poems, and slightly countenancing him when he was little known in London, he always spoke of him with a respect bordering on reverence.

It is remarkable, that at this time he wrote his name William Mickle. The reason of his afterwards adding Julius to his name, is not certainly known.

From some circumstances, unknown to his biographers, he did not go to Carolina; but was employed as corrector of the Clarendon press in Oxford; a situation much more congenial to his taste, than that of a merchant's clerk.

In 1765, he published Pollio, an Elegiac Ode, written in the wood near Reslin Castle, 4to. It was written in 1762, on the death of his brother, and was the first poem which brought him into notice.

In 1767, he published The Concubine, a Poem, in two cantos, in the manner of Spenser, 4to; which, after going through three editions, was improved, and republished in 1777, under the title of Sir Martyn, the former title, as he acknowledges in his Introduction, giving a very improper idea both of the subject and spirit of the poem.

In 1769, he published a Letter to Dr. Harwood, wherein some of his evasive glosses, &c. in support of the Arian heresy, contained in his liberal translation of the New Testament, are pointed out and confuted, 8vo.

In 1770, his Mary Queen of Scots, an elegy; Knowledge, an ode; and Hengist and Mey, a ballad; were published in Pearch's "Collection of Poems." The note inserted at the conclusion of the elegy on Mary, was intended to obviate the objections which Lyttleton made to his defence of her character.

Many elaborate attempts have been made to rescue the character of the beautiful, but unfortunate Mary, from obloquy and reproach. The artifices of her insidious but inexorable rival, Elizabeth, have been clearly laid open by the masterly pen of Dr. Stuart. Elizabeth was undoubtedly the enemy of her fame, her fortune, and her life. Yet the conduct of the Queen of England may be considered as in a great measure justified by the alarming combinations of Mary and her abettors; by the general circumstances of the times, and of the two countries; and by the rebellious disposition of a considerable portion of her subjects, exasperated by the suppressed but malignant bigotry of the old superstition, and ready to seize every opportunity of disturbing the reign of their triumphant enemy.

In 1770, he published Voltaire in the Shades, or Dialogues on the Deistical Controversy, 8vo; and about this period was a frequent writer in the "Whitehall Evening Post."

He had very early in life, read Castéra's translation of the Lusiad of Camoens into French, and then conceived a design of giving an English version of it. Various avocations had, however, prevented him from executing his intention; though he retained the idea.

At length, having prepared himself by acquiring a knowledge of the Portuguese language, he, in 1771, published the first book as a specimen of his powers; and finding the manner in which it was performed approved by his friends, determined to devote his whole time to the completion of the work.

That he might do this without interruption, he quitted his situation at Oxford, and went to reside at a farm house at Forest Hill, where he adhered to his plan with such attention, that the translation, which had been printing while he proceeded on it, was entirely finished in 1775, and published under the title of The Lusiad, or the Discovery of India, an Epic Poem, &c. 4to, Oxford; with an Introduction, The History of the Discovery of India, The History of the Rise and Fall of the Portuguese Empire in the East. The Life of Camoens, a Dissertation on the Lusiad, and Observations upon Epic Poetry, and Notes and Illustrations, &c.

His publication came out under peculiar disadvantages. The Lusiad had been before translated into English verse, by Sir. Richard Fanshaw, 1655; but the manner in which it was done, gave but a faint idea of the beautiful original. It was written in a language but little cultivated by the muses. The writer was little known in this country, and of the translator's powers the public at that time knew still less.

In a letter to a friend, Jan. 22. 1776, he says, "Though my work is well received at Oxford, I will honestly own to you, some things have hurt me. A few grammatical slips in the Introduction have been mentioned; and some things in the notes, about Virgil, Milton, and Homer, have been called the arrogance of criticism. But the greatest offence of all, is what I say of blank verse. My versification, however, receives a most general approbation."

In his Dissertation, after acknowledging his obligations to Mr. Magellans, and other Portuguese gentlemen, Thomas Pearson, Esq. of the East India Company's service, for books and information; he adds, "The approbation expressed by several gentlemen of the East-India Company, on the appearance of the poem on the Discovery of India, gave the translator the greatest satisfaction. To Governor Johnstone, whose ancestors have been the hereditary patrons of the success of the translator, he is under all the obligations which the warmest zeal to promote the success of his undertaking can possibly confer. To this gentleman, in a great measure, the appearance of the Lusiad in English is due. To the friendship of Mr. Hoole, the elegant translator of Tasso, he is peculiarly indebted. To James Boswell, Esq. he confesses many obligations. And while he thus recollects with pleasure the names of many gentlemen, from whom he has received assistance or encouragement, he is happy to be enabled to add Dr. Johnson to the number of those, whose kindness for the man, and good wishes for the translator, call for his sincerest gratitude. Nor must a tribute to the memory of Dr. Goldsmith be neglected. He saw a part of this version; but he cannot now receive the thanks of the translator. The manner in which his Grace the Duke of Buccleugh took the English Lusiad under his patronage, infinitely enhanced the honour of his acceptance of the dedication."

In a letter to Mr. Boswell, preserved in his "Life of Dr. Johnson," he says, "Before publishing the Lusiad, I sent Mr. Hoole a proof of that part of the introduction in which I make mention of Dr. Johnson, yourself, and other well-wishers to the work, begging it might be shown to Dr. Johnson. This was accordingly done, and in place of the simple mention of him which I had made, he dictated to Mr. Hoole the sentence as it now stands. Dr. Johnson told me in 1772, that about twenty years before that time, he himself had a design to translate the Lusiad, of the merit of which he spoke highly; but had been prevented by a number of other engagements." Dr. Johnson, it is said, afterwards recommended it to Goldsmith.

During the time which Mickle employed in this translation, he had no other means of subsistence, than what he received as corrector of the Clarendon press; and when he relinquished that situation, he had only the subscriptions he received for the work, to support him. The difficulties that so narrow an income must occasion, may be more readily conceived than described. But, looking forward with the enthusiasm of genius, he would not suffer difficulties that might have discouraged meaner minds, to obstruct his progress, or damp his ardour.

"When, after five years unremitting attention," says the writer of the "Anecdotes" of his life, "he had completed this great work, those friends who knew his circumstances, advised him to consider who would be the proper patron to whom he ought to dedicate such a poem. I am assured by one who lived with him in habits of great intimacy (the Rev. Mr. Sim, of Chenies, Bucks, formerly of St. Alban-Hall, Oxford), that Mr. Mickle had repeated intimations from unquestionable authority, informing him, that to several persons, then high in the India department, it would be very acceptable; but by the dedication of such a poem, as the Lusiad, they would think themselves highly honoured; that he might depend on a princely acknowledgement; and they therefore advised him to think of the most worthy. This counsel he was at first inclined to, but the advice of Commodore Johnstone, turned the scale, and it was dedicated to the Duke of Buccleugh."

"That he might omit," says the writer of the account of his life, in the "European Magazine," "no prudential attentions to his future welfare, and with the hopes of reaping those advantages which usually attend so laborious a work, he applied to a person of great rank, with whom his family had been connected, for permission to dedicate it to him. "The manner," says the author "in which ———— took the English Lusiad under his patronage, infinitely enhanced the honour of his acceptance." The manner, as the author frequently told his friends, was "by a very polite letter written with his own hand." But let not indigent genius, in future, place too much expectation on the generosity of patrons. After receiving a copy, for which an extraordinary price was paid for the binding, days, weeks, and months elapsed, without the slightest notice. During this time, though the author had too much spirit to solicit or complain, it is to be feared that some of the misery for feelingly described by Spenser, fell to his lot.

Full little knowest thou, that hast not tried,
What hell it is in suing long to bide; &c.

"At length a gentleman of rank in the political world, a fast and a firm friend to the author, and who afterwards took him under his protection, and by that means afforded him the independence he latterly enjoyed, waited on the patron, and heard with the indignation and contempt it deserved, a declaration, that the work was at that time unread, but had been represented not to have the merit it had been first said to possess; and therefore nothing could be then done on the subject of his mission. This paltry evasion, the solicitor declared, he believed arose from the malicious insinuations of a certain person about the patron, whose mistakes had received a proper correction in the preface to the Lusiad. We know not how true this suggestion may be, though, admitting the fact, it hardly alters the case. Mr. Mickle's account of this interview, in a letter to a friend, dated August 22. 1776, now lies before us, and we might probably do no disservice to the general interests of literature, were we to print it. We cannot, however, omit to suggest a doubt, whether there is not some small violation of moral rectitude, in a great man accepting from an indigent one, that compliment which is offered him, under, at least, an implied agreement, to receive some acknowledgement in return for the honour done him? It ought not to be concealed, that when the second edition of the Lusiad was published in 1773, Mickle was strongly recommended by a friend, to suppress the Dedication. His resentment at the unworthy treatment he had received, had by this time been converted into contempt, and with great magnanimity he refused. Whoever will read the Life of Camoens, cannot avoid observing a striking similarity in the fortunes of the author, and his translator, and he will probably not be displeased at the concluding note of the Lusiad. "Similarity of condition, produced similarity of complaint and sentiment in Spenser and Camoens. Each was unworthily neglected by the Gothic grandees of his age; yet both their names will live when the remembrance of the courtiers who spurned them "Shall sink beneath their mountain tombs."

"Oh may that man that hath the muses scorn'd, Alive, nor dead, be ever of a muse adorn'd."

"I believe," says the writer of the "Anecdotes," of his life, "the person alluded to is Dr. Adam Smith, who was the professed admirer of Hume, to whom Mickle was a declared antagonist, and once intended to have written and published, An Heroic Epistle from David Hume to Dr. Adam Smith (in which the Doctor and his pupil would have been rather harshly treated). Many of the verses, he, at the time, repeated to a particular friend; but the poem was never completed."

Such is the manner in which the Dedication of the Lusiad was received, according to his biographers; who, in their indignation at the supposed neglect of his patron, seem not to have made sufficient allowance for the obligations his father was under to the family of Buccleugh. His examination of the popular arguments relative to the British commerce with India, in his Dissertation prefixed to the Lusiad, his "favourite above all that he ever attempted in prose," might displease the celebrated author of "The Wealth of Nations," who stood forth as the philosophical champion for the abolition of the monopoly of the English East-India Company; but it can hardly be supposed that the "Epic Poem of Commerce," a work that challenges the attention of the philosopher, the politician, and the gentleman, could be neglected by a nobleman, distinguished as much by his patriotism and benevolence, as his high rank, and princely fortune, and whose love and patronage of literature and science, have obtained him the distinction of President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and enrolled his name among the Fellows of the Royal Colleges of Physicians, and Surgeons in that City.

In his Dissertation prefixed to the Lusiad; after reflecting on the distressed situation in which Camœns was suffered to languish, he concludes his remarks with some stanzas, in the manner of Spenser, on the Neglect of Poetry, descriptive of what we may naturally conceive were his own fears for the fate of his translation. But poetry so splendid, so spirited, so harmonious, could not remain long unnoticed; and the applause of the public followed the appearance of the Lusiad in so high a degree, as soon to banish from his mind the momentary chagrin, which a few circumstances attending the publication had given birth to.

Notwithstanding the approbation with which the public had received his translation, by a letter to Thomas Caldecott, Esq. of the Middle Temple, who warmly patronised, and very essentially served him, while he was at Oxford, dated Forest-Hill, Dec. 20. 1778, it appears that he was by no means happy; and had projected an edition of his works by subscription, for which he had printed proposals: "Besides the necessity which urges to this scheme, I am very desirous of giving an edition of my works, in which I shall bestow the utmost attention. Except on very popular or temporary subjects little or nothing is to be made of half crown publications, and this also inclines me to a quarto collection; which, perhaps, will be my final farewell to that blighted spot (worse than the most bleak mountains of Scotland), yclept Parnassus; for after this labour is finished, if Governor J—— cannot, or does not, help me to a little independence, I will certainly bid adieu to Europe, to unhappy suspense, and, perhaps, also, to the chagrin of soul which I feel to accompany it."

Previous to the publication of the Lusiad, he had been tempted to try his powers in dramatic composition, and wrote a tragedy, called the Seige of Marseilles, formed upon a story from the French history in the reign of Francis I., when the Duke of Bourbon, at the head of a Spanish army, invaded his native country, and laid siege to Marseilles; which, with some recommendations from his literary friends, he transmitted to Garrick. The manager acknowledged, in a letter to a friend, that it contained many beautiful passages; but he added, that fine writing was not of itself sufficient to constitute a drama fit for public exhibition. Governor Johnstone, unwilling that the labour he bestowed on this work should be entirely lost, solicited the aid of Mr. Home, author of Douglas, to make some alterations. This was complied with, and the piece, after being inspected by Mr. Warton, was again submitted to the manager, and again rejected.

The conduct of Garrick strongly excited his resentment; he determined to print the tragedy, begun it, and sent the first sheet of it to the manager. The motives which led him to the first, appear in the preface to the play; what induced him to the latter, he has described in a letter to Mr. Hoole, dated Nov. 15. 1773.

"I have just received a letter from Mr. Ballantyne, wherein he acquaints me, that you seemed sorry that Mr. Garrick had seen a proof sheet of the preface to my play. Mr. B. also expressed his surprisè how he should have obtained it, and supposed that some person who wished me ill had sent it, that he might be prepared to prejudice the public against me.

"The truth is, I sent it to him in a blank cover. Let him be prepared as he will. Half a year ago, I declared my resolution to my friend Mr. Boswell. He wrote me two earnest dissuasive letters; but in vain. I have maturely considered every circumstance; I have passed the Rubicon, and I will proceed. In a letter to Mr. Boswell, sent off only three days ago, I told him that I should look upon any farther dissuasive as thus, in plain English: "What do you think the public will mind such a scribbler as you? No, my friend, take my advice, fold your hands together, submit to the infallibility of Mr. Garrick, and starve." I have also cited the same sentence in a letter now on the table to Governor Johnstone. "I have passed the Rubicon, I say, but I am not a Kenrick. No friend shall blush for me. I know what I owe to them, and to myself. If I am possessed of any satirical abilities, Mr. G. shall feel them. I have planned a new Dunciad, of which he is the hero. As soon as I finish the Lusiad, I will set about it. If you think proper, you may mention this in any company."

He was, afterwards, advised to try its fate on the Edinburgh theatre; but Governor Johnstone thinking it might interfere with the completion of the Lusiad, recommended him to lay it entirely aside, until the translation was finished. To this he consented; and when the Lusiad was finished, another friend recommended to him to revise the play, and offer it to Mr. Harris. This was accordingly done, but it was still unsuccessful. After this repulse, he relinquished all expectations of advantage from the theatre, though he afterwards permitted a person to show the unfortunate play to Mr. Sheridan, and here too it had the same success as with the other managers. Had he lived, he always declared his intention of printing it in the collection of his works.

The approbation which had crowned his translation of the Lusiad, and the respectable name which he had now attained in the literary world, soon banished from his mind the mortifications he suffered from the ill success of his tragedy.

The first edition of the Lusiad being soon sold, he immediately prepared a second, with improvements, which was published in June 1778. For this Mr. Mortimer presented him with an etching; and on the death of that excellent artist, Feb. 4. 1779, he wrote an Epitaph for him.

In 1779, he published a pamphlet, intitled A Candid Examination of the reasons for depriving the East India Company of its charter, contained in the history and management of the East India Company, from its commencement to the present time; together with strictures on some of the self-contradictions, and historical errors, of Dr. Adam Smith, in his reasons for the abolition of the said Company. 4to.

About this time, some of his friends had it in contemplation to recommend him to the notice of his Majesty, as worthy of a pension. Dr. Lowth, Bishop of London, from a knowledge of his virtues and talents, intimated his readiness to give him ordination, with a promise of some provision in the church; but this mode of life was not agreeable to his disposition.

While the scheme of publishing a collection of his poems by subscription, was ripening, in which, from the exertions of his friends, he had great reason to hope for success, his friend Governor Johnstone was, in May 1779, appointed to the command of the Romney man of war, and he immediately offered to appoint him his secretary, in order that he might partake of any good fortune, which might attend the cruize. So strict was his regard to the engagement he had previously made with his friends, from whom he had received a few subscriptions for his poems, that it was found a very difficult task to persuade him to accept this offer. It was at length suggested to him, that a new situation would open a new scene, which would enable him to add what might render his volume still more acceptable to his subscribers; under this impression he engaged, and fulfilled his appointment during the remainder of the year.

In November he arrived at Lisbon, and was appointed by the Commodore, joint-agent for the prizes which were taken. At this place he was considered as the translator of the Lusiad, and received with the most flattering marks of attention. There, and in the neighbourhood, he remained for more than six months.

During his stay, he composed his Almada Hill, an epistle from Lisbon, published in 4to, 1781; and collected some particulars concerning the history, manners, and customs of the Portuguese; which he never arranged.

The Royal Academy being opened while he was at Lisbon, he was present at the ceremony of its commencement, and had the honour to be admitted a member, under the Presidency of one of the most illustrious characters of the age, Prince Don John of Braganza, Duke of Lafuens; who presented him with his own portrait as a mark of his regard.

On his return to England, it was thought necessary that he should stay in London, to attend the proceedings in the courts of law, respecting the condemnation of some prizes; and he did not therefore accompany the Commodore during his last expedition to the Cape of Good Hope, nor did he go any more to sea.

In 1782, he came forward as an advocate for Chatterton's title, in the Rowlesian controversy, and published an ironical pamphlet, intitled, The Prophecy of Queen Emma, an ancient ballad, lately discovered, written by Johannes Turgottus, Prior of Darham, in the reign of William Rufus; to which is added, by the editor, an account of the discovery and hints towards a vindication of the authenticity of the poems of Ossian and Rowley. 8vo.

On the 6th of June 1782, he married Miss Tomkins, daughter of the person with whom he resided at Forest-Hill, while he was engaged in translating the Lusiad.

The fortune he acquired under Commodore Johnstone, now enabled him to retire to literary leisure and independence. He accordingly took a house at Wheatley, a few miles from Oxford, where he devoted his vacant time to the revision of his poetical works and tragedy, which he proposed publishing by subscription.

The efficient patronage of Commodore Johnstone will be remembered to his honour. On the death of his real friend and patron, May 24. 1787, he showed his affection and gratitude to his memory, in some elegiac verses, a copy of which he sent to the gallant Lord Rodney, begging his opinion and correction of the first note, and received the following answer, dated Albemarle-street, May 16. 1788. "Nothing can give me more real pleasure, than the affection and gratitude shown by you to the memory of our worthy friend George Johnstone. It is impossible for me not to approve of the verses of the translator of the Lusiad, which, without flattery, in my poor opinion, are equal, if not superior, to Pope's translation of the Iliad. It is impossible not to be pleased with both. Both unfit in our minds the glorious idea of doing our duty to our country, and that life without honour is a burden.

"Your note relative to the intelligence sent me in 1761, I think not full enough. The intelligence was of that consequence, that without it every Spanish province in the West Indies had been prepared, as I did not receive orders from England till Martinique was taken, and I had failed to attack Domingo, in which time my cruisers had taken every Spanish packet that had sailed from Spain with the declaration of war. And the very day I received Mr. Johnstone's dispatches, I sent them to Jamaica, desiring the Governor to lay an embargo, and the Admiral to seize all Spanish ships; which was done accordingly, and the Spanish Governors, totally ignorant of the war, till Sir George Pococke and the British fleet came in sight, some months after, off the Havannah. Mr. Johnstone, therefore, may be properly said to have taken the Havannah.

"With infinite pleasure I beg you will put me down as a subscriber to your works, and beg you will do me the honour of calling upon me when you come to town."

During the last seven years of his life, he occasionally afforded some assistance to the "European Magazine," the Fragments of Lep, and several of the Reviews of books came from his hand. In September 1788, at the request of a friend, he wrote a song called Esldale Braes, in honour of the place of his birth, a country-moat beautifully Arcadian, in the centre of that district on the border of Scotland which is thus described by Dr. Percy, in his "Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," "Most of the finest old Scottish songs have the scene laid within twenty miles of England, which is indeed all poetic ground, green hills, remains of woods, clear brooks. The pastoral scenes remain; of the rude chivalry of former ages, happily nothing remains but the ruins of the castles."

This song, in commemoration of a spot, in itself of little importance, but dignified by the birth of heroes, who have bled in defence of their country, and poets who have given new harmony to the language, was intended to be set to music by James Balmain, Esq. Commissioner of the Excise, and brother-in-law to Commodore Johnstone; so that we should have an Esldale song, written by a bard of Esldale, and set to music by a native of the same place.

This was the last composition he lived to finish. After a short illness, he died at Wheatly in Oxfordshire, Oct. 25th 1789, in the 55th year of his age. He was buried at Wheatly. He left a son, with but a scanty provision; whom his executors Francis Warrie, Esq. of Great Milton, Oxfordshire, and Mr. William Ballantyne, merchant, Savage Gardens, have placed with the Rev. Mr. Nailor at Hammer-smith, in order that he may be qualified for admission, on the foundation of Winchester College.

His Poems, including the pieces formerly printed separately, except Providence, with the Sorcerers, and other original pieces, and the tragedy of the Siege of Marseilles, were collected and published by subscription, in one volume 4to, 1794, with some "Anecdotes" of his life, "in which are comprised several letters from the late Lord Lyttleton," with the benevolent purpose of raising a sum to assist the education and provision of his son. His poems, reprinted from the edition 1794 with his verses on Passing through the Parliament Close of Edinburgh, at Midnight, and some smaller pieces selected from the Introduction to the Lusiad, and the "Anecdotes" of his life, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry. His poem on Providence, he himself thought too incorrect for republication. A copy of his Prophecy of Queen Emma, &c. could not be obtained for the use of this edition.

On the following character of Mickle, given by the writer of the account of his life in the "European Magazine," the editor of his poems observes, "that having known him intimately, and known him long, he thinks it strictly just."

"To those who are unacquainted with Mr. Mickle's writings, we need not point out the beauty, the strength, or the variety of his versification, the harmony of his numbers, and the vigour of his imagination. These are so apparent, that we risk nothing in declaring our opinion, that they must sooner or later force themselves into the notice of those who at present are strangers to them. Leaving his literary character, therefore, to find its own value, we shall confine ourselves to speak of him as a member of society. He was in every point of view a man of the utmost integrity, warm in his friendship, and indignant only against vice, irreligion, or meanness. The compliment paid by Lord Lyttleton to Thomson, might be applied to him with the strictest truth; not a line is to be found in his works, which, dying, he would wish to blot. During the greatest part of his life, he endured the pressures of a narrow fortune without repining, never relaxing his industry to acquire by honest exertion that independence which at length he enjoyed. He did not shine in conversation, nor would any person from his appearance have been able to form a favourable judgment of his talents. In every situation in which fortune placed him, he displayed an independent spirit, undebased by any meanness, and when his pecuniary circumstances made him on one occasion feel a disappointment with some force, he even then seemed more ashamed at his want of discernment of character, than concerned for his loss. He seemed to entertain with reluctance an opinion, that high birth could be united with a sordid mind. He had, however, the satisfaction of reflecting, that no extravagant panegyric had disgraced his pen. Contempt certainly came to his aid, though not soon; he wished to forget his credulity, and never after conversed on the subject by choice. To conclude, his foibles were but few, and those inoffensive; his virtues many; and his genius very considerable. He lived without reproach, and his memory will always be cherished by those who were acquainted with him."

In his portrait of Mickle, his few imperfections are commendably thrown into shade, but his virtues are faithfully delineated, and cannot fail to impress the most advantageous idea of his character. Religion appears to have been a leading feature in his mind; but the zeal against infidelity which induced him to plan his Cave of Deism ought not to have rendered him insensible of the value of two such men as David Hume, and Adam Smith, so far as to circulate among his acquaintance the Heroic Epistle in ridicule of these ornaments of philosophy. To have threatened Garrick with a Dunciad if he refused to get up a very moderate tragedy, would seem inexcusable, were not the genus irritabile vatium almost proverbial.

The character of Mickle, as a poet, ranks very high among his countrymen. His versification is undoubtedly very vigorous and manly; but certainly not equally remarkable for correctness. It unites the freedom of Dryden with the force and harmony of Pope. The English Lusiad is a truly classical performance, and stands unrivalled by any production of the kind in our language, but the English Iliad. His Sir Martyn, Almada Hill, Pollio, and Mary Queen of Scots, if he had written nothing else are sufficient to entitle him to a classical distinction among the poets of our nation.

Of the Lusiad he is not only an able translator, but a spirited advocate. He has very judiciously prefaced his translation with a copious and satisfactory introduction to the history of the poem, and accompanied it with notes that were necessary to give it proper elucidation. The narrative is liberal and elegant, interspersed with many sensible observations, and just political reflections. In the critical part of his notes, he merits great praise; but he has sometimes, perhaps, rather stepped out of his way. The lively and ingenious, though inaccurate and ill-grounded criticisms and misrepresentations of Voltaire, respecting the Lusiad, have drawn from his pen such a severity of animadversion and reprehension, as seem scarcely justifiable, when occasioned by a difference chiefly affecting a point of taste. Voltaire admits the Lusiad to be a work justly deserving of a distinguished rank in epic poetry, a work abounding in beauties, and exhibiting also some striking defects. It is, as he affirms, a poem without a plan; without unity; without propriety; for the machinery exhibits a monstrous combination of Christian and Pagan mythology. Vasco de Gama, the hero of the poem, for instance, prays to the God of Israel in a storm, and the goddess Venus comes to his relief, "But we are told," says Voltaire, "that the machinery is allegorical; thus Mars is clearly designed to represent Jesus Christ, and Venus the Virgin Mary. All this may be true, but I own I should not have suspected it." He is not satisfied with eagerly defending the propriety of this allegorical interpretation, and with stating the obvious answer to the objection respecting the unity of the action, but he recriminates upon Voltaire, and exposes him to contempt and detestation. In his analysis of the Lusiad, he enters deep into the merits of the poem, and finds it possessed of all the spirit, and great component parts of the epic. The result of his examination of the machinery, and construction of the poem, on the principles of the Epopœa, will satisfy men of taste and elegant researches. Men, of minuter studies, and sentiments less enlarged, may, indeed, cavil at what they think some deviations from the epic system; that system which scholastic formality and mechanical minds have drawn from those great archetypes, who themselves know no rule but the implicit pursuit of nature.

If we consider only the state of the Iberian poetry at, and even after, the time when Camoens wrote, we must look upon his Lusiad as a wonderful performance. He was the original poet of his country. He had not, like Tasso, a Dante to smooth his way, nor like Milton, a Spenser. Around him all was obscurity, and even an affectation of obscurity. The Spaniards looked with the highest veneration on the writings of Balthazar Gracian, and Luis de Gongora, because they were abstracted and unintelligible. Even their great poet Lopez de Vega, wrote in the same strange enigmatical style; a whimsical heterogeneous mixture of the enslure of the French, and the conceits of the Italians, interwoven with the sombrous, but fantastic ground of the Moresca. When these defects of the national poetry are considered, those of Camoens, in particular, will be thought the more excusable, and his excellences will do him the greater honour.

"Homer and Virgil" says Mickle "have been highly praised for their judgment in the choice of the subjects which interested their countrymen; and Statius has been as severely blamed for his uninteresting choice. But though the subject of Camoens be particularly interesting to his countrymen, it has also the peculiar happiness to be the poem of every trading nation. It is the epic poem of the birth of commerce. And in a particular manner the epic poem of whatever country has the controul and possession of the commerce of India. An unexhausted fertility and variety of poetical description, an unexhausted elevation of sentiment, and a constant tenor of the grand simplicity of diction complete the character of the Lusiad of Camoens; a poem which though it has hitherto received from the public most unmerited, and from the critics most unmerited injustice, was yet better understood by the greatest poet of Italy. Tasso never did his judgment more credit than when he dreaded Camoens as a rival, or his generosity more honour, than when he addressed his elegant sonnet, "Vasco le cui felici, &c." to the hero of the Lusiad."

Of the extraordinary talents of his illustrious contemporary, Tasso appears to have been perfectly sensible. Montesquieu in his "Spirit of Laws," has, with a degree of impartiality, by no means peculiar to his character, allowed that the Lusiad unites the charms of the "Odyssey" with the magnificence of the "Æneid;" he might have added, with the majestic spirit and divine energy of the "Iliad." The fire of the Mæonian bard glows in the eye of Camoens, while he bears upon his aspect the serene dignity of the Mantuan muse. But he not only unites the power of composition that characterize the three ancient poems; he associates their different interests. The strong unconquered passions, the martial ardour, and stormy valour of the heroes at Troy, are powerfully represented in Gama's narrative of the Lusians and their wars. His piety, his tender attachment to his country, and affection for his prince, make us feel every thing for him that we have felt for Virgil's hero; and whatever attention, curiosity or concern the man, could possibly excite in the reader, all these must be awakened in a more interesting manner by the author of the Lusiad. He subscribes to Voltaire's assertion, when he calls it une nouvelle espèce d'Épopée; but though the happiness of Camoens in the novelty of his subject must be acknowledged, yet it is certainly much in the manner and spirit of the "Odyssey," the conduct of which he has omitted to analyse.

Qui mores hominum multorum vidit—

To the character of the Lusiad, as given by Mickle, every reader of taste will very freely consent; and he has done himself the highest honour, in making his author live in the fulness of his spirit, and in all the strength, harmony, and beauty of our heroic verse. The most delicate strain of gallantry, and the high spirit of Spanish honour, while in its unstained days, breathe throughout the Lusiad. Description riots, and the graces of imitative and sentimental harmony abound in every page. On the principal beauties of the poem, it is unnecessary to enlarge. The death of the beautiful Inez, an epifode, in the third book, is distinguished by a tenderness and sweetness of numbers. The battle of Ajubarota in the fourth, and the sea storm in the sixth, are described in all the strength of rough nervous verse. The fiction of the apparition of the Cape of Tempests, in the fifth, in sublimity and awful grandeur of imagination, is perhaps unequalled in human composition. The description of the spectre, the awfulness of the prediction, and the horror that breathes through the whole, till the phantom is interrupted by Gama, are in the true spirit of the wild and grand terrific of an Homer or a Shakspeare. The numbers which relate the behaviour of Gama, while a prisoner in India, in the beginning of the ninth book, have a peculiar loftiness and grand simplicity; and the description of the Island of Love, in the same book, contains the most beautiful landscapes of rural painting, presented in successive scenes, in the softest and most melodious versification.

It is with concern, that the present writer is obliged to observe, that, notwithstanding the epic powers of Camoens, have received their due honour in our language, by the elegant and spirited translation of Mickle, and the subject being commercial, and therefore seeming so peculiarly calculated for Great Britain, the English Lusiad has not yet attained the celebrity it merits. But the time must come, when it will be universally read, and then it must be universally admired. That its merits may be more generally known, he has recommended it to be reprinted among other poetical translations, designed as a supplement to this collection of the "Works of the British Poets."

His Sir Martyn, or the Progress of Dissipation, is the longest and most elaborate of his original poetical compositions. Among the numerous imitations of Spenser, it will not be easy to point out one that will so well bear a comparison with the original. It indicates a warm and fruitful imagination, with much taste. The design and spirit of the poem deserve great praise. After an invocation to the genius of Spenser, and the proposition of the subject, Sir Martyn's first attachment to his concubine, his levity, his love of pleasure and dissipation, with the influence over him which she assumes, are described. The effects of this influence are next exemplified in the different parts of his relative character,—in his domestic elegance of park, garden, and house;—in his unhappiness as a lover, a parent, a man of letters;—behaviour as a master to his tenants, as a friend and a brother;—and in his feelings in his hours of retirement, as a man of birth and a patriot. The poem closes with an allegorical catastrophe. The reasons he gives in his preface for having adopted the manner of Spenser, are, "That the fulness and wantonness of description, the quaint simplicity, and above all, the ludicrous, of which the antique phraseology and manner of Spenser, are so happily and peculiarly susceptible, inclined him to esteem it, not only as the best, the only mode of composition adapted to his subject." Though the relation between verse of Gothic structure, and the Progress of Dissipation may not generally be allowed, yet it cannot be denied,—that the imitation is very successfully performed, with respect to the metre, the language, and the fiction. He has the same style of harmony, and the same spirit of enthusiasm which distinguish the poetry of Spenser. His descriptions are equally copious and luxuriant, and are embellished with the same degree of imagery, and heightened by the same colourings of animated fancy.

His Almada Hill, an Epistle from Lisbon, is very properly styled "A Supplement to the English Lusiad," and well deserves to be adopted into the native language of the Portuguese Homer. He opens his epistle with a well-drawn picture of a joyless winter day in England, contrasted with the genial influence of a warmer clime! After hinting at what will probably be the cause of our political decay, he enters more immediately upon the subject of the poem, which abounds with local picturesque views by land and sea, and historical incidents, from the time of the Romans, to the great earthquake in 1755. The descriptive parts are, he tells us, strictly local; and they have every appearance of being truly characteristic and appropriate. The names of Viriatus, Sertorius, Lucan, Trajan, &c. are happily introduced. After cursorily pointing out the mighty deeds the lofty hills of Spain of old have witnessed, he notices the change of manners that has prevailed in consequence of the subversion of the Roman empire, by the irruption of the Goths and other northern tribes; and though the causes he assigns for that peculiar character which has since marked each of the different divisions of Europe, may not be historically true, yet the ideas he has started on this subject are at least poetical and ingenious. The diseased chivalry of romance is contrasted with the chivalry of wisdom and honour, as he styles the religious fury of crusading, which the present writer cannot agree with him in admiring. The fall of Lisbon's naval throne occasions some boding thoughts on that of London. The naval glory of the Portuguese, during the time they first established themselves in Asia, and the fate of Gama, have their due place; with the massacre of the Moors at the taking of Lisbon, that of the Jews and Christians in 1505, the revolution that set the Duke of Braganza on the throne, a sublime description of the earthquake, &c. The Duke of Lafœws receives a high eulogium in the conclusion, for his taste in the belles lettres, history, &c. The general poetical merit of the epistle is very considerable. The sentiments may sometimes be thought exceptionable; but the versification is spirited and harmonious; though it would have been more so, had he less frequently made one verse run into another. In attempting bold innovations in language, he has, in some instances, violated metaphorical propriety. Of the peculiar advantages of the epistolary form of composition, he has not perhaps availed himself so much as he might have done; excepting, at the commencement of the poem, he seems in great measure to have lost sight of the friend to whom it is addressed. He is indeed twice afterwards adverted to; but from the manner in which it is done, it seems as much with the view to fill up the measure of the verse, as to awaken and direct the attention to any striking object. The writer of epistles, if he wishes to make them as interesting as their nature will admit, should lose no opportunity of appealing, where it can prudently be done, to the feelings and sentiments of those to whom he is supposed to be addressing himself.

His Pollio, an Elegiac Ode, is characterised by genuine enthusiasm, vigour of thought, and natural expression. The description of Roslin Castle has dignity and characteristic propriety. There is likewise considerable merit in the description of the retreats where he had experienced with his brother, the happy amusements of young simplicity; which naturally renew his grief and complaints for his loss.

His Elegy on Mary Queen of Scots, evinces strong powers of imagination, a brilliant fancy, and true sentimental feeling. The imagery is various and rich; the expression is at the same time beautiful and bold; and the sentiments are tender and interesting. They who think differently from him with respect to the character of Mary, must allow, that her misfortunes are lamented, and her virtues and accomplishments are commended, in numbers equally harmonious and tender.

His Knowledge, an Ode, is nervous and elegant, both in sentiment and expression; and though, by reason of its philosophical tenor, the descriptive part is less luxuriant, yet the colouring is not languid, nor are the descriptions inanimated.

His Hengist and Mey, and the Sorcerers, are not inferior to the best imitations of the ancient heroic ballad. The Sorcerers, is conceived with much fancy. It was written at the request of a friend, who possessed Mr. Mortimer's picture of "The Incantation," as a story to the painting. From this picture, Dixon, engraved a very fine print.

His Esdale Braes, he has characterised in a letter, which he sent to a friend, with the song, "The ballad, indifferent as it is, has too much poetical expression, and is too clear of low nonsense and absurdity, ever to become popular."

The elegant stanzas on Mr. Servinton, were built on an incident somewhat similar to that which he has made the groundwork of his Sir Martyn, and may be considered as a miniature picture of the consequences of dissipation. The stanzas On the neglect of Poetry are beautifully pathetic. Of his smaller pieces, the Epitaph on Mr. Mortimer is the most successful. In the Stanzas to a young Lady studious of Botany, he makes the primrose a flower which lingers to the winter season; on the contrary, it is, as its name denotes, an early production of the Spring, and does not linger even to the approach of Summer.

POLLIO.

AN ELEGIAC ODE.

Written in the Wood near Roslin Castle. 1762.

"Hæc Jovem sentire deosque cunctos,
"Spem bonam certamque domum reporto."

HORAT.

ADVERTISEMENT.

IT has been often said, that fiction is the most proper field for poetry. If it is always so, the writer of this little piece acknowledges it as a circumstance against him. The following ode was first suggested, and the ideas contained in it raised, on revisiting the ruins and woods that had been the scene of his early amusements, with a deserving brother, who died in his twenty-first year.

THE peaceful evening breathes her balmy store,
The playful school-boys wanton o'er the green;
Where spreading poplars shade the cottage door,
The villagers in rustic joy convene.

Amid the secret windings of the wood,
With solemn meditation let me stray;
This is the hour, when to the wife and good,
The heavenly maid repays the toils of day.

The river murmurs, and the breathing gale
Whispers the gently-waving boughs among;
The star of evening glimmers o'er the dale,
And leads the silent host of heaven along.

How bright, emerging o'er yon broom-clad height,
The silver empress of the night appears!
Yon limpid pool reflects a stream of light,
And faintly in its breast the woodland bears,

The waters tumbling o'er their rocky bed,
Solemn and constant, from yon dell resound;
The lonely hearths blaze o'er the distant glade;
The bat, low-wheeling, skims the dusky ground.

August and hoary, o'er the sloping dale,
The Gothic abbey rears its sculptur'd towers;
Dull through the roofs resounds the whistling gale;
Dark solitude among the pillars low'rs.

Where yon old trees bend o'er a place of graves,
And, solemn, shade a chapel's sad remains;

Where yon skaith'd poplar through the window
waves,

And, twining round, the hoary arch sustains:

There oft at dawn, as one forgot behind,
Who longs to follow, yet unknowing where,
Some hoary shepherd, o'er his staff reclin'd,
Pores on the graves, and sighs a broken prayer.

High o'er the pines, that with their dark'ning shade

Surround yon craggy bank, the castle rears
Its crumbling turrets: still its towery head
A warlike mien, a fullen grandeur wears.

So, 'midst the snow of age, a beautilf air
Still on the war-worn veteran's brow attends;
Still his big bores his youthful prime declare,
Though trembling, o'er the feeble crutch he bends.

While round the gates the dusky wallflowers creep,
Where oft the knights the beauteous dames have led;

Gone is the bower, the grot a ruin'd heap,
Where bays and ivy o'er the fragments spread.

'Twas here our fires, exulting from the fight,
Great in their bloody arms, march'd o'er the lea,
Eying their rescued fields with proud delight;
Now lost to them! and ah, how chang'd to me!

This bank, the river, and the fanning breeze,
The dear idea of my Pollio bring;
So shone the moon through these soft-nodding
trees,
When here we wander'd in the eves of spring.

When April's smiles the flowery lawn adorn,
And modest cowslips deck the streamlet's side:
When fragrant orchards to the roseate morn
Unfold their bloom, in heaven's own colours
dy'd:

So fair a blossom gentle Pollio wore,
These were the emblems of his healthful mind;
To him the letter'd page display'd its lore,
To him bright fancy all her wealth resign'd:

Him with her purest flames the muse endow'd,
Flames never to th' illiberal thought allied;
The sacred sisters led where virtue glow'd
In all her charms; he saw, he felt, and died.

Oh partner of my infant griefs and joys!
Big with the scenes now past, my heart o'erflows,
Bids each endearment, fair as once, to rise,
And dwells luxurious on her melting woes.

Oft with the rising sun, when life was new,
Along the woodland have I roam'd with thee;
Oft by the moon have brush'd the evening dew,
When all was fearless innocence and glee.

The fainted well where yon bleak hill declines,
Has oft been conscious of those happy hours;
But now the hill, the river crown'd with pines,
And fainted well, have lost their cheering powers.

For thou art gone—my guide, my friend, oh
where,
Where hast thou fled, and left me here behind!
My tenderest wish, my heart to thee was bare,
Oh, now cut off each passage to thy mind!

How dreary is the gulf, how dark, how void,
The trackless shores that never were repast!
Dread separation! on the depth untry'd
Hope falters, and the soul recoils aghast.

Wide round the spacious heavens I cast my eyes;
And shall these stars glow with immortal fire,
Still shine the lifeless glories of the skies,
And could thy bright, thy living soul expire?

Far be the thought—the pleasures most sublime,
The glow of friendship, and the virtuous tear,
The tow'ring wish that scorns the bounds of time,
Chill'd in this vale of death, but languish here.

So plant the vine on Norway's wint'ry land,
The languid stranger feebly buds, and dies;
Yet there's a clime where virtue shall expand
With godlike strength, beneath her native skies.

The lonely shepherd on the mountain's side,
With patience waits the rosy opening day;
The mariner at midnight's darksome tide,
With cheerful hope expects the morning ray.

Thus I, on life's storm-beaten ocean tost,
In mental vision view the happy shore,
Where Pollio beckons to the peaceful coast,
Where fate and death divide the friends no
more.

Oh that some kind, some pitying kindred shade,
Who now, perhaps, frequents this solemn grove,
Would tell the awful secrets of the dead,
And from my eyes the mortal film remove!

Vain is the wish—yet surely not in vain
Man's bosom glows with that celestial fire,
Which scorns earth's luxuries, which smiles at pain,
And wings his spirit with sublime desire.

To fan this spark of heaven, this ray divine,
Still, oh my soul! still be thy dear employ;
Still thus to wander through the shades be thine,
And swell thy breast with visionary joy.

So to the dark-brow'd wood, or sacred mount,
In ancient days the holy seers retir'd,
And, led in vision, drank at Siloe's fount,
While rising ecstasies their bosoms fir'd;

Restor'd creation bright before them rose,
The burning deserts smil'd as Eden's plains,
One friendly shade the wolf and lambkin chose,
The flowery mountains sung—"Messiah reigns!"

Though fainter raptures my cold breast inspire,
Yet let me oft frequent this solemn scene,
Oft to the abbey's shatter'd walls retire,
What time the moonshine dimly gleams between.

There, where the crows in hoary ruin nod,
And weeping yews o'er shade the letter'd stones,
While midnight silence wraps these drear abodes,
And soothes me wand'ring o'er my kindred bones.

Let kindled fancy view the glorious morn,
When from the bursting graves the just shall rise,
All nature smiling, and, by angels borne,
Messiah's cros's far blazing o'er the skies.

SIR MARTYN.

IN THE MANNER OF SPENSER.

AUTHOR'S ADVERTISEMENT.

THIS attempt in the manner of Spenser, was first published in 1767, since which time it has passed through some editions, under the title of the Concubine; a title which, it must be confessed, conveyed a very improper idea both of the subject and spirit of the poem. It is now more properly intitled Sir Martin; and the author is happy to find that the public approbation of the work has given him an opportunity to alter its name so much to advantage.

The first publication was not accompanied with any prefatory address, by which either the intention of the writer might be explained, or the candour of the reader solicited. To solicit candour for the poetical execution, he still declines; for taste is not to be bribed; but, perhaps, justice to himself may require some explanation of his design, and some apology for his use of the manner of Spenser.

It is an established maxim in criticism, that an interesting moral is essential to a good poem. The character of the man of fortune is of the utmost importance, both in the political and moral world; to throw, therefore, a just ridicule on the pursuits and pleasures which often prove fatal to the important virtues of the gentleman, must afford an interesting moral; but it is the management of the writer which alone must render it striking. Yet however he may have failed in attaining this, the author may decently assert, that to paint false pleasure as it is, ridiculous and contemptible, alike destructive to virtue and to happiness, was, at least, the purpose of his poem.

It is also an established maxim in criticism, that the subject of a poem should be one; that every part shou'd contribute to the completion of one design; which, properly pursued, will naturally diffuse itself into a regular beginning, middle, and end. Yet, in attaining this unity of the whole, the necessary regularity must still be poetical; for the spirit of poetry cannot exist under the shackles of logical or mathematical arrangement. Or, to use the words of a very eminent critic, "As there must

"needs be a connection, so that connection will
 "best answer its end, and the purpose of the writer;
 "which, whilst it leads by a sure train of think"ing to the conclusion in view, conceals itself all
 "the while, and leaves to the reader the satisfac"tion of supplying the intermediate links, and
 "joining together, in his own mind, what is left
 "in a seeming posture of neglect and incon-
 "nection."

If, therefore, the delineation of the character of the man of birth, who, with every advantage of natural abilities and amiable disposition, is at once lost to the public and himself; if this character has its beginning, middle, and end, the poem has all the unity that propriety requires: how far such unity is attained, may perhaps be seen at one view in the following argument.

After an invocation to the genius of Spenser, and proposition of the subject, the knight's first attachment to his concubine, his levity, love of pleasure, and dissipation, with the influence over him which on this she assumes, are parts which undoubtedly constitute a just beginning.

The effects of this influence, exemplified in the different parts of a gentleman's relative character —in his domestic elegance of park, gardens, and house—in his unhappiness as a lover, a parent, and a man of letters—behaviour as a master to his tenants, as a friend and a brother—and in his feelings in his hours of retirement as a man of birth, and a patriot, naturally complete the middle, to which an allegorical catastrophe furnishes the proper and regular end.

Some reasons, perhaps, may be expected, for having adopted the manner of Spenser. To propose a general use of it, were indeed highly absurd;
 yet it may be presumed, there are some subjects on which it may be used with advantage. But not to enter upon any formal defence, the author will only say, that the fulness and wantonness of description, the quaint simplicity, and above all, the ludicrous, of which the antique phraseology and manner of Spenser are so happily and peculiarly susceptible, inclined him to esteem it not solely as the best, but the only mode of composition adapted to his subject.

CANTO I.

The mirthfull bowres and flowry dales
 Of pleasures faerie land,
 Where virtues budds are blighted as
 By fount enchanters wand.

AWAKE, ye west windes, through the lonely dale,
 And, fancy, to thy faerie bowre betake!
 Even now, with balmie freshnesse, breathes the gale,
 Dimpling with downy wing the stilly lake;
 Through the pale willows faultering whispers
 wake, [dew;
 And evening comes with locks bedropt with
 On Desmonds * mouldering turrets slowly shake

* The castle of the Earl of Desmond, on the banks of the river Mulla in Ireland, was some time the residence of Spenser, the place where he wrote the greatest part of the Faery Queene.

The trembling ric-grass, and the hare-bell blue
 And ever and anon faire Mullas plaints renew.

O for the namelesse powre to strike mine eare,
 That powre of charme by naiads once possess'd,
 Melodious Mulla! when, full oft whyleare,
 Thy gliding murmurs soothd the gentle brest
 Of haplesse Spenser; long with woes oppress'd,
 Long with the drowlic patrons smyles decoy'd,
 Till in thy shades, no more with cares distrest,
 No more with painful anxious hopes accloyd,
 The Sabbath of his life the milde good man en-
 joyd:

Enjoyd each wish; while wrapt in visions blest,
 The muses wooed him, when each evening grey
 Luxurious fancy, from her wardrobe drest
 Brought forth her faerie knights in sheen array
 By forrest edge or welling fount, where lay,
 Farre from the crowd, the carelesse bard supine:
 Oh happy man! how innocent and gay,
 How mildly peaceful past these houres of thine!
 Ah, could a sigh avail, such sweete calme peace were mine!

Yet oft, as pensive through these lawns I stray,
 Unbidden transports through my bosome swell;
 With pleasing reverence awd mine eye, survey
 The hallow'd shades where Spenser strung his shell. [dell,
 The brooke still murmurs through the bushy
 Still through the woodlands wild and beauteous rise
 The hills green tops; still from her moss-white cell
 Complaining echoe to the stockdove sighs,
 And fancy, wandering here, still feels new extacies.

Then come, ye genii of the place! O come,
 Ye wilde-wood muses of the native lay!
 Ye who these bancks did whilom constant roam,
 And round your Spenser ever gladsom play!
 Oh come once more! and with your magic ray
 These lawns transforming, raise the mystic scene—
 These lawns already own your vertual sway,
 Proud citys rise, with seas and wildes atweene;
 In one enchanted view the various walks of men.

Towrd to the sky, with cliff on cliff ypild,
 Fronting the sunne, a rock fantastic rose;
 From every rift the pink and primrose smild,
 And redd with blossoms hung the wildings
 boughs;
 On middle cliff each flowry shrub that blows
 On Mayes sweete morn a fragrant grove dis-
 playd,
 Beauteous and wilde as ever druid chose;
 From whence a reverend wizard through the shade
 Advaupt to meet my steps; for here me seemd
 I stray'd.

White as the snow-drop round his temples flowd
 A few thin hairs; bright in his eagle eye,
 Meint with heavens lightning, social mildnesse
 glowd;
 Yet when him list queynt was his leer and slye,
 Yet wondrous distant from malignant;
 For still his smyle did forcibly disclose
 The soul of worth and waim hart-honestie:

Such winning grace as age but rare bestows
Dwelt on his cheeks and lips, though like the withering rose.

Of skyen blue a mantling robe he wore,
A purple girdle loosely tyd his waist
Enwove with many a flowre from many a shore,
And half conceald, and half reveald his vest,
His vest of silk, the Faerie Queenes bequest
What time she wooed him ere his head was grey;
A lawrell bough he held, and now address
To speech, he points it to the mazy way
That wide and farre around in wildest prospect lay.

Younkling, quoth he, lo, where at thy desire
The wilderness of life extensive lies;
The path of blustering fame and warlike ire,
Of scowling powre and lean-boned covetise,
Of thoughtlesse mirth and folly's giddy joys;
And whither all those paths illusive end,
All these at my command didactick rise,
And shift obedient as mine arm I bend.
He said, and to the field did strait his arm extend.

Well worthy views, quoth I, rise all around,
But certes, lever would I see and hear,
How, oft, the gentle plant of generous ground
And fairest bloom no ripend fruit will bear:
Oft have I shed, perdie, the bitter tear
To see the shoots of virtue shrink and dy,
Untimely blasted in the soft greene eare:
What evil blight thus works such villainy,
To tell, O reverend seer, thy prompt enchantment try.

Ah me! how little doe unthinking youth
Foresee the sorrowes of their elder age!
Full oft, quoth he, my bosom melts with ruth
To note the follies of their early stage,
Where dissipations cup full deepe they pledge;
Ne can the wizards saws disperse to flight
The ills that soon will warre against them wage, [spright,
Ne may the spells that lay the church-yarde
From pleasures servile bands release the luckles wight.

This truth to tell, see yonder lawnskepe rise,
An ample field of British clime I ween,
A field which never by poetick eyes
Was viewd from hence. Thus, through the rural scene
Has by a thousand artists pencild beene,
Some other may, from other point, explore
A view full different, yet as faire besene:
So shall these lawns present one lawnskepe more:
For certes where we stand stood never wight before.

In yonder dale does wonne a gentle knight—
Fleet as he spake still rose the imagerie
Of all he told depeinten to the sight;
It was, I ween, a goodly baronic:
Beneath a greene-clad hill, right faire to see,
The castle in the sunny vale yfood; [tree,
All round the east grew many a sheltering
And on the west a dimpling silver flood Ran through the gardins trim, then crept into the wood.

How sweetly here, quoth he, might one employ
And fill with worthy deed the fleeting houres.
What plesance mote a learned wight enjoy
Among the hills and vales, and shady bowres,
To mark how buxom Ceres round him poures
The hoary-headed wheat, the freckled corne,
The bearded barlie, and the hopp that towres
So high, and with his bloom salewes the morne,
And with the orchard vies the lawnskepe to adorn;

The fragrant orchard, where her golden store
Pomona lavishes on everie tree,
The velvet-coated peach, the plumb so hore,
The nestrines redd, and pippins sheene to see,
That nod in everie gale with wanton glee:
How happy here with Woodstocks' laughing
swain,
And Avon's bard of peerlesse memorie,
To faunter through the dase-whitened plain,
When fancies sweetest impe, Dan Spenser, joins the train.

Ne to Syr Martyn height were these unknown;
Oft by the brooke his infant steps they led,
And oft the fays, with many a warbling tone
And laughing shape, stood round his morning
bed:
Such happinefs bloom'd fair around his head.
Yet though his mind was formd each joy to taste,
From him, alas! dear homefelt joyance fled,
Vain meteors still his cheated arms embrac'd;
Where all seemd flowrie gay, he found a dreary waste.

Just when he had his eighteenth summer seen,
Lured by the fragrance of the new-mown
hay, [green,
As careless sauntering through the elm-fenced
He with his book beguiled the closing day,
The dairy-maide hight Kathrin frisk'd that
way;
A roguish twinkling look the gypsic cast,
For much she wishd the lenmans part to play?
Nathlesse unheeding on his way he past, [chast.
Ne entered in his heart, or wish or thought un-
Right plump she was, and ruddie glowd her cheek,
Her easie waiste in milch-white boddice dight,
Her golden locks curld down her shoulders sleek,
And halfe her bosome heaving met the sight,
Whiles gayly she accosts the sober wight:
Freedom and glee blythe sparkling in her eye
With wanton merrimake she trips the knight,
And round the younkling makes the clover fly:
But soon he starten up, more gamefome by and bye.

I ween, quoth she, you think to win a kiss,
But certes you shall woo and strive in vain.
Fast in his armes he caught her then ywis;
Yfere they fell; but loud and angry then
Gan she of shame and haviour vild complain,
While bashfully the weetelesse boy did look:
With cunning smyles she viewd his awkward pain; [took,
The smyle he caught, and eke new courage
And Kathrin then a kiss, perdie, did gentlic brook.

Fleet past the months ere yet the giddy boy
 One thought bestowd on what would surely be;
 But well his aunt perceivd his dangerous toy,
 And fore she feard her auncient familie [gree:
 Should now be staine with blood of bale de-
 For sooth to tell, her liefest hearts delight
 Was still to count her princely pedigree,
 Through barons bold all up to Cadwall hight,
 Thence up to Trojan Brute ysprung of Venus
 bright.

But, zealous to forefend her gentle race
 From baselic matching with plebeian bloud,
 Whole nights she schemed to shonne thilk fould disgrace, [vowd:
 And Kathrin's bale in wondrous wrath she Yet could she not with cunning portauñce shroud,

So as might best succeed her good intent,
 But clept her lemman and vild slut aloud;
 That soon she should her gracelesse thewes repent, [shent.

And stand in long white sheet before the parson
 So spake the wizard, and his hand he waid,
 And prompt the scenerie rose, where listles lay

The knight in shady bowre, by streamlet lavd,
 While Philomela sooth'd the parting day:
 Here Kathrin him approachd with features
 gay,

And all her store of blandishments and wiles;
 The knight was touchd—but she with soft delay

And gentle tears ybleds her languid smiles,
 And of base falsitie th' enamour'd boy reviles.

Amazed the boy beheld her ready teares,
 And, faultring oft, exclaims with wondring stare,

What mean these sighs? dispell thine ydle fears,
 And, confidant in me, thy griefes declare.
 And need, quoth she, need I my heart to bare,

And tellen what untold well knowne mote he?
 Lost is my friends good-will, my tuothers
 care—

By you deserted—ah! unhappy me!
 Left to your aunts fell spight, and wreakfull crueltie.

My aunt! quoth he, forsooth shall she command?

No; sooner shall yond hill forsake his place,
 He laughing said, and would have caught her
 hand;

Her hand she shifted to her blubbered face
 With prudish modestie, and sobd: alas!
 Grant me your bond, or else on yonder tree
 These silken garters, pledge of thy embrace,
 Ah, welayday! shall hang my babe and me,
 And everie night our ghostes shall bring all hell to thee.

Ythrilld with horror gapd the wareles wight,
 As when, aloft on well-stored cherrie-tree,
 The thievish elfe beholds with pale affright
 The gardner near, and weets not where to flee:

And will my bond forefend thilk miserie?
 That shalt thou have; and for thy peace beside, [be—
 What mote I more? Houfekerper shalt thou
 An awfull oath forthwith his promise tied,
 And Kathrine was as blythe as ever blythesome bride.

His aunt fell sick for very dole to see [pine
 Her kindest counfels scorn'd, and fore did
 To think what well she knew would shortly be,
 Cadwallins bloud debas'd in Kathrins line;
 For very dole she died. Oh sad propine,
 Syr knight, for all that care which she did take!
 How many a night, for coughs and colds of thine,
 Has she sat up rare cordial broths to make,
 And cockerd thee so kind with manie a daintie cake!

Soft as the gossamer in summer shades
 Extends its twinkling line from spray to spray,
 Gently as sleep the weary lids invades,
 So soft, so gently pleasure mines her way:
 But whether will the smiling fiend betray,
 Ah, let the knights approaching dayes declare!
 Though everie bloome and flowre of buxon
 May
 Bestrew her path, to defarts cold and bare
 The mazy path betrays the giddy wight unware.

Ah! says the wizard, what may now availe
 His manlie sense that fairest blossoms bore,
 His temper gentle as the whispering gale,
 His native goodnesse, and his vertuous lore!
 Now through his veins, all uninflam'd before,
 Th' enchanted cup of dissipation hight
 Has snedd, with subtil stealth, through everie pore,
 Its giddy poison, brewd with magicke might,
 Each budd of gentle worth and better thought to blight.

So the Canadïan, train'd in drery wastes
 To chase the foaming bore and fallow deer,
 At first the trader's beverage shytle tastes;
 But soon with headlong rage, unselft whyleare,
 Inflam'd he lusts for the delirious cheer:
 So bursts the boy disdainful of retreat
 Headlong atonce into the wyld career
 Of jollitie, with all his mind unbent, [spent.
 And dull and yrksome hangs the day in sports un-

Now fly the wassal seasons wing with glee,
 Each day affords a floode of roing joy;
 The springs green months ycharm'd with cock-
 ing flee,
 The jolly horse-race, summers grand employ,
 His harvests sports the foxe and hare destroy;
 But the substantial comforts of the bowl
 Are thine, O winter! thine to fire the boy
 With Englands cause, and swell his mightie soul,
 Till dizzy with his peres about the flore-he rowl.

Now round his dores ynail'd on cloggs of wood
 Hangs many a badgers snout and foxes tail,
 The which had he through many a hedge per-few'd, [and delve, and dale;
 Through marsh, through meer, dyke, ditch,

To hear his hair-breadth scapes would make you pale; [late,
 Which well the groom height Patrick can re-
 Whileas on holidays he quaffs his ale;
 And not one circumstance will he forgett;
 So keen the braggard chole is on his hunting fett.

Now on the turf the knight with sparkling eyes Beholds the springing racers sweep the
 ground:

Now lightlie by the post the foremost flies,
 And thondring on, the ratling hoofs rebound;
 The courfers groan, the cracking whips re-
 found:

And gliding with the gale they rush along
 Right to the stand. The knight flares wildly round

And rising on his fell, his jocund tongue
 Is heard above the noise of all the noise throng.

While thus the knight persewd the shaddow joy,

As youthly spirits thoughtlesse led the way,
 Her gilden baits, ah; gilded to decoy!
 Kathrine did eve and morn before him lay,
 Watchfull to please, and ever kindle gay;
 Till, like a thing bewitchd, the careless wight
 Relinquish himself to her capricious sway:
 Then soon, perdie, was never charme-bound spright

In necromancers thrall in halfe such pitteous plight.

Her end accomplishd, and her hopes at stay,
 What need her now, she recks, one smyle bestow;

Each care to please were trouble thrown away,
 And thirlesse waste, with many maxims moe,
 As, what were she the the better did she so?
 She conns, and freely sues her native bent:

Yet still can she to guard his thraldom know,
 Though grim'd with snuff in tawdrie gown she went, [ment.

Though peevish ere her spleen and rude her jolli-

As when the linnnet hails the balmic morne,
 And roving through the trees his mattin sings,

Lively with joy, till on a lucklesse thorn
 He lights, where to his feet the birdlime clings;

Then all in vain he flaps his gandy wings;
 The more he flatters still the more foredone:

So fares it with the knight: each morning brings

His deeper thrall; ne can he brawling shun,
 For Kathrin was his thorne and birdlime both in in one.

Or, when atop the hoary western hill
 The ruddic funne appears to rest his chin,

When not a breeze disturbs the murmuring rill,
 And mildlie warm the falling dewes begin,

The gamefome trout then shows her silveric skin,

As wantonly beneath the wave she glides,
 Watching the buzzing flies, that never blin,

Then, dropt with pearle and golde, displays her sides, [divides.

While she with frequent leape the ruffled streame

On the green banck a truant schoolboy stands;
 Well has his urchin markt her merry play,

An ashen rod obeys his guileful hands,
 And leads the nimick fly acrofs her way;

Askaunce, with listly look and coy delay,
 The hungrie trout the glitteraund treachor eyes,
 Semblaunt of life, with speckled wings fo gay;
 Then, flylic nibbling, prudish from it flies,
 Till with a bouncing start she bites the truthles
 prize.

Ah, then the younker gives the fatefull twitch;
 Struck with amaze he feels the hook ypignt Dcepe in her gills, and, plunging where the beech

Shaddows the poole, she runs in dread affright;
 In vain the deepest rocke her late delight,
 In vain the fedgy nook for help she tries;
 The laughing elfe now curbs, now aids her slight,

The more entangled still the more she flies,
 And soon amid the grafs the panting captive lies.

Where now, ah pity! where that sprightly play,
 That wanton bounding, and exulting joy,

That lately welcomd the retourning ray,
 When by the rivletts banks, with blushes coy,

April walkd forth---ah! never more to toy,
 In purling streame, she pants, she gasps, and dies!

Ah me! how like the fortune of the boy,
 His days of revel, and his nights of noise

Have left him now involvd, his lemman's haplesse prize.

See now the changes that attend her sway;
 The park where rural elegance had placd

Her sweete retreat, where cunning art did play
 Her happiest freaks, that nature undefaced

Received new charmes; ah, see, how foul disgraced

Now lies thilke park so sweetlie wyld afore!
 Each grove and bowery walke be now laid

waste;
 The bowling-greene has lost its shaven flore,
 And snowd with washing suds now yawns beside the dore.

All round the borders where the pansie blue,
 Crocus, and polyanthus speckled fine,

And dasodils in sayre confusion grew
 Emong the rose-bush roots and eglantine;

These now their plaec to cabbages resign,
 And tawdrie please supply the lillys stead;

Rough artichokes now bristle where the vine
 Its purple clusters round the windows spread,

And laisic cucumbers on dung recline the head.

The fragrant orchard, once the summers pride,
 Where oft, by moonshine, on the daisie greene,

In jovial daunce, or tripping fide by fide,
 Pomona and her buxom nymphs were scene;

Or where the clear canal stretchd out atweene, Dextly their locks with blossomes would they brede;

Or resting by the primerose hillocks sheene,
 Beneath the apple boughs and walnut shade,

They sung their loves the while the fruitage gaily
 spread:

The fragrant orchard at her dire command
 In all the pride of blossom strewd the plain;

The hillocks gently rising through the land
 Must now no trace of natures steps retain;

The clear canal, the mirrour of the swain,
 And bluish lake no more adorn the greene,

Two dirty watering ponds alone remain;

And where the moss-floord filbert bowres had beene, [cleane.
 Is now a turnip fielde and cow yarde nothing

An auncient crone, yclepd by housewives thrift;
 All this devidd for trim oeconomie;
 But certes, ever from her birth bereft
 Of elegance, ill fitts her title high:
 Coarse were her looks, yet smoothe her courtesse,
 Hoyden her shapes, but grave was her attyre,
 And ever fixt on trifles was her eye;
 And still she plodden round the kitchen fire,
 To save the smallest crombe her pleasure and de-lyre.

Bow-bent with eld, her steps were soft and flow,
 Fast at her side a bunch of keys yhong,
 Dull care sat brooding on her jealous brow,
 Sagacious proverbs dropping from her tongue:
 Yet sparing though she beene her guesstes emong,
 Ought by herselfe that the mote gormandise,
 The foul curmudgeon would have that ere long,
 And hardly could her witt her gust suffice;
 Albee in varied stream, still was it covetise.

Dear was the kindlie love which Kathrin bore
 This crooked Ronion, for in soothly guise
 She was her genius and her counsellor:
 Now cleanly milking-pails in careful wise
 Bedeck each room, and much can she despise
 The Knights complaints, and thriflesse judgment ill: [buys,
 Eke versd in sales, right wondrous cheap she ParLOUR and bedroom too her bargains fill;
 Though uselesse, cheap they beene, and cheap she purchafd still.

His tenants whilom been of thristie kind,
 Did like to sing and worken all the day,
 At feed time never were they left behind,
 And at the harvest feast still first did play;
 And ever at the terme their rents did pay,
 For well they knew to guide their rural geer:
 All in a row, yclad in homespun gray,
 They marchd to church each Sunday of the year,
 Their imps yode on afore, the carles brought up the rear.

Ah happy days! but now no longer found:
 No more with social hospitable glee
 The village hearths at Christmas-tide resound,
 No more the Whitson gamboll may you see,
 Nor morrice-daunce, nor May daye jollitie
 When the blythe maydens foot the dewey green;
 But now, in place, heart-sinking penurie
 And hopelesse care on every face is seen,
 As these the dreary times of curfeu bell had been.

For everie while, with thief-like lounging pace,
 And dark of look, a tawdrie villain came,
 Muttering some words with serious-meaning face, [name;
 And on the church dore he would fix their
 Then, nolens volens, they must heed the same,
 And nought those fieldes their yeomen grand-fires plowd
 Eer since black Edwards days, when, crown'd with fame,

From Cressie field the knights old grandfire prow'd [allowd.
 Lied home his yeomandrie, and each his glebe

But now the orphan fees his harvest fielde
 Beneath the gripe of laws stern rapine fall,
 The friendlesse widow, from her hearth expelld,
 Withdraws to some poor hutt with earthen wall:
 And these, perdie, were Kathrins projects all;
 For, sooth to tell, grievd was the Knight full iore
 Such sinful deeds to see: yet such his thrall,
 Though he had pledged his troth, yet mathemore
 It mote-he keep, except she willd the same before.

Oh wondrous powre of womans wily art,
 What for thy witchcraft too securd may be!
 Not Circes cup may so transform the heart,
 Or bend the will, fallacious powre, like thee;
 Lo, manly sence, of princely dignitie, Witchd by thy spells, thy crouching slave is seen; [knee,
 Lo, high-browd honour bends the groveling,
 And every bravest virtue, sooth I ween,
 Seems like a blighted flowre of dank unlovely
 mien.

Ne may grim Saracene, nor Tartar man,
 Such ruthlesse bondage on his slave impose,
 As Kathrin on the Knight full desfly can;
 Ne may the Knight escape, or cure his woes:
 As he who dreams he climbs some mountains
 browes,
 With painful struggling up the steep height strains,
 Anxious he pants and toils, but strength fore-goes
 His feeble limbs, and not a step he gains;
 So toils the powrellesse Knight beneath his servile chains.

His lawyer now assumes the guardians place;
 Learn'd was thilk clerk in deeds, and passing flie;
 Slow was his speeche, and solemn was his face
 As that grave bird which Athens rankt so high
 Pleas'd dullness basking in his gloffie eye,
 The smyle would oft steal through his native
 phlegm;
 And well he guards Syr Martyns propertie,
 Till not one peasant dares invade the game:
 But certes, seven yeares rent was soon his own just claim.

Now mortgage follows mortgage: Cold delay
 Still yawns on everie long depending case.
 The Knights gay bloome the while did fast away;
 Kathrin the while brought bantling imps away,
 While everie day renews his vile disgrace,
 And straitens still the more his galling thrall:
 See now what scenes his household hours debafes;
 And rise successive in his chcerlesse hall. [call.
 So spake the feer, and prompt the scene obeyd his

See, quoth the wizard, how with foltering mien,
 And discomposd yon stranger he receives;
 Lo, how with fulkie look, and moapt with spleen,
 His frowning mistresse to his friend behaves;
 In vain he nods, in vain his hand he waves,
 Ne will she heed, ne will she sign obey;
 Nor corner dark his awkward blushes saves,

Ne may the hearty laugh, ne features gay :
The hearty laugh, perdie, does but his pain betray.

A worthy wight his friend was ever known,
Some generous cause did still his lips inspire ;
He begs the Knight by friendships long agoone
To shelter from his lawyers cruel ire
An auncient hinde, aronde whose cheerlesse
fire
Sat grief and pale diseafe. The poor manswrong
Affects the Knight : his inmost hearts desire Gleams through his eyes ; yet all confusd, and stung [tongue.
With inward pain he looks, and silence guards his

See, while his friend entreats and urges still,
See, how with fidelong glaunce and haviour shy
He steals the look to read his lemman's will,
Watchfull the dawn of an assent to spy.
Look as he will, yet will she not comply.
His friend with scorn beholds his awkward pain ;
From him even pity turns her tear-dewd eye,
And hardlie can the bursting laugh refrain,
While manlie honour frowns on his unmanlie stain.

Let other scenes now rise, the wizard said :
He waid his hand, and other scenes arose.
See there, quoth he, the Knight fupinely laid
Invokes the household hours of learned repose ;
An auncient song its manly joys bestows :
The melting passion of the Nutt-bröwn Mayde
Glides through his breast ; his wandering fancy glows,
Till into wildest reveries betrayd,
He hears th' imagin'd faire, and woos the lovely shade.

Transported he repeats her constant vow,
How to the green wode shade, betide whateer,
She with her banished love would fearlesse goe,
And sweet would be with him the hardest cheer. [sincere
Oh heaven ! he sighs, what blessings dwell
In love like this !—But instant as he sigh'd,
Bursting into the room, loud in his ear
His lemman thonders, Ah ! fell dole betide
The girl that trusts in man before she bees his bride !

And must some lemman of a whiffing song
Delight your fancy she disdainful cries ;
When strait herimps all brawling round her throng, [plies :
And, bleard with teares, each for revenge ap-
Him chief in spleene the father means chastise,
But from his kindlie hand she saves him still ;
Yet for no fault, anon, in furious wife
Yon yellow elfe she little spares to kill ;
And then, next breath, does all to coax his stubborn will.

Pale as the ghoſte that by the gleaming moon
Withdraws the curtain of the murderers bed,
So pale and cold at heart, as halfe aſwoon
The Knight stares round ; yet good nor bad he fed.
Alas ! though trembling anguish inward bled,
His best resolve soon as a meteor dies : [fled,
His present peace and ease mote chance have

He deems ; and yielding, looks most wondrous wife, [guife.
As from himself he hopd his grief and shame dif-
Woe to the wight whose hated home no more
The hallowd temple of Content may be !
While now his days abroad with groomes he wore,
His mistress with her liefeſt companie,
A rude unlettered herd ! with dearest glee,
Enjoys each whisper of her neighbours shame ;
And still anon the flask of ratafie
Improves their tales, till certes not a name Escapes their blasting tongue, or goody, wench, or danic.

One evening tide as with her crones she fate,
Making sweete solace of some scandall new,
A boifrous noife came thondring at the gate,
And soon a sturdy boy approachd in view ;
With gold far glitterand were his vestments
And pyc-shapd hat, and of the silver sheen [blue
An huge broad buckle glauncd in either shoe,
And round his neck an India kerchiefe clean,
And in his hand a switch : a jolly wight I ween.

Farre had he saild, and roamd the foamy deepe,
Where ruddie Phoebus flacks his fire team ;
(With burning golde then flaines th' ethereal steepe,
And Oceans waves like molten silver seem)
Eke had he seen, with diamond glittering beam,
The starre of morn awake the roseate day,
While yet beneath the moon old Nilus stream
Pale through the land reflects the gleamy ray,
As through the midnight skyes appears the milky
way.

Through the Columbian world, and verdant ileas
Unknown to Carthage, had he frequent sped,
Eke had he beene where flowy sonimer smiles
At Christmas tide, where other heavens are spread,
Besprent with starres that Newton never red,
Where in the North the sun of noone is seen :
Wherever Hannos bold ambition led,
Wherever Gama saild, there had he beene,
Gama *, the darling care of Beautys heavenly queene.

Eke had he plied the rivers and the coast [guide ;
Where bold Nearch young Ammons fleet did
A task so dread the world-subduing host
Could not another for such feats provide :
And often had he seen that ocean wide,
Which to his wearie bands thilke youth did say,
None but th' immortal gods had ever spy'd ;
Which sight, quoth he, will all your toils repay :
That none mote see it more als he the gods did pray †.

Through these outlandish shores and oceans dire
For ten long seasons did the younking toil,
Through stormes, through tempests, and the battels fire,
Through cold, through heat, cheerd by the hope the while

Of yet revisiting his natal soil:
 And oft, when flying in the monsoon gale,
 By Æthiopia's coast or Javas ile,
 When glancing over Oceans bosom pale,
 The ship hung on the winds with broad and stea-
 die sail:

Hung on the winds as from his ayrie flight,
 With wide-spread wing unmov'd, the eagle
 bends,
 When, on old Snowdons brow prepar'd to light,
 Sailing the liquid skye he sheer descends:
 Thus oft, when roving farre as wave extends,
 The scenes of promise blis would warm the boy;
 To meet his brother with each wish yblends,
 And friendships glowing hopes each thought employ;

And now at home arriv'd his heart dilates with joy.
 Around the meadows and the park he looks,
 To spy the streamlett or the elm-tree shade,
 Where oft at eve, beneath the cawing rooks,
 He with his sers in merry childhoode playd:
 But all was chang'd!--Unweetingly dismayd
 A cold foreboding impulse thrills his breast;
 And who but Kathrin now is dearnly frayd
 When entering in the kens the stranger guest:
 Then with sad mien she rose, and kindle him embrast.

Great marvell at her solemn cheer he made;
 Then, sobbing deepe, Glad will Syr Martyn be,
 Faire Syr, of your retourne, she gently said;
 But what mishap! our infant familie,
 The dearest babes, though they were nought
 to me,
 That ever breathd, are laid in deadlie plight:
 What shall we do!--great were your courtesie
 To lodge in yonder tenant's house to night;
 The skillfull leache forbids that noise my babes should fright.

Blunt was the boy, and to the farme-house nigh
 To wait his brother, at her bidding fares,
 Conducted by a gossip pert and fly:
 Kathrin the while her malengines prepares.
 Now gan the duske suspend the plowmans cares,
 When from his rural sportes arrives the Knight;
 Soon with his mates the jovial bowl he shares,
 His hall resounds!--amazd the stranger wight
 Arreads it all as done to him in fell despight.

Late was the houre whenas the Knight was tould
 Of stranger guest; Go, bid him welcome here;
 What seeks he there? quoth he, Perdie, what would
 You seek? says to the boy the messenger.
 To see the Knight, quoth he, I but require.
 Syr Knight, he scornes to come; the servant said.
 Go bid him still quoth he, to welcome cheer:
 But all contrarywise the saytor made, [sed:
 Till rage enflamd the boy; and still his rage they
 Your brother, quoth the hostesse, soon will waste
 His fair estate; and certes, well I read,
 He weens to hold your patrimonie fast.
 Next morne a lawyer been ybrought with speed,
 And wise he lookt, and wisely shook his hede.
 Him now impowrd, the youth with rage yblent
 Yows never to retourne; then mounts his steed,

And leaves the place in fancy hugely flent
 All which to Kathrins mind gave wondrous great content.

CANTO. II.

In musefull stownd Syr Martyn rews
 His youthhedes thoughtlesse stage;
 But dissipation haunts him to
 The blossomes of old age.

With gracefull pause awhile the wizard stood,
 Then thus resum'd,—As he whose homeward way [wood;
 Lies through the windings of some verdant
 Through many a mazy turn and arbour gay
 He sees the flowery steps of jollie May,
 While through the openings many a lawnskepe
 new
 Bursts on his sight; yet, never once astray,
 Still home he wends: so we our theme pursue,
 Through many a bank and bowre close following still our cue.

Soothd by the murmurs of a plaintive streame,
 A wyld romantick dell its fragrance shed;
 Safe from the thonder showre and scorching
 beame [plaid;
 Their faerie charmes the summer bowres dis-
 Wyld by the banks the bashfull cowslips
 spread,
 And from the rock above each ivied seat
 The spotted foxgloves hung the purple head,
 And lowlie villets kist the wanderers feet:
 Sure never Hyblas bees rovd through a wild so sweet.

As winds the streamlett serpentine along,
 So leads a solemn walk its bowry way,
 The pale-leaved palms and darker limes among,
 To where a grotto lone and secret lay;
 The yellow broome, where chirp the linnets gay, [skyes
 Waves round the cave; and to the blue-skeakd
 A shatterd rock towrcs up in fragments gray:
 The shee goat from its height the lanskepe eyes,
 And calls her wanderd young, the call each bank replies.

Here oft the knight had past the sommers morne
 What time the wondering boy to manhood
 rose,
 When fancy first her lanskepces gan adorne,
 And reasons folded budds their flowres disclose,
 What time young transport through the spirits flows
 When nature smyles with charmes unseene before,
 When with unwonted hopes the bosome glows,
 While wingd with whirlwind speed the thoughts explore [store.
 The endieffe wyld of joys that youth beholds in
 The dryads of the place, that nurse the flowres,
 And hung the dew-drop in the hyacinth bell,
 For him employd their virtue breathing powres,
 And Cambrias genius bade his worth excell.
 His youthfull breast confess the wondrous spell;
 His generous temper warmd with fayre design,
 The friend and patriot now his bosome swell,

The lover and the father now combine, [join.
And smiling visions form, where bliss and honour

Of these loved soothing things this the loved retreat
Must now no more with dreams of bliss decoy;

Yet here he liken still himself to meet, [employ :
Though woes, a gloomy train, his thoughts
Oh lost to peace, he sighs, unhappy boy!

Oh lost to every worth that life adorns!—
Oh lost to peace, to elegance, and joy!
The aerial genius of the cave returns, [mourns.
Whiles in the bubbling rill the plaintive naiade

Thus as he spake the magic lawnskepe clad,
The dell, the grotto, and the broom clad hill;
See, quoth the wizard, where the knight bestows
An hour to thought and reason's whispers fill;

Whiles, as a nightly vision boding ill,
Seen with pale glimps by lonely wandering swayne,
Truth, gleaming through the fogs of bias will,
Frowns on him stern, and honest shame gins fayne

In her reflective glass his life's ignoble straine.

His earlie hopes she shews and shews againe;
How oft hast thou, he cries, indignant viewd
The titled cypher and his solemn traine,
The busie face, and dull solicitude,

That, ever plodding in important mood,
Has not a soul to reach one noble aim, [dewd
Nor soul, nor wish—whose vacant mind en-
With not one talent, yet would lowly claim
For his vile leaden buff the sacred wreath of fame:

Who to the patrons lawrells would aspire,
By labouring in the British clime to rear
Those arts that quencht prowde Romes patrician
fire,

And bowd her prone beneath the Gothic [spear;
Illustrious cares! besitting patriot peer!
Italian sing-song and the eunuchs squall!
Such arts as sooth'd the base, unmanly car
Of Greece and Persia bending to their fall;
When freedom bled unwept, and scorn was glorys call.

While these thy breast with scorn indignant fir,

What other views before thee would disclose!
As fancy painted and thy wish inspird, [rose!
What glorious scenes beneath thy shades a-
Britannias gardens here dispell her woes,
Forming her laws, her artes, with godlike toil;
There Albion, smiling on her learn'd repose,
Sees manly genius in ther influence smile,
And spread the hallowd streames of virtue round the ile.

How blest, ah Heaven! such selfe-approving hours,

Such views still opening, still extending higher,
Cares whence the state derives its firmest powres;
And scenes where friendship sheds his purest
fire?

And did, ah shame! these hopes in vain ex-
A morning dreame!—As lorn the spendthrift stands,

Who sees the fieldes bequeathd him by his

His own no more, now reapt by strangers hands;
So languid must I view faire honours fertile lands.

Silence would then ensue; perhaps reclind
On the greene margin of the streame he lay,
While softlie stealing on his languid mind
Th' ideal scene would hold a moments sway,
And the domestick houre all smiles, display,
Where fixt esteeme the fond discourse inspires:
Now through his heart would glide the sprightlie ray
Where married love bids light his purest fires,
Where elegance presides, and wakes the young desires.

Strait to his brawling lemman turns his mind;
Shockd he beholds the odious colours rise,
Where selfishnesse, low pride and spleen comb-
bind,
Bid every anguishd thought his mate despise,
His mate unformd for sweet affections ties:
Groving, indelicate—Stung to the heart
His indignation heaves in stifled sighs;
But soon his passion bursts with suddain flart:
His children strike his thoughts with lively pier-fant smart.

The mothers basnesse in their deeds he sees,
And all the wounded father swells his breast:
Suddain he leaves the cave and mantling trees,
And up the furzie hill his footsteps haste,
While fullenly he footches his soul to rest:
Meantime the opening prospect wide he gains,
Where, crown'd with oake, with meadow floures ydrest,
His British chaplet, buxom summer reigns,
And waves his mantle greene farre round the smy-ling plains.

Still as he slow ascends, the bounteous farms,
And old grey towres of rural churches rise,
The fields still lengthening shew their crowded
charms
In sayre perspective and in richest guise:
His sweeping scythe the white-sleeved mower
plies,
The plowman through the fallow guides his teame,
Acrosse the wheaten field the milkmayde hies,
To where the kine, foreby the reedy streame,
With frequent lowe to plaine of their full udders seeme.

See, now the knight arrives where erst an oak
Dan Æols blustering stormes did long repell,
Till witchd it was, when by an headlong shock,
As the hoar fathers of the village tell,
With horrid crash on All Saints eve it fell:
But from its trunk soon sprouting saplings rose,
And round the parent stock did shadowy swell;
Now, aged trees, they bend their twisted boughs,
And by their moss-greene roots invite the swains repose.

Here on a bending knare he pensive leans,
And round the various lawnskepe range his eyes:
There stretch the corny fieldes in various greens,
Farre as the sight: there, to the peaceful skyes
The darkning pines and dewy poplars rise:
Behind the wood a dark and heathly lea,
With sheep faire spotted, farre extended lie,

With here and there a lonlic blasted tree;
And from between two hills appears the duskie fea.

Bright through the fleeting clouds the sunny ray
Shifts o'er the fields, now glids the woody dale,

The flocks now whitten, now the ocean bay
Beneath the radiance glistens clear and pale;
And white from farre appears the frequent fail,
By traffic spread. Moord where the land divides,

The British red-crofs waving in the gale,
Hulky and black, a gallant warre ship rides,
And over the greene wave with lordly port presides.

Fixt on the bulwark of the British powre [air;
Long gazd the knight, with fretfull languid
Then thus, indulging the reflectiv' houre,
Pours forth his soul: Oh, glorious happy care!
To bid Britannias navies greatly dare,
And through the vassal seas triumphant reign,
To either India waft victorious warre,
To join the Poles in trades unbounded chain,
And bid the British throne the mighty whole sustain.

With what superiour lustre and command
May stedfast zeal in Albion's senate shine!
What glorious lawrells court the patriots hand!
How base the hand that can such meed decline! [mine?

And was, kind fate! to snatch these honours
Yes! greene they spread, and faire they bloom'd for me;

Thy birth and duty bade the chief be thine;
Oh lost, vain trifler, lost in each degree!
Thy country never turnd her hopefull eyes on thee.

Yet, how the felde of worth luxurious smiles!
Nor Africk yields, nor Chily's earth contains Such funds of wealth as crown the plowmans toils,

And tinge with waving gold Britannias plains;
Even on her mountains cheerful plenty reigns,
And wildly grand her fleecy wardrope spreads.

What noble meed the honest statesman gains,
Who through these publike nerves new vigour
sheds,

And bids the useful artes exalt their drooping heads:

Who, founding on the plough and humble loome
His countrys greatnesse, sees, on every tide,
Her fleets the umpire of the world assume,

And spread her justice as her glories wide—
Oh wonder of the world, and fairest pride,
Britannias fleet! how long shall pity mourn

And stain thy honours! from his weeping
bride

And starving babes, how long inhuman torn Shall the bold sailor mount thy decks with heart forlorn!

Forlorn with sinking heart his task he plies,
His brides distresse his reckless fancy sees,
And fixing on the land his earnest eyes,

Cold is his breast and faint his manly knees.
Ah! hither turn, ye sons of courtlie ease,
And let the brave mans wrongs, let interest plead:

Say, while his armc his countrys fate decrees,

Say, shall a fathers anguish be his meed;
His wrongs unnerve his soul, and blight each mighty deed?

Whatever party boasts thy glorious name,
O thou reserv'd by Heavens benign decree
To blast those arts that quench the British flame,
And bid the meanest of the land be free;
Oh, much humanity shall owe to thee!
And shall that palm unenvy'd still remain?
And hear, ye lordlings, each feveritie,
And every woe the labouring tribes sustain,
Upbraids the man of powre, and dims his honours
vain.

While thus the knights long smother'd fires broke forth,
The rousing musicke of the horne he hears Shrill echoing through the wold; and by the north [pears;
Where bends the hill, the sounding chace ap-
The hounds with glorious peal salute his ears,
And wood and dale rebound the swelling lay;
The youths on courfers fleet as fallow deers
Pour through the downs, while, foremost of the fray; [Away!
Away! the jolly huntsman cries; and echo sounds,

Now han the beagles scourd the bushy ground,
Till where a brooke strays hollow through the bent,

When all confus'd, and snuffing wyldlie round,
In vain their fretfull haste explor'd the scent:
But Reynards cunning all in vain was spent;
The huntsman from his stand his arts had spyd,

Had markt his doublings and his shrewd intent, [plyd
How both the bancks he trac'd, then backward
His track some twentie roods, then bounding sprong aside.

Eke had he markt where to the broome he crept,
Where, harkening everie sound, an hare was hid;

Then from the thickest bush he slylie leapt,
And wary feuds along the hawthorne shade,
Till by the hills slant foot he earths his head
Amid a briarie thicket: Emblem meet

Of slylie statesman of his foes adred;
He oft misguides the peoples rage, I weet,
On others, whilst himself winds off with slye deceit.

The cunning huntsman now cheers on his pack,
The lurking hare is in an instant slain:
Then opening loud, the beagles scent the track
Right to the hill; while thondring through the plain

With blythe huzzas advance the jovial train:
And now the groomes and squires, cowherds and boys,
Beat round and round the brake; but all in vain [noise,

Their poles they ply, and vain their oathes and
Till plunging in his den the terrier fiercely joys.

Expell'd his hole, upstarts to open sky
The villain bold, and wildly glares around;
Now here, now there, he bends his knees to fly,

As oft recoils to guard from backward wound,

His frothie jaws he grinds—with horrid sound
The pack at once rush on him: foming ire,
Fierce at his throte and sides hangs many a hound;

His burning eyes flash wyld red sparckling fire, Whiles weltring on the swaird his breath and strength expire.

Straight to Syr Martyns hall the hunters bend,
The knight perceives it from his cak-crownd hill,

Down the steep fuzrie height he slow gan wend,
With troublous thoughts keen ruminating still;

While grief and shame by turns his bosom fill.
And now, perchd prowldic on the topmost spray,
The sootie blackbird chaunts his vespegs shrill;

While twilight spreads his robe of sober grey,
And to their bowies the rooks loud cawing wing
their way:

And bright behind the Cambrian mountains
hore

Flames the red beam; while on the distant ^{east}
Led by her starre, the horned moone looks o'er
The bending forest, and with rays increast
Ascends; while trembling on the dappled west
The purple radiance shifts and dies away;

The willows with a deeper green impreft
Nod o'er the brooks; the brooks with gleamy
ray

Slide on, and holy peace assumes her woodland ^{sway.}

All was repose, all but Syr Martyns brest;
There, passions tearing gusts tempestuous rise.
Are these, he murmurs, these my friends! the best.

That crowd my hall! the sonnes of madning
Whose warmest friendship with the revel dies?
Whose glee it were my dearest peace destroy,
Who with my woes could sport, my wrongs
despise;

Could round my coffin pledge the cup of joy,
And on my crimes even then their base-tongue witt
employ:

Whose converse, oft as sulsome bawdrie fails,
Takes up the barkings of impiety,
The scepticks wild disjointed dreanis retails,
These modern ravings of philo'sophy
Made drunk, the cavil, the detected ly,

The witt of ignorance, and gloss unfair,
Which honest dullness would with shame deny;
The hope of baseness vaumpt in candours air:
Good Heaven! are such the friends that to my hearth repair!

The man of worth shuns thy reputelesse dore;
Even the old peasant shakes his silverd head,
Old saws and stories babbling evermore,
And adding still, alas, those dayes be fled!
Here indignation pausd, when, up the glade,
Fale through the trees his household smoke ascends;
Wakd at the sight, his brothers wrongs upbraid

His melting heart, and grief his bosome rends:
And now the keen resolve its gleaming comfort lends.

Perdie, now were I bent on legends fine
My knight should rise the floure of chivalrie,

Brave as Syr Arthegal or Valentine, Another faint George England then should see,

Britannias genius should his Sabra bee,
Chaind to the rock by dragon to be slain;
But he the virgin princeesse soon should free,
And stretch the monster breathlesse on the plain;
Bribery, the dragon huge, should never rise again.

Eke should he, freed from foul enchaunters
spell

Escape his false dueffas magicke charms,
And folly quaid, yclepd an hydra fell,
Receive a beauteous lady to his arms;
While bardes and minstrales chaunt the soft alarms

Of gentle love, unlike his former thrall.
Eke should I sing, in courtly cunning terms,
The gallant feast, servd up by seneshall,
To knights and ladies gent in painted bowre and hall.

But certes, while my tongue sayre truth indites
And does of human frailtie soothly tell,
Unmeet it were indulge the daintie flights
Of phantastie, that never yet befell:
Uneath it is long habits to expell,
Ne may the best good heart its blifs secure,
Ne may the lively powre of judging well,
In arduous worthy deed long time endure,
Where dissipation once has fixt her footing sure.

Such was the powre that angry Jove bestowed
On this faire nymph: the legend thus is told.
To Dians care her life her mother owd;
Faire Dian found her naked on the wold,
Some peasants babe, exposed to deadlie cold
And to a favourite satyr gaye to rear:
Then, when the nymph was fifteen spring-
times old,

Equipt her with the bow and huntresse spear,
And of her woodland traine her made a wellcome fere.

But ill her mind received chaste Phœbes lore,
Fain would she at the chace still lag behind:
One sultry noone, as Phœbe sped afore,
Beneath a leafy vine the nymph reclind,
And, fan my breast, she cried, O western wind!

Soon as the with-for word Favonius came.
From that day forth the conscious nymph declind
The near inspection of the soveraign dame;
Till mid the chace, one morne, her throes betrayd her fame.

Her throes with scorne the taunting dryads eyd,
The nymph changd colour, and hung down
her head;

Still change thy blushing hue, the goddess cry'd:
Forthwith a freezing langour gan invade
Her limbs; and now, with suddain leaves arrayd,

A Russian poppey she transm'd remains;
The various colours ever rise and fade,
The tints still shifting mock the painters pains;
And still her drowsie mood the beauteous nymph retains.

Meanwhile his new-born elfe Favonius bore,
Soft lapt, on balmy pinions farre away;
And with the fawns, by Peneus flowery shore,
From earliest youth the laughing impdid play,
For ever fluttering, debonair, and gay,
And refliffe, as the dove Deucalion tent
To spy if peering oake did yet bewray.
Its branching head above the flooded bent;
But ydlie beating round, the day in vain was spent.

When now the nymph to riper yeares gan rise,
To fayre Parnassus groves she took her flight:
There culling flowretts of a thousand dyes,
Still did her head with tawdry girlonds dight;
As soon the wreath ill sorted would the quight
Ne ever did she climb the twyfork hill,
Ne could her eyen explore in lofty height,
Ne did she ever taste the sacred rill
From inspirations fount that ever doth distil.

Her sprightly levitie was from her syre,
Her drowy dulness from her mother sprong;
This never would allow her mind aspyre,
That never would allow her patience long,
Thus as the slightly rovd the lawns among,
High Jove beheld her from his starry seat,
And call'd her Dissipation: wyld and young
Still shalt thou be, he said; and this thy fate,
On man thy sleights employ, on man that proud ingrate.

All happinesse he claims his virtues due,
And holds him injurd when my care denies
The fondling wish, whence sorrow would enfue;
And idle still his prayers invade my skies:
But bold and arduous must that virtue rise
Which I accept, no vague inconstant blaze.
Then be it thine to spread before his eyes
Thy changing colours, and thy wyld-fire rays,
And fruitlesse still shall be that virtue thou canst daze.

So swore the god, by gloomy Styx he swore:
The fates asented, and the daemon flew
Right to the seats of men. The robe she wore
Was starrd with dewdrops, and of palest blue;
Faire round her head playd many a beauteous hue, [plays;
As when the rainbow through the bean-flowres
The fleeting tints the swaynes with wonder
view,
And ween to snatch a prize beneath the rays;
But through the meadows dank the beauteous meteor strays.

So shone the nymph, and prank in pleasures guise
With wylie traines the sonnes of earth beset;
Goodnesse of heart before her yawns and dies,
And friendship ever feels the drowie sitt
Just when his powre to serve could serve a whitt.
And still behind her march remorse and shame
That never will their yron scourge remitt,
Whens the fiend resigns her thraits to them:
Sad case, I weet, where still onefelse onefelse must blame.

Long had the knight to her his powres resignd;
In wanton dalliance first her nett she spred,
And soon in mirthful tumult on his mind
She loitlie stole: yet, while at times he sped
To contemplations bowre, his sight she fled;
Ne on the mountaintett with lim durst bide;
Yet homewards still she mett him in the glade,
And in the social cup did slyly glide,
And still his best resolve eitfoons she scatterd wide.

And now, as slowly fauntering up the dale
He homeward wends, in heavie musefull stowre,
The smooth deceiver gan his heart assail;
His heart soon felt the fascinating powre:
Old Cambrias genius markt the fatal houre,
And tore the girlond from her sea-greene hair,
The conscious oakes above him rustling lowre,
And through the branches sighs the gloomy air.
As when indignant Jove rejects the flamens prayer.

The dryads of the grove, that oft had fir'd
His opening mind with many a raptured
dream,
That oft his evening wanderings had inspir'd,
All by the silent hill or murmuring stream,
Forfake him now; for all as lost they deem
So homeward he wends; where, wrapt in jollitie,
His hall to keepon holiday mote seem,
And with the hunters soon full blyth was he,
The blythest wight of all that blythsome com-panie.

As when th' autumnal morne with ruddy hue
Looks through the glen besprent with silver
here,
Across the stubble, brushing off the dew,
The younkling fowler gins the fields explore,
And, wheeling oft, his pointer veres afore,
And oft, sagacious of the tainted gale,
The fluttering bird betrays; with thundering
rore [dale;
The shott resounds, loud echoing through the
But still the younkling kills nor partridge, snipe, nor quail.

Yet still the queint excuse is at command;
The dog was rash, a swallow twittered by,
The gun hung fire, and keennes shook his hand,
And there the wind or bushes hurt his eye.
So can the knight his mind still satisfye:
A lazie fiend, self imposition hight,
Still whispers some excuse, some gilden lye!
Himself did gild to cheat himselfe outright:
God help the man betwitchd in such ungracious plight.

On dissipation still this treachor waits,
Obsequiously behind at distance due;
And still to disconsents accursed gates,
The house of sorrow, these ungodlike two,
Conduct their fainty thralls—Great things to do

The knight resolvd, but never yet could find
The proper time, while still his miseries
grew:

And now these demons of the captive mind
Him to the dreary cave of discontent resign'd.

Deep in the wyldes of Faerie Lond it lay ;
Wide was the mouth, the roofo all rudely rent ;

Some parts receive, and some exclude the day,
For deep beneath the hill its caverns went :
The ragged walls with lightning seemd
ybrent,

And loathlie vermin ever crept the flore :
Yet all in fight, with towres and castles gent,
A beauteous lawnskepe rose afore the dore,
The which to view so fayre the captives grieved
fore.

All by the gate, beneath a pine shade bare,
An owl-frequented bowre, some tents were spred ;

Here sat a throng, with eager furious stare
Rattling the dice ; and there, with eyes half dead, [red,

Some drowfie dronkards, looking black and Dozd out their days: and by the path-way
green [sped,

A sprightlie troupe still onward heedlesse
In chace of butterflies alert and keen Honours, and wealth, and powre, their butterflies I ween.

And oft, disguffull of their various cares,
Into the cave they wend with fullen pace ;
Each to his meet apartment dernly fares ;

Here, all in raggs, in piteous plight most bace, [grace.

The dronkard fitts ; there, shent with foul dif-
The thriftelese heir ; and o'er his reeking blade
Red with his friends heart gore, in woefull cace

The duellist raves ; and there, on vetchie bed,
Crazd with his vain pursuits, the maniaek bends his head.

Yet round his gloomy cell with chalk he scrawls
Ships, coaches, crownes, and eke the gallow
tree,

All that he wisd or feard his ghastly walls
Prest him still, and mock his miserie.
And there, self-doomd, his cursed self to flee,

The gamester hangs in-corner murk and dread ;
Nigh to the ground bends his ungracious
knee ;

His drooping armes and white-reclining head
Lim seen, cold horror gleams athwart th' unhallowed shade.

Near the dreare gate, beneath the rifted rock,
The keeper of the cave all haggard fatt,
His pining corse a restlesse ague shook,

And blistering sores did all his carkas fret :
And with himsele he seemd in keen debate ;
For still the muscles of his mouth he drew

Ghastly and fell ; and still with deepe regrate
He lookd him around, as if his heart did rew
His former deeds, and mournd full fore his sores to view.

Yet not himself, but Heavens Great King he blamd,

And dard his wisdom and his will arraign ;

For boldly he the ways of God blasphem'd,
And of blind governaunce did loudly plain,
While vild self-pity would his eyes diftrain,
As when an wolfe, entrapt on village ground,
In dread of death ygnaws his limb in twain,
And views with scalding tears his bleeding wound,
Such fierce selfe-pity still this wights dire portaunce crown'd.

Near by there stood an hamlett in the dale,
Where, in the silver age, content did wonne ;
This now was his : yet all mote nought avail,
His loathing eyes that place did ever shun ;
But ever through his neighbours lawns would run,

Where every goodlie fiede thrice goodlie seemd.
Such was this weary wight all woe-begone ;
Such was his life ; and thus of things he deemd ;
And such like was his cave that all with forrowes teemd.

To this fell carle gay dissipation led,
And in his dreary purlieus left the knight.
From the dire cave fain would the knight have fled,

And fain recalld the treachrous nymph from fight,

But now the late obtruder shuns his fight,
And dearly must be wooed : hard by the den,
Where listles Bacchus had his tents ypight,

A transient visit sometimes would he gain,
While wine and merry song beguild his inward
pain.

Yet, ever as he reard his slombering head,
The ghastly tyrant at his couch stood near ;
And ay with ruthles clamour gan upbraid,
And words that would his very heartstrings tear :

See now, he sayes, where setts thy vain career :
Approaching elde now wings its cheerlesse way,

Thy fruitlesse autumn gins to blanchethe thy heare,

And aged winter asks from youth its stay ;
But thine comes poore of joy, comes with unhonoured gray.

Thou hast no friend !—still on the worthlesse train [paid ;

Thy kindnesse flowd, and still with scorne re-
Even she on whom thy favours heapt remain,

Even she regards thee with a bosome dead
To kindly passior, and by motives led

Such as the planter of his negroe deems ;
What profit fill can of the wretch be made
Is all his care, of more he never dreams :

So farre remote from her, thy troubles she esteems.

Thy children too ! Heavens ! what a hopelesse
fight ;

Ah, wretched fyre !—but ever from this scene
The wretched fyre precipitates his flight,

And in the bowls wyld fever shuns his teene,
So pass his dayes, while what he might have been

Its beauteous views does every morne present :
So passe his dayes, while still the raven spleen

Croaks in his eares, the brightest parts mispent
Beget an hoarie age of grief and discontent.

But boast not of superior shrewd address,
 Ye who can calmly spurn the ruind mayd,
 Ye who unmovd can view the deepe distresse
 That crushes to the dust the parents head,
 And rends that easie heart by you betrayd,

Boast not that ye his numerous woes eskew;
 Ye who unawd the nuptial couch invade,
 Boast not his weaknesse with contempt to view;
 For worthy is he still compar'd, perdie, to you.

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.

AN ELEGY.

Quod tibi vitæ fors detraxit,
 Fama adjiciet posthuma laudi;
 Nostris longum tu dolor et honor.

THE balmy zephyrs o'er the woodland fray,
 And gently stir the bosom of the lake:
 The fawns that panting in the covert lay,
 Now through the gloomy park their revels take.

Pale rise the rugged hills that skirt the north,
 The wood glows yellow'd by the evening rays,
 Silent and beauteous flows the silver Forth,
 And Annan murmuring through the willows frays.

But, ah! what means this silence in the grove,
 Where oft the wild notes sooth'd the love-sick boy?
 Why cease in Mary's bower the songs of love?
 The songs of love, of innocence, of joy!

When bright the lake reflects the setting ray,
 The sportive virgins tread the flowery green;
 Here by the moon full oft in cheerful May,
 The merry bride-maids at the dance are seen.

But who these nymphs that through the copse appear
 In robes of white adorn'd with violet blue?
 Fondly with purple flowers they deck yon bier,
 And wave in solemn pomp the boughs of yew.

Supreme in grief, her eye confus'd with woe,
 Appears the lady of the aerial train,
 Tall as the sylvan goddess of the bow,
 And fair as she who wept Adonis slain.

Such was the pomp when Gilead's virgin band,
 Wandering by Judah's flowery mountain^s wept,
 And with fair Iphis by the hallow'd strand
 Of Siloe's brook a mournful Sabbath kept.

By the resplendent cross with thistles twin'd,
 'Tis Mary's guardian genius lost in woe,
 "Ah, say what deepest wrongs have thus com-
 "bin'd [snow!
 "To heave with restless sighs thy breast of

- " Oh stay, ye dryads, nor unfinish'd fly
 " Your solemn rites ! here comes no foot pro-
 " fane !
 " The muse's son, and hallow'd is his eye,
 " Implores your stay, implores to join the strain.
- " See from her cheek the glowing life blush flies !
 " Alas, what faultering sounds of woe be these !
 " Ye nymphs who fondly watch her languid eyes,
 " Oh say what music will her soul appease !
- " Refound the solemn dirge," the nymphs reply,
 " And let the turtles moan in Mary's bower ;
 " Let grief indulge her grand sublimity,
 " And melancholy wake her melting power.
- " For art has triumph'd---Art, that never stood
 " On honour's side, or generous transport knew,
 " Has dy'd its baggard hands in Mary's blood,
 " And o'er her fame has breath'd its blighting
 " dew.
- " But come ye nymphs, ye woodland spirits
 " come,
 " And with funereal flowers your tresses braid,
 " While in this hallowed bower we raise the " tomb,
 " And consecrate the song to Mary's shade.
- " O sing what smiles her youthful morning wore,
 " Her's every charm, and every loveliest grace,
 " When nature's happiest touch could add no
 " more,
 " Heaven lent an angel's beauty to her face.
- " O ! whether' by the moss-grown bushy dell,
 " Where from the oak depends the mistletoe,
 " Where creeping ivy shades the druids' cell,
 " Where from the rock the gurgling waters
 " flow :
- " Or whether sportive o'er the cowslip beds,
 " You through the fairy dales of Tewiot glide,
 " Or brush the primrose banks, while Cynthia
 " sheds
 " Her silv'ry light o'er Esk's transcendent tide :
- " Hither, ye gentle guardians of the fair,
 " By virtue's tears, by weeping beauty, come ;
 " Unbind the festive robes, unbind the hair,
 " And wave the Cyprus bough at Mary's tomb.
- " And come, ye fleet magicians of the air,
 " The mournful lady of the chorus cried ;
 " Your airy tints of baleful hue prepare,
 " And through this grove bid Mary's fortunes
 " glide :
- " And let the songs, with solemn harpings join'd,
 " And wailing notes, unfold the tale of woe !"
 She spoke, and waking through the breathing-
 wind,
 From lyres unseen the solemn harpings flow.
- The song began---" How bright her early morn !
 " What lasting joys her smiling fate portends !
 " To wield the awful British sceptres born !
 " And Gaul's young heir her bridal-bed af-
 " cends.
- " See, round her bed, light floating on the air,
 " The little loves their purple wings display ;
- " When sudden, shrieking at the dismal glare
 " Of funeral torches, far they speed away.
- " Far with the loves each blissful omen speeds,
 " Her eighteenth April hears her widow'd
 " moan,
 " The bridal-bed the sable horse succeeds,
 " And struggling factions shake her native
 " throne.
- " No more a goddess in the swimming dance,
 " May'st thou, O queen ! thy lovely form dis-
 " play ;
 " No more thy beauty reign the charm of France,
 " Nor in Versailles' proud bowers outshine the
 " day.
- " For the cold north the trembling sails are spread ;
 " Ah, what drear horrors gliding through thy
 " breast !
 " While from thy weeping eyes fair Gallia fled,
 " Thy future woes in boding sighs confess !
- " A nation stern and stubborn to command,
 " And now coavuls'd with faction's fierce
 " rage,
 " Commits its sceptre to thy gentle hand,
 " And asks a bride from thy tender age."
- As weeping thus they sung, the omens rose,
 Her native shore receives the mournful queen ;
 November wind o'er the bare landscape blows,
 In hazy gloom the sea-wave skirts the scene.
- The house of Holy-Rood, in fullen state,
 Bleak in the shade of rude pil'd rocks appears ;
 Cold on the mountain's side, the type of fate,
 Its shattered walls a Romish chapel rears.
- No nodding grove here waves the sheltering bough ;
 O'er the dark vale, prophetic of her reign,
 Beneath the carving mountain's craggy brow
 The dreary echoes to the gales complain :
- Beneath the gloomy clouds of rolling smoke,
 The high pil'd city rears her Gothic towers ;
 The stern brow'd castle, from his lofty rock,
 Looks scornful down, and fix'd defiance lours †.
- * The unhappy Mary, in her infancy, was sent to France to the care of her mother's family, the house of Guise. The French Court was at that time the gayest and most gallant of Europe. Here the princess of Scotland was educated with all the distinction due to her high rank ; and as soon as years would allow, she was married to the Dauphin, afterwards Francis ; and on the death of this monarch, which closed a short reign, the politics of the house of Guise required the return of the young queen to Scotland. She left France with tears and the utmost reluctance ; and on her landing in her native kingdom, the different appearance of the country awakened all her regret, and affected her with a melancholy which seemed to forebode her future misfortunes.
- † These circumstances, descriptive of the environs of Holy-Rood-House, are local ; yet, however dreary the unimproved November view may

Domestic bliss, that dear, that sovereign joy,
Far from her heart was seen to speed away;
Strait dark brow'd factions entering in, destroy
The seeds of peace, and mark her for their prey.

No more by moon-shine to the nuptial bower
Her Francis comes, by love's soft fetters led;
Far other spouse now wakes her midnight hour*,
Enrag'd, and reeking from the harlot's bed.

" Ah! draw the veil!" shrill trembles through the air:
The veil was drawn—but darker scenes arose,
Another † nuptial couch the fates prepare,
The baleful teeming source of deeper woes.

The bridal torch her evil angel wav'd,
Far from the couch offended prudence fled;
Of deepest crimes deceitful faction rav'd,
And rous'd her trembling from the fatal bed.

The hinds are seen in arms, and glittering spears,
Instead of crooks, the Grampian shepherds
wield;

Fanatic rage the ploughman's visage wears,
And red with slaughter lies the harvest field.

From Borthwick field, deserted and forlorn,
The beautiful queen all tears is seen to fly;
Now ‡ through the streets a weeping captive borne,
Her woe the triumph of the vulgar eye.

Again the vision shifts the woeful scene;
Again forlorn from rebel arms she flies,
And, unsuspecting, on a sister queen,
The lovely, injur'd fugitive relies.

When wisdom, baffled, owns th' attempt in vain,
Heaven oft delights to set the virtuous free;
Some friend appears and breaks affliction's
chain:

But ah, no generous friend appears for thee

A prison's ghastly walls and grated cells
Deform'd the airy scenery as it pass;
The haunt where listless melancholy dwells,
Where every genial feeling sinks aghast.

No female eye her sickly bed to tend!

" Ah cease to tell it in the female ear!

" A woman's stern command! a proffer'd friend!

" Oh generous passion, peace, forbear, forbear!

appear, the connoisseur in gardening will perceive that plantation, and the efforts of art, could easily convert the prospect into an agreeable and most romantic summer landscape.

* Lord Darnley, the handsomest man of his age, but a worthless debauchee of no abilities.

† Her marriage with the Earl of Bothwell, an unprincipled politician of great address.

‡ When she was brought prisoner through the streets of Edinburgh, she suffered almost every indignity which an outrageous mob could offer. Her person was bedaubed with mire, and her ear insulted with every term of vulgar abuse. Even Buchanan seems to drop a tear when he relates these circumstances.

" And could, oh Tudor! could thy heart retain " No softening thought of what thy woes had
" been;

" When thou, the heir of England's crown, in
" Didst sue the mercy of a tyrant queen?

" And could no pang from tender memory wake,
" And feel those woes that once had been thine
" own;

" No pleading tear to drop for Mary's sake,
" For Mary's sake, the heir of England's throne?

" Alas! no pleading touch thy memory knew,
" Dry'd were the tears which for thyself had
" flow'd;

" Dark politics alone engag'd thy view;
" With female jealousy thy bosom glow'd.

" And say, did wisdom own thy stern command?
" Did honour wave his banner o'er the deed?

" Ah!—Mary's fate thy name shall ever brand,
" And ever o'er her woes shall pity bleed.

" The babe that prattled on his nurse's knee,
" When first thy woeful captive hours began,
" Ere heaven, oh hapless Mary, set thee free,
" That babe to battle march'd in arms—
" man."

An awful pause ensues—with speaking eyes,
And hands half-raised, the guardian wood-nymphs wait;

While slow and sad the airy scenes arise,
Stain'd with the last deep woes of Mary's fate.

With dreary black hung round the hall appears,
The thrifty saw-dust strews the marble floor,
Blue gleams the ax, the block its shoulders rears,
And pikes and halberds guard the iron door.

The clouded moon her dreary glimpses shed,
And Mary's maids, a mournful train, pass by;
Languid they walk, and pensive hang the head,
And silent tears pace down from every eye.

Serene and nobly mild appears the queen;
She smiles on Heaven, and bows the injur'd
head:

The ax is lifted—from the deathful scene
The guardians turn'd, and all the picture fled—

It fled: the wood-nymphs o'er the distant lawn,
As wrapt in vision, dart their earnest eyes;
So when the huntsman hears the rattling fawn,
He stands impatient of the starting prize.

The sovereign dame her awful eye-balls roll'd,
As Cuma's maid when by the god inspir'd;
" The depth of ages to my sight unfold,"
She cries, and Mary's meed my breast has fir'd.

" On Tudor's throne her sons shall ever reign,
" Age after age shall see their flag unfurl'd,
" With sovereign pride wherever roars the main,
" Stream to the wind, and awe the trembling
" world.

" Nor Britain's sceptre shall they wield alone,
" Age after age through length'ning time shall
" see

" Her branching race on Europe's every throne,
" And either India bend to them the knee.

" But Tudor, as a fruitless gourd, shall die ;
 " I see her death-scene on the lowly floor :
 " Dreary the sits, cold grief has glaz'd her eye,
 " And anguish gnaws her till she breathes no
 " more."

But bark!--loud howling through the midnight
 gloom,
 Faction is rous'd, and sends the baleful yell !
 Oh save, ye generous few, your Mary's tomb !
 Oh save her ashes from the baleful spell !

" And, lo! where time with brighten'd face fe-
 " rene

" Points to yon far, but glorious opening sky ;
 " See truth walk forth, majestic awful queen !
 " And party's blackening mists before her fly.

" Falsehood unmask'd withdraws her ugly train,
 " And Mary's virtues all illustrious shine--
 " Yes, thou hast friends, the godlike and humane
 " Of latest ages, injur'd queen, are thine."

The milky splendours of the dawning ray,
 Now through the grove a trembling radiance shed ;
 With brightly note the woodlark hail'd the day,
 And with the moonshine all the vision fled.

KNOWLEDGE: AN ODE.

S. ANN. ÆT. AUCT. 18.

Ducit in errorem variorum ambage viarum.
 OVID.

HIGH on a hill's green bosom lay'd,
 At ease my careless fancy stray'd,
 And o'er the landscape ran :
 Reviv'd, what scenes the seasons show ;
 And weigh'd, what share of joy or woe
 Is doom'd to toiling man.

The nibbling flocks around me bleat ;
 The oxen low beneath my feet,
 Along the clover'd dale ;

The author of this little poem to the memory of an unhappy princess, is unwilling to enter into the controversy respecting her guilt or her innocence. Suffice it only to observe, that the following facts may be proved to demonstration:--The letters which have always been esteemed the principal proofs of Queen Mary's guilt, are forged. Buchanan, on whose authority Francis, and other historians, have condemned her, has falsified several circumstances of her history, and has cited against her public records which never existed, as has been lately proved to demonstration. And, to add no more, the treatment she received from her illustrious cousin was dictated by a policy truly Machiavelian.--a policy which trampled on the obligations of honour, of humanity and morality. From whence it may be inferred, that, to express the indignation at the cruel treatment of Mary, which history must ever inspire, and to drop a tear over her sufferings, is not unworthy of a writer who would appear in the cause of virtue.

VOL. XI.

The golden sheaves the reapers bind,
 The ploughman whistles near behind,
 And breaks the new mown vale.

" Hail knowledge ! gift of heaven !" I cried,
 " E'en all the gifts of heaven beside,
 " Compar'd to thee how low !
 " The blessings of the earth, and all
 " The beasts of fold and forest share,
 " But godlike beings know.

" How mean the short-liv'd joys of sense ;
 " But how sublime the excellence
 " Of wisdom's sacred lore !
 " In death's deep shades what nations lie,
 " Yet still can wisdom's piercing eye
 " Their mighty deeds explore.

" She sees the little Spartan band,
 " With great Leonidas, withstand
 " The Asian world in arms ;
 " She hears the heav'nly sounds that hung,
 " On Homer's and on Plato's tongue,
 " And glows at Tully's charms.

" The wonders of the spacious sky,
 " She penetrates with Newton's eye,
 " And marks the planets' roll :
 " The human mind with Locke she scans ;
 " With Cambray, virtue's fame she fans,
 " And lifts to heaven the soul.

" How matter takes ten thousand forms
 " Of metals, plants, of men and worms ;
 " She joys to trace with Boyle
 " This life she deems an infant state,
 " A gleam, that bodes a life complete,
 " Beyond the mortal toil.

" What numerous ills in life befall !
 " Yet wisdom learns to scorn them all,
 " And arms the breast with steel :
 " E'en death's pale face no horror wears ;
 " But ah ! what horrid pangs and fears
 " Unknowing wretches feel !

" That breast excels proud Ophir's mines,
 " And fairer than the morning shines,
 " Where wisdom's treasures glow :
 " But ah ! how void yon peasant's mind,
 " His thoughts how darken'd and confin'd,
 " Nor cares he more to know.

" The last two tenants of the ground,
 " Of ancient times his history bound ;
 " Alas ! it scarce goes higher :
 " In vain to him is Maro's strain,
 " And Shakpeare's magic powers in vain ;
 " In vain is Milton's fire.

" Nor sun by day, nor stars by night,
 " Can give his soul the grand delight
 " To trace Almighty power :
 " His team thinks just as much as he
 " Of nature's vast variety,
 " In animal and flower."

As thus I sung, a solemn sound
 Accofts mine ear ; I look'd around,
 And lo ! an ancient page,

T t

Hard by an ivy'd oak stood near,
That fenc'd the cave, where many a year
Had been his hermitage.

His mantle gray flow'd loose behind,
His snowy beard wav'd to the wind,
And added solemn grace;

His broad bald front gave dignity,
Attention mark'd his lively eye,
And peace smil'd in his face.

He beckon'd with his wrinkled hand;
My ear was all at his command,
And thus the sage began:

"Godlike it is to know, I own;
"But oh! how little can be known,
"By poor short-sighted man.

"Go, mark the schools where letter'd pride,
"And star-crown'd science boastful guide,
"Display their fairest light;

"There, led by some pale meteor's ray,
"That leaves them off, the fages stray,
"And grope in endless night.

"Of wisdom proud, yon sage exclaims,
"Virtue and vice are merely names,
"And changing every hour;

"Ashley, how loud in virtue's praise!
"Yet Ashley with a kiss betrays,
"And strips her of her dower.

"Hark, Bollingbroke his God arraigns;
"Hobbes smiles on vice; Descartes maintains
"A godless passive cause.

"See Bayle off lily shifting round,
"Would fondly fix on sceptic ground,
"And change, O truth, thy laws!

"And what the joy this love bestows,
"Alas, no joy, no hope it knows
"Above what bestials claim:

"To quench our noblest native fire,
"That bids to nobler worlds aspire,
"Is all its hope, its aim.

"Not Aërie's wilds, nor Babel's waste,
"Where ignorance her tents hath plac'd,
"More dismal scene display;

"A scene where virtue sickening dies,
"Where vice to dark extinction flies,
"And spurns the future day.

"Wisdom, you boast to you is given;
"At night then mark the fires of heaven,
"And let thy mind explore;

"Swift as the lightning let it fly,
"From star to star, from sky to sky,
"Still, still, are millions more.

"Th' immerse ideas strike the soul
"With pleasing horror, and controul
"Thy wisdom's empty boast,

"What are they?—Thou canst never say:
"Then silent adoration pay,
"And be in wonder lost.

"Say, how the self-same roots produce
"The wholesome food and poisonous juice;
"And adders balsams yield;

"How fierce the hurking tyger glares,
"How mild the heifer with thee shares
"The labours of the field?

"Why growling to his den retires
"The fullen pard, while joy inspires
"Yon happy sportive lambs?

"Now scatter'd o'er the hill they stray,
"Now weary of their gambling play,
"All single out their dams.

"Instinct directs—but what is that?
"Fond man, thou never canst say what:
"Oh short thy searches fall!

"By stumbling chance, and slow degrees,
"The useful arts of men increase,
"But this at once is all.

"A trunk first floats along the deep,
"Long ages still improve the ship,
"Till the commands the shore,

"But never bird improv'd her nest,
"Each all at once of powers possest,
"Which ne'er can rise to more.

"That down the steep the waters flow,
"That weight descends, we see, we know,
"But why, can ne'er explain;

"Then humbly weighing nature's laws,
"To God's high will ascribe the cause,
"And own thy wisdom vain.

"For still the more thou know'st, the more
"Shalt thou the vanity deplore
"Of all thy soul can find.

"This life a sickly woeful dream,
"A burial of the soul will seem,
"A palsy of the mind.

"Though knowledge scorns the peasant's fear,
"Alas, it points the secret spear
"Of many a nameless woe.

"Thy delicacy dips the dart
"In rankling gall, and gives a smart
"Beyond what he can know.

"How happy then the simple mind
"Of yon unknown and labouring hind,
"Where all is smiling peace!

"No thoughts of more exalted joy
"His present bliss one hour destroy,
"Nor rob one moment's ease.

"The stings neglected merit feels,
"The pangs the virtuous man conceals,
"When crush'd by wayward fate.

"These are not found beneath his roof,
"Against them all securely proof,
"Heaven guards his humble state.

"Knowledge or wealth to few are given,
"But mark how just the ways of Heaven;
"True joy to all is free,

"Nor wealth nor knowledge grant the boon.
"Tis thine, O conscience, thine alone,
"It all belongs to thee!

"Blest in thy smiles the shepherd lives;
"Gay is his morn; his evening gives "Content and sweet repose

"Without them—ever, ever cloy'd
"To sage or chief, one weary void
"Is all that life bestows.

"Then would'st thou mortal rise divine,
"Let innocence of soul be thine,
"With active goodness join'd;

" My heart shall then confess thee blest,
 " And ever lively, joyful taste
 " The pleasures of the mind."
 So spake the fage: my heart reply'd,
 " How poor, how blind is human pride,
 " All joy how false and vain:
 " But that from conscious worth which flows,
 " Which gives the death-bed sweet repose,
 " And hopes an after reign."

HENGIST AND MEY.

A BALLAD.

Hæc novimus esse nihil.

In ancient days when Arthur reign'd,
 Sir Elmer had no peer;
 And no young knight in all the land,
 The ladies lov'd so dear.
 His sister Mey, the fairest maid
 Of all the virgin train,
 Won every heart at Arthur's court;
 But all their love was vain.
 In vain they lov'd, in vain they vow'd,
 Her heart they could not move;
 Yet at the evening hour of prayer,
 Her mind was lost in love.
 The abbess saw---the abbess knew,
 And urg'd her to explain
 " O name the gentle youth to me,
 " And his consent I'll gain."
 Long urg'd, long tir'd, fair Mey reply'd,
 " His name---how can I say?
 " An angel from the fields above,
 " Has rapt my heart away."
 " But once, alas! and never more,
 " His lovely form I spy'd;
 " One evening by the sounding shore,
 " All by the greenwood side.
 " His eyes to mine the love confess,
 " That glow'd with mildest grace;
 " His courtly mien and purple vest,
 " Bespoke his princely race.
 " But when he heard my brother's horn,
 " Fast to his ships he fled;
 " Yet while I sleep, his graceful form
 " Still hovers round my bed.
 " Sometimes all clad in armour bright,
 " He shakes a warlike lance;
 " And now in courtly garments dight,
 " He leads the sprightly dance.
 " His hair, as black as raven's wing;
 " His skin---as Christmas snow;
 " His cheeks outvie the blush of morn,
 " His lips like rose-buds glow.
 " His limbs, his arms, his stature, shap'd
 " By nature's finest hand;
 " His sparkling eyes declare him born
 " To love, and to command."
 The live-long year fair Mey bemoan'd
 Her hopeless pining love:
 But when the balmy spring return'd,
 And summer cloth'd the grove;
 All round by pleasant Humber side,
 The Saxon banners flew,

And to Sir Elmer's castle gates,
 The spearmen came in view.
 Fair blush'd the morn, when Mey look'd o'er
 The castle walls so shewn;
 And lo! the warlike Saxon youth
 Were sporting on the green.
 There Hengist, Offa's eldest son,
 Lean'd on his burnish'd lance,
 And all the armed youth around,
 Obey'd his manly glance.
 His locks, as black as raven's wing,
 Adown his shoulders flow'd;
 His cheeks outv'd the blush of morn,
 His lips like rose-buds glow'd.
 And soon the lovely form of Mey
 Has caught his piercing eyes;
 He gives the sign, the bands retire,
 While big with love he sighs.
 " Oh thou, for whom I dar'd the seas;
 " And came with peace or war!
 " Oh, by that cross that veils thy breast,
 " Relieve thy lover's care!
 " For thee I'll quit my father's throne;
 " With thee the wilds explore;
 " Or with thee share the British crown;
 " With thee the crosses adore."
 Beneath the timorous virgin blush,
 With love's soft warmth she glows;
 So, blushing through the dews of morn,
 Appears the opening rose.
 'Twas now the hour of morning pray'r,
 When men their sins bewail,
 And Elmer heard King Arthur's horn,
 Shrill sounding through the dale.
 The pearly tears from Mey's bright eyes,
 Like April dew-drops fell,
 When with a parting dear embrace,
 Her brother bade farewell.
 The crosses with sparkling diamonds bright,
 That veil'd the snowy breast,
 With prayers to Heaven her lily hands
 Have fix'd on Elmer's vest.
 Now, with five hundred bowmen true,
 He's march'd across the plain;
 Till with his gallant yeomandrie,
 He join'd King Arthur's train.
 Full forty thousand Saxon spears,
 Came glittering down the hill,
 And with their shouts and clang of arms,
 The distant valleys fill.
 Old Offa, dress'd in Odin's garb,
 Assam'd the hoary god;
 And Hengist, like the warlike Thor,
 Before the horsemen rode.
 With dreadful rage the combat burns,
 The captains shout amain;
 And Elmer's tall victorious spear
 Far glances o'er the plain.
 To stop its course young Hengist flew,
 Like lightning o'er the field;
 And soon his eyes the well-known cross
 On Elmer's vest beheld.

The slighted lover swell'd his breast,
His eyes shot living fire;
And all his martial heat before,
To this was mild desire.

On his imagin'd rival's front,
With whirlwind speed he prest,
And glancing to the sun, his sword
Refounds on Elmer's crest.

The foe gave way, the princely youth
With heedless rage pursu'd,
Till trembling in his cloven helm,
Sir Elmer's javelin stood.

He bow'd his head--flow dropt his spear;
The reins slip through his hand,
And stain'd with blood--his stately corse
Lay breathless on the strand.

"O bear me off," Sir Elmer cried;
"Before my painful fight
The combat swims--yet Hengist's vest
"I claim as victor's right."

Brave Hengist's fall the Saxons saw,
And all in terror fled;
The bowmen to his castle gates
The brave Sir Elmer led.

"O wash my wounds, my sister dear;
"O pull this Saxon dart,
"That whizzing from young Hengist's arm
"Has almost pierc'd my heart."
"Yet in my hall his vest shall hang;
"And Britons yet unborn,
"Shall with the trophies of to-day
"Their solemn feasts adorn."

All trembling Mey beheld the vest;
"Oh, Merlin!" loud she cried;
"Thy words are true--my slaughter'd love
"Shall have a breathless bride!"

"Oh Elmer, Elmer, boast no more,
"That low my Hengist lies!
"O Hengist, cruel was thine arm!
"My brother bleeds and dies!"

She spake--the roses left her cheeks,
And life's warm spirit fled:
So nipt by winter's withering blasts,
The snow-drop bows the head.

Yet parting life one struggle gave,
She lifts her languid eyes;
"Return my Hengist, oh return
"My slaughter'd love," she cries.

"Oh--fill he lives--he smiles again,
"With all his grace he moves;
"I come--I come where bow nor spear
"Shall more disturb our loves."

She spake--she dy'd. The Saxon dart
Was drawn from Elmer's side,
And thrice he call'd his sister Mey,
And thrice he groan'd, and dy'd.

Where in the dale a moss-grown cross
O'er shades an aged thorn,
Sir Elmer's and young Hengist's corse
Were by the spearmen borne.

And there, all clad in robes of white,
With many a sigh and tear,
The village maids to Hengist's grave,
Did Mey's fair body bear.

And there, at dawn and fall of day,
All from the neighbouring groves,
The turtles wail, in widow'd notes,
And sing their hapless loves.

THE SORCERESS;

OR, WOLFOLD AND ULLA.

An Heroic Ballad.

—"Prisca fides." VIRG.

"Oh, low he lies; his cold pale cheek
"Lies lifeless on the clay;
"Yet struggling hope--O day-spring break,
"And lead me on my way."

"On Denmark's cruel bands, O Heaven!
"Thy red-wing'd vengeance pour;
"Before my Wolfold's spear be driven--
"O rise bright morning hour!"

Thus Ulla wail'd the fairest maid
Of all the Saxon race;

Thus Ulla wail'd, in nightly shade,
While tears bedew'd her face.

When sudden o'er the fir-crown'd hill
The full orb'd moon arose;
And o'er the winding dale so still
Her silver radiance flows.

No more could Ulla's fearful breast
Her anxious care delay;
But, deep with hope and fear imprest,
She holds the moonshine way.

She left the bower, and all alone
She trac'd the dale so still;
And sought the cave with rue o'ergrown,
Beneath the fir-crown'd hill.

Black knares of blasted oak, embound
With hemlock, fence'd the cell;
The dreary mouth, half under ground,
Yawn'd like the gate of hell.

Soon as the gloomy den she spy'd,
Cold horror shook her knee;
And hear, O prophets, the cry'd,
A prince's fate to thee.

Aghast she stood! athwart the air
The dismal screech-owl flew;
The fillet round her auburn hair
Asunder burst in two.

Her robe of softest yellow glow'd
Beneath the moon's pale beam;
And o'er the ground, with yew-boughs strew'd,
Eflus'd a golden gleam.

The golden gleam the forceress spy'd,
As in her deepest cell,
At midnight's magic hour she try'd
A tomb, o'erpowering spell.

When from the cavern's dreary womb
Her groaning voice arose,
"O come, my daughter, fearless come,
"And fearless tell thy woes."

As shakes the bough of trembling leaf,
When whirlwinds sudden rise;
As stands aghast the warrior chief,
When his base army flies;

So shook, so stood, the beauteous maid,
 When from the dreary den
 A wrinkled hag came forth, array'd
 In matted rags obscene.

Around her brows, with hemlock bound,
 Loose hung her ash gray hair;
 As from two dreary caves profound
 Her blue flam'd eye-balls glare.

Her skin, of earthy red, appear'd
 Clung round her shoulder bones,
 Like wither'd bark, by lightning fear'd,
 When loud the tempest groans.

A robe of squalid green and blue
 Her ghostly length array'd,
 A gaping rent full to the view
 Her furrow'd ribs betray'd.

"And tell, my daughter, fearless tell
 "What sorrow brought thee here?
 "So may my power thy cares expel,
 "And give thee sweetest cheer.

"O mistress of the powerful spell,
 "King Edric's daughter see,
 "Northumbria to my father sell,
 "And sorrow fell to me.

"My virgin heart Lord Wolfwold won;
 "My father on him smil'd
 "Soon as he gain'd Northumbria's throne,
 "His pride the youth exil'd.

"Stern Denmark's ravens o'er the seas
 "Their gloomy black wings spread,
 "And o'er Northumbria's hills and leas
 "Their dreadful squadrons sped.

"Return brave Wolfwold, Edric cry'd,
 "O generous warrior hear,
 "My daughter's hand, thy willing bride,
 "Awaits thy conquering spear.

"The banish'd youth in Scotland's court
 "Had past the weary year;
 "And soon he heard the glad report,
 "And soon he grasped his spear.

"He left the Scottish dames to weep,
 "And wing'd with true love speed;
 "Nor day nor night he slept to sleep,
 "And soon he cross'd the Tweed.

"With joyful voice, and raptur'd eyes,
 "He press'd my willing hand;
 "I go, my fair, my love, he cries,
 "To guard thy father's land.

"By Edon's shore, in deathful fray,
 "The daring foe we meet;
 "Ere three short days I trust to lay
 "My trophies at thy feet.

"Alas, alas, that time is o'er,
 "And three long days beside,
 "Yet not a word from Edon's shore
 "Has cheer'd his fearful bride.

"O mistress of the powerful spell,
 "His doubtful fate decide;"—
 "And cease, my child, for all is well,"
 The grizly witch reply'd.

Approach my cave, and where I place
 "The magic circle, stand

"And fear not ought of ghastly face
 "That glides beneath my wand."

The grizly witch's powerful charms
 Then reach'd the labouring moon,
 And cloudless at the dire alarms
 She shed her brightest noon.

The pale beam struggled through the shade,
 That black'd the cavern's womb,
 And in the deepest nook betray'd
 An altar and a tomb.

Around the tomb, in mystic lore,
 Were forms of various mien,
 And efts, and foul-wing'd serpents, bore
 The altar's base obscene.

Eyeless a huge and starv'd toad sat
 In corner murk aloof,
 And many a snake and famish'd bat
 Clung to the crevic'd roof.

A fox and vultures skeletons
 A yawning rift betray'd;
 And grappling still each others bones,
 The strife of death display'd.

"And now, my child, the forceress said,
 "Lord Wolfwold's father's grave
 "To me shall render up the dead,
 "And send him to my cave.

"His skeleton shall hear my spell,
 "And to the figur'd walls
 "His hand of bone shall point and tell
 "What fate his son bestows."

O cold down Ulla's snow-like face
 The trembling sweat-drops fell:
 And, borne by sprights of gliding ice,
 The corse approach'd the cell.

And thrice the witch her magic wand
 Wav'd o'er the skeleton;
 And slowly, at the dread command,
 Up rose the arm of bone.

A cloven shield, and broken spear,
 The finger wander'd o'er,
 Then rested on a fable bier,
 Disgain'd with drops of gore.

In ghastly writhes, her mouth so wide
 And black, the forceress throws;
 "And be those signs, my child," she cries,
 "Fulfill'd on Wolfwold's foes.

"A happier spell I now shall try;
 "Attend, my child, attend,
 "And mark what flames from altar high
 "And lowly floor ascend.

"If of the rose's softest red
 "The blaze shines forth to view,
 "Then Wolfwold lives—but hell forbid
 "The glimmering flame of blue!"

The witch then rais'd her haggard arm,
 And wav'd her wand on high;
 And, while she spoke the mutter'd charm,
 Dark lightning fill'd her eye.

Fair Ulla's knee swift smote the ground;
 Her hands aloft were spread;
 And every joint, as marble bound,
 Felt horror's darkest dread.

Her lips, ere while so like the rose,
 Were now as vi'let pale,
 And, tumbling in convulsive throes,
 Express'd o'erwhelming ail.

Her eyes, ere while so starry bright,
 Where living lustre shone,
 Were now transform'd to sightless white,
 Like eyes of lifeless stone.

And soon the dreadful spell was o'er,
 And glimmering to the view,
 The quivering flame rose through the floor,
 A flame of ghastly blue.

Behind the altar's livid fire,
 Low from the inmost cave,
 Young Wolfwold rose in pale attire,
 The vestments of the grave.

His eye to Ulla's eye he rear'd,
 His cheek was wan as clay,
 And half cut through his hand appear'd
 That beckon'd her away.

Fair Ulla saw the woeful shade,
 Her heart struck at her side,
 And burst—low bow'd her lifeless head,
 And down she sunk, and dy'd.

ALMADA HILL.

AN EPISTLE FROM LISBON.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THOUGH no subjects are more proper for poetry than those which are founded upon historical retrospect, the author of such a poem lies under very particular disadvantages: every one can understand and relish a work merely fictitious, descriptive, or sentimental; but a previous acquaintance, and even intimacy, with the history and characters upon which the other poem is founded, is absolutely necessary to do justice to its author. Without such previous knowledge, the ideas which he would convey pass unobserved, as in an unknown tongue; and the happiest allusion, if he is fortunate enough to attain any thing worthy of that name, is unfelt and unseen. Under these disadvantages, the following epistle is presented to the public, whose indulgence and candour the author has already amply experienced.

In the twelfth century, Lisbon, and great part of Portugal and Spain, were in possession of the Moors. Alphonso the first king of Portugal, having gained several victories over that people, was laying siege to Lisbon, when Robert, Duke of Gloucester, on his way to the Holy Land, appeared upon the coast of that kingdom. As the cause was the same, Robert was easily persuaded to make his first crusade in Portugal. He demanded that the storming of the castle of Lisbon, situated on a considerable hill, and whose ruins show it to have been of great strength, should be allotted to him, while Alphonso was to assail the walls and the city. Both leaders were successful; and Alphonso, among the rewards which he bestowed upon the English, granted to those who were wounded, or unable to proceed to Palestine, the castle of Almada, and the adjoining lands.

The river Tagus, below and opposite to Lisbon, is edged by steep grotesque rocks, particularly on the south side. Those on the south are generally higher and much more magnificent and picturesque than the Cliffs of Dover. Upon one of the highest of these, and directly opposite to Lisbon, remain the stately ruins of the castle of Almada.

In December 1779, as the author was wandering among these ruins, he was struck with the idea, and form'd the plan of the following poem; an idea which, it may be allowed, was natural to the translator of the Lusiad; and the plan may, in some degree, be called a supplement to that work.

The following poem, except the corrections and a few lines, was written in Portugal. The descriptive parts are strictly local. The finest prospect of Lisbon and the Tagus (which is there about four miles broad), is from Almada; which also commands the adjacent country, from the rock of Cintra to the castle and city of Palmela, an extent of above fifty miles. This magnificent view is completed by the extensive opening at the mouth of the Tagus, about ten miles below, which discovers the Atlantic Ocean.

AN EPISTLE FROM LISBON.

WHILE you, my friend, from low'ring wintry plains,
 Now pale with snows, now black with drizzling rains,

From leafless woodlands, and dishonour'd bowers
 Mantled by gloomy mists, or lash'd by showers
 Of hollow moan, while not a struggling beam
 Steals from the sun to play on Isis' stream;
 While from these scenes by England's winter spread
 Swift to the cheerful hearth your steps are led,
 Pleas'd from the threat'ning tempest to retire
 And join the circle round the social fire;
 In other climes through sun bask'd scenes I stray,
 As the fair landscape leads my thoughtful way,
 As upland path, oft winding, bids me rove
 Where orange bowers invite, or olive grove,
 No fullen phantoms brooding o'er my breast,
 The genial influence of the clime I taste;
 Yet still regardful of my native shore,
 In every scene, my roaming eyes explore,
 Where'er its aspect, still by mem'ry brought,
 My fading country rushes on my thought.

While now perhaps the classic page you turn,
 And warm'd with honest indignation burn,
 Till hopeless, sickled by the climate's gloom,
 Your generous fears call forth Britannia's doom,
 What hostile spears her sacred lawns invade,
 By friends deserted, by her chiefs betray'd,
 Low fall'n and vanquish'd—!—, with mind serene
 As Lisboa's sky, yet pensive as the scene
 Around, and pensive seems the scene to me,
 From other ills my country's fate foresee.

Not from the hands that wield Iberia's spear,
 Not from the hands that Gaul's proud thunders bear,

Nor those that turn on Albion's breast the sword
 Peat down of late by Albion when it gor'd
 Their own, who impious doom their parents' fall
 Beneath the world's great foe th' insidious Gaul;
 Yes, not from these the immedicable wound
 Of Albion—Other is the bane profound
 Destin'd alone to touch her mortal part;
 Herself is sick and poisoned at the heart.

O'er Tago's banks where'er I roll mine eyes
 The gallant deeds of ancient days arise;
 The scenes the Lusian Muses fond display'd
 Before me oft, as oft at eve I stray'd

By Isis' hallowed stream. Oft now the strand
Where Gama march'd his death-devoted * band,
While Lisbon aw'd with horror saw him spread
The daring sails that first to India led;
And oft Almada's castled steep inspires
The pensive muse's visionary fires;
Almada Hill to English memory dear,
While shades of English heroes wander here!

To ancient English valour sacred still Remains, and ever shall, Almada Hill;
The hill and lawns to English valour given
What time the Arab Moors from Spain were driven,
Before the banners of the cross subdued,
When Lisbon's towers were bath'd in Moorish blood

By Glosser's lance.—Romantic days that yield
Of gallant deeds a wide luxuriant field
Dear to the muse that loves the fairy plains,
Where ancient honour wild and ardent reigns.

Where high o'er Tago's flood Almada lowers,
Amid the solemn pomp of mouldering towers,
Supinely seated, wide and far around
My eye delighted wanders.—Here the bound
Of fair Europa o'er the ocean rears
Its western edge; where dimly disappears
The Atlantic wave, the slow descending day
Mild beaming pours serene the gentle ray
Of Lusitania's winter, silversing o'er
The tower-like summits of the mountain shore;
Dappling the lofty cliffs that coldly throw
Their fable horrors o'er the vales below.
Far round the stately-shoulder'd river bends
Its giant arms, and sea-like wide extends
Its midland bays, with fertile islands crown'd,
And lawns for English valour still renown'd;
Given to Cornwallia's gallant sons of yore,
Cornwallia's name the smiling pastures bore;
And still their lord his English lineage boasts
From Rolland famous in the Croisade hosts.
Where sea-ward narrower rolls the shining tide
Through hills by hills embosom'd on each side,
Monastic walls in every glen arise
In coldest white fair glistening to the skies
Amid the brown-brow'd rocks; and, far as sight,
Proud domes and villages array'd in white †

* The expedition of Vasco de Gama, the discoverer of the East Indies, was extremely unpopular, as it was esteemed impracticable. His embarkation is strongly marked by Orosius the historian. Gama, before he went on board, spent the night along with the crews of his squadron in the chapel of our Lady at Belem, on the spot where the noble Gothic church now stands adjoining the convent of St. Jerome.

† In the chapel they bound themselves to obedience to Gama, and devoted themselves to death. "On the next day when the adventurers marched to the ships, the shore of Belem presented one of the most solemn and affecting scenes perhaps recorded in history. The beach was covered with the inhabitants of Lisbon. A numerous procession of priests in their robes sung antems, and offered up invocations to heaven. Every one beheld the adventurers as brave innocent men going to a dreadful execution, as rushing upon certain death." Introduction to the Lusitana.

† The houses in Portugal are generally whitened on the outside, white being esteemed as repulsive of the rays of the sun.

Climb o'er the steeps, and through the dusky green
Of olive groves, and orange bowers between,
Speckled with glowing red, unnumber'd gleam—
And Lisbon towering o'er the lordly stream
Her marble palaces and temples spreads
Wildly magnific o'er the loaded heads
Of bending hills, along whose high-pil'd base
The port capacious, in a moon'd embrace,
Throws her mast-forest, waving on the gale
The vans of every shore that hoists the sail.

Here while the sun from Europe's breast retires,
Let fancy, roaming as the scene inspires,
Pursue the present and the past restore,
And nature's purpose in her steps explore.

Nor you, my friend, admiring Rome, disdain
Th' Iberian fields and Lusitanian Spain.
While Italy, obscur'd in tawdry blaze,
A motley, modern character displays,
And languid trims her long exhausted store;
Iberia's fields with rich and genuine ore
Of ancient manners woo the traveller's eye;
And scenes untrac'd in every landscape lie.
Here every various dale with lessons fraught
Calls to the wanderer's visionary thought
What mighty deeds the lofty hills of Spain
Of old have witness'd—From the evening main
Her mountain tops the Tyrian pilots saw
In lightning's wrapt, and thrill'd with sacred awe
Through Greece the tales of Gorgons, Hydras
spread,

And Geryon dreadful with the triple head;
The stream of * Lethe, and the dread abodes
Of forms gigantic, and infernal gods.
But soon, by fearless lust of gold impell'd,
They min'd the mountain, and explor'd the field;
Till Rome and Carthage, fierce for empire, strove,
As for their prey two famish'd birds of Jove.
The rapid Durius then and Cæti's food
Were dy'd with Roman and with Punic blood,
While oft the length'ning plains and mountain fides

Seem'd moving on, slow rolling tides on tides,
When from Pyrene's summits Afric pour'd
Her armies, and o'er Rome destruction low'd.

Here while the youth revolves some hero's fame,
If patriot zeal his British breast inflame,
Here let him trace the fields to freedom dear
Where low in dust lay Rome's invading spear;
Where Viriatus † proudly trampled o'er
Fafces and Roman eagles sleep in gore;
Or where he fell, with honest laurels crown'd,
The awful victim of a treacherous wound;
A wound still bath'd in honour's generous tear,
While freedom's wounds the brave and good revere;

* The river of Lima, in the north of Portugal, said to be the Lethe of the ancients, is thus mentioned by Cellarius in his Geographia Antiqua; "Fabius Orosius Oblivionis fluvius Limaes, ultra Lusitaniam in septentrione." It runs through a most romantic and beautiful district; from which circumstance it probably received the name of the River of Oblivion, the first strangers who visited it, forgetting their native country, and being willing to continue on its banks. The same reason of forgetfulness is ascribed to the Letes by Homer, Odyss. ix. There is another Lethe of the ancients in Africa.

† This great man is said by Florus to be the Romulus of Spain. What is here said of him is agreeable to history.

Still pouring fresh th' inexpiable stain
 O'er Rome's patrician honour false and vain!
 Or should the pride of bold revolt inspire,
 And touch his bosom with unhallowed fire;
 If merit spurn'd demand stern sacrifice,
 O'er Ev'ra's * fields let dread Sertorius rife.
 Dy'd in his country's blood, in all the pride
 Of wrongs reveng'd, illustrious let him ride
 Enshrin'd, o'er Spain, in victory's dazzling rays,
 Till Rome look pale beneath the mounting blaze.
 But let the British wanderer through the dales
 Of Ev'ra stray, while midnight tempest wails:
 There as the hoary villagers relate
 Sertorius, Sylla, Marius, weep their fate,
 Their spectres gliding on the lightning blue,
 Oft doom'd their ancient stations to renew;
 Sertorius bleeding on Perpenna's knife,
 And Marius sinking in ambition's strife;
 As forest boars entangled in a chain,
 Dragg'd on, as stings each leader's rage or pain;
 And each the furious leader in his turn,
 Till now they lie, a ghastly wreck forlorn.

And say, ye trampers on your country's mounds,
 Say who shall fix the swelling torrent's bounds?
 Or who shall sail the pilot of the flood?
 Alas, full oft some worthless trunk of wood
 Is whirl'd into the port, blind fortune's boast,
 While noblest vessels, founder'd, strew the coast!

If wars of fairer fame and old applause,
 That bear the title of our country's cause
 To humanize barbarians, and to raise
 Our country's prowess, their asserted praise;
 If these delight, Hispania's dales display
 The various arts and toils of Roman sway.
 Here jealous Cato † laid the cities waste,
 And Julius † here in fairer pride replac'd,
 Till ages saw the labours of the plough
 By every river, and the barren bough
 Of laurel shaded by the olive's bloom,
 And grateful Spain the strength of lordly Rome;
 Hers mighty bards ‡, and hers the sacred earth
 That gave the world a friend in Trajan's birth.

When Rome's wide empire, a luxurious prey,
 Debas'd in false refinement nerveless lay,
 The northern hordes on Europe's various climes,
 Planted their ruling virtues and their crimes.
 Cloister'd by Tyber's stream the stolid staid,
 To Seine and Loire the gay and frivolous stray'd
 A fordid group the Belgian marshes pleas'd,
 And Saxony's wild forest-freedom seiz'd,
 There held her juries, pois'd the legal scales;—
 And Spain's romantic hills and lonely dales
 The pensive lover fought; and Spain became
 The land of gallantry and amorous flame.
 Hail, favour'd clime! whose lone retreats inspire
 The softest dreams of languishing desire,
 Affections trembling with a glow all holy,
 Wildly sublime, and sweetly melancholy;
 Till rapt devotion to the fair, refine
 And bend each passion low at honour's shrine.
 So felt the iron Goth when here he brought
 His worship of the fair with valour fraught:

Soon as Iberia's mountains fix'd his home,
 He rose a character unknown to Rome;
 His manners wildly colour'd as the flowers
 And flaunting plumage of Brazilian bowers:
 New to the world as these, yet polish'd more
 Than e'er the pupil of the Attic lore
 Might proudly boast. On man's bold arm robust
 The tender fair reclines with fondest trust:
 With nature's finest touch exulting glows
 The manly breast which that fond aid bestows:
 That first of generous joys on man bestow'd,
 In Gothic Spain in all its fervour glow'd.
 Then high burn'd honour; and the dread alarms
 Of danger then assum'd the dearest charms.
 What for the fair was dar'd or suffer'd, bore
 A faint-like merit, and was envied more;
 Till led by love-sick fancy's dazzled flight,
 From court to court forth roam'd adventure's knight;

And tilts and tournaments, in mimic wars,
 Supplied the triumphs and the honour'd scars
 Of arduous battles for their country fought,
 Till the keen relish of the marvellous wrought
 All wild and fever'd and each peaceful shade,
 With batter'd armour deck'd, its knight display'd,
 In soothing transport, listening to the strain
 Of dwarfs and giants, and of monsters slain;
 Of spells all horror, and enchanters dire,
 And the sweet banquet of the amorous fire, [thrall,
 When knights and ladies chaste, reliev'd from Holdove's high holiday in bowr and hall.

'Twas thus, all pleasing to the languid thought,
 With magic power the tales of magic wrought;
 Till by the muses arm'd, in all the ire
 Of wit, resistless as electric fire,
 Forth rode La Mancha's knight; and sudden fled
 Goblins and beauteous nymphs, and pagans dread,
 As the delirious dream of sickness flies,
 When health returning smiles from vernal skies.

But turn we now from chivalry diseas'd,
 To chivalry when honour's wreath the seiz'd
 From wisdom's hand.—From Taurus' rugged steep,

And Caucasus, far round with headlong sweep,
 As wolves wild howling from their famish'd den,
 Rush'd the devouring bands of Sarazen:
 Their savage genius, giant-like and blind,
 Trampling with sulcen joy on human kind,
 Assyria lay its own uncover'd grave,
 And Gallia trembled to the Atlantic wave:
 In awful waste the fairest cities moan'd,
 And human liberty expiring groan'd
 When chivalry arose:—Her ardent eye
 Sublime, that fondly mingled with the sky,
 Where patience watch'd, and steadfast purpose
 frown'd,
 Mix'd with devotion's fire, she darted round,
 Stern and indignant; on her glittering shield
 The cross she bore, and, proudly to the field,
 High plum'd she rush'd; by honour's dazzling
 fir'd,

Conscious of Heaven's own cause, and all inspir'd,
 By holy vows, as on the frowning tower
 The lightning volleys, on the crested power
 Of Sarazen the wing'd her jav'lin's way,
 And the wide-wasting giant prostrate lay.

Let supercilious wisdom's smiling pride
 The passion wild of these bold days deride;

* Eboræ, now Eboræ, was the principal residence of Sertorius.

† According to history, this different policy is strikingly characteristic of those celebrated names.

‡ Lucan, Martial, Seneca.

But let the humbler sage with reverence own,
 That something sacred glows, of name unknown,
 Glows in the deeds that Heaven delights to crown;
 Something that boasts an impulse uncontroul'd
 By school-taught prudence, and its maxims cold.
 Fir'd at the thought, methinks on sacred ground
 I tread; where'er I cast mine eyes around,
 Palmela's hill, * and Cintra's summits tell
 How the grim Sarazen's dread legions fell;
 Turbans and cymeters in carnage roll'd,
 And their moon'd ensigns torn from every hold:—
 Yes, let the youth whose generous search explores
 The various lessons of Iberia's shores,
 Let him as wandering at the muse's hour
 Of eve or morn where low the Moorish tow'r,
 Fall'n from its rocky height and tyrant sway,
 Lies scatter'd o'er the dale in fragments gray,
 Let him with joy behold the hills around
 With olive forests, and with vineyards crown'd,
 All grateful pouring on the hands that rear
 Their fruit, the fruitage of the bounteous year.
 Then let his mind to fair Ionia turn,—
 Alas! how waste Ionia's landscapes mourn;
 And thine, O beauteous Greece, amid the tow'rs
 Where dreadful still the Turkish banner low'rs;
 Beneath whose gloom, unconscious of the stain
 That dims his soul, the peasant hugs his chain.
 And whence these woes, debasing human kind?
 Eunuchs in heart, in polish'd sloth reclin'd,
 Thy sons, degenerate Greece, ignobly bled,
 And fair Byzantium bow'd th' imperial head;
 While Tago's iron race, in dangers steel'd,
 All arduous, dar'd the horrors of the field.
 The tow'rs of Venice trembled o'er her flood,
 And Paris' gates aghast and open stood;
 Low lay her peers on Fontarabia's † plains:
 And Lisboa groan'd beneath stern Mah'met's
 chains:
 Vain was the hope the North might rest un-
 spoil'd;
 When stern Iberia's spirit fierce recoil'd.
 As from the toils the wounded lion bounds,
 And tears the hunters and the fated hounds;
 So smarting with his wounds th' Iberian tore,
 And to his sun-scorch'd regions drove the Moor:
 The vengeful Moors, as matiffs on their prey,
 Return'd; as heavy clouds their deep array
 Blacken'd o'er Tago's banks.—As Sagres ‡ braves
 And stems the furious rage of Afric's waves,
 So brav'd, so stood the Lusitanian bands,
 The southern bulwark of Europa's lands.
 Such were the foes by chivalry repell'd,
 And such the honours that adorn'd her shield.

* Palmela's hill and Cintra's summits—are both seen from Almada, and were principal forts of the Moors. They were storm'd by Alphonso the First, about the time of the conquest of Lisbon.

† The irruption of the Mahomedans into Europe gave rise to that species of poetry called Romance. The Orlando Furioso is founded upon the invasion of France, when Charlemagne with all his peerage fell by Fontarabia—

MILTON.

‡ The promontory of Sagres, where Henry Duke of Viseo resided and established his naval school, is on the southern part of Portugal opposite to Africa.

And ask what Christian Europe owes the high
 And ardent soul of gallant chivalry,
 Ask, and let Turkish Europe's groans reply!

As through the pictur'd abbey window gleams
 The evening sun, with bold though fading beams,
 So through the reverend shade of ancient days,
 Gleam these bold deeds with dim yet golden rays.
 But let not glowing fancy as it warms
 O'er these, high honour's youthful pride in arms,
 Forget the stern ambition, and the worth
 Of minds mature, by patriot kings call'd forth;
 That worth which rous'd the nation to explore
 Old ocean's wildest waves and farthest shore.

By human eye untempted, unexplor'd,
 An awful solitude, old ocean roar'd:
 As to the fearful dove's impatient eye,
 Appears the height untry'd of upper sky;
 So seem'd the last dim wave, in boundless space
 Involv'd and lost, when Tago's gallant race,
 As eagles fixing on the sun their eyes
 Through gulfs unknown explor'd the morning skies;
 And taught the wondering world the grand design
 Of parent Heaven, that shore to shore should join
 In bands of mutual aid, from sky to sky,
 And ocean's wildest waves the chain supply.

And here, my friend, how many a trophy woos;
 The Briton's earnest eye, and British muse!
 Here bids the youthful traveller's care forego,
 The arts of elegance and polish'd show;
 Bids other arts his nobler thoughts engage
 And wake to highest aim his patriot rage;
 Those arts which rais'd that race of men, who shone

The heroes of their age on Lisboa's throne.
 What mighty deeds in filial order flow'd,
 While each still brighter than its parent glow'd,
 Till Henry's naval school its heroes pour'd
 From pole to pole; wherever ocean roar'd!
 Columbus, Gama, and Magellan's name,
 Its deathless boast; and all of later fame
 Its offspring—kindling o'er the view the muse
 The naval pride of those bright days reviews;
 Sees Gama's sails, that first to India bore,
 In awful hope vanish from the shore;
 Sees from the silken regions of the morn
 What fleets of gay triumphant vanes return!
 What heroes, plum'd with conquest, proudly bring
 The eastern sceptres to the Lusian king!
 When sudden, rising on the evening gale,
 Methinks I hear the oceans murmurs wail,
 And every breeze repeat the woful tale,
 How bow'd, how fell proud Lisboa's naval throne—

Ah Heaven, how cold the bodding thoughts rush
 Methinks I hear the shades that hover round
 Of English heroes heave the sigh profound,
 Prophetic of the kindred fate that lowers,
 O'er Albion's fleets and London's proudest towers.

Broad was the firm-bas'd structure and sublime,
 That Gama fondly rear'd on India's clime:
 On justice and benevolence he plac'd
 Its ponderous weight, and warlike trophies grac'd
 Its mounting turrets; and o'er Asia wide
 Great Albuquerque * renown'd its generous pride.

* Albuquerque, Sampayo, Nunio, Castro, are distinguished characters in the Lusiad, and in the History of Portuguese Asia,

The injur'd native fought its friendly shade,
 And India's princes blest its powerful aid:
 Till from corrupted passion's basest hour
 Rose the dread demon of tyrannic power.
 Sampayo's heart, where dauntless valour reign'd,
 And counsel deep, the seiz'd and soul profan'd.
 Then the straight road where sacred justice leads,
 Where for its plighted compact honour bleeds,
 Was left, and holy patriot zeal gave place
 To lust of gold and self-devotion base:
 Deceitful art the chief's sole guide became,
 And breach of faith was wisdom; slaughter, fame,
 Yet though from far his hawk eye mark'd its prey,
 Soon through the rocks that crost his crooked
 way,

As a toil'd bull, fiercely he stumbled on,
 Till low he lay dishonour'd and o'erthrown.

Others, without his valour or his art,
 With all his interested rage of heart,
 Follow'd, as blighting mists on Gama's toil,
 And undermin'd and rend the mighty pile;
 Convulsions dread its deep foundations tore,
 Its bending head the scath of lightning bore:
 Its falling turrets desolation spread;
 And from its faithless shade in horror fled
 The native tribes—yet not at once subdu'd;
 Its pristine strength long storms on storms withstood;

A Nunio's justice, and a Castro's sword,
 Oft rais'd its turrets, and its dread restor'd.
 Yet, like the sunshine of a winter day
 On Norway's coast, soon died the transient ray.
 A tyrant race who own'd no country*, came,
 Deep to entrench themselves, their only aim;
 With lust of rapine fever'd and athirst,
 With the unhallow'd rage of game accurst;
 Against each spring of action, on the breast
 For wifely ends, by nature's hand impress,
 Stern war they wag'd; and blindly wren'd, alone
 On brutal dread, to fix their cruel throne.
 The wise and good, with indignation fir'd,
 Silent from their unhallow'd board retir'd;
 The base and cunning staid, and, slaves avow'd,
 Submiss to every insult smiling bow'd.
 Yet while they smil'd and bow'd the abject head,
 In chains unscelt their tyrant lords they led;
 Their avarice, watching as a bird of prey,
 O'er every weakness, o'er each vice held sway;
 Till secret art assum'd the thwarting face,
 And dictate bold; and ruin and disgrace
 Clos'd the unworthy scene. Now trampled low
 Beneath the injur'd native, and the foe
 From Belgia lur'd by India's costly prey,
 Thy glorious structure, Gama, prostrate lay,
 And lies in desolated awful gloom;
 Dread and instructive as a ruin'd tomb.

Nor less on Tago's than on India's coast
 Was ancient Lusitan virtue stain'd and lost:
 On Tago's banks, heroic ardour's foes,
 A soft, luxurious, tinsel'd race, arose;

* Before the total desension of the Portuguese in Asia; and while they were subject to Spain, the principal people, says the historian Faria, who were mostly a mixed race born in India, lost all affection for the mother country, nor had any regard for any of the provinces where they were only the sons of strangers: and present emolument became their sole object.

Of lofty boastful look and pompous show,
 Triumphant tyrants o'er the weak and low:
 Yet wildly starting from the gaming board
 At every distant brandish of the sword;
 Already conquer'd by uncertain dread,
 Imploping peace with feeble hands outspread;—
 Such peace as trembling suppliants still obtain,
 Such peace they found beneath the yoke of Spain;
 And the wide empires of the east no more
 Pour'd their redundant horns on Lisboa's shore.

Alas, my friend, how vain the fairest boast
 Of human pride! how soon is empire lost!
 The pile by ages rear'd to awe the world,
 By one degenerate race to ruin hurl'd!
 And shall the Briton view that downward race
 With eye unmov'd, and no sad likeness trace!
 Ah Heaven! in every scene, by memory brought,
 My fading country rushes on my thought.
 From Lisboa now the frequent vesper bell
 Vibrates o'er Tago's stream with solemn knell.
 Turn'd by the call my pensive eye surveys
 That mighty scene of hill'ry's shame and praise.
 Methinks I hear the yells of horror rise
 From slaughter'd thousands shrieking * to the skies,
 As factious rage or blinded zeal of yore [gore,
 Roll'd their dire chariot wheels though streams of
 Now throbs of other glow my soul employ;
 I hear the triumph of a nation's joy †,
 From bondage rescu'd and the foreign sword,
 And independence and the throne restor'd!

Hark, what low found from Cintra rock! the air

Trembles with horror; fainting lightning's glare;
 Shril crow the cock, the dogs give dismal yell;
 And with the whirlwind's roar full comes the swell;

Convulsive staggers rock th' eternal ground,
 And heave the Tagus from his bed profound;
 A dark red cloud the towers of Lisboa veils;
 Ah Heaven, what dreadful groan! the rising gales
 Bright light; and Lisboa smoaking in the dust
 Lies fall'n.—The wide-spread ruins, still august,
 Still show the footsteps where the dreadful God
 Of earthquake, cloth'd in howling darkness, trod;

* Besides the total slaughter of the Moors at the taking of Lisbon, other massacres have bathed the streets of that city in blood. King Fernando, surnamed the Careless, was driven from Lisbon by a bloody insurrection, headed by one Velasquez a taylor. Some time after, on the death of Fernando, Adrya, the Queen's favourite, was stabbed in her presence, the Bishop of Lisbon was thrown from the tower of his own cathedral, and the massacre of all the Queen's adherents became general; and many were murdered under that pretence, by those who had an enmity against them. In 1505, between two and three thousand Jews were massacred in Lisbon in the space of three days, and many Christians were also murdered by their private enemies under a similar pretence that they were of the Hebrew race. Thousands flocked in from the country to assist in their destruction, and the crews of some French and Dutch ships then in the river, says Osorius, were particularly active in murdering and plundering.

† When the Spanish vote was thrown off, and the Duke of Braganza ascended the throne under the title of John IV. This is one of the most remarkable events in history, and does the Portuguese nation infinite honour.

Where mid foul weeds the heaps of marble tell
 From what proud height the spacious temples fell;
 And penury and sloth of squalid mien
 Beneath the roofless palace walls * are seen
 In savage hovels, where the tap'fried floor
 Was trod by nobles and by kings before;
 How like, alas, her Indian empire's state!
 How like the city's and the nation's fate!
 Yet time points forward to a brighter day;
 Points to the domes that stretch their fair array
 Through the brown ruins, lifting to the sky
 A loftier brow and mien of promise high;
 Points to the river-shore where wide and grand
 The courts of commerce and her walks expand,
 As an imperial palace † to retain
 The universal queen, and fix her reign;
 Where pleas'd she hears the groaning oar resound;
 By magazines and arsenals mounded round.
 Whose yet unfinish'd grandeur proudly boasts
 The fairest hope of either India's coasts,
 And bids the muse's eye in vision roam
 Through mighty scenes in ages long to come.

Forgive, fair Thames, the song of truth that pays

To Tago's emprefs-stream superior praise;
 O'er every vauntful river be it thine
 To boast the guardian shield of laws divine;
 But yield to Tagus all the sovereign state
 By nature's gift bestow'd and partial fate,
 The sea-like port and central sway to pour
 Her fleets, by happiest course, on every shore.

When from the sleep of ages dark and dead,
 Thy genius, commerce, rear'd her infant head,
 Her cradle bland on Tago's lap she chose.
 And soon to wandering childhood sprightly rose;
 And when to green and youthful vigour grown
 On Tago's breast she fix'd her central throne;
 Far from the hurricane's resistless sweep
 That tears with thundering rage the Carib deep;
 Far from the foul-wing'd winter that deforms
 And rolls the northern main with storms on storms;
 Beneath salubrious skies, to summer gales
 She gives the ventrous and returning sails:
 The smiling isles, nam'd Fortunate of old,
 First on her ocean's bosom fair unfold;
 Thy world, Columbus, spreads its various breast,
 Proud to be first by Lisboa's waves caress'd;
 And Afric woos and leads her easy way
 To the fair regions of the rising day.
 If Turkey's drugs invite or silken pride,
 Thy straits, Alcides, give the ready tide;
 And turn the prow, and soon each shore expands
 From Gallia's coast to Europe's northern lands.

* This description is literally just. Whole families, of all ages, are every where seen among the ruins, the only covering of their habitations being ragged fragments of sail cloth; and their common bed dirty straw. The magnificent and extensive ruins of the palace of Braganza contain several hundreds of these idle people, much more wretched in their appearance than the gypsies of England.

† The Praça de commercio, or forum of Commerce, is one of the largest and most magnificent squares in Europe. Three sides consist of the Exchange and the public offices; the fourth is formed by the Tagus, which is here edged by an extensive and noble quay, built of coarse marble.

When Heaven decreed low to dust to bring
 That lofty oak *, Assyria's boastful king.
 Deep, said the angel voice, the roots secure
 With bands of brafs, and let the life endure,
 For yet his head shall rise.—And deep remain
 The living roots of Lisboa's ancient reign;
 Deep in the castl'd isles on Asia's strand,
 And firm in fair Brazilia's wealthy land.
 And say, while ages roll their length'ning train,
 Shall nature's gifts to Tagus still prove vain,
 An idle waste!—A dawn of brightest ray
 Has boldly promis'd the returning day
 Of Lisboa's honours, fairer than her prime
 Lost by a rude unletter'd age's crime—
 Now heaven-taught science and her liberal band
 Of arts, and dictates by experience plann'd,
 Beneath the smiles of a benignant queen
 Boast the fair opening of a reign † serene,
 Of omen high.—And Camoens's ghost no more
 Wails the neglect'd muse on Tago's shore;
 No more his tears the barbarous age ‡ upbraid
 His griefs and wrongs all sooth'd, his happy shade
 Beheld th' Ulysses § of his age return
 To Tago's banks; and earnest to adorn
 The hero's brows, he waves the Elysian crown,
 What time the letter'd chiefs of old renown,
 And patriot heroes, in the Elysian bowers
 Shall hail Braganza of the fair-st flowers
 Of Helicon, entwinn'd with laurel leaves
 From Maxen field, the deathless wreath he waves;

† Alludes to the establishment of the Royal Academy of Lisbon in July 1780, under the presidency of the most illustrious Prince Don John of Braganza, Duke of Lafcoens, &c. &c. &c. The author was present at the ceremony of its commencement, and had the honour to be admitted a member.

‡ Camoens the first poet of Portugal, published his Lusiad at a time of the deepest declension of public virtue, when the Portuguese empire in India was falling into rapid decay, when literature was totally neglected, and all was luxury and imbecility at home. At the end of Books V. and VII. of his Lusiad, he severely upbraids the nobility for their barbarous ignorance. He died neglected in a workhouse, a few months before his country fell under the yoke of Philip II. of Spain, whose policy in Portugal was of the same kind with that which he exercised in the Netherlands, endeavouring to secure submission by severity, with the view of reducing them beneath the possibility of a successful revolt.

§ This title is given by the Portuguese historians to Don John, one of the younger sons of John I. of Portugal, who had visited every court of Europe. The same title is no less due to the present illustrious descendant of his family, the Duke of Lafcoens. His Grace, who has within these few years returned to his native country, was about twenty-two years absent from it. During the late war, he was a volunteer in the army of the Empress Queen, in which he served as lieutenant-general, and particularly distinguished himself at the battle of Maxen, where the Prussians were defeated. After the peace, he not only visited every court of Europe, most of whose languages he speaks fluently, but also travelled to Turkey and Egypt, and even to Lapland. His Grace is no less distinguished by his taste for the Belles Lettres, than for his extensive knowledge of history and science.

Anxious alone, nor be his vows in vain!
That long his toil unfinish'd may remain!

The view how grateful to the liberal mind,
Whose glow of heart embraces human kind,
To see a nation rise! But ah my friend,
How dire the pangs to mark our own descent!
With ample powers from ruin still to save,
Yet as a vessel on the furious wave, [toft,
Through sunken rocks and rav'nous whirlpools
Each power to save in counter-action lost,
Where, while combining storms the decks o'erwhelm,

Timidity flow falters at the helm,
The crew, in mutiny, from every mast
Tearing its strength, and yielding to the blast;
By factions stern and gloomy lust of change,
And selfish rage inspir'd and dark revenge—
Nor ween, my friend, that favouring fate forebodes

That Albion's state, the toil of demigods,
From ancient manners pure, through ages long,
And from unnumber'd friendly aspects sprung;
When poison'd at the heart its soul expires,
Shall e'er again resume its generous fires:
No future day may such fair frame restore;
When Albion falls, she falls to rise no more.

STANZAS.

ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG LADY STUDIOUS OF BOTANY.

SAY, gentle lady of the bower,
For thou, though young, art wise,
And known to thee is every flower
Beneath our milder skies:

Say, which the plant of modest dye,
And lovely mien combin'd,
That fittest to the pensive eye
Displays the virtuous mind.

I fought the groves where innocence
Methought might long reside;
But April's blossom's banish'd thence,
Gave summer, Flora's pride.

I fought the garden's boasted haunt,
But on the gay partere
Carnations glow, and tulips faint,
No humble flow'ret there.

The flower you seek, the nymph replies,
Has bow'd the languid head;
For on its bloom the blazing skies
Their sultry rage have shed.

'Tis now the downward withering day,
Of winter's dull presage,
That seeks not where the dog-stars ray,
Has shed his fiercest rage.

Yet search yon shade, obscure forlorn
Where rude the bramble grows;
There, shaded by the humble thorn,
The lingering primrose blows.

SACRED TO THE HEIRS OF — CASTLE.

Oh thou whose hopes these fair domains inspire,
The awful lesson here bestow'd attend,

With pensive eye here let thy steps retire,
What time rapt fancy's shadowy forms descend.
Hark! from yon hall as headlong waste purveys,
What Bacchanalian revels loud resound,
With festive fires the midnight windows blaze,
And fever'd tumult reels his giddy round.

'Tis past—the mansion owns another lord,
The ousted heir so riotous ere while,
Now sits a suppliant at his wonted board,
Insulted by the base-born menial's smile.

By the base menials taunted from the door,
With anguish'd heart resistless of his woe,
Forlorn he strays those lawns, his own no more,
Unknowing where, on trembling knees and flow.

'Till here beneath an aged elm's bleak shade,
Fainting he sinks—Ah! let thy mind desecry,
On the cold turf how low his humbled head,
On yon fair dome how fix'd his ghastly eye.

By his mad revels, by his last heart-sigh,
Oh thou of these proud towers the promis'd heir,
By every manly virtue's holy tie,
By honour's fairest bloom, Oh fortune's child, beware!

FRAGMENT.

TELL me gentle echo, tell,
Where and how my lover fell?
On the cold grass did he lie,
Crown'd with laurels did he die?
Echo twice gave swift reply, [die.
Crown'd with laurels, crown'd with laurels, he did
His snow-white breast was stain'd with gore,
A cruel sword his bosom tore.

Say with his parting vital flame,
Did he sigh Ophelia's name,
Was he constant still the same?
Echo sigh'd Ophelia's name.
When in honour's bed he lay,
And breath'd his gallant soul away,
Ye gentler spirits of the air,
Why was not Ophelia there?
Echo answer'd her despair,
Why was not Ophelia there?

While the full moon's paly ray
Sleeping on the hill side lay,
Thus to echo, through the glade,
The lovely maniac talk'd and stray'd;
Straight on fancy's wild wings borne,
By the glimpse of opening morn,
She saw—or thought she saw, her love
Lie bleeding * * * * *

FRAGMENT.

COME gentle peace on every breathing gale,
O come and guard the slumbers of the vale,
Awake gay mirth and glee, with playful wile,
Wake with the morn, and o'er the landscape
smile.

ON THE DEATH OF THE PRINCESS DOWAGER OF WALES.

ASPERS'D by malice and unmanly rage,
Disgraceful stamp to this flagitious age,

In conscious innocence secur'd from blame,
 She sigh'd—but only sigh'd o'er Britain's shame;
 She saw her children through their early tomb,
 Disease, slow-wasting, fade her Glosters' bloom;
 She saw—but death appear'd a friendly guest,
 His arrow pointing to the realms of rest!
 Calmly she views him, dauntless and resign'd,
 Yet drops one tear for those she leaves behind.
 Warm from the heart these honest numbers flow,
 Which honour, truth, and gratitude, bestow.

EPITAPH ON MR. MORTIMER.

O'er Angelo's proud tomb no tear was shed;
 Pleas'd was each muse, for full his honours spread;
 To bear his genius to its utmost shore,
 The length of human days could give no more.

Oh Mortimer, o'er thy untimely urn
 The arts and all the gentle muses mourn;
 And shades of English heroes gliding by,
 Heave o'er thy shrine the languid hopeless sigh!
 Thine all the breathing rage of bold design,
 And all the poetry of painting thine;
 Oh, long had thy meridian sun to blaze!
 And onward hov'ring in its magic rays,
 What visions rose!—Fair England's patriots old,
 Monarchs of proudest fame, and barons bold,
 In the fir'd moments of their bravest strife,
 Bursting beneath thy hand again to life!
 So shone thy noon—when one dim void profound,
 Rush'd on, and shapeless darkness clos'd around.
 Alas! while ghosts of heroes round thy tomb,
 Robb'd of their hope, bewail the artist's doom;
 Thy friend, Oh Mortimer, in grief sincere,
 Pours o'er the man sad memory's silent tear;
 And in the fond remembrance of thy heart,
 Forgets the honours of thy wond'rous art.

TO THE

MEMORY OF COM. GEO. JOHNSTONE.

THROUGH life's tempestuous sea to thee 'twas given
 Thy course to steer, yet still preserv'd by Heaven;
 As childhood clos'd, thy ceaseless toils began,
 And toils and dangers ripen'd thee to man:
 Thy country's cause thy ardent youth inspir'd,
 Thy ripen'd years thy country's dangers fir'd;
 All life to trace the councils of the foe,
 All zealous life to ward the lifted blow*.

When dubious peace, in gilded clouds array'd,
 Fair o'er Britannia threw her painted shade,
 Thy active mind illiberal ease disdain'd;
 Forth burst the senator unaw'd, unshain'd!
 By private aim unwrapt as generous youth,
 Thy ear still listening to the voice of truth,

* The Commodore was remarkably happy in procuring intelligence. He sent the first notice of the Spanish declaration of war in 1761 to Admiral Rodney, then commanding in the West Indies; in consequence of which the Havannah was taken. He sent also the first account of the sailing and destination for the West Indies of the Grand Spanish Fleet in 1760 to Admiral Rodney, then also commander on that station. Both messages were carried from Lisbon by the same person, Capt. M^r. Laurin. In consequence of this intelligence, many of the Spanish transports were taken, and the operations of the combined force of France and Spain in the West Indies retarded for that season.

That sacred power thy bursting warmth controul'd,
 And bade thee at her side be only hold.
 Nor toils of state alone thy cares employ'd;
 The muses in thy sunshine glow'd and joy'd.

When filial strife unheath'd the ruthless brand,
 And discord rioted on Salem's strand,
 Thy hands to Salem's strand the olive bore*;
 Alas, denied!—and liberal peace no more
 Smil'd on the crest of hope; thy country's weal
 Again to action wak'd thy patriot zeal;
 Old Tagus saw the British red cross stream
 O'er Gallia's lilies and the tawny gleam
 Of proud Iberia's castles: Belgia mourn'd
 Her broken faith, and Afric's shores return'd †
 Her Lisbon groans for British friendship spurn'd. }
 Again life's tempest beaten ocean roar'd,
 And round thy head the mists of faction pour'd;
 Dark low'd the storm; but heaven's own light
 rose mild,

And rescued honour on thy death-bed smil'd ‡;
 Soft shedding peaceful joy; the blissful sign,
 That Heaven's forgiveness and its balm were thine.

All hail, sooth'd shade! The muse that own'd thy care

Hails thee, and blesses Heaven that heard her pray-
 For ever green the laurel o'er thy tomb
 Shall flourish, ever white its flowery bloom;
 And gratitude, Oh Johnstone, round thy shrine,
 And friendship, heave the sigh, and thy fair wreath entwine.

STANZAS ON MR. GARRICK.

FAIR was the graceful form Prometheus made,
 Its front the image of the god display'd
 All heaven approv'd it e'er Minerva soul'd
 The fire of Jove, and kindled up the soul.

So Shakspeare's page, the flower of poetry,
 Ere Garrick rose had charms for every eye;
 'Twas nature's genuine image wild and grand,
 The strong-mark'd picture of a master's hand.

But when his Garrick, nature's Pallas, came,
 The bard's bold painting burst into a flame:
 Each part new force and vital warmth receiv'd,
 As touch'd by heaven—and all the picture liv'd!

On passing through the Parliament-Close of Edinburgh at Midnight.

So now the doors are shut, the busy hand
 Of industry suspends her toil a while,
 And solemn silence reigns: the men of law
 Throng not the passage to the august court;
 Nor clients, walking o'er the pavement, curse
 Their cause's long delay; the labourer
 Lies wrapt in sleep, his brawny nerves unbrac'd,
 Cath'ring new vigour for to-morrow's toil.
 Now o'er their cups immoderate, the rout

* He was one of the commissioners sent to America in 1778.

† Alluding to the French and Dutch prizes he sent into the Tagus in 1779 and 1780, and to his capture of four Dutch Indiamen in Saldanha Bay in 1781.

‡ Alluding to the sentence against him in the cause of Captain Sutton, being reversed by the House of Lords; the account of which he received about twenty-four hours before his death.

Of Bacchanalians, with impetuous laugh,
 Applaud the witless; but invenom'd jest.
 At yon dim taper, poring on his bonds,
 Or ledger, crooked av'rice keenly fits;
 Or sleepless on his tawdry bed, fums up
 His rents and int'rests. O thrice dire disease!
 Oh doleful madness! Wherefore all this care,
 This sinful care, that from the mind excludes
 All thought of duty toward God or man!
 An heir debauch'd, who wishes nothing more
 Than the old dotard dead, will throw it all
 On whores and dogs away; then, cursing life,
 That nothing gives but scoundrel poverty,
 By his own hand a mangled carcase falls.
 Now smoking with unhallow'd fires, the sons
 Of curs'd Gomorra' stroll along the streets,
 Scenting the prostitutes: perhaps the son
 Of some well-meaning countryman, entic'd
 By lewd companions, midnight orgies holds,
 Kennels with some abominable wretch,
 Contracting foul disease, one day to smart
 His pious parents souls with bitter grief,
 And o'er their rev'rend hoary cheeks to pour
 The sad parental tear.

Behold how grand the lady of the night,
 The silver moon, with majesty divine,
 Emerges from behind yon sable cloud;
 Around her all the spacious heavens glow
 With living fires. In the pale air sublime,
 St. Giles's column rears its ancient head;
 Whose builders many a century ago
 Were moulder'd into dust. Now, O my soul,
 Be fill'd with sacred awe—I tread above
 Our brave forgotten ancestors. Here * lie
 Those who in ancient days the kingdom rul'd,
 The counsellors and favourites of kings,
 High lords and courtly dames, the valiant chiefs,
 Whose manly harness'd breasts, and mighty arms,
 Stood as the brazen bulwarks of the land,
 Mingling their dust with those of lowest rank,
 And basest deeds, and now unknown as they.—
 Hark! 'twas the clock struck One—the solemn found

Yet vibrates in my ear: Such is the life,
 The transient life of man: a while he breathes,
 Then in a little with his mother earth [race
 Lies mix'd, and known no more; even his own
 Forget his name. And if his name remains,
 What is it but an empty, airy sound?
 Cæsar, and Ammon's son, high-founding air,
 Founders of states, their country's favours, lie
 In dark oblivion; others only live
 In fables wild and vague: yea, this same age,
 That saw the wave of Marlborough's sword decide
 The fate of Europe, and her trembling kings,
 Relate his actions past as an old tale,
 Without concern: and soon the days shall come,
 When Prussian peasants shall strange stories tell
 Of Fred'ric and his brothers; such as oft
 The British labourer, by winter's fire,
 Tells to his wond'ring children, of the feats
 Of Arthur and his knights: a few years more
 Shall see great Fred'ric and his glorious bands,
 And all the millions of his raging foes,
 All silent dust, and lodging with the hosts

* This was once a burial-place.

(Down in the dreary mansions of the dead),
 That fought at Cannæ or Thermopylæ,
 And those of later name, that stood beneath
 The banners of Godfredo or Gustave.

Say, ye immortal sons of heav'n, who rule
 This nether world, who, from old Nimrod's days
 Down to the present, have beheld the fate
 Of emperors and kings; say, which the life
 That the immortal shade will like to own?
 Does Cæsar boast of his eternal name,
 How, wading through the blood of millions, he Enslav'd his country? No, he droops his head,
 And imprecates oblivion to o'er shade
 The horrid tale. Not so poor Socrates
 With everlasting smiles he humbly owns
 The life that was a blessing to mankind.
 The heroes, whose unconquerable souls
 Would from their country's int'rest never flinch,
 Look down with sweet complacence on th' realms
 Their valour sav'd. O Wallace, wond'rous chief!
 Who durst alone thy country's rights assert,
 Betray'd and sworn away by all but thee;
 And thou, great Bruce, who many a doleful day,
 For thy enslav'd and groaning country's sake,
 Stray'd o'er the solitary hills of Lorn;
 With what ecstatic raptures do you see
 A nation to this day blest'd by your arms!
 Such shall thy happiness, O Fred'ric! be,
 Thou glorious pattern of a perfect king;
 And such the recompensing heaven of those,
 The happy few, in blest'd obscurity
 Who pass their days; whom Gabriel pointing out,
 When in his silent rounds, unto his mates
 Will say, "There is the man, who at all times
 "Acts as becometh an immortal spirit."
 Such is the life that's worthy of a man,
 And such the life that God himself applauds.

ON THE NEGLECT OF POETRY.

A FRAGMENT, IN THE MANNER OF SPENSER.

(From the Introduction to the English Lullaby.)*

HENCE, vagrant minstrel, from my thriving farm,
 Far hence, nor ween to shed thy poison here:
 My hinds despise thy lyre's ignoble charm;
 Seek in the floggard's bowers thy ill-earn'd cheer:
 There, while thy idle chaunting sooths thine ear,
 The noxious thistle choaks their sickly corn;
 Their apple boughs, ungraff'd, four wildings bear,
 And o'er the ill-fenced dales with fleeces torn,
 Unguarded from the fox, their lambkins stray forlorn.

Such ruin withers the neglected soil,
 When to the song the ill-star'd swain attends.
 And well thy meed repays thy worthless toil;
 Upon thy houseless head pale want descends

* A work which claims poetical merit, while its reputation is unestablished, is beheld, by the great majority, with a cold and a jealous eye. The present age, indeed, is happily auspicious to science and the arts; but poetry is neither the general taste, nor the fashionable favourite of these times. Often, in the dissipated hour, have these views obtruded upon the translator. While he has left his author upon the table, and wandered in the fields, these views have clothed themselves almost imperceptibly in the stanza and allegory of Spenser.

In bitter shower : and taunting scorn still rends,
And wakes thee trembling from thy golden dream:
In vetchy bed, or loathly dungeon ends
Thy idled life—What fitter may beseech,
Who poisons thus the fount, should drink the poison'd stream.

And is it thus, the heart-stung minstrel cry'd,
While indignation shook his silver'd head;
And is it thus, the gross-fed lordling's pride,
And hind's base tongue the gentle bard upbraid!
And must the holy song be thus repaid
By sun-bask'd ignorance, and chorlish scorn!
While liffles drooping in the languid shade
Of cold neglect, the sacred bard must mourn,
Though in his hallowed breast heaven's purest ar-dours burn!

Yet how sublime, O bard, the dread behest,
The awful trust to thee by Heaven assign'd!
'Tis thine to humanise the savage breast,
And form in virtue's mould the youthful mind;
Where lurks the latent spark of generous kind,
'Tis thine to bid the dormant ember blaze:
Heroic rage with gentlest worth combin'd;
Wide through the land thy forming power displays.

So spread the olive boughs beneath Dan Phœbus

When Heaven decreed to soothe the feuds that tore

The wolf-eyed barons, whose unletter'd rage
Spurn'd the fair muse; Heaven bade on Avon's shore
A Shakspeare rise, and sooth the barbarous age:
A Shakspeare rose; the barbarous heats aswage—
At distance due how many bards attend!
Enlarged and liberal from the narrow cage
Of blinded zeal, new manners wide extend,
And o'er the generous breast the dews of heaven descend.

And fits it you, ye sons of hallowed power,
To hear, unmov'd, the tongue of scorn upbraid
The muse, neglected in her wintery bower;
While proudly flourishing in princely shade
Her younger sisters lift the laurel'd head.—
And shall the pencil's boldest mimic rage,
Or softest charms, foredoom'd in time to fade,
Shall these be vaunted o'er th' immortal page,
Where passion's living fires burn unimpair'd by age!

And shall the warbled strain, or sweetest lyre,
Thrilling the palace roof at night's deep hour;
And shall the nightingales in woodland choir
The voice of heaven in sweeter raptures pour!
Ah no! their song is transient as the flower
Of April morn: In vain the shepherd boy
Sits listening in the silent autumn bower;
The year no more restores the short lived joy;
And never more his harp shall Orpheus' hands employ.

Eternal silence in her cold deaf ear
Has clos'd his strain; and deep eternal night
Has o'er Apelles' tints, so bright while ere,
Drawn her blank curtains—never to the fight
More to be given—But cloth'd in heaven's own
light,
Homer's bold painting shall immortal shine;
Wide o'er the world shall ever sound the might,
The raptur'd muse of each deathless line. [divine.
For death nor time may touch their living soul

And what the strain, though Perez swell the note,
High though its rapture, to the muse of fire!
Ah! what the tranfient sounds, devoid of thought,
To Shakspeare's flame of ever-burning ire,
Or Milton's flood of mind, till time expire
Foredoom'd to flow; as heaven's dread energy
Unconscious of the bounds of place—

TRANSLATION OF TASSO'S SONNET.

“ Vasco, le cui felici, &c.”

VASCO, whose bold and happy bowsprit bore
Against the rising morn; and, homeward fraught, Whose sails came westward with the day, and brought

The wealth of India to thy native shore;

Ne'er did the Greek such length of seas explore,
The Greek, who sorrow to the Cyclop wrought;
And he who, victor, with the harpies fought,
Never such pomp of naval honours wore.

Great as thou art, and peerless in renown,
Yet thou to Camoens ow'it thy noblest fame;
Farther than thou didst sail, his deathless song
Shall bear the dazzling splendour of thy name;
And under many a sky thy actions crown,
While time and fame together glide along.

AN INSCRIPTION

On an Obelisk at Langford, in Wiltshire, the seat of the Earl of Radnor, commemorating the unfortunate fate of Mr. Servinton, who was formerly in possession of that estate.

WHILE o'er these lawns thine eye delighted strays,
Allow a pause to hear the tale of woe;
Here stood the parent elm in elder days,
Here o'er its lord slow wav'd the wither'd bough.
While pale and cold his famish'd cheek full low,
On the rude turf in death's last swooning lay.

Even now, methinks, his anguish'd look I see,
As by the menials taunted from the door;
Fainting, he wander'd—then beneath the tree
Sunk down—sweet heaven, what pangs his bosom tore.

When o'er yon lordly dome, his own no more
He roll'd his dying eyes—Ah! what compare
To this the lessons taught of fages hoar?
By his mad revels, by the gilded snare,
By all the hopes of joy, Oh! fortune's child beware.

TRANSLATION OF AN EPITHALAMIUM,

Written in Hebrew, by Abraam Depas, on the marriage of Jacob Franco, Esq. to Miss Abigail D' Aguilar, daughter of the late Baron D' Aguilar.

THE voice of joy this happy day demands;
Resound the song, and in our God confide:
Beneath his canopy the bridegroom stands,
In all her beauty shines the lovely bride.
O may their joys still blossom ever new,
Fair as a garden to the ravish'd view!
Rejoice, O youth! and if thy thoughts aspire;
To Heaven's pure blest, the sacred law revere;

The stranger's wants, the needy soul's desire
Supply, and humbly with thy neighbour bear,
So shall thy father's grateful heart rejoice,
And thy fair deeds inspire thy people's voice.

Sing from your bowers ye daughters of the song,
Behold the bride with star-light glory shine!
May each succeeding day still glide along,
Fair as the first, begirt with grace divine:
Far from her tent may care and sorrow fly,
While she o'erjoy'd beholds her numerous progeny.

Ye happy parents, shout with cheerful voice,
See o'er your son the canopy unfolds,
And thou, O hoary reverend sire! rejoice,
May thy glad eyes thy grandson's son behold:
The song of joy, ye youthful kindred raise
And let the people join the living God to praise.

ESKDALE BRAES.

By the banks of the crystal-stream'd Esk,
Where the Wauchope her yellow wave joins*,
Where the lambkins on funny braes bask,
And wild woodbine the shepherd's bower twines.

Maria, disconsolate maid,
Oft sigh'd the still noontide away,
Or, by moonlight all desolate stray'd,
While woeful she tun'd her love-lay.

Ah! no more from the banks of the Ewes,
My shepherd comes cheerly along,
Broomholm †, and the Deansbanks refuse
To echo the plaints of his song.

No more from the echoes of Ewes,
His dog fondly barking I hear,

* The scene is laid on the banks where the two rivers of the Wauchope and Ewes join the Esk: On the banks of the former, was anciently a castle belonging to the Knights Templars, on the ruins of which was built the manse or parsonage house, called the Waas (Walls), at which Mickle's father resided, and where the poet was born.

† The seat of John Maxwell, Esq. author of the celebrated "Essay on Tune;" Deansbanks, so called from the Dean of the Knights Templars.

No more the tir'd lark he pursues,
And tells me his master draws near.

Ah! woe to the wars, and the pride
That my heroes, Oh Esk! could display,
When with laurels they planted thy side,
From France and from Spain borne away.

Oh! why did their honours decoy
My poor shepherd lad from the shore,
Ambition bewitch'd the vain boy,
And oceans between us now roar!

Ah! methinks his pale corse floating by,
I behold on the rude billows tost;
Unburied his scatter'd bones lie,
Lie bleaching on some desert coast!

By this stream, and the May-blossom'd thorn,
That first heard his love-tale and his vows,
My pale ghost shall wander forlorn,
And the willow shall weep o'er my brows.

With the ghosts of the Waas will I wail,
In Watblaw* woods join the sad throng,
To balloo-ee-ns blast tell my tale,
As the spectres, ungrav'd, glide along.

Still the Ewes rolls her paly blue stream,
Old Esk, still his crystal tide pours,
Still golden the Wauchope waves gleam,
And, still green, Oh! Broomholm, are thy bowers!

No—blasted they seem to my view,
The rivers in red floods combine!
The turtles their widow'd notes coo,
And mix their sad ditties with mine.

Discover'd in sorrow's dim shade,
All nature seems with me to mourn—
Strait the village bells merrily play'd,
And announc'd her dear Jamie's return.

The woodlands all May-blown appear,
The silver streams murmur new charms;
As smiling her Jamie drew near,
And, all eager, sprung into her arms.

* The skirts of this very picturesque mountain form a bank for the Esk and the Wauchope, and are covered with a beautiful and romantic wood.

THE LIFE OF JAGO.

RICHARD JAGO was born October 1. 1715. His family was of Cornish extraction; but his father, the Rev. Richard Jago, was Rector of Beaufert, near Henley in Arden, in Warwickshire. He married Margaret, the daughter of William Parker, Gent. of Henley, 1711, by whom he had several children. The poet was his third son.

He received a good classical education under the Rev. Mr. Crumpton, an excellent country school-master at Solihull, near Birmingham in Warwickshire; where he formed an acquaintance with several gentlemen who were his school-fellows; among others with Shenstone. A similarity of taste and of pursuits soon brought on an intimacy between these two poets, which continued without abatement till the death of Shenstone.

“From the acquaintance,” says Mr. Graves, in his “Recollection of some particulars in the Life of Shenstone,” “which I had with Mr. Jago, and some others who were bred under Mr. Crumpton, he seems to have given his pupils a more early taste for the English classics, than was commonly done in grammar schools at that time.”

About 1732, he was removed from the school of Solihull, and entered as a servitor, of University College, Oxford; where he was privately visited by his school-fellow Shenstone, then a commoner of Pembroke College, who introduced him to the acquaintance of his fellow collegians, Anthony Whistler, Esq. of Whitchurch, Oxfordshire, author of the “Shuttle-cock,” and several original poems in “Doddsley’s Collection,” Mr. Robert Binnel, author of some learned notes in Grainger’s “Tibullus,” and Mr. Richard Graves, the present rector of Claverton in Somersetshire, author of “The Spiritual Quixote,” “Euphrosync,” “Columella,” “Peter of Pontefract,” and other ingenious performances.

On the humiliating situation in which he was placed at University College, his friend Mr. Graves makes the following liberal and indignant reflections, in his “Recollection, &c.”

“Mr. Shenstone had one ingenious and much valued friend in Oxford, Mr. Jago, his school-fellow, whom he could only visit in private, as he wore a servitor’s gown; it being then deemed a great disparagement for a commoner to appear in public with one in that situation; which, by the way, would make one wish with Dr. Johnson, that there were no young people admitted in that servile state in a place of liberal education.

“Servitors, or Sizars as they are called in Cambridge, were probably appointed when colleges were first established, and when there was a scarcity of fit persons to supply the learned professions, that a greater number might have the advantage of literary instruction, by the poorer waiting on the more affluent students.

“But what good end can it answer in these times, when every genteel profession is overstocked, to rob our agriculture or our manufactures of so many useful hands, by encouraging every substantial farmer or mechanical tradesman, to breed his son to the church?

“If now and then a very uncommon genius in those walks of life discovers itself, there are seldom wanting gentlemen in the neighbourhood, who are proud of calling forth, and if necessary, of supporting, by a subscription, such extraordinary talents.

“Mr. Jago, however, who was the son of a clergyman in Warwickshire, with a large family, and who could not otherwise have given his son a liberal education, may be thought an instance in favour of this institution.

“But I make no doubt, that a respectable clergyman, as Mr. Jago’s father was, might, by a very slight application to the head, or fellows of almost any college, have procured some scholarship or exhibition, for a youth of genius, and properly qualified; which, with a very small additional expence, might have supported him in the university, without placing him in so humiliating a situation; which in some future period of his life (when, perhaps, his parts might have raised him to some eminence in the world), might put it in the power of any purse-proud fellow collegian, to boast that he had waited on him in the college; though, perhaps, all the obligation he had lain under to such a patron, was the receiving sixpence a week, not as an act of generosity, but as a tribute imposed upon him by the standing rules of the society.”

He took his degree of Master of Arts, July 9. 1738, having taken orders the year before, and served the curacy of Snitterfield, near Stratford upon Avon.

In 1744, he married Dorothea Susanna Fancourt, a daughter of the Rev. Mr. Fancourt, of Kilmcote in Leicestershire.

For several years after his marriage, he resided at Harbury; to which living he was instituted in 1746. At a small distance lay Chesterton, given him about the same time by Lord Willoughby de Broke; the two together amounting to about 100l. a-year.

Before his removal from Harbury, he had the misfortune to lose his amiable companion, who died in 1751, leaving him a numerous family of small children, and from such a loss the most inconsolable widower.

In 1754, Lord Clare, afterwards Earl Nugent, who had a great regard for him, by his interest with Dr. Madox, Bishop of Worcester, procured him the Vicarage of Snitterfield, where he had formerly been curate, worth about 140l. a-year; whither he removed, and where he resided the remainder of his life.

In 1759, he married a second wife, Margaret, the daughter of James Underwood, Esq. of Budgely in Staffordshire.

While he was engaged in the duties of his profession as a country clergyman, which he performed with exemplary diligence, he found leisure to indulge his early propensity to the study of poetry; and carried on a constant correspondence with his friend Shenstone, on the subject of their literary studies and poetical compositions.

It appears from Shenstone's "Letters," published in 1769, that he communicated from time to time to Mr. Jago and Mr. Graves, the detail of his improvements at the Leasowes, an account of the visits he received from people of rank, and the ordinary occurrences of his life. His eleventh "Elegy" is addressed to Jago. He appears also to have lived in intimacy with Somerville, Mr. Hylton, Lady Luxborough, and other friends of Shenstone.

In 1752, his Elegy on the Blackbirds was published by Dr. Hawkesworth in the "Adventurer," and attributed to West. It was afterwards inserted in "Doddsley's Collection," with his name.

When it first appeared with his name in Doddsley's Collection, a manager of the Bath theatre boasted in the circle of his acquaintance, that he was the author of it, and that Jago was a fictitious name which he had adopted from the celebrated tragedy of "Othello."

It is remarkable, that Dr. Johnson, in his "Life of West," should leave this affair still dubious; when it is demonstrable, from the very letters of Shenstone to which he refers, that Jago was the real author.

The case seems to have been thus: As Shenstone was fond of communicating any poetical productions of his friends, which he thought would do them credit, he probably gave a copy of Jago's elegy to the Lyttleton family at Hagley, where West frequently visited. And as West thought it worthy to appear in the "Adventurer," he might send it to Dr. Hawkesworth without mentioning Jago's name, which was then very little known in the world. So that Dr. Hawkesworth might well imagine that West himself was the author of it, as Dr. Johnson has hinted.

However this may be, there is a living evidence, Mr. Hylton, the editor of his poems, who is able and ready to support indisputably, Jago's claim to this beautiful elegy, as well as to the others of the Swallows and Goldfinches.

In 1767, he published his Edge-Hill, or the rural prospect delineated and moralized, a poem, in four books, 4to, which completely established his poetical reputation.

In 1768, he published his Labour and Genius, or the Mill-Stream and the Cascade, a Fable, written in the year 1762, and inscribed to the late William Shenstone, Esq., 4to. It consists chiefly of encomiums on the genius and taste of Shenstone.

In 1771, he was presented by Lord Willoughby de Broke, to the living of Kilmcote, before mentioned, with near 300l. a-year, and resigned the vicarage of Harbury.

During the latter part of his life, as the infirmities of age came upon him, he seldom went far from home. He amused himself at his leisure, in improving his vicarage-house, and ornamenting his grounds, which were agreeably situated, and had many natural beauties.

After a short illness, he died on the 8th of May 1781, in the 66th year of his age; and was buried according to his desire, in a vault which he had made for his family in the church at Snitterfield.

He had children only by his first wife; three sons, who died before him, and four daughters, three of whom were living in 1784.

His poem of Edge-Hill, Labour and Genius, Elegies, &c. was reprinted, as they were corrected, improved, and enlarged by him, a short time before his death, with Adam, or the Fatal Disobedience, an Oratorio, compiled from the Paradise Lost of Milton, and adapted to music; and some additional pieces, never before printed, in one volume 8vo., under the title of Poems, Moral and Descriptive, by the late Richard Jago, M. A. with a preface, containing an account of his life and character, by his friend Mr. Hylton; which has been chiefly followed in this account. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1784, for the first time received into a collection of classical English poetry. The Oratorio is omitted in this edition; because it is merely a compilation from the "Paradise Lost," in the language of Milton, adapted to representation. An Oratorio, on a similar plan, intitled, "Paradise Lost," was presented to the world, by the amiable and ingenious naturalist and poet Mr. Stillingfleet, in 1760.

The character of Jago appears to have been truly amiable and respectable. To his learning, taste, and good sense, Sherstone, Graves, &c. bear ample testimony. His moral and intellectual character has been so accurately delineated by the friendly pencil of Mr. Hylton, as to render the after-strokes of a casual hand unnecessary:

"Mr. Jago in his person," says Mr. Hylton; who knew him well, "was about the middle stature. In his manner, like most people of sensibility, he appeared reserved amongst strangers; amongst his friends he was free and easy, and his conversation sprightly and entertaining. In domestic life, he was the affectionate husband, the tender parent, the kind master, the hospitable neighbour, and sincere friend, and both by his doctrine and example, a faithful and worthy minister of the parish over which he presided."

"To do justice to Mr. Jago's character as a poet, would require the pen of a more able writer. It may safely be asserted, however, on the authority of the public approbation which they have already met with, that the pieces on which we rest his poetical fame, viz. his poem of Edge-Hill, his fable of Labour and Genius, and his Elegies on the Blackbirds, &c. are all excellent in their kind."

"The poem of Edge-Hill, though the subject is local and chiefly descriptive, yet he has contrived to make it generally interesting, by his historical narrations and digressive episodes; and by his philosophical disquisitions or moral reflections; particularly the philosophical account of the Origin of Mountains, which is equally curious and poetical. His description of the Earl of Leicester's Entertainment of Queen Elizabeth, at Kenelworth Castle, which is truly characteristic of that pedantic age; as the moral reflections on the ruins and departed grandeur of that superb structure, is in the best manner of Young, in his "Night Thoughts." The story of the youth restored to sight, from the "Tatler," is told with so many natural and affecting circumstances, as makes Mr. Jago's poetical much superior to Sir Richard Steele's prose narration. The historical account of the important battle of Kineton or Edge-Hill, contains some curious facts not generally known, as well as very suitable reflections, religious and moral, on the fatal effects of civil discord.

"The fable of Labour and Genius, the subject of which was suggested by Mr. Shenstone, is told with some humour, and great clearness and precision, with a very useful moral forcibly inculcated.

"In the beautiful elegy on the Blackbirds, as well as in the others of the Swallows and Goldfinches, Mr. Jago's original genius appears, and as Thomson says, he has touch'd a theme

Unknown to fame, the passion of the groves.

"Among the additional pieces, which now make their first appearance, the Roundelay for the Stratford Jubilee, in particular, is beautifully expressive and characteristic of Shakspeare's versatile genius and multifarious excellence."

These observations might be still augmented, by a more minute examination and developement of the beauties in his Edge-Hill and Elegies, which, if he had written nothing else, are sufficient to entitle him to a classical distinction among the poets of our country.

As a descriptive poet, he evinces a picturesque imagination, a correct judgment, and a delicate taste, refined by a careful perusal of the ancient classics. His Edge-Hill ranks with the "Cooper's Hill" of Denham, the "Grongar Hill" of Dyer, and similar compositions of other writers, who have proved their powers in loco-descriptive poetry. It is written in blank verse, and exhibits a specimen of great strength and harmony in that metre. The diction is elegant and poetical. He discovers no want of ease or fancy; and shows a goodness of disposition in every part of his work.

"The title is Edge-Hill," he informs us, in his introduction, "a place taken notice of by all the topographical writers who have had occasion to mention it; for its extensive and agreeable prospect, and farther, unhappily distinguished by being the scene of the first battle between the forces of King

Charles and those of the Parliament, under the command of the Earl of Essex, in the year 1642. These two circumstances of natural beauty and historical importance, coinciding with the affection of the writer for his native country, lying at the foot of this celebrated mountain, presented to his mind a theme for poetical imagery too pleasing to be resisted by him. His business, therefore, was first to select a stock of materials fit for his purpose, and then to arrange them in the best manner he could. Both these points he endeavoured to effect, not only by consulting his eye, but also by considering the character, natural history, and other circumstances of such places as were most likely to afford matter for ornament or instruction of this kind; forming from the whole, by an imaginary line, a number of distant scenes, placed in the most advantageous light, and corresponding with the different times of the day, each exhibiting an entire picture, and containing its due proportion of objects and colouring.

“ In the execution of this design, he endeavoured to make it as extensively interesting as he could, by the frequent introduction of general sentiments, and moral reflections; and to enliven the descriptive part by digressions and episodes belonging to, or deducible from the subject; divesting himself as much as possible of all partiality in matters of a public concernment; in private ones, following with more freedom, the sentiments and dictates of his own mind.”

That poetry which is employed in rural description, lies under many disadvantages. Though there is a variety, there is likewise an uniformity in the works of nature, which renders it difficult to embellish such subjects that have not been exhibited by former writers. Hence it arises, that he who has perused one descriptive poem of this kind, is often struck with a seeming repetition of ideas; and more sensibly so, where the places described have no previous seat in his own imagination. The poet who describes, or the reader who peruses descriptions of scenes familiar to him, will easily find the distinct images awakened by general terms; but he who is to impress a local picture in his fancy, merely from the combination of words, will find little novelty in these reiterated descriptions of country prospects. The poem of Edge-Hill is local; and though it is embellished with strong painting, apt allusions, historical incidents, and moral reflections, yet its descriptions are not always adapted exclusively to the place it professes to celebrate. Like the descriptions of Thomson, they do not always apply to any particular spot, or raise any ideas of locality, but more frequently please, by exhibiting the general views and effects of nature. The different times of the day, Morning, Noon, Afternoon, and Night, produce an agreeable diversity of description. Pathetic reflections, and moral instructions, are often happily introduced, in places where one expects only painting and amusement. Through the whole poem, the descriptions of places, and images raised by the poet, are still tending to some hint, or leading to some reflection upon moral life or political institution, that have a relation to the object. But the moralizing of his rural paintings, is sometimes attended with quaintness, and a forced manner. Nor is it difficult to investigate the cause: All moral truths are of an abstracted nature; and when we attempt to illustrate them by objects of the senses, the transition from the natural simplicity of the latter, to the refinement of the former, is incompatible with that ease which we expect to find in poetical descriptions, and interrupts that attention which we are always inclined to afford. The digressions and episodes arise naturally from the subject, and enliven the description; but the episode of the blind youth in the third book, is perhaps too long. Where episodes are introduced, in works of this kind, they should be related in no very tedious or circumstantial manner; because we are not willing to be long detained from the principal subject. The famous story of the Lady Godiva of Coventry, will be read with pleasure. The rules he lays down for the situation and construction of a rural seat, are worthy of the genius and taste of Shenstone. They show him to have been a man of true taste and good observation.

Of his Elegies on the Blackbirds, Goldfinches, and Swallows, the extensive popularity is the best eulogium. They are characterized by an amiable humanity, and tender simplicity of thought and expression, which justly entitle him to the exclusive distinction of the “poet of the birds.” They have received the highest applause from Dr. Aikin, in his ingenious and entertaining “Essay on the application of Natural History to poetry.” Græme, Mr. Pratt, and other poets, have successfully employed similar circumstances of fictitious distress in their compositions; but the praise of invention, and the palm of merit, in this species of elegy, belong to Jago. Respecting his fable of Labour and Genius, the present writer is happy to coincide with the judgment of Mr. Hylton.

His Eclogues and smaller pieces, have considerable merit; but they require no distinct examination, or particular criticism.

THE WORKS OF JAGO.

HINTS FOR A PREFACE

FOR

ANY AUTHOR, AND FOR ANY BOOK.

THE following sheets were fairly transcribed, the title page was adjusted, and every thing, as the writer thought, in readiness for the press, when, upon casting his eyes over them for the last time, with more than usual attention, something seemed wanting, which, after a short pause, he perceived to be the preface. Now, it is fit the reader should know, as an apology for this seeming inattention, that he had formerly rejected this article under a notion of its being superfluous, and uninteresting to the reader; but now when matters were come to a crisis, and it was almost too late, he changed his mind, and thought a preface as essential to the figure of a book, as a portico is to that of a building.

Not that the author would insinuate by this comparison, that his paper edifice was entitled to any thing superb and pompous of this sort; but only that it wanted something plain and decent, between the beggarly style of Quarles, or Ogilby, and the magnificence of the profuse Dryden. Far be it from him, by calling this small appendage to his work by the name of a portico, or an antichamber, or a vestibule, or the like, to raise the reader's expectations, or to encourage any ideas but those of the most simple kind, as introductory to his subsequent entertainment: neither would he, like some undertakers in literary architecture, bestow as much expence on the entrance, as, prudently managed, might furnish the lofty town apartments, or pastoral villa of a modern poet. On the contrary, he reserves all his finery of carving and gilding, as well as his pictures, and cabinets for their proper places within.

But for the further illustration of his meaning, he chooses to have recourse to allusions more nearly related to his subject, such as the prelude to a song, or the prologue to a play, there being evidently a great affinity between rhiming and fiddling, writing verses, and playing the fool.

Another consideration which greatly influenced the author in this point, was, the respect which he bears to the public. For, conceiving himself now in the very act of making his appearance before every circle of the polite, and learned world, he was struck with awe, and felt as if he had been guilty of some indecorum, like a person abruptly breaking into good company with his hat on, or without making a bow. For though, by his situation in life, he is happily relieved from any personal embarrassment of this kind, yet he considers his book as his proxy, and he would by no means have his proxy guilty of such an impropriety as to keep his hat on before all the learned men of Europe, or to omit making his bow upon being admitted to an audience, or presented in the drawing-room.

Great is the force of this little article of gesticulation, from the lowest class of orators in the street, to those in the highest departments in life; inasmuch that it has been thought a prudent, attentive, and skilful manager, either on the stage, or at the bar, as well as the bowing Dean in his walk, may acquire as much success, amongst polite and well-bred people, and particularly the ladies, who are the best judges, by the magic of his bow, as by any other part of his action, or oratory.

Yet, notwithstanding all that the author has said concerning this external mark of reverence, he is sensible that there is a set of cynical philosophers, who are so far from paying it due regard, that they count it no better than a refined species of idolatry, and an abomination utterly unbecoming so noble and erect a creature as man. Upon these gentlemen it is not to be expected that the best bow which the author, or his book could make, would have any effect; and therefore he shall decline that ceremony with them, to take them by the hand in a friendly manner, hoping that they will make some allowance for his having been taught against his own consent to dance, and scribble from his infancy.

He is aware, likewise, that there is another sect of philosophers, whom his ingenious friend Mr. Graves, author of the Spiritual Quixotte, distinguishes by the name of censorious Christians, "who," as he expresses it, "will not suffer a man to nod in his elbow-chair, or to talk nonsense without contradicting or ridiculing him"—But as the writer of this admirable work has shown himself so able, and successful a casuist in a similar instance of a petulant, and over-officious zeal, he hopes these gentlemen will, in imitation of Mr. Wildgoose, for the future refrain from a practice so injurious to their neighbours repose, and so contrary to all the laws of civility and good manners.

It is true, some of these literati may be considered under a more formidable character, from their custom of holding a monthly meeting, or office for arraigning the conduct of all whom they suspect of maintaining heretical opinions contrary to their jurisdiction. In this view, these good fathers scruple not to put an author upon the rack for the slightest offence, and not content with their claims of inspiration and infallibility, will torture his own words to prove his guilt. In the execution of this office, they judge all men by their own standard, and like the tyrant Procrustes, regardless of the acute pain they inflict at every stroke, will lop off a foot, or any other portion of an author's matter, or lengthen it out, as best suits their purpose, to bring him to their measure.

But, to the inexpressible comfort of himself, and of every free-born English writer, the author reflects that the competence of such a court cannot be admitted in a Protestant country; and to speak the truth, from experience, its power, as exercised amongst us, though still very tremendous, is tempered with a gentleness and moderation unknown to those of Spain and Portugal.

But though the author is not without hopes, by his complaisance, and condescension, to conciliate the affections of all those various sects of the learned in every part of the world, yet his principal dependance is upon the gentle and humane, whose minds are always open to the feelings of others, as well as to the gratification of their own refined taste and sentiments; and to these he makes his appeal, which he hopes they will accept as a tribute due to their superior merit, and a testimony of the profound respect, with which he is their

Most obedient,

P R E F A C E.

THE following poem takes its name from a ridge of hills, which is the boundary between the counties of Oxford and Warwick, and remarkable for its beautiful and extensive prospect, of which the latter forms a considerable part. This circumstance afforded the writer an opportunity, very agreeable to him, of paying a tribute to his native country, by exhibiting its beauties to the public in a poetical delineation; divided, by an imaginary line, into a number of distinct scenes, corresponding with the different times of the day, each forming an entire picture, and containing its due proportion of objects and colouring.

In the execution of this design, he endeavoured to make it as extensively interesting as he could, by the frequent introduction of general reflections, historical, philosophical, and moral; and to enliven the description by digressions and episodes, naturally arising from the subject.

BRITANNIA'S rural charms, and tranquil scenes,
 Far from the circling ocean, where her fleets,
 Like * Eden's nightly guards, majestic ride,
 I sing; O may the theme and kindred soil
 Propitious prove, and to th' appointed hill
 Invite the muses from their cloister'd shades,
 With me to rove, and harmonize the strain!
 Nor shall they, for a time, regret the loss
 Of their lov'd Isis, and fair Cherwel's stream,
 While to the north of their own beauteous fields
 The pictur'd scene they view, where Avon shapes
 His winding way, enlarging as it flows,
 Nor hastes to join Sabrina's prouder wave.

Like a tall rampart, here the mountain rears
 Its verdant edge; and, if the tuneful maids
 Their presence deign, shall with Parnassus vie.
 Level, and smooth the track, which thither leads!
 Of champaign bold and fair! Its adverse side Abrupt, and steep! Thanks, Miller†! to thy paths,

That ease our winding steps! Thanks to the fount
 The trees, the flow'rs, imparting to the sense
 Fragrance or dulcet sound of murmur'ing rill,
 And stilling ev'ry tumult in the breast!
 And oft the stately tow'rs, that overtop
 The rising wood, and oft the broken arch,
 Or mould'ring wall, well taught to counterfeit
 The waste of time, to solemn thought excite,
 And crown with graceful pomp the slaggish hill.

† So virtue paints the steep ascent to fame:
 So her aerial residence displays.

Still let thy friendship, which prepar'd the way,
 Attend, and guide me, as my ravish'd sight
 O'er the bleak hill, or shelter'd valley roves.
 Teach me with just observance to remark
 Their various charms, their storied fame record,
 And to the visual join the mental search.

 The late-trod plain looks like an inland sea,
 View'd from some promontory's hoary head,

With distant shores environ'd; not with face
Glassy, and uniform, but when its waves
Are gently ruffled by the southern gale,
And the tall maits like waving forests rise.

Such is the scene, that from the terrac'd hill,
Displays its graces; intermixture sweet
Of lawns and groves, of open and retir'd.
Vales, farms, towns, villas, castles, distant spires,
And hills on hills, with ambient clouds enrob'd,
In long succession court the lab'ring sight,
Lost in the bright confusion. Thus the youth,
Efcap'd from painful drudgery of words,
Views the fair fields of science wide display'd;
Where Phœbus dwells, and all the tuneful nine;
Perplex'd awhile he stands, and now to this,
Now that blest seat of harmony divine
Explores his way, with giddy rapture tir'd:
Till some sage Mentor, whose experienc'd feet
Have trod the mazy path, directs his search,
And leads him wond'ring to their bright abodes.
Come then, my friend! guide thou th' advent'rous
maise,

And with thy counsel regulate her flight.
Yet, ere the sweet excursion she begins,
O! listen, while, from sacred records drawn,
My daring song unfolds the cause, whence rose
This various face of things—of high, and low—
Of rough and smooth. For with its parent earth
Coeval not prevail'd what now appears
Of bill and dale; nor was its new-form'd shape,
Like a smooth, polish'd orb, a surface plain,
Wanting the sweet variety of change;
Concave, convex, the deep, and the sublime:
Nor, from old ocean's wat'ry bed, were scoop'd
Its neighb'ring shores; nor were they now de-press'd,

Now rais'd by sudden shocks; but fashion'd all
In perfect harmony, by * laws divine,
On pass'ive matter, at its birth impress'd.

When now two days, as mortals count their time,

Th' Almighty had employ'd on man's abode;
To motion rous'd the dead, inactive mass,
The dark illumin'd, and the parts terrene
Impelling each to each the circle form'd,
Compact, and firm, of earth's stupendous orb,
With boundless seas, as with a garment cloth'd,
On the third morn he bade the waters flow
Down to their place, and let dry land appear;
And it was so. Strait to their destin'd bed,
From every part, th' obedient waters ran,
Shaping their downward course; and, as they found

Resistance varying with the varying soil,
In their retreat they form'd the gentle slope,

* Amongst the many fanciful conceits of writers on the subject, a learned divine, in his consultation of Dr. Burnet's theory, supposes that hills and mountains might be occasioned by fermentation, after the manner of leaven in dough; while others have attributed their production to the several different causes mentioned above.

The following solution, by the descent of water from the surface of the earth to the centre, seem'd most easy, and natural to the author, and is therefore adopted. Vid. Warren's Geologiz, 1698.

Or headlong precipice, or deep-worn dale,
Or valley, stretching far its winding maze,
As farther still their humid train they led,
By heav'n directed to the * realms below.

Now first was seen the variegated face
Of earth's fair orb shap'd by the plastic flood:
Now smooth and level like its liquid plains,
Now, like its ruffled waves, sweet interchange
Of hill and dale, and now a rougher scene,
Mountains on mountains lifted to the sky.
Such was her infant form, yet unadorn'd!
And in the naked soil the subtle † stream
Fretted its winding track. So he ordain'd!
Who form'd the fluid mass of atoms small,
The principles of things! who moist from dry,
From heavy sever'd light, compacting close
The solid glebe, stratum of rock, or ore,
Or crumbly marl, or close tenacious clay,
Or what beside, in wond'rous order rang'd,
Orb within orb, earth's secret depths contains.

So was the shapely sphere, on ev'ry side,
With equal pressure of surrounding air
Sustain'd, of sea and land harmonious form'd.
Nor beautiful cov'ring was withheld, for strait,
At the divine command, the verd'rous grass
Upprang unsworn, with ev'ry seedful herb,
Fruit, plant, or tree, pregnant with future store;
God saw the whole—And lo! 'twas very good.
But man, ungrateful man! to deadly ill
Soon turn'd the good bestow'd with horrid crimes
Polluting earth's fair seat, his Maker's gift!
Till mercy could no more with justice strive.

Then wrath divine unbarr'd heav'n's wat'ry gates,

And loos'd the fountains of the great abyfs.
Again the waters o'er the earth prevail'd.
Hills rear'd their heads in vain. Full forty days
The flood increas'd, nor, till seven moons had wan'd,

Appear'd the mountain-tops. Perish'd all flesh,
One family except! and all the works
Of art were sweep'd into th' oblivious pool.
In that dread time what change th' avenging flood

Might cause in earth's devoted fabric, who
Of mortal birth can tell? Whether again
'Twas to its first chaotic † mass reduc'd,
To be reform'd anew? or, in its orb,
What violence, what ‡ disruptions it endur'd?
What ancient mountains stood the furious shock?
What new arose? For doubtless new there are,
If all are not; strong proof exhibiting
Of later rise, and their once fluid state,

Of looser mould, or marble rock entomb'd,
Or shell marine, incorp'rate with themselves:
Nor less the * conic hill, with ample base,
Or scarry * slope by rushing billows torn,
Or * fissure deep, in the late delug'd soil
Cleft by succeeding drought, side answering side,
And curve to adverse curve exact oppos'd,
Confess the wat'ry pow'r; while scatter'd trains,
Or rocky fragments, wash'd from broken hills,
Take up the tale, and spread it round the globe.
Then, as the flood retir'd, another face
Of things appear'd, another, and the same!
Taurus, and Libanus, and Atlas feign'd
To prop the skies! and that fam'd Alpine ridge,
Or Appenine, or snow-clad Caucasus,
Or Ararat on whose emergent top
First moor'd that precious bark, whose chosen crew

Again o'erspread earth's universal orb.
For now, as at the first, from ev'ry side
Hasted the waters to their ancient bounds,
The vast abyss! perhaps from thence ascend,
Urg'd by th' incumbent air, through mazy clefts
Beneath the deep, or rise in vapours warm,
Piercing the vaulted earth, anon condens'd
Within the lofty mountains' secret cells,
Ere they their summit gain, down their steep sides
To trickle in a never-ceasing † round.
So up the porous stone, or crystal tube

* There are some remarkable traces of the great event here treated of, in each of these kind, at Welcombe, near Stratford upon Avon, formerly a seat of the Combe family, the whole scene bearing the strongest marks of some violent conflict of nature, and particularly of the agency of water.

† May not the ebbing and flowing of the sea, to whatever cause it is owing, tend to assist this operation, as the pulsation of the heart accelerates the circulation of the blood in animal bodies?

The reader may see this hypothesis very ably supported by Mr. Cutcut, in his Essay on the Deluge, 2d edit. together with many respectable names, ancient and modern, by whom it is patronized. The following passage from Lucretius is quoted by him, as well expressing their general meaning.

"Partim quod subter per terras diditur omnes.

"Convenit, unde super terras fluit agmine dulci,

Across the vale, disclosing all its charms,
Emblem of that fair light, at whose approach
The Gentle darkness fled! ye nymphs, and

Come haste with me, while now 'tis early morn,
Through Upton's * airy fields, to where yon' point
Projecting hides Northampton's ancient seat †
Retir'd, and hid amidst surrounding shades:
Counting a length of honourable years,
And solid worth; while painted Belvideres,
Naked, aloft, and built but to be seen,
Shrink at the sun, and totter to the wind.

So sober sense oft shuns the public view,
In privacy conceal'd, while the pert sons
Of folly flutter in the glare of day.

Hence, o'er the plain, where strip'd with

Alike her walls a noble master own,

New pillars grace the dome with Grecian pomp
Of Corinth's gay design. At his command,
On hill, or plain, new culture clothes the scene
With verdant grass, or variegated grove;
And bubbling rills in sweeter notes discharge
Their liquid stores. Along the winding vale,
At his command, observant of the shore,
The glitt'ring stream, with correspondent grace,
Its course pursues, and o'er th' exulting wave
The stately bridge a beauteous form displays.
On either side, rich as th' embroider'd floor
From Persia's gaudy looms, and firm as fair,
The chequer'd lawns with count'nance blithe proclaim

The graces reign. Plains, hills, and woods reply
The graces reign, and nature smiles applause.
Smile on, fair source of beauty, source of bliss!

The pleasing toil. Unwilling who can pay
To thee the votive strain? For science here,
And candour dwell, prepar'd alike to cheer
The stranger-guest, or for the nation's weal
To pour the stores mature of wisdom forth,
In senatorial councils often prov'd,
And, by the public voice attested long,
Long may it be! with well-deserv'd applause.
And see, beneath the shade of full-grown elm,
Or near the border of the winding brook,
Skirting the grassy lawn, her polish'd train
Walks forth to taste the fragrance of the grove,
Woodbine, or rose, or to the upland scene
Of wildly-planted hill, or trickling stream
From the pure rock, or moss-lin'd grotto cool,

Where Avon's sportive stream delighted strays
Through the gay smiling meads, and to his bed,
Hele's gentle current woos, by Lucy's hand
In ev'ry graceful ornament attir'd,
And worthier, such, to share his liquid realms!
Near, nor unmindful of th' increasing flood,
Stratford her spacious magazines unfolds,
And hails th' unwieldy barge from western shores,
With foreign dainties fraught, or native ore
Of pitchy hue, to pile the feuell'd grate
In woolly stores, or husky grain repay'd.
To speed her wealth, lo! the proud bridge † extends

His num'rous arches, stately monument
Of old munificence, and pious love
Of native soil! there Stower exulting pays
His tributary stream, well pleas'd with wave
Auxiliary her pond'rous stores to waft;
And boasting, as he flows, of growing fame,
And wond'rous beauties on his banks display'd—
Of Alcot's ‡ swelling lawns, and fretted spires
Of fairest model, Gothic, or Chinese—
Of Eatington's §, and Tolton's ¶ verdant meads,
And groves of various leaf, and Honington ¶¶,
Profuse of charms, and Attic elegance;
Nor fails he to relate, in jocund mood,
How liberally the masters of the scene
Enlarge his current, and direct his course
With winding grace—and how his crystal wave
Reflects th' inverted spires, and pillar'd domes—
And how the frisking deer play on his sides,
Pick'ring their branched heads, with wanton sport,
In his clear face. Pleas'd with the vaunting tale,
Nor jealous of his fame, Avon receives
The prattling stream, and, towards thy nobler
flood,

Sabrina fair, pursues his length'ning way.

Hail, beauteous Avon, hail! on whose fair banks

The smiling daisies, and their sister tribes,
Violets, and cuckow-buds, and lady-smocks,
A brighter dye disclose, and proudly tell
That Shakspeare, as he stray'd these meads along,
Their simple charms admir'd, and in his verse
Preserv'd, in never-fading bloom to live.

And thou, whose birth these walls unrival'd boast,

That mock'st the rules of the proud Stagyrite,
And learning's tedious toil, hail mighty bard!
Thou great magician bail! thy piercing thought
Unaided saw each movement of the mind,
As skilful artists view the small machine,
The secret springs and nice dependencies,
And to thy mimic scenes, by fancy wrought
To such a wond'rous shape, th' impassion'd breath
In floods of grief, or peals of laughter bow'd,
Obedient to the wonder-working strain,
Like the tun'd string responsive to the touch,
Or to the wizzard's charm, the passive storm.
Humour and wit, the tragic pomp, or phrase
Familiar flow'd, spontaneous from thy tongue,
As flowers from nature's lap.—Thy potent spells
From their bright seats aerial sprites detain'd,
Or from their unseen haunts, and slumbering shades
Awak'd the fairy tribes, with jocund step
The circled green, and leafy hall to tread:
While, from his dripping caves, old Avon sent
His willing naiads to their harmless rout.

Alas! how languid is the labour'd song,
The slow result of rules, and tortur'd sense,
Compar'd with thine! thy animated thought,
And glowing phrase! which art in vain essays,
And schools can never teach. Yet, though deny'd
Thy pow'rs, by situation more allied,
I court the genius of thy sportive muse
On Avon's bank, her sacred haunts explore,
And hear in ev'ry breeze her charming notes.

Beyond these flow'ry meads, with classic streams
Enrich'd, two sister rills their currents join,
And Ikenild displays his Roman pride.
There Alcester * her ancient honour boasts.
But fairer fame, and far more happy lot
She boasts, O Ragley †! in thy courtly train
Of Hertford's splendid line! lo! from these shades,
Ev'n now his sov'reign, studious of her weal,
Calls him to bear his delegated rule
To Britain's sister isle. Hibernia's sons
Applaud the choice, and hail him to their shore
With cordial gratulation. Him, well-pleas'd
With more than filial reverence to obey,
Beauchamp attends. What son, but would rejoice

The deeds of such a father to record!

What father, but were blest in such a son!

Nor may the muse omit with Conway's ‡ name

Airy, and light, in many a conic form,
A theatre compose, grotesque and wild;
And, with their straggly sides, contract the vale
Winding, in straiten'd circuit, round their base.
Beneath their waving umbrage Flora spreads
Her spotted couch, primrose, and hyacinth

By no scant bound'ry, nor obstructing fence,
Inmurd, or circumscrib'd; but spread at large
In open day: save what to cool recesses
Is destin'd voluntary, not constrain'd
By sad necessity, and casual state
Of sickly peace! Such as the moated hall,

And narrow circuit of embattled walls,

And Norman policy! Such the retreats
Of Britain's ancient nobles! less intent
On rural beauty, and sweet patronage
Of gentle arts, than studious to restrain,
With servile awe, barbarian multitudes;
Or, with confederate force, the regal pow'r
Controul. Hence proudly they their vassal troops
Assembling, now the fate of empire plann'd:
Now o'er defenceless tribes, with wanton rage,
Tyrannic rul'd; and, in their castled halls
Secure, with wild excess their revels kept,
While many a sturdy youth, or beauteous maid,
Sole solace of their parents' drooping age!
Bewail'd their wretched fate, by force compell'd
To these abhor'd abodes! Hence frequent § wars,
In ancient annals fam'd! Hence haply feign'd
Th' enchanted castle, and its cursed train
Of giants, spectres, and magicians dire!
Hence gen'rous minds, with indignation fir'd,
And threat'ning fierce revenge, were character'd
By gallant knights on bold achievements bent,
Subduing monsters, and dissolving spells.

‡ The forest, or woodland part of Warwickshire.

§ So called, from its pleasant rural situation.

¶ Called the Barons wars.

Thus, from the rural landscape, learn to know
The various characters of time and place.
To hail, from open scenes, and cultur'd fields,
Fair liberty, and freedom's gen'rous reign,
With guardian laws, and polish'd arts adorn'd.
While the portcullis huge, or moated fence
The sad reverse of savage times betray—
Distrust, barbarity, and Gothic rule.

Would ye, with faultless judgment, learn to plan

The rural seat? To copy, as ye rove,
The well-form'd picture, and correct design?
First shun the false extremes of high and low.
With wat'ry vapours this your fretted walls
Will soon deface; and that, with rough assault,
And frequent tempests, shake your tott'ring roof.
Me most the gentle eminence delights
Of healthy champaign, to the sunny south
Fair op'ning, and with woods, and circling hills,
Nor too remote, nor, with too close embrace,
Stopping the buxom air, behind enclos'd.
But if your lot hath fall'n in fields less fair,
Consult their genius, and, with due regard
To nature's clear directions, shape your plan.
The site too lofty shelter, and the low
With sunny lawns and open areas cheer.
The marsh drain, and, with capacious urns,
And well-conducted streams, refresh the dry.
So shall your lawns with healthful verdure smile,
While others, sick'ning at the sultry blaze,
A rustlet wild display, or the rank blade,
And matted tufts the careless owner shame.
Seek not, with fruitless cost, the level plain
To raise aloft, nor sink the rising hill.
Each has its charms, though different; each in kind

Improve, not alter. Art with art conceal.
Let no strait terrac'd lines your slopes deform;
No barb'rous walls restrain the bounded sight;
But to the distant fields the closer scene
Connect. The spacious lawn with scatter'd trees
Irregular, in beauteous negligence,
Clothe bountiful. Your unimprison'd eye,
With pleasing freedom, through the lofty maze
Shall rove, and find no dull satiety.
The sportive stream with stiffen'd line avoid
To torture, nor prefer the long canal
Or labour'd fount to nature's easy flow.
Your winding paths, now to the sunny* gleam
Directed, now with high embow'ring trees
Or fragrant shrubs conceal'd, with frequent seat
And rural structure deck. Their pleasing form
To fancy's eye suggests inhabitants
Of more than mortal make, and their cool shade,
And friendly shelter to refreshment sweet,
And wholesome meditation, shall invite.

To ev'ry structure give its proper site.
Ner, on the dreary heath, the gay alcove,
Nor the lone hermit's cell, or mournful urn
Build on the sprightly lawn. The grassy slope
And shelter'd border for the cool arcade
Or Tuscan porch reserve. To the chaste dome
And fair rotunda give the swelling mount
Of freshest green. If to the Gothic scene
Your taste incline, in the well-water'd vale,
With lofty pines embrown'd, the mimic fan

* "Hæc amat obscurum, vollet hæc sub luce videri."

And mould'ring abbey's fretted windows place.
The craggy rock, or precipitious hill,
Shall well become the cattle's maffy walls.
In royal villas the Palladian arch
And Grecian portico with dignity
Their pride display: ill fuits their lofty rank
The simpler scene. If chance historic deeds
Your fields distinguish, count them doubly fair,
And studious aid, with monumental stone,
And faithful comment, fancy's fond review.

Now other hills, with other wonders stor'd,
Invite the search. In vain! unless the muse
The landscape order. Nor will she decline
The pleasing task. For not to her 'tis hard
To soar above the mountain's airy height,
With tow'ring pinions, or, with gender wing,
To explore the cool recesses of the vale.

Her piercing eye extends beyond the reach
Of optic tube, levell'd by midnight fage,
At the moon's disk, or other distant fun,
And planetary worlds beyond the orb
Of Saturn. Nor can intervening rocks
Impede her search. Alike the sylvan gloom
Or earth's profoundest caverns she pervades,
And to her fav'rite fons makes visible
All that may grace or dignify the fong,
Howe'er envelop'd from their mortal ken.

With champaign fields, broad plain, and covert vale

Diverfify'd: By Ceres fome adorn'd

THE sun, whose eastern ray had scarcely gilt
The mountain's brow, while up the steep ascent
With early step we climb'd, now wide displays
His radiant orb, and half his daily stage
Hath nearly measur'd. From th' illumin'd vale
The soaring mists are drain'd, and o'er the hill
No more breathes grateful the cool balmy air,
Cheering our search, and urging on our steps
Delightful. See, the languid herds forsake
The burning mead, and creep beneath the shade
Of spreading tree, or shelter hedge-row tall;
Or, in the mantling pool, rude reservoir

Of wint'ry rains, and the slow thrifty spring,
Cool their parch'd limbs, and lave their panting sides.

Let us too seek the shade. Yon airy dome,
Beneath whose lofty battlements we found
A covert passage to these sultry realms,
Invites our drooping strength, and well befriends
The pleasing comment on fair nature's book,
In sumptuous volume, open'd to our view.

Ye sportive nymphs, that o'er the rural scene
Preside; you chief, that haunt the flow'ry banks
Of Avon, where, with more majestic wave,
Warwick's illustrious lord through the gay meads
His dancing current guides, or round the lawn
Directs th' embroider'd verge of various dyes,
O! teach me all its graces to unfold,
And with your praise join his attendant fame.

'Tis well! Here shelter'd from the scorching
heat,

At large we view the subject vale sublime
And unimpeded. Hence its limits trace
Stretching, in wanton lord'ry, from the foot
Of this green mountain, far as human ken
Can reach, a theatre immense! adorn'd
With ornaments of sweet variety,
By nature's pencil drawn—the level meads,
A verdant floor! with brightest gems inlaid,
And richly-painted flow'rs—the tillag'd plain,
Wide-waving to the sun a rival blaze
Of gold, best source of wealth!—the prouder hills,
With outline fair, in naked pomp display'd,
Round, angular, oblong; and others crown'd
With graceful foliage. Over all her horn
Fair plenty pours, and cultivation spreads
Her height'ning lustre. See, beneath her touch
The smiling harvests rise, with bending line,
And wavy ridge, along the dappled glebe
Stretching their lengthen'd beds. Her careful hand

Piles up the yellow grain, or rustling hay
Aduft for wint'ry store—the long-ridg'd mow,
Or shapely pyramid, with conic roof,
Dressing the landscape. She the thick-wove fence
Nurses, and adds with care the hedge-row elm.
Around her farms and villages she plans
The rural garden, yielding wholesome food
Of simple viands, and the fragrant herb Medicinal. The well-rang'd orchard now
She orders, or the sheltering clump, or tuft
Of hardy trees, the wint'ry storms to curb,
Or guard the sweet retreat of village swain,
With health and plenty crown'd. Fair science next,

Her offspring, adds towns, cities, vaulted domes,
And splendid palaces, and chafes large,
With lake and planted grove, Hence Warwick,
fair

With rising buildings, Coventry's tall spires,
And Kenelworth! thy stately castle rose,
Which still in ruin charms th' astonish'd sight.
To crown the beautiful scene, the curtain'd sky,
Its canopy divine of azure tint,
Spreads heav'nly fair, and softens ev'ry charm.

Now yet again, with accurate survey,
The level plain, hills rising various, woods,
And meadows green, the simple cot, and towns,
Nurs'ries of arts, and commerce! Warwick, fair
With rising buildings, Coventry's tall spires,

Magnificent in ruin Kenelworth!
And still more distant scenes, with legends strange,
And smoky arts, taught in the dusky schools
Of Tubal's sons, attentive let us scan,
And all their charms and mysteries explore.

First view, but cautious, the vast precipice;
Left, startled at the giddy height, thy sense
Swimming forsake thee, and thy trembling limbs,
Unnerv'd and fault'ring, threaten dang'rous lapse.
Along th' indented bank, the forest tribes,
The thin-leav'd ash, dark oak, and glossy beech,
Of polish'd rind, their branching boughs extend,
With blended tints, and amicable frise,
Forming a checker'd shade. Below, the lawns,
With spacious sweep, and wild declivity,
To yellow plains their sloping verdure join.

There, white with flocks, and, in her num'rous herds

Exulting, Chadfont's * pastures, large and fair,
Salute the sight, and witness to the fame
Of Lichfield's mired faint †. The furzy heaths
Succeed; close refuge of the tim'rous hare,
Or prowling fox, but refuge insecure!
From their dark covert oft the hunter train
Rouse them unwilling, and o'er hill and dale
With wild tumultuous joy their steps pursue.
Just vengeance on the midnight thief! and life
With life aton'd! But that poor, trembling wretch!
"Who doubts if now she lives," what hath she done;

Guiltless of blood, and impotent of wrong?
How num'rous, how insatiate yet her foes!
Ev'n in these thickets, where she vainly sought
A safe retreat from man's unfeeling race,
The busy hound, to blood and slaughter train'd,
Snuffs her sweet vapour, and to murd'rous rage,
By madd'ning sounds impell'd, in her close feat
With fury tears her, and her corse devours;
Or scares her o'er the fields, and by the scent,
With keen desire of reeking gore inflam'd,
Loud-bellowing tortures her with dreadful cries.
Nor more secure her path! Man even there,
Watching with foul intent her secret haunts,
Plants instruments of death, and round her neck
The fatal snare entwines. Thus innocence,
In human things, by wily fraud ensnar'd,
Oft helpless falls, while the bold plund'rer 'scapes.
Next the wide-champaign, and the cheerful downs
Claim notice; chiefly thine, O Chesterton ‡!
Pre-eminent. Nor 'scape the roving eye
Thy solemn wood, and Roman vestiges,
Encampment green, or military road!
Amusive to the grave, historic mind.
Thee || Pachbroke joins with venerable shade.
Nor distant far, in Saxon annals fam'd,
The rural court § of Offa, Mercian king!
Where, sever'd from its trunk, low lies the head
Of brave Fermundus, slain by coward hands,
As on the turf supine in sleep he lay,
Nor wist it sleep from which to wake no more!

"TROPHOEV M PECCATI!

"Fulke Greville, Servant to Queen Elizabeth, Counsellor to King James, and Friend to Sir Philip Sidney."

Consign'd the lofty structure: Worthy he!
The lofty structure's splendour to restore.

Or ample verdant lawns, where the sleek deer

Beneath the rising walls; magnificence
With grace uniting, and enlarg'd delight
Of prospect fair, and nature's smiling scenes!

Still is the colouring faint. O! could my verse,
Like their * Louisa's pencil'd shades describe
The tow'rs, the woods, the lawns, the winding stream,

Fair like her form, and like her birth sublime!
Not Windsor's royal scenes by Denham sung,
Or that more tuneful bard on Twick'nham's shore
Should boast a loftier strain, but in my verse
Their fame should live, as lives proportion'd true,
Their beauteous image in her graven lines.

Transporting theme! on which I still could waste
The ling'ring hours, and still protract the song
With new delight: but thy example, Guy!
Calls me from scenes of pomp and earthly pride,
To muse with thee in thy sequester'd cell †.

Here the calm scene lulls the tumultuous breast
To sweet composure. Here the gliding stream,
That winds its wat'ry path in many a maze,
As loth to leave th' enchanted spot, invites
To moralize on fleeting time, and life,
With all its treach'rous sweets and fading joys,
In emblem shown, by many a short-liv'd flow'r,
That on its margin smiles, and smiling falls
To join its parent earth. Here let me delve,
Near thine, my chamber in the peaceful rock,
And think no more of gilded palaces,
And luxury of sense. From the till'd glebe,
Or ever-teeming brook, my frugal meal
I'll gain, and slake my thirst at yonder spring.
Like thee, I'll climb the steep, and mark the scene
How fair! how passing fair! in grateful strains
Singing the praises of creative love.

Like thee, I'll tend the call of matin bell †
To early orisons, and latest tune
My evening song to that more wond'rous love,
Which sav'd us from the grand apostate's wiles,
And righteous vengeance of Almighty ire,
Justly incens'd. O pow'r of grace divine!
When mercy met with truth, with justice, peace.
Thou, holy hermit! in this league secure,
Did'st wait death's vanquish'd spectre as a friend,
To change thy mortal coil for heav'nly bliss.

Next, Kenelworth! thy fame invites the song.
Assemblage sweet of social, and serene!
But chiefly two fair streets, in adverse rows,
Their lengthen'd fronts extend, reflecting each.
Beauty on each reciprocal. Between

Drest with the rampant ivy's unchecked growth

And sprightly mirth, beneath the festive roof,
Are now no more. No more assembled crowds
At the stern porter's lodge admittance crave.
No more, with plaint, or suit importunate,

Or gaudy badge, the busy pursuivants

And silence keeps her melancholy court

Or screech-owls hoot along the vaulted isles.
No more the trumpet calls the martial band,
With sprightly summons to the guarded lists;
Nor lofty galleries their pride disclose

What art thou, grandeur! with thy flatt'ring train

Of pompous lies, and boastful promises?
Where are they now, and what's their mighty sum?
All, all are vanish'd! like the fleeting forms
Drawn in an evening cloud. Nought now remains,
Save these sad relics of departed pomp,
These spoils of time, a monumental pile!
Which to the vain its mournful-tale relates,
And warns them not to trust to fleeting dreams.

These too, though boasting not a royal train,
The muse, O * Balsal! in her faithful page
Shall celebrate: for long beneath thy roof
A band of warriors bold, of high renown,
To martial deeds, and hazardous emprise
Sworn, for defence of Salem's sacred walls,
From Paynim foes, and holy pilgrimage.
Now other guests thou entertain'st,
A female band, by female charity

Seat of the poet's, and the muse's friend!
My verse shall sing, with thy long-exil'd knight,
To these brown thickets, and his mournful mate,
By Leonard's pray'rs, from distant fervitude,
Invisibly convey'd. Yet doubtedst thou
His speech, and alter'd form, and better proof
Impatient urg'd. (So Ithaca's chaste queen
Her much-wish'd lord, by twice ten absent years
And wife Minerva's guardian care disguis'd
Acknowledg'd not: so, with suspended faith,
His bridal claim repress'd.) Straight he displays
Part of the nuptial ring between them shar'd,
When in the bold crusade his shield he bore.
The twin memorial of their plighted love
Within her faithful bosom the retain'd.
Quick from its shrine the hallow'd pledge she drew,
To match it with its mate, when, strange to tell!
No sooner had the separated curves
Approach'd each other, but, with sudden spring,
They join'd again, and the small circle clos'd.
So they, long sever'd, met in close embrace.

Nor shall the muse, in her descriptive song,
Neglect from dark oblivion to preserve
Thy mould'ring * cros, with ornament profuse
Of pinnacles, and niches, proudly rais'd,
Height above height, a sculptur'd chronicle!
Less lasting than the monumental verse.
Nor scornful will she flout thy cavalcade,
Made yearly to Godiva's deathless praise,
While gaping crowds around her pageant throng,
With prying look, and stupid wonderment.
Not so the muse! who, with her virtue fir'd,
And love of thy renown, in notes as chaste
As her fair purpose, from memorials dark,
Shall, on the list'ning ear, her tale explain.

When † Edward, last of Egbert's royal race,
O'er sev'n united realms the sceptre sway'd,
Proud Leofric, with trust of sov'reign pow'r,
The subject Mercians rul'd. His lofty state
The loveliest of her sex! a noble dame
Of Thorald's ancient line, Godiva shar'd.
But pageant pomp charm'd not her faintly mind
Like virtuous deeds, and care of others weal.
Such tender passions in his haughty breast
He cherish'd not, but with despotic sway,
Controul'd his vassal tribes, and, from their toil,
His luxury maintain'd. Godiva saw

Their plaintive looks; with grief the saw thy sons,
O Coventry! by tyrant laws oppress'd,
And urg'd her haughty lord, but urg'd in vain!
With patriot-rule, thy drooping arts to cheer.
Yet, though forbidden e'er again to move
In what so much his lofty state concern'd,
Not so from thought of charitable deed
Desist'd she, but amiably perverse

Her hopeless suit renew'd. Bold was th' attempt!
Yet not more bold than fair, if pitying sighs
Be fair, and charity which knows no bounds.
What had'st thou then to fear from wrath inflam'd
At such transcendent guilt, rebellion join'd
With female weakness, and officious zeal?
So thy stern lord might call the gen'rous deed;
Perhaps might punish as bestid'd deed
So call'd, if love restrain'd not: yet though love
O'er anger triumph'd, and imperious rule,
Not o'er his pride; which better to maintain,
His answer thus he artfully return'd.

Why will the lovely partner of my joys,
Forbidden, thus her wild petition urge?

* Built by Sir William Hollies, Lord Mayor of London, in the reign of King Henry VIII.

† Edward the Confessor.

Think not my breast is steel'd against the claims
Of sweet humanity. Think not I hear
Regardless thy request. If piety,
Or other motive, with mistaken zeal,
Call'd to thy aid, pierc'd not my stubborn frame,
Yet to the pleader's worth, and modest charms,
Wou'd my fond love no trivial gift impart.
But pomp and fame forbid. That vassalage,
Which, thoughtless, thou wou'dst tempt me to dissolve,

Exalts our splendour, and augments my pow'r.
With tender bosoms form'd, and yielding hearts,
Your sex soon melts at sighs of vulgar woe;
Heedless how glory fires the vulgar breast
With love of rank sublime. This principle
In female minds a feebler empire holds,
Opposing less the specious arguments
For milder rule, and freedom's popular theme.
But plant some gentler passion in its room,
Some virtuous instinct suited to your make,
As glory is to ours, alike requir'd.

A ransom for the vulgar's vassal state,
Then wou'dst thou soon the strong contention own,
And justify my conduct. Thou art fair,
And chaste as fair; with nicest sense of shame,
And sanctity of thought. Thy bosom thou
Did'st ne'er expose to shameless dalliance
Of wanton eyes; nor, ill-concealing it
Beneath the treach'rous cov'ring, tempt aside
The secret glance, with meditated fraud.

Go now, and lay thy modest garments by:
In naked beauty, mount thy milk-white steed,
And through the streets, in face of open day,
And gazing slaves, their fair deliverer ride:
Then will I own thy pity was sincere,
Applaud thy virtue, and confirm thy suit.
But if thou lik'st not such ungentle terms,
And sure thy soul the guilty thought abhors!
Know then, that Leofric, like thee, can feel,
Like thee, may pity, while he seems severe,
And urge thy suit no more. His speech he clos'd,
And, with strange oaths, confirm'd the sad decree.

Again, within Godiva's gentle breast
New tumults rose. At length her female fears
Gave way, and sweet humanity prevail'd.
Reluctant, but resolv'd, the matchless fair
Gives all her naked beauty to the sun:
Then mounts her milk-white steed, and, through the streets,

Rides fearless; her dishevell'd hair a veil!
That o'er her beauteous limbs luxuriant flow'd,
Nurs'd long by fate for this important day!
Prostrate to earth th' astonish'd vassals bow,
Or to their inmost privacies retire.

All, but one prying slave! who fondly hop'd,
With venial curiosity, to gaze
On such a wond'rous dance. But soul disgrac'd
O'ertook the bold offender, and he stands,
By just decree, a spectacle abhor'd,
And lasting monument of swift revenge

For thoughts impure, and beauty's injur'd charms.
Ye guardians of her rights, so nobly won!
Cherish the muse, who first in modern strains
Essay'd to sing your lovely * patriot's fame,

* See Dugdale's Antiquities of Warwickshire.

It is pleasant enough to observe, with what gravity
the above-mentioned learned writer dwells on the praises

Anxious to rescue from oblivious time
Such matchless virtue, her heroic deed
Illustrate, and your gay procession grace.

BOOK III.

AFTERNOON.

ARGUMENT.

ADDRESS to the Right Hon. the Earl of Clarendon. Metaphysical subtleties exploded. Philosophical account of vision, and optic glasses. Objects of sight not sufficiently regarded on account of their being common. Story relative thereto. Return to the mid-scene. Solihul. School-scene. Bremicham. Its manufactures. Coal-mines. Iron-ore. Precepts of it. Panegyric upon iron.

AGAIN, the muse her airy flight essays.
Will Villers, skill'd alike in classic song,
Or, with a critic's eye, to trace the charms
Of nature's beautiful scenes, attend the lay?
Will he, accusom'd to soft Latian climes,
As to their foster numbers, deign a while
To quit the Mantuan bard's harmonious strain,
By sweet attraction of the theme allur'd?
The Latian poet's song is still the same.
Not so the Latian fields. The Gentle arts
That made those fields so fair, when Gothic rule,
And superstition, with her bigot train,
Fixt there their gloomy seat, to this fair isle
Retir'd, with freedom's generous sons to dwell,
To grace her cities, and her smiling plains
With plenty clothe, and crown the rural toil.

Nor hath he found, throughout those spacious realms

Where Albion flows, and Ister's stately flood,
More verdant meads, or more superb remains
Of old magnificence, than his own fields
Display, where * Clinton's venerable walls
In ruin, still their ancient grandeur tell.

Requires there aught of learning's pompous aid
To prove that all this outward frame of things
Is what it seems, not unsubstantial air,
Ideal vision, or a waking dream,
Without existence, save what fancy gives?
Shall we, because we strive in vain to tell
How matter acts on incorporeal mind,
Or how, when sleep has lock'd up ev'ry sense,
Or severs rage, imagination paints
Unreal scenes, reject what sober sense,
And calmest thought attest? Shall we confound of this renowned lady. "And now, before I proceed," says he, "I have a word more to say of the noble Countess Godova, which is, that besides her devout advancement of that pious work of his, i. e. her husband Leofric, in this magnificent monastery, viz. of monks at Coventry, she gave her whole treasure thereto, and sent for skilful goldsmiths, rubo, with all the gold and silver she had, made crosses, images of saints, and other curious ornaments." Which passages may serve as a specimen of the devotion and patriotism of those times.

* The magnificent ruins of Kenilworth Castle, built by Geoffrey de Clinton, and more particularly described in the preceding book, belong to the Right Hon. the Earl of Clarendon, many years resident in Italy, and Envoy to most of the Courts in Germany.

States wholly diff'rent? Sleep with wakeful life?
Disease with health? This were to quit the day,
And seek our path at midnight. To renounce
Man's surest evidence, and idolize Imagination. Hence then banish we

These metaphysic subtleties, and mark
The curious structure of these visual orbs,
The windows of the mind; substance how clear,
Aqueous, or crystalline! through which the soul,
As through a glass, all outward things surveys.

See, while the sun gilds, with his golden beam,
Yon distant pile, which Hyde, with care refin'd,
From plunder guards, its form how beautiful!
Anon some cloud his radiance intercepts,
And all the splendid object fades away.
Or, if some incrustation o'er the sight
Its baleful texture spread, like a clear lens,
With silt obscur'd! no more the sensory,
Through the thick film, imbibes the cheerful
day,

'But cloud instead, and ever-during night
Surround it.' So, when on some weighty truth
A beam of heav'nly light its lustre sheds,
To reason's eye it looks supremely fair.
But if soul passion, or distemper'd pride,
Impede its search, or phrenzy seize the brain,
Then ignorance a gloomy darkness spreads,
Or superstition, with mishapen forms,
Erects its savage empire in the mind.

The vulgar race of men, like herds that graze,
On insens'd live, not knowing how they live;
While reason sleeps, or waking stoops to sense.
But sage philosophy explores the cause
Of each phenomenon of sight, or sound,
Taste, touch, or smell; each organ's inmost frame,
And correspondence with external things:
Explains how diff'rent texture of their parts
Excites sensations diff'rent, rough, or smooth,
Bitter, or sweet, fragrance, or noisome scent:
How various streams of undulating air,
Through the ear's winding labyrinth convey'd,
Cause all the vast variety of sounds.
Hence too the subtle properties of light,
And sev'n-fold colour are distinctly view'd
In the prismatic glass, and outward forms
Shown fairly drawn, in miniature divine,
On the transparent eye's membranous cell.
By combination hence of diff'rent orbs,
Convex, or concave, through their crystal pores,
Transmitting variously the solar ray,
With line oblique, the telescopic tube
Reveals the wonders of the starry sphere,
Worlds above worlds; or, in a single grain,
Or wat'ry drop, the penetrative eye
Discerns innumerable inhabitants
Of perfect structure, imperceptible
To naked view. Hence each defect of sense
Obtains relief; hence to the palsi'd ear
New impulse, vision new to languid sight,
Surprise to both, and youthful joys restor'd!

Cheap is the bliss we never knew to want!
So graceless spendthrifts waste unthankfully
Those sums, which merit often seeks in vain,
And poverty would kneel to call its own.
So objects, hourly seen; unheeded pass,
At which the new-created sight would gaze
With exquisite delight. Doubt ye this truth?
A tale shall place it fairer to your view.

A youth* there was, a youth of lib'ral mind,
 And fair proportion in each lineament
 Of outward form: but dim suffusion veil'd
 His sightless orbs, which roll'd, and roll'd in vain
 To find the blaze of day. From infancy,
 Till full maturity glow'd in his cheeks,
 The long, long night its gloomy empire held,
 And mock'd each gentle effort, lotions,
 Or cataplasms, by parental hands,
 With fruitless care employ'd. At length a leech,
 Of skill profound, well-vers'd in optic lore,
 An arduous task devis'd aside to draw
 The veil, which, like a cloud, hung o'er his sight,
 And ope a lucid passage to the sun.
 Infant the youth the pronis'd blessing craves.
 But first his parents, with uplifted hands,
 The healing pow'rs invoke, and pitying friends
 With sympathizing heart, the rites prepare:
 'Mongst these, who well deserv'd the important trust,

A gentle maid there was, that long had wail'd
 His hapless fate. Full many a tedious hour
 Had she, with converse, and instructive song,
 Beguil'd. Full many a step darkling her arm
 Sustain'd him; and, as they their youthful days
 In friendly deeds, and mutual intercourse
 Of sweet endearment pass'd, love in each breast
 His empire fix'd; in hers with pity join'd,
 In his with gratitude, and deep regard. [film]

The friendly wound was giv'n; th' obstracting
 Drawn artfully aside; and, on his sight
 Burst the full tide of day. Surpris'd he stood,
 Not knowing where he was, nor what he saw!
 The skilful artist, first as first in place
 He view'd, then seiz'd his hand, then felt his own,
 Then mark'd their near resemblance; much perplex'd,

And still the more perplex'd, the more he saw.

Now silence first th' impatient mother broke,
 And, as her eager looks on him she bent, [gaz'd
 "My son," she cried; "My son!" On her he With fresh surpris'd. And, what? he cried, art thou

My mother? for thy voice bespeaks thee such,
 Though to my sight unknown. Thy mother I!
 She quick reply'd, thy sister, brother these—
 O! 'tis too much, he said; too soon to part,
 Ere well we meet! But this new flood of day
 O'erpow'rs me, and I fell a death-like damp
 Chill all my frame, and stop my fault'ring tongue.

Now Lydia, so they call'd his gentle friend,
 Who, with averted eye, but in her soul,
 Had felt the lancing steel, her aid apply'd,
 And stay, dear youth, she said, or with thee take Thy Lydia, thine alike in life, or death.

At Lydia's name, at Lydia's well known voice,
 He strove again to raise his drooping head,
 And ope his closing eye, but strove in vain,
 And on her trembling bosom sunk away.

Now other fears distract his weeping friends.
 But short this grief! for soon his life return'd,
 And, with return of life, return'd their peace.
 Yet, for his safety, they resolve a while
 His infant sense from days bright beams to guard,
 Ere yet again they tempt such dang'rous joy.

* For the general subject of the following story, see the Tatler, No. 55. and Smith's Optics.

As, when from some transporting dream awak'd
 We fondly on the sweet delusion dwell,
 And, with intense reflection, to our minds
 Picture th' enchanted scene—angelic forms—
 Converse sublime—and more than waking bliss!
 Till the coy vision, as the more we strive
 To paint it livelier on th' enraptur'd sense,
 Still fainter grows, and dies at last away:
 So dwelt the youth on his late transient joy,
 So long'd the dear remembrance to renew.

At length, again the wish'd-for day arriv'd.
 The task was Lydia's! hers the charge, alone
 From dangers new to guard the dear delight;
 But first th' impatient youth she thus address'd:

Dear youth! my trembling hands but ill essay
 This tender task, and, with unusual fear,
 My fluttering heart forebodes some danger nigh.

Dismiss thy fears, he cried, nor think so ill
 I con thy lessons, as still need be taught
 To hail, with caution, the new-coming day.
 Then loose these ev'ous folds, and teach my sight,
 If more can be, to make thee more belov'd.

Ah! there's my grief, she cried: 'tis true our hearts

With mutual passion burn, but then 'tis true
 Thou ne'er hast known me by that subtle sense
 Through which love most an easy passage finds;
 That sense! which soon may show thee many a maid

Fairer than Lydia, though more faithful none.
 And may she not cease then to be belov'd?
 May she not then, when less thou need'st her care,
 Give place to some new charmer? 'Tis for this
 I sigh; for this my sad foreboding fears
 New terrors form. And can'st thou then, he cried,
 Want aught that might endear thee to my soul?
 Art thou not excellence? Art thou not all
 That man cou'd wish? Goodness, and gentlest love?
 Can I forget thy long assiduons care?

Thy morning-tendance, surest mark to me
 Of day's return, of night thy late adieu?
 Do I need aught to make my blefs complete,
 When thou art by me? when I press thy hand?
 When I breath fragrance at thy near approach;
 And hear the sweetest music in thy voice?
 Can that, which to each other sense is dear,
 So wond'rous dear, be otherwise to fight?
 Or can fight make, what is to reason good,
 And lovely, seem less lovely, and less good?
 Perish the sense, that wou'd make Lydia such!
 Perish its joys, those joys however great!
 If to be purchas'd with the loss of thee.
 O my dear Lydia! if there be indeed
 The danger thou report'st, O! by our love,
 Our mutual love, I charge thee, ne'er unbind
 These hapless orbs, or tear them from their seat,
 Ere they betray me thus to worse than death.

No, Heav'n forbid! she cried, for Heav'n hath heard

Thy parents pray'rs, and many a friend now waits
 To mingle looks of cordial love with thine.
 And should I rob them of the sacred bliss?
 Shou'd I deprive thee of the rapt'rous sight?
 No! be thou happy; happy be thy friends;
 Whatever fate attend thy Lydia's love;
 Thy hapless Lydia! Hapless did I say?
 Ah! wherefore? wherefore wrong I thus thy worth?

Why doubt the well-known truth, and constant mind?

No, happiest she of all the happy train,
In mutual vows, and plighted faith secure!

So saying, she the silken bandage loos'd,
Nor added further speech, prepar'd to watch
The new surprize, and guide the doubtful scene,
By silence more than tenfold night conceal'd.
When thus the youth: And is this then the world

In which I am to live? Am I awake?
Or do I dream? Or hath some pow'r unknown,
Far from my friends, far from my native home;
Convey'd me to these radiant seats? O thou!
Inhabitant of this enlighten'd world!
Whose heav'nly softness far transcends his shape,
By whom this miracle was first achiev'd,
O! deign thou to intrust me where I am;
And how to name thee by true character,
Angel, or mortal! Once I had a friend,
Who, but till now, ne'er left me in distress.
Her speech was harmony, at which my heart
With transport flutter'd; and her gracious hand
Supplied me with whate'er my wish could form;
Supply, and transport ne'er so wish'd before!
Never, when wanted, yet, so long denied!
Why is she silent now, when moit I long
To hear her heavenly voice? why flies she not
With more than usual speed to crown my bliss?
Ah! did I leave her in that darksome world?
Or rather dwells she not in these bright realms,
Companion fit for such fair forms as thine?
O! teach me, if thou canst, how I may find
This gentle counsellor; when found, how know
By this new sense, which, better still to rate
Her worth, I chiefly wish'd. This lovely form
Replied, In me behold that gentle friend,
If still thou own'st me such. O! yes, 'tis she,
He cried; 'tis Lydia! 'tis her charming voice!
O! speak again; O! let me press thy hand:
On these I can rely. This new-born sense
May cheat me. Yet so much I prize thy form,
Iwillingly would think it tells me true—

Ha! what are these? Are they not they of whom

Thou warn'dst me? Yes—true—they are beautiful.
But have they lov'd like thee, like thee convers'd?
They move not as we move, they hear no part
In my new bliss. And yet methinks in one,
Her form I can descry, though now so calm,
Who call'd me son. Mistaken youth! she cried,
These are not what they seem; are not as we,
Not living substances, but pictur'd shapes,
Resemblances of life! by mixture form'd
Of light and shade, in sweet proportion join'd.
But hark! I hear, without, thy longing friends,
Who wait my summons, and reprove my stay.

To thy direction, cried th' enraptur'd youth,
To thy direction I commit my steps.
Lead on, be thou my guide, as late, so now,
In this new world, and teach me how to use
This wond'rous faculty; which thus, so soon
Mocks me with phantoms. Yet enough for me!
That all my past experience joins with this
To tell me I am happier than I know:
To tell me thou art Lydia! From whose side
I never more will part! with whom compar'd,

All others of her sex, however fair,
Shall be like painted unsubstantial forms.

So when the soul, inflam'd with strong desire
Of purer bliss, its earthly mansion leaves,
Perhaps some friendly genius, wont to steer
With ministerial charge, his dang'rous steps;
Perhaps some gentle partner of his toil,
More early blest, in radiant lustre clad,
And form celestial, meets his dazzled sight; fair,
And guides his way, through trackless fields of
To join, with rapt'rous joy, th' ethereal train.

Now to the midland search the muse returns.
For more, and still more busy scenes remain;
The promis'd schools of wise artificers
In brass and iron. But another school
Of gentler arts demands the muse's song,
Where first the learn'd to scan the measur'd verse,
And aukwardly her infant notes essay'd.

Hail, Solihul! respectful I salute
Thy walls; more awful once! when, from the sweets.

Of festive freedom, and domestic ease,
With throbbing heart, to the stern discipline
Of pedagogue morose I sad return'd.
But though no more his brow severe, nor dread
Of birchen sceptre awes my riper age,
A sterner tyrant rises to my view,
With deadlier weapon arm'd. Ah! critic! spare,
O! spare the muse, who feels her youthful fears
On thee transferr'd, and trembles at thy lash.
Against the venal tribe, that prostitutes
The tuneful art, to sooth the villain's breath,
To blazon fools, or feed the pamper'd lust
Of bloated vanity; against the tribe
Which casts its wanton jests at holy truths,
Or clothes, with virtue's garb, th' accursed train
Of loathsome vices, lift thy vengeful arm,
And all thy just severity exert.
Enough to venial faults, and hapless want
Of animated numbers, such as breathe
The soul of epic song, hath erst been paid
Within these walls, still stain'd with infant blood.

Yet may I not forget the pious care
Of love parental, anxious to improve
My youthful mind. Nor yet the debt disown
Due to severe restraint, and rigid laws,
The wholesome curb of passion's headstrong reign.
To them I owe that ere with painful toil,
Through Priscian's crabbed rules, laborious task!
I held my course, till the dull tirefome road
Plac'd me on elastic ground, that well repaid
The labours of the way. To them I owe
The pleasing knowledge of my youthful mates
Matur'd in age and honours. These among,
I gratefully whom Augustus's senate hails
Father! and, in each charge and high employ,
Found worthy all her love, with amplest trust,
And dignity invests. And well I ween,
Her tribunitial power, and purple pomp
On thee confers, in living manners school'd
To guard her weal, and vindicate her rights,
O Ladbroke! once in the same fortunes class'd
Of early life; with count'nance unestrang'd,
For ev'ry friendly deed still vacant found!

Nor can the muse, while she these scenes surveys,
Forget her Sheafstone, in the youthful toil

Affociate; whose bright dawn of genius oft Smooth'd my incondite verse; whose friendly voice

Call'd me from giddy sports to follow him
Intent on better themes—call'd me to taste
The charms of British song, the pictur'd page
Admire, or mark his imitative skill;
Or with him range in solitary shades,
And scoop rude grottos in the shelving bank.
Such were the joys that cheer'd life's early morn!
Such the strong sympathy of soul, that knit
Our hearts congenial in sweet amity!

On Cherwel's banks, by kindred science nurs'd;
And well matur'd in life's advancing stage,
When, on Ardena's plain, we fondly stray'd,
With mutual trust, and amicable thought;
Or in the social circle gaily join'd;
Or round his Leafow's happy circuit rovd';
On hill, and dale invoking ev'ry muse,
Nor Tempe's shade, nor Aganippe's fount
Envi'd; so willingly the dryads nurs'd
His groves; so lib'rally their crystal urns
The naiads pour'd, enchanted with their spells;
And pleas'd to see their overflowing streams
Led by his hand, in many a mazy line;
Or, in the copious tide, collected large,
Or tumbling from the rock, in sportive falls,
Now, from the lofty bank, precipitate;
And now, in gentler course, with murmurs soft
Soothing the ear; and now, in concert join'd,
Fall above fall, oblique and intricate,
Among the twisted roots. Ah! whilst I write,

In deeper murmur flows the sadd'ning stream;
Within the groves; and from the beautiful scene,
Its soft enchantments fly. No more for me
A charm it wears, since he alas! is gone,
Whose genius plann'd it, and whose spirit grac'd.
Ah! hourly does the fatal doom pronounce'd
Against rebellious sin, some social band
Dissolve, and leave a thousand friends to weep,
Soon such themselves, as those they now lament!
This mournful tribute to thy mem'ry paid!
The muse pursues her solitary way;
But heavily pursues, since thou art gone,
Whose counsel brighten'd, and whose friendship shar'd

The pleasing task. Now Brémicham! to thee
She steers her flight, and, in thy busy scenes,
Seeks to refrain a while the starting tear.

Yet ere her song describes the smoky forge,
Or sounding anvil, to the dusky heath
Her gentle train she leads. What, though no grain

Or herbage sweet, or waving woods adorn
Its dreary surface, yet it bears within
A richer treasury. So worthy minds
Oft lurk beneath a rude unsightly form.
More hapless they! that few observers search,
Studios to find this intellectual ore,
And stamp with gen'rous deed its current worth.
Here many a merchant turns adventurer,
Encourag'd, not disgust'd. Interest thus,
On sordid minds, with stronger impulse works,
Than virtue's heav'nly flame. Yet Providence
Converts to gen'ral use man's selfish ends.
Hence are the hungry fed, the naked cloth'd,
The wintry damps dispell'd, and social mirth

Exults, and glows before the blazing hearth.

When likely signs th' advent'rous search invite,
A cunning artist tries the latent soil:
And if his subtle engine, in return,
A brittle mass contains of fable hue,
Strait he prepares th' obstructing earth to clear,
And raise the crumbling rock. A narrow pass
Once made, wide, and more wide the gloomy cave
Stretches its vaulted isles, by num'rous hands
Hourly extended. Some the pick-axe ply,
Loos'ning the quarry from its native bed.
Some wait it into light. Thus the grim ore,
Here useless, like the miser's brighter hoard,
Is from its prison brought, and sent abroad,
The frozen hours to cheer, to minister
To needful sustenance and polish'd arts.
Meanwhile the subterraneous city spreads
Its covert streets, and echoes with the noise
Of swarthy slaves, and instruments of toil.
They, such the force of custom's pow'ful laws!
Pursue their sooty labours, destitute
Of the sun's cheering light and genial warmth,
And oft a chilling damp, or unctuous mist,
Loos'd from the crumbly caverns, issues forth,
Stopping the springs of life. And oft the flood,
Diverted from its course, in torrents pours,
Drowning the nether world. To cure these ills
Philosophy two curious arts supplies,
To drain th' imprison'd air, and, in its place,
More pure convey, or, with impetuous force,
To raise the gather'd torrents from the deep.
One from the * wind its salutary pow'r
Derives, thy charity to sick'ning crowds,
From cheerful haunts, and nature's balmy draughts
Cônfin'd; O friend of man, illustrious † Hales!
That, stranger still! its influence owes to air ‡,
By cold and heat alternate now condens'd,
Now rarified. Agent! to vulgar thought
How seeming weak, in act how pow'ful seen!
So Providence, by instruments despis'd,
All human force, and policy confounds.

But who that fiercer element can rule?
When, in the nitrous cave, the kindling flame,
By pitchy vapours fed, from cell to cell,
With fury spreads, and the wide fuell'd earth,
Around with greedy joy, receives the blaze.
By its own entrails nourish'd, like those mounts
Vesuvian, or Ætnean, still it wastes,
And still new fuel for its rapine finds
Exhaustless. Wretched he! who journeying late,
O'er the parch'd heath, bewild'rd, seeks his way.
Oft will his snorting steed, with terror struck,
His wonted speed refuse, or start aside,
With rising smoke, and ruddy flame annoy'd.
While, at each step, his trembling rider quakes,
Appall'd with thoughts of bog, or cavern'd pit,
Or treach'rous earth, subsiding where they tread,
Tremendous passage to the realms of death!

Yet want there not ev'n here some lucid spots
The smoky scene to cheer, and by contrast,

* The ventilator.

More fair. Such Dartmouth's cultivated * lawns!
Himself, distinguish'd more with ornament
Of cultur'd manners, and supernal light!
Such † thine, O Bridgman! such—but envious
time

Forbids the muse to these fair scenes to rove,
Still minding her of her unfinished theme,
From russet heaths, and smould'ring furnaces,
To trace the progress of thy steely arts,
‡ Queen of the founding anvil! Aston||, thee,
And § Edgbaston, with hospitable shade,
And rural pomp invest. O! warn thy sons;
When, for a time their labours they forget,
Not to molest these peaceful solitudes.

So may the masters of the beauteous-scene,
Protect thy commerce, and their toil reward.

Nor does the barren soil conceal alone
The sable rock inflammable. Oft-times
More pond'rous ore beneath its surface lies,
Compact, metallic, but with earthy parts
Incrusted. These the smoky kiln consumes,
And to the furnace's impetuous rage
Consigns the solid ore. In the fierce heat
The pure dissolves, the dross remains behind.
This push'd aside, the trickling metal flows
Through secret valves along the channell'd floor,
Where in the mazy moulds of figur'd sand,
Anon it hardens. Now the busy forge
Reiterates its blows, to form the bar
Large, massy, strong. Another art expands,
Another yet divides the yielding mass
To many a taper length, fit to receive
The artist's will, and take its destin'd form.

Soon o'er thy furrow'd pavement, Bremicham!
Ride the loose bars obstreperous; to the fous
Of languid sense, and frame too delicate,
Harsh noise perchance, but harmony to thine.

Instant innumerable hands prepare
To shape, and mould the malleable ore.
Their heavy sides th' inflated bellows heave, Tugg'd by the pulley'd line, and, with their blast

Continuous, the sleeping embers rouse,
And kindle into life. Strait the rough mass,
Plung'd in the blazing hearth, its heat contracts,
And glows transparent. Now, Cyclopean chief!
Quick on the anvil lay the burning bar,
And with thy lusty fellows, on its sides
Impress the weighty stroke. See, how they strain
The swelling nerve, and lift the sinewy ¶ arm
In measur'd time; while with their clatt'ring blows,

From street to street the propagated sound
Increasing echoes, and, on ev'ry side,
The tortur'd metal spreads a radiant glow'r.
'Tis noise, and hurry all! The thronged street,
The close-pil'd warehouse, and the busy shop!

With nimble stroke the tinkling hammers move;
While slow, and weighty the vast sledge descends,
In solemn bass responsive, or apart,
Or socially conjoin'd in tuneful peal.
The rough file * grates; yet useful is its touch,
As sharp corrosives to the ichirrous flesh,
Or, to the stubborn temper, keen rebuke.

How the coarse metal brightens into fame,
Shap'd by their plastic hands! what ornament!
What various use! See there the glitt'ring knife
Of temper'd edge! The scissars' double shaft,
Useless apart, in social union join'd,
Each aiding each! Emblem how beautiful
Of happy nuptial leagues! The button round,
Plain or imboit, or bright with steely rays!
Or oblong buckle, on the lacker'd shoe,
With polish'd lustre, bending elegant
Its shapely rim. But who can count the forms
That hourly from the glowing embers rise,
Or shine attractive through the glitt'ring pane,
And emulate their parent fires? what art
‡ Can, in the scanty bounds of measur'd verse,
Display the treasure of a thousand mines
To wond'rous shapes by stubborn labour wrought?

Nor this alone thy praise. Of various grains
Thy sons a compound form, and to the fire
Commit the precious mixture, if perchance
Some glitt'ring mass may bless their midnight toil,

Or glossy varnish, or enamel fair,
To shame the pride of China or Japan.
Nor wanting is the graver's pointed steel,
Nor pencil, wand'ring o'er the polish'd plate,
With glowing tints, and mimic life endued.
Thine too, of graceful form, the letter'd type!
The friend of learning; and the poet's pride!
Without thee what avail his splendid aims,
And midnight labours? Painful drugery!
And pow'rless effort! But the thought of thee
Imprints fresh vigour on his panting breast,
As thou ere long shalt on his work impress;
And, with immortal fame, his praise repay.

Hail, native British ore! of thee possess'd,
We envy not Golconda's sparkling mines,
Nor thine, Potosi! nor thy kindred hills,
Teeming with gold. What? though in outward form

Less fair? not less thy worth. To thee we owe
More riches than Peruvian mines can yield,
Or Montezuma's crowded magazines,
And palaces could boast, though roof'd with gold.
Splendid barbarity! and rich distress!
Without the social arts and useful toil;
That polish life, and civilize the mind!
These are thy gifts, which gold can never buy.

Thine is the praise to cultivate the soil;
To bare its inmost strata to the sun;
To break and meliorate the stiffen'd clay,
And from its close confinement, set at large
Its vegetative virtue. Thine it is

Go now, and see, if, to the Silver's edge,
The reedy stalk will yield its bearded store,
In weighty sheafs. Or if the stubborn marble,
In sidelong rows, with easy force will rise
Before the silver plowshare's glitt'ring point.
Or wou'd your gen'rous horses tread more fast
On plated gold? Your wheels, with swifter force
On golden axles move? Then grateful own,
Britannia's sons! Heav'n's providential love,
That gave you real wealth, not wealth in show,
Whose price in bare imagination lies,
And artificial compact. Thankful ply
Your iron arts, and rule the vanquish'd world.

Hail, native ore! without thy pow'rful aid,
We still had liv'd in huts, with the green sod,
And broken branches roof'd. Thine is the plane,
The chissel thine; which shape the well-arch'd dome,

The graceful portico; and sculptur'd walls.

Wou'd ye your coarse, unsightly mines exchange
For Mexicanian hills? to tread on gold,
As vulgar sand? with naked limbs to brave
The cold, bleak air? to urge the tedious chase,
By painful hunger stung, with artless toil,
Through gloomy forests, where the founding axe,
To the sun's beam, ne'er op'd the cheerful glade,
Nor culture's healthful face was ever seen!
In squalid huts to lay your weary limbs,
Bleeding, and faint, and strangers to the bliss
Of home-felt ease, which British swains can earn,
With a bare spade; but ill alas! cou'd earn,
With spades of gold? Such the poor Indian's lot!
Who starves 'midst gold, like misers o'er their bags;

Not with like guilt! Hail, native British ore!
For thine is trade, that with its various stores,
Sails round the world, and visits ev'ry clime,
And makes the treasures of each clime her own,
By gainful commerce of her woolly vests,
Wrought by the spiky comb; or steely wares,
From the coarse mass, by stubborn toil, refin'd.
Such are thy peaceful gifts! And war to thee
Its best support, and deadliest horror owes,
The glitt'ring falchion, and the thund'ring tube!
At whose tremendous gleam, and volley'd fire,
Barbarian kings fly from their useles boards,
And yield them all to thy superior pow'r.

IN purple vestments clad, the temper'd sky
Invites us from our hospitable roof,
To taste her influence mild; while to the west
The jocund sun his radiant chariot drives,
With rapid course, untir'd. Ye nymphs and swains!

Now quit the shade, and, with recruited strength,
Along the yet untrodden terrace urge
Your vig'rous steps. With moderated heat,
And ray oblique, the sun shall not o'erpow'r,
But kindly aid your yet unfinish'd search.

Not after sable night, in silence hush'd,
More welcome is th' approach of op'ning morn,
"With song of early birds," than the fresh breeze
Of soften'd air succeeding sultry heat,
And the wild tumult of the buzzing day.

Nor think, though much is past, that nought remains,

Or nought of beauty, or attractive worth,
Save what the morning-sun, or noon-tide ray,
Hath, with his rising beam, distinctly mark'd,
Or more confus'dly, with meridian blaze,
Dazz'ling display'd imperfect. Downward he Shall other hills illumine opposite,
And other vales as beauteous as the past;
Suggesting to the muse new argument,
And fresh instruction for her closing lay.

There Dasset's ridgy mountain courts the song.
Scarce Malvern boasts his adverse boundary

Admiring. * Newbold there her modest charms
More bashfully unveils, with solemn woods,
And verdant glades enamour'd. Here her lawns,
And rising groves for future shelter form'd,
Fair † Coton wide displays. There Addison,
With mind serene, his moral theme revolv'd,
Instruction dress'd in learning's fairest form!
The gravest widow with the liveliest wit
Attempter'd! or, beneath thy roof retir'd
O † Bilton much of peace, and liberty
Sublimely mus'd, on Britain's weal intent,
Or in thy shade the coy Pierians woo'd.

Another theme demands the varying song.
Lo! where but late the flocks, and heifers graz'd,
Or yellow harvests wav'd, now through the vale,
Or o'er the plain, or round the flanting hill
A glitter'ing path attracts the gazer's eye,
Where footy barques pursue their liquid track
Through lawns, and woods, and villages remote
From public haunt, which wonder as they pass.
The channell'd road still onward moves, and still
With level course, the flood attendant leads.
Hills, dales oppose in vain. A thousand hands
Now through the mountain's side a passage ope,
Now with stupendous arches bridge the vale,
Now over paths, and rivers—urge their way
Aloft in air. Again the Roman pride
Beneath thy spacious camp embattel'd hill,
O † Brinklow! seems with gentler arts return'd.
But Britain now no bold invader fears,
No foreign aid invokes. Alike in arts
Of peace, or war renown'd. Alike in both
She rivals ancient Rome's immortal fame.

Still villas fair, and populous towns remain—
Polesworth, and Atherstone, and Eaton's walls
To charity devote! and Tamworth, thine
To martial fame! and thine, O † Merival!
Boasting thy beauteous woods, and lofty scite!
And † Colehill! long for momentary date

Rejoicing in his care, to whom adorn'd
 With all the graces which her schools expound,
 The gowny son's of Isis trust their own,
 And Britain's weal. Nor shall thy splendid walls,
 O * Packington! allure the muse in vain.
 The Goths no longer here their empire hold.
 The shaven-terrac'd hill, slope above slope,
 And high imprising walls to Belgia's coast
 Their native clime retire.—In formal bounds
 The long canal no more confines the stream
 Reluctant.—Trees no more their tortur'd limbs
 Lament—no more the long-neglected fields,
 Like outlaws banish'd for some vile offence,
 Are hid from sight—from its proud reservoir
 Of amplest size, and fair indented form,
 Along the channell'd lawn the copious stream
 With winding grace the stately current leads.
 The channell'd lawn its bounteous stream repays,
 With ever-verdant banks, and cooling shades,
 And wand'ring paths, that emulate its course.
 On ev'ry side spreads wide the beauteous scene,
 Assemblage fair of plains, and hills, and woods,
 And plants, of od'rous scent—plains, hills, and woods,
 And od'rous plants rejoice, and smiling hail
 The reign of nature, while attendant art
 Submissive waits to cultivate her charms.

Hail happy land! which nature's partial smile
 Hath rob'd profusely gay! whose champagnes wide

With plenteous harvests wave; whose pastures
 With horned tribes, or the sheep's fleecy race;
 To the throng'd shambles yielding wholesome food,
 And various labour to man's active powers,
 Not less benign than to the weary rest.
 Nor destitute thy woodland scenes of wealth,
 Or sylvan beauty! there the lordly swain
 His scantier fields improves; o'er his own realms
 Supreme, at will to sow his well-fenc'd glebe,
 With grain successive; or with juicy herbs,
 To swell his milky kine; or feed, at ease,
 His flock in pastures warm. His blazing hearth,
 With copious fuel heap'd, defies the cold;
 And housewife-arts or tease the tangl'd wool,
 Or, from the distaff's hoard, the ductile thread,
 With sportive hand entice; while to the wheel
 The sprightly carol join'd, or plaintive song
 Diffuse, and artless sooths th' untutor'd ear
 With heart-felt strains, and the slow task beguiles.

Nor hath the sun, with less propitious ray,
 Shone on the masters of the various scene.
 Witness the splendid train! illustrious names,
 That claim precedence on the lists of fame,
 Nor fear oblivious time! enraptur'd bards!
 Or learned sages! gracing, with their fame,
 Their native soil, and my aspiring verse.

Say, now my dear companions! for enough
 Of leisure to descriptive song is giv'n;
 Say, shall we, ere we part, with moral eye,
 The scene review, and the gay prospect close
 With observation grave, as sober eve
 Hastes now to wrap in shades the closing day?
 Perhaps the moral strain delights you not!
 Perhaps you blame the muse's quick retreat;
 Intent to wander still along the plain,
 In coverts cool, lull'd by the murm'ring stream,

Or gentle breeze; while playful fancy skims,
 With careless wing, the surfaces of things:
 For deep research too indolent, too light
 For grave reflection. So the Syren queen
 Tempted Alcides, on a flow'ry plain,
 With am'rous blandishment, and urg'd to waste
 His prime inglorious: but fair virtue's form
 Rescu'd the yielding youth, and fir'd his breast
 To manly toil, and glory's well-earn'd prize.
 O! in that dang'rous season, O! beware
 Of vice, envenom'd weed! and plant betimes
 The seeds of virtue in th' untainted heart.
 So on its fruit th' enraptur'd mind shall feast,
 When, to the smiling day, and mirthful scene
 Night's solemn gloom, cold winter's chilling blasts,
 And pain, and sickness, and old age succeed.
 Nor slight your faithful guide, my gentle train;
 But, with a curious eye, expatiate free [theme,
 O'er nature's moral plan. Though dark the Though formidable to the sensual mind;
 Yet shall the muse, with no fictitious aid,
 Inspir'd, still guide you with her friendly voice,
 And to each seeming ill some greater good
 Oppose, and calm your lab'ring thoughts to rest.

Nature herself bids us be serious,
 Bids us be wise; and all her works rebuke
 The ever-thoughtless, ever-titt'ring tribe.
 What though her lovely hills, and valleys smile
 To-day, in beauty dress'd? yet ere three moons
 Renew their orb, and to their wane decline,
 Ere then the beauteous landscape all will fade;
 The genial airs retire; and shiv'ring swains
 Shall, from the whiten'd plain, and driving storm,
 Avert the smarting cheek, and humid eye.

So some fair maid to time's devouring rage
 Her bloom resigns, and, with a faded look,
 Disgusts her paramour; unless thy charms,
 O virtue! with more lasting beauty grace
 Her lovelier mind, and through declining age,
 Fair deeds of piety, and modest worth,
 Still flourish, and endear her still the more.

Nor always lasts the landscape's gay attire
 Till furly winter with his ruffian blasts,
 Benumbs her tribes, and dissipates her charms.
 As sickness oft the virgin's early bloom
 Spoils immature, preventing hoary age,
 So blasts and mildews oft invade the fields
 In all their beauty, and their summer's pride.
 And oft the sudden show'r, or sweeping * storm
 O'erflows the meads, and to the miry glebe
 Lays close the matted grain; with awful peal,
 While the loud thunder shakes a guilty world,
 And forked lightnings cleave the sultry skies.

Nor does the verdant mead, or bearded field
 Alone the rage of angry skies sustain.
 Oft-times their influence dire the bleating flock,
 Or lowing herd assails, and mocks the force
 Of costly med'cine, or attendant care.
 Such late the wrathful pestilence, that seiz'd
 In pastures far retir'd, or guarded stalls,
 The dew-lap'd race! with plaintive lowings they,

* "Sæpe etiam immensum cælo venit agnem
 "aquarum,

"Et sædam glomerant tempestatem imbribus atris
 "Collectæ ex alto nubes; ruit arduus æther,
 "Et pluvia ingenti fata læta, boumque labores
 "Diluit."

* The feat of the Right Hon. the Earl of Aylesford.

And heavy eyes, confess'd the pois'nous gale,
 And drank infection in each breath they drew.
 Quick through their veins the burning fever ran,
 And from their nostrils stream'd the putrid rheum
 Malignant; o'er their limbs faint languors crept,
 And it stupefaction all their senses bound.
 In vain their master, with officious hand,
 From the pill'd mow the sweetest lock presents;
 Or anxiously prepares the tepid draught
 Balsamic; they the proffer'd dainty lothe,
 And * death exulting claims his destin'd prey.

Nor freedom † coughs, and wat'ry rheums afflict
 The woolly tribes, and on their vitals seize;
 Thinning their folds; and, with their mangled
 limbs,

And tatter'd fleeces, the averted eye
 Disgusting, as the squeamish traveller,
 With long-suspended breath, hies o'er the plain.
 And is their lord, proud man! more safe than they?

More privileg'd from the destroying breath,
 That, through the secret shade, in darkness walks,
 Or smites whole pastures at the noon of day?
 Ah! no, death mark'd him from his infant birth:
 Mark'd for his own, and with envenom'd touch,
 His vital blood desil'd. Through all his veins
 The subtle poison creeps; compounded joins
 Its kindred mafs to his increasing bulk;
 And, to the rage of angry elements,
 Betrays his victim, poor ill-fated man;
 Not surer born to live, than born to die!

In what a sad variety of forms
 Clothes he his messengers? Deliriums wild!
 Inflated dropsy! slow consuming cough!
 Jaundice, and gout, and stone; convulsive spasms;
 The shaking head, and the contracted limb;
 And ling'ring atrophy, and hoary age;
 And second childhood, slack'ning ev'ry nerve,
 To joy, to reason, and to duty dead!

I know thee, who thou art, offspring of Sin,
 And Satan! nurs'd in hell, and then let loose
 To range, with thy accursed train, on earth,
 When man, apostate man! by Satan's wiles,
 From life, from bliss, from God, and goodness fell!
 Who knows thee not? who feels thee not within,
 Plucking his heart-strings? whom hast thou not robb'd

Of parent, wife, or friend, as thou hast me?
 Glutting the grave with ever-crowding guests,
 And, with their image, sadd'ning ev'ry scene,
 Lest peopled with the living than the dead!

Through populous streets the never-ceasing bell
 Proclaims, with solemn sound, the parting breath;
 Nor seldom from the village-tow'r is heard
 The mournful knell. Alike the grassy ridge,
 With osiers bound, and vaulted catacomb,
 His spoils enclose. Alike the simple stone,
 And mausoleum proud, his pow'r attest,

* "Hinc lætis vituli vulgo moriuntur in herbis,
 Et dulces animas plena ad præsepia recludunt."

In wretched doggrel, or elab'rate verse.

Perhaps the peasant's humble obsequies;
 The flowing sheet, and pall of rusty hue,
 Alarm you not. You slight the simple throng;
 And for the nodding plumes, and scutcheon'd
 herse,

Your tears reserve. Then mark, o'er yonder plain,
 The grand procession suited to your taste.
 I mock you not. The fable pursuivants Proclaim th' approaching state. Lo! now the plumes!

The nodding plumes, and scutcheon'd herse ap-
 And clad in mournful weeds, a long sad train
 Of slowly-moving pomp, that waits on death!
 Nay—yet another melancholy train!

Another triumph of the ghostly fiend
 Succeeds! 'Tis so. Perhaps ye have not heard
 The mournful tale. Perhaps no messenger
 Hath warn'd you to attend the solemn deed!
 Then from the muse the piteous story learn;

And, with her, on the grave procession wait,
 That to their early tomb, to mould'ring dust
 Of ancestors, that crowd the scanty vault,
 Near which our song began, * Northampton bears,
 The gay Northampton, and his beauteous † bride!

Far other pageants in his youthful breast
 He cherish'd, while, with delegated trust,
 On stately ceremonials, to the shore,
 Where Adria's waves the sea-girt city lave,
 He went; and with him, join'd in recent love,
 His blooming bride, of Beauford's royal line,
 The charming Somerset! But royal blood,
 Nor youth, nor beauty, nor employment high,
 Could grant protection from the rude assault
 Of that barbarian death; who, without form,
 To courts and cottages unbidden comes;

And his unwelcome embassy fulfils,
 Without distinction, to the lofty peer,
 The graceful bride, or peasant's homely race.
 Ere from her native soil she saw the sun
 Run half his annual course, in Latian climes,
 She breath'd her last; him, ere that course was done,

Death met returning on the Gallie plains,
 And sent to join her yet unburied dust:
 Who but this youthful pair's untimely fate
 Must weep, who but in theirs may read their own?

Another lesson seek ye, other proof
 Of vanity, and lamcutable woe
 Betiding man? Another scene to grace
 With troops of victims the terrific king,
 And humble wanton folly's laughing sons?
 The muse shall from her faithful memory
 A tale select; a tale big with the fate
 Of kings, and heroes on this now fair field
 Embattled! but her song shall to your view
 Their ranks embody, and to future peace
 Their fierce designs and hostile rage convert.

Not on Pharsalia's plain a bolder strife
 Was held, though twice with Roman blood dis-
 stain'd,

Than when thy subjects, first imperial Charles!

* The Right Hon. the Earl of Northampton, who died on his return from an embassy to Venice, while the author was writing this poem.

† The Right Hon. the Countess of Northampton, daughter to the Duke of Beaufort.

Dar'd in these fields with arms their cause to plead.
 * Where once the Romans pitch'd their hostile tents,
 Other Campanias fair, and milder Alps
 Exploring, now a nobler warrior flood,
 His country's sov'reign liege! Around his camp
 A gallant train of loofest rank attend,
 By loyalty and love of regal sway
 To mighty deeds impell'd. Meanwhile below
 Others no less intrepid courage boast,
 From source as fair, the love of liberty!
 Dear liberty! when rightly understood,
 Prime social bliss! Oh! may no fraud
 Usurp thy name, to veil their dark designs
 Of vile ambition, or licentious rage!

Long time had they, with charge of mutual blame,

And fierce debate of speech, discordant minds
 Avow'd, yet not to desp'rate chance of war
 Till now their cause referr'd: rude arbiter
 Of fit and right! Unhappy native land!
 Nought then avail'd that nature form'd thy fields
 So fair, and with her wat'ry barrier fenc'd!
 Nought then avail'd thy forms of guardian laws,
 The work of ages, in a moment lost,
 And ev'ry social tie at once dissolv'd!
 For now no more sweet peace, and order fair,
 And kindred love remain'd, but hostile rage
 Instead, and mutual jealousy, and hate,
 And tumult loud! nor, hadst thou then been there,
 † O Talbot! could thy voice, so often heard
 On heav'nly themes! nor ‡ his fraternal! skill'd
 In social claims, the limits to define
 Of law and right, have calm'd the furious strife,
 Or still'd the rattling thunder of the field.

Across the plain, where the slight eminence
 And scatter'd hedge-rows mark a midway space
 To yonder || town, once decm'd a royal court,
 Now harbouring no friends to royalty!
 The popular troops their martial lines extend.
 High on the hill the royal banners wave
 Their faithful signals. Rang'd along the steep,
 The glitt'ring files, in burnish'd armour clad,
 Reflect the downward sun, and with its gleam
 The distant crowds affright, who trembling wait
 For the dire onset, and the dubious fight.

As pent-up waters, swell'd by sudden rains,
 Their former bounds disdain, and foam, and rage,
 Impatient of restraint, till at some breach
 Outward they burst impetuous, and mock
 The peasant's soeble toil, which strives to check
 Their headlong torrent; so the royal troops,
 With martial rage inflam'd, impatient wait
 The trumpet's summons. At its sprightly call
 The airy feat they leave, and down the steep,
 Rank following rank, like wave succeeding wave,
 Rush on the hostile wings. Dire was the shock,
 Dire was the clash of arms! The hostile wings
 Give way, and soon in flight their safety seek.

* A Roman camp at Warmington, on the top of Edge-Hill.

† The Rev. Mr. Talbot, of Kington, ‡ Cb. Henry Talbot, Esq. of Marston, at the bottom of Edge-Hill.

|| Kington, alias Kington. So called, as some conjecture, from a castle on a neighbouring hill, said to have been a palace belonging to King John.

They with augmented force and growing rage
 The flying foe pursue. But too secure,
 And counting of cheap conquest quickly gain'd
 O'er dastard minds, in wordy quarrels bold,
 But slack by deeds to vindicate their claim,
 In chase and plunder long they waste the day,
 And late return, of order negligent.
 Meanwhile the battle in the centre rag'd
 With diff'rent fortune, by bold Essex led,
 Experienc'd chief! and to the monarch's cause,
 And youthful race, for martial deeds unripe,
 Menac'd destruction. In the royal breast
 High passions rose, by native dignity
 Made more sublime, and urg'd to pow'ful act
 By strong, * paternal love, and proud disdain
 Of vulgar minds, arrainging in his race
 The rights of sov'reignty, from ancient kings
 In order fair deriv'd. Amidst his troops
 With haste he flies, their broken ranks reforms,
 To bold revenge reanimates their rage,
 And from the foe his short-liv'd honour wrests.
 Now death, with hasty stride, stalks o'er the field,

Grimly exulting in the bloody fray.
 Now on the crested helm or burning shield
 He stamps new horrors; now the levell'd sword
 With weightier force impels, with iron hoof
 Now tramples on th' expiring ranks, or gores
 The foaming steed against th' opposing spear.
 But chiefly on the cannon's brazen orb
 He sits triumphant, and with fatal aim
 Involves whole squadrons in the sulph'rous storm.
 Then † Lindsey fell, nor from the shelt'ring straw

Ceas'd he to plead his sov'reign's slighted cause
 Amidst surrounding foes, nor but with life
 Expir'd his loyalty. His valiant son ‡
 Attempts his rescue, but attempts in vain!
 Then || Verney too, with many a gallant knight,
 And faithful courtier, anxious for thy weal,
 Unhappy prince! but mindless of their own,
 Pour'd out his life upon the crimson plain.
 Then fell the gallant § Stewart, ¶ Aubigny,
  And Kingsmill! He whose monumental stone
 Protects his neighb'ring ashes and his fame.

The closing day compos'd the furious strife;
 But for short time compos'd! anon to wake
 With tenfold rage, and spread a wider scene
 Of terror and destruction o'er the land!

Now mark the glories of the great debate!
 You grafs-green mount, where waves the planted pine,
 And whispers to the winds the mournful tale,

* Prince Charles, afterwards King Charles II. and his brother the Duke of York, afterwards
 King James II. were then in the field, the former being in the 13th, and the latter just entered into the 10th year of his age.

† Earl of Lindsey, the King's general.
 ‡ Lord Willoughby, son to the Earl of Lindsey.
 § Sir Edmund Verney, standard-bearer to the king.

|| Lord Stewart.
 ¶ Lord Aubigny, son to the Duke of Lenox.
  Captain Kingsmill, buried at Radway.

Contains them in its monumental mould;
 A slaughter'd crew, promiscuous lodg'd below!
 Still as the ploughman breaks the clotted glebe,
 He ever and anon some trophy finds,
 The * relics of the war—or rusty spear,
 Or canker'd ball; but from sepulchral soil
 Cautious he turns aside the shining steel,
 Left haply at its touch uncover'd bones
 Should start to view, and blast his rural toil.

Such were the fruits of passion, froward will,
 And unsubmitting pride! Worse storms than those
 That rend the sky, and waste our cultur'd fields:
 Strangers alike to man's primeval state,
 Ere evil entrance found to this fair world,
 Permitted, not ordain'd, whatever pride
 May dream of order in a world of sin,
 Or pre-existent soul, and penal doom
 For crimes unknown. More wise, more happy he!
 Who in his breast oft pond'ring, and perplex'd
 With endless doubt, and learning's fruitless toil,
 His weary mind at length reposes sure
 On Heav'n's attested oracles. To them
 Submits he bows, convinc'd, however weak
 His reason the mysterious plan to solve,
 That all he wills is right, who, ere the worlds
 Were form'd, in his all-comprehensive mind
 Saw all that was, or is, or e'er shall be.
 Who to whate'er exists, or lives, or moves,
 Throughout creation's wide extent, gave life,
 Gave being, pow'r, and thought to act, to move
 Impelling, or impell'd, to all ordain'd
 Their ranks, relations, and dependencies,
 And can direct, suspend, controul their pow'rs,
 Else were he not supreme! Who bids the winds
 Be still, and they obey; who to the sea
 Assigns its bounds, and calms its bolstering waves;
 Who, with like ease, can moral discord rule,
 And all apparent evil turn to good.

Hail then, ye sons of Eve! th' unerring guide,
 The sovereign grant receive, sin's antidote!
 A cure for all our griefs! So heav'nly truth
 Shall wide display her captivating charms,
 And peace her dwelling fix with human race.
 So love through ev'ry clime his gentle reign
 Shall spread, and at his call discordant realms Shall beat their swords to ploughshares, and their spears

To pruning-hooks, nor more learn murd'rous war.
 So when revolving years, by Heav'n's decree,
 Their circling course have run, new firmaments,
 With blessings fraught, shall fill the bright expanse,

Of tempests void, and thunder's angry voice.
 New verdure shall arise to clothe the fields;
 New Edens, teeming with immortal fruit.
 No more the wing'd inhabitants of air,
 Or those that range the fields, or skim the flood,
 Their fierceness shall retain, but brute with brute,
 And all with man in amicable league
 Shall join, and enmity for ever cease.

* " Scilicet et tempus veniet, cum finibus illis,

Remains there aught to crown the rapt'rous
 theme?

'Tis this, unfading joy beyond the reach
 Of elemental worlds and short-liv'd time.
 This too is yours—from outward sense conceal'd,
 But, by resemblance of external things,
 Inward display'd, to elevate the soul
 To thoughts sublime, and point her way to heav'n.

So, from the top of Nebo's lofty mount,
 The patriot leader of Jehovah's sons
 The promis'd land survey'd; to Canaan's rate
 A splendid theatre of frantic joys,
 And fatal mirth, beyond whose scanty bounds
 Darkness and horror dwell! Emblem to him
 Of fairer fields and happier seats above!
 Then clos'd his eyes to mortal scenes, to wake
 In the bright regions of eternal day.

LABOUR AND GENIUS;

OR, THE MILL-STREAM AND THE CASCADE.

A FABLE.

Inscribed to William Shenstone, Esq.

— " discordia femina rerum." OVID.

NATURE with lib'ral hand dispenses
 Her apparatus of the senses,
 In articles of gen'ral use,
 Nerves, sinews, muscles, bones profuse.
 Distinguishing her fav'rite race
 With form erect, and feature'd face;
 The flowing hair, the polish'd skin—
 But, for the furniture within,
 Whether it be of brains or lead,
 What matters it, so there's a head?
 For wisest noddle seldom goes,
 But as 'tis led by corp'ral nose.
 Nor is it thinking much, but doing,
 That keeps our tenements from ruin.
 And hundreds eat, who spin or knit,
 For one that lives by dint of wit.

The sturdy thresher plies his flail,
 And what to this doth wit avail?
 Who learns from wit to press the spade?
 Or thinks 'twould mend the cobbler's trade?
 The pedlar, with his cumb'rous pack,
 Carries his brains upon his back.
 Some wear them in full-bottom'd wig,
 Or hang them by with queue or pig.
 Reduc'd, till they return again
 In dishabille, to common men.
 Then why, my friend, is wit so rare?
 That sudden flash, that makes one stare!
 A meteor's blaze, a dazzling show!
 Say what it is, for well you know.
 Or, if you can with patience hear
 A witless fable, lend an ear.

BETWIXT two sloping verdant hills
 A current pour'd its careless rills,
 Which unambitious crept along,
 With weeds and matted gras o'erhung.
 Till rural genius, on a day,
 Chancing along its banks to stray,
 Remark'd, with penetrating look,
 The latent merits of the brook;

Much griev'd to see such talents hid,
And thus the dull by-standers chid.

How blind is man's incurious race
The scope of nature's plans to trace?
How do ye mangle half her charms,
And fright her hourly with alarms?
Disfigure now her swelling mounds,
And now contract her spacious bounds?
Fritter her fairest lawns to alleys,
Bare her green hills, and hide her valleys?
Confine her streams with rule and line,
And counteract her whole design?
Neglecting, where she points the way,
Her easy dictates to obey?
To bring her hidden worth to light,
And place her charms in fairest light?

Alike to intellectuals blind,
'Tis thus you treat the youthful mind;
Mistaking gravity for sense,
For dawn of wit, impertinence.

The boy of genuine parts and merit,
For some unlucky prank of spirit,
With frantic rage is scourg'd from school,
And branded with the name of fool,
Because his active blood flow'd faster
Than the dull puddle of his master.
While the slow plodder trots along
Through thick and thin, through prose and song,
Insensible of all their graces,
But learn'd in words and common phrases;
Till in due time he's mov'd to college,
To ripen these choice seeds of knowledge.

So some taste-pedant, wond'rous wise,
Exerts his genius in dirt-pies.
Delights the tonsile yew to raise,
But hates your laurels and your bays,
Because too rambling and luxuriant,
Like forward youths, of brain too purrient.
Makes puns and anagrams in box,
And turns his trees to bears and cocks.
Excels in quaint jette-d'eau or fountain,
Or leads his stream across a mountain,
To show its shallowness and pride,
In a broad grin, on t'other side.
Perverting all the rules of sense,
Which never offers violence,
But gently leads where nature tends,
Sure with applause to gain its ends.

But one example may teach more
Than precepts hackney'd o'er and o'er.
Then mark this rill, with weeds o'erhung,
Unnotic'd by the vulgar throng!
Ev'n this, conducted by my laws,
Shall rise to fame, attract applause;
Instruēt in * fable, shine in song,
And be the theme of ev'ry tongue.
He said: and to his fav'rite son
Consign'd the task, and will'd it done.

Damon his counsel wisely weigh'd,
And carefully the scene survey'd.
And, though it seems he said but little,
He took his meaning to a tittle.

And first, his purpose to befriend,
A bank he rais'd at th' upper end:
Compact and close its outward side,
To stay and swell the gath'ring tide:
But on its inner, rough and tall,
A ragged cliff, a rocky wall.
The channel next he op'd to view,
And from its course the rubbish drew.
Enlarg'd it now, and now with line
Oblique, purfu'd his fair design.
Preparing here the mazy way,
And there the fall for sportive play;
The precipice abrupt and steep,
The pebbled road, and cavern deep;
The rooty seat, where best to view
The fairy scene, at distance due.
He last invok'd the dryads aid,
And fring'd the borders round with shade.
Tap'stry, by nature's fingers wove,
No mimic, but a real grove:
Part hiding, part admitting day,
The scene to grace the future play.

Damon perceives, with ravish'd eyes,
The beautiful enchantment rise.
Sees sweetly blended shade and light;
Sees ev'ry part with each unite;
Sees each, as he directs, assume
A livelier dye, or deeper gloom:
So fashion'd by the painter's skill,
New forms the glowing canvas fill:
So to the summer's sun the rose
And jessamin their charms disclose.

While, all intent on this retreat,
He saw his fav'rite work complete,
Divine enthusiasm seiz'd his breast,
And thus his transport he express'd:
"Let others toil for wealth or pow'r,
I court the sweetly-vacant hour:
Down life's smooth current calmly glide,
Nor vex'd with cares, nor rack'd with pride.
Give me, O nature! to explore
Thy lovely charms, I ask no more.
For thee I fly from vulgar eyes;
For thee I vulgar cares despise;
For thee ambition's charms resign;
Accept a vot'ry wholly thine.

Yet still let friendship's joys be near,
Still on these plains her train appear.
By learning's fons my haunts be trod,
And Stamford's feet imprint my sod.
For Stamford oft hath deign'd to stray
Around my leafsow's flow'ry way.
And, where his honour'd steps have rovd,
Oft have his gifts those scenes improv'd.
To him I'll dedicate my cell,
To him suspend the votive spell.
His name shall heighten ev'ry charm,
His name protect my groves from harm,
Protect my harmless sport from blame,
And turn obscurity to fame."

He spake. His hand the pencil guides,
And * Stamford o'er the scene presides.
The proud device, with borrow'd grace,
Confer'd new lustre on the place:

* See Fable XLI. and LI. in Dodley's new invented Fables, and many little pieces printed in the public papers.

* The scene here referred to, was inscribed to the Right Hon. the Earl of Stamford, but since to William Edenstone, Esq.

As books, by dint of dedication,
Enjoy their patron's reputation.

Now, launching from its lofty shore,
The loosen'd stream began to roar:
As headlong, from the rocky mound,
It rush'd into the vast profound.
There check'd awhile, again it flow'd
Glitt'ring along the channell'd road:
From steep to steep, a frequent fall,
Each diff'rent, and each natural.

Obstructing roots and rocks between,
Diversify th' enchanted scene;
While winding now, and intricate,
Now more develop'd, and in state,
Th' united stream, with rapid force,
Pursues amain its downward course,
Till at your feet absorb'd, it hides
Beneath the ground its bustling tides.

With prancing steeds and liv'ried trains,
Soon daily shone the bord'ring plains.
And distant sounds foretold th' approach
Of frequent chaise, and crowded coach.
For sons of taste, and daughters fair,
Hasted the sweet surprize to share:
While * Hagley wonder'd at their stay,
And hardly brook'd the long delay.

Not distant far below, a mill
Was built upon a neighb'ring rill:
Whose pent-up stream, whene'er let loose,
Impell'd a wheel, close at its sluice,
So strongly, that by friction's pow'r,
'T would grind the firmest grain to flour.
Or, by a correspondence new,
With hammers, and their clatt'ring crew,
Would so bestir her active stumps,
On iron blocks, though arrant lumps,
That in a trice she'd manage matters,
'To make 'em all as smooth as platters.
Or slit a bar to rods quite taper,
With as much ease as you'd cut paper.
For, though the lever gave the blow,
Yet it was lifted from below;
And would for ever have lain still,
But for the bustling of the rill;
Who, from her stately pool or ocean,
Put all the wheels and logs in motion;
Things in their nature very quiet,
'Though making all this noise and riot.

This stream that could in toil excel,
Began with foolish pride to swell:
Piqu'd at her neighbour's reputation,
And thus express'd her indignation:

"Madam! methinks you're vastly proud,
You wasn't us'd to talk so loud.

* The seat of the Right Hon. Lord Lyttleton, distant but a few miles from the Leasowes.

Nor cut such capers in your pace,
Marry! what antics, what grimace!
For shame! don't give yourself such airs,
In flaunting down those hideous stairs.
Nor put yourself in such a flutter,
Whate'er you do, you dirty gutter!
I'd have you know, you upstart nix!
Ere you were form'd, with all your sinks,
A lake I was, compar'd with which,
Your stream is but a paltry ditch:
And still, on honest labour bent,
I ne'er a single flash mispent.
And yet no folks of high degree,
Would e'er vouchsafe to visit me,
As in their coaches by they rattle,
Forsooth! to hear your idle prattle.
Though half the business of my flooding
Is to provide them cakes and pudding:
Or furnish stuff for many a trinket,
Which, though so fine, you scarce would think it,
When † Boulton's skill has fix'd their beauty,
To my rough toil first 'ow'd their duty.
But I'm plain Goody of the mill,
And you are—Madam Cascadille!"

"Dear Coz," reply'd the beauteous torrent,
"Pray do not discompose your current.
That we all from one fountain flow,
Hath been agreed on long ago.
Varying our talents and our tides,
As chance, or education guides.
That I have either note, or name,
I owe to him who gives me fame.
Who teaches all our kind to flow,
Or gaily swift, or gravely slow.
Now in the lake, with glassy face,
Now moving light, with dimpled grace,
Now gleaming from the rocky height,
Now, in rough eddies, foaming white.
Nor envy me the gay, or great,
That visit my obscure retreat.
None wonders that a clown can dig;
But 'tis some art to dance a jig.
Your talents are employ'd for use,
Mine to give pleasure, and amuse.
And though, dear Coz, no folks of taste
Their idle hours with you will waste,
Yet many a grist comes to your mill,
Which helps your master's bags to fill.
While I, with all my notes and trilling,
For Damon never got a shilling.
Then, gentle Coz, forbear your clamours,
Enjoy your hoppers, and your hammers:
We gain our ends by diff'rent ways,
And you get bread, and I get—praise.

MISCELLANEOUS PIECES.

ARDENNA.

A PASTORAL-ECLOGUE. TO A LADY.

Damon and Lycidas.

WHEN o'er the western world fair science spread
Her genial ray, and Gothic darkness fled,
To Britain's isle the muses took their way,
And taught her list'ning groves the tuneful lay.
'Twas then two swains the Doric reed essay'd
To sing the praises of a peerless maid.
On Arden's blissful plain her seat she chose,
And hence her rural name Ardenna rose.
In sportive verse alternately they vied,
Thus Damon sang, and Lycidas replied.

Damon.

Here, gentle swain, beneath the shade reclin'd,
Remit thy labours, and unbend thy mind.
Well with the shepherd's state our cares agree,
For nature prompts to pleasing industry.
'Tis this to all her gifts fresh beauty yields,
Health to our flocks, and plenty to our fields.
Yet hath she not impos'd unceasing toil,
Not restless plowshares always vex the soil.
Then, shepherd, take the blessings Heav'n bestows,
Assist the song, and sweeten our repose.

Lycidas.

While others, sunk in sleep, or live in vain,
Or, slaves of insolence, but wake to pain,
Me let the call of earliest birds invite
To hail th' approaches of returning light;
To taste the freshness of the cheerful morn,
While glitt'ring dew-drops hang on ev'ry thorn.
Hence all the bliss that centers in our kind,
Health to the blood, and vigour to the mind.
Hence ev'ry task its meet attendance gains,
And leisure hence to listen to thy strains.

Damon.

Thrice happy swain, so fitly form'd to share
The shepherd's labour, and Ardenna's care!
To tell Ardenna's praise the rural tram
Inscribe the verse, or chant it o'er the plain.
Plains, hills, and woods return the well-known
found,

And the smooth beech records the sportive wound.
Then, Lycidas, let us the chorus join,
So bright a theme our music shall refine.

Escap'd from all the busy world admires,
Hither the philosophic dame retires;
For in the busy world, or poets feign,
Intemp'rate vice, and giddy pleasures reign;
Then, when from crowds the loves, and graces flew,
To these lone shades the beautiful maid withdrew,
To study nature in this calm retreat,
And with confed'rate art her charms complete.
How sweet their union is, ye shepherds, say,
And thou who form'dst the reed inspire my lay.

VOL. XI.

Her praise I sing by whom our flocks are freed
From the rough bramble, and envenom'd weed;
Who to green pastures turns the dreary waste,
With scatter'd woods in careless beauty grac'd.

'Tis she, Ardenna! guardian of the scene,
Who bids the mount to swell, who smooths the green,

Who drains the marsh, and frees the straggling flood
From its divided rule, and strife with mud.
She winds its course the copious stream to show,
And he in swifter currents bids it flow;
Now smoothly gliding with an even pace,
Now dimpling o'er the stones with roughen'd grace:
With glassy surface now serenely bright,
Now foaming from the rock all silver white.

'Tis she the rising bank with beeches crowns,
Now spreads the scene, and now contracts its bounds.

Clothes the bleak hill with verdure ever gay,
And bids our feet through myrtle-valleys stray.
She for her shepherds rears the rooky shed,
The chequer'd pavement, and the straw-wove bed.

For them she scoops the grotto's cool retreat,
From storms a shelter, and a shade in heat.
Directs their hands the verdant arch to bend,
And with the leafy roof its gloom extend.
Shells, flint, and ore their mingled graces join,
And rocky fragments aid the chaste design.

Lycidas.

Hail happy laws! where'er we turn our eyes,

Fresh beauties bloom, and opening wonders rise.
Whilome these charming scenes with grief I view'd

A barren waste, a dreary solitude!
My drooping flocks their rust' pastures mourn'd,
And lowing herds the plaintive moan return'd.
With weary feet from field to field they stray'd,
Nor found their hunger's painful sense allay'd,
But now no more a dreary scene appears,
No more its prickly boughs the bramble rears,
No more my flocks lament th' unfruitful soil,
Nor mourn their ragged fleece, or fruitless toil.

Damon.

As this fair lawn excels the rushy mead,
As firs the thorn, and flow'rs the poisonous weed,
Far as the warbling sky-larks soar on high,
Above the clumby bat, or buzzing fly;
So matchless moves Ardenna o'er the green,
In mind alike excelling as in mien.

Lycidas.

Sweet is the fragrance of the damask rose,
And bright the dye that on its surface glows,
Fair is the poplar rising on the plain,
Of shapely trunk, and lofty branches vain;

Y y

But neither sweet the rose, nor bright its dye,
Nor poplar fair, if with her charms they vie.

Damon.

Grateful is sunshine to the sportive lambs,
The balmy dews delight the nibbling dams;
But kindlier warmth Ardena's fumes impart,
A balm more rich her lessons to the heart.

Lycidas.

No more Pomona's guiding hand we need,
Nor Flora's help to paint th' enamell'd mead,
Nor Ceres' care to guard the rising grain,
And spread the yellow plenty o'er the plain;
Ardena's precepts ev'ry want supply,
The grateful lay what shepherd can deny?

Damon.

A theme so pleasing, with the day begun,
Too soon were ended with the setting sun.
But see o'er yonder hill the parting ray,
And hark! our bleating flocks reprove our stay.

THE SCAVENGERS.

A TOWN-ECLOGUE.

Dulcis odor lucri ox re quâlibet.

AWAKE, my muse, prepare a loftier theme.
The winding valley, and the dimpled stream
Delight not all: quit, quit the verdant field,
And try what dusty streets, and alleys yield.

Where Avon wider flows, and gathers fame,
Stands a fair town, and Warwick is its name.
For useful arts entitled once to share
The gentle Etheldreda's guardian care.
Nor less for deeds of chivalry renown'd,
When her own Guy was with her laurels crown'd.
Now Syren sloth holds here her tranquil reign,
And binds in silken bonds the feeble train.
No frowning knights in uncouth armour lac'd,
Seek now for monsters on the dreary waste:
In these soft scenes they chase a gentler prey,
No monsters! but as dangerous as they.
In different forms as sure destruction lies,
They have no claws 'tis true—but they have eyes.

Last of the toiling race there liv'd a pair,
Bred up in labour, and inur'd to care!
To sweep the streets their task from sun to sun,
And seek the nastiness which others shun.
More plodding wight, or dame you ne'er shall see,
He Gaffer Pestel light, and Gammer she.

As at their door they fate one summer's day,
Old Pestel first essay'd the plaintive lay:
His gentle mate the plaintive lay return'd,
And thus alternately their cares they mourn'd.

Old Pestel.

Alas! was ever such fine weather seen,
How dusty are the roads, the streets how clean!
How long, ye almanacks! will it be dry?
Empty my cart how long, and idle I!
Ev'n at the best the times are not so good,
But 'tis hard work to scrape a livelihood.
The cattle in the stalls resign their life,
And baulk the thambles, and th' unbloody knife.
While farmers sit at home in pensive gloom,
And turppikes threaten to complete my doom.

Wife.

Well! for the turnpike that will do no hurt,
Some say the managers are friends to dirt.

But much I fear this murrain where 'twill end,
For sure the cattle did our door befriend.
Oit have I hail'd 'em, as they stalk'd along,
Their fat the butchers pleas'd, but me their dung.

Old Pestel.

See what a little dab of dirt is here!
But yields all Warwick more, O tell me where!
Yet, on this spot, though now so naked seen,
Heaps upon heaps, and loads on loads have been.
Bigger, and bigger, the proud dunghill grew,
Till my diminish'd house was hid from view.

Wife.

Ah! Gaffer Pestel, what brave days were those,
When higher than our house our muckhill rose!
The growing mount I view'd with joyful eyes,
And mark'd what each load added to its size.
Wrapt in its fragrant steam we often sat,
And to its praises held delightful chat.
Nor did I e'er neglect my mite to pay,
To swell the goodly heap from day to day.
A cabbage once I bought; but small the cost—
Nor do I think the farthing all was lost.
Again you sold its well-digested store,
To dung the garden where it grew before.

Old Pestel.

What though the beaus, and powder'd coxcombs
jeer'd,

And at the scavenger's employment sneer'd,
Yet then at night content I told my gains,
And thought well paid their malice, and my pains.
Why toils the tradesman, but to swell his store?
Why craves the wealthy landlord still for more?
Why will our gentry flatter, fawn, and lie?
Why pack the cards, and what d'ye call't—the die?

All, all the pleasing paths of gain pursue,
And wade through thick, and thin, as we folks do.
Sweet is the scent that from advantage springs,
And nothing dirty which good int'rest brings.

Wife.

When goody Dobbins call'd me nasty bear,
And talk'd of kennels, and the ducking-chair,
With patience I could bear the scolding quean,
For sure 'twas dirtiness that kept me clean.
Clean was my gown, on Sundays, if not fine,
Nor Mrs. _____'s cap so white as mine.

A slut in silk, or kersey is the same,
Nor (weetest always is the finest dame.
Thus wail'd they pleasure past, and present cares,
While the starv'd hog join'd his complaint with theirs.

To still his grunting diff'rent ways they tend,
To * West-ireet he, and she to * Cotton-end.

ABSENCE.

WITH leaden foot time creeps along

While Delia is away,
With her, nor plaintive was the song,
Nor tedious was the day.

Ah! envious pow'r! reverse my doom,
Now double thy career,
Strain ev'ry nerve, stretch ev'ry plume,
And rest them when she's here.

* Names of the most remote, and opposite parts of the town.

TO A LADY.

WHEN nature joins a beautiful face
With shape, and air, and life, and grace,
To ev'ry imperfection blind,
I spy no blemish in the mind.

When wit flows pure from Stella's tongue,
Or animates the sprightly song,
Our hearts confess the pow'r divine,
Nor lightly prize its mortal shrine.

Good-nature will a conquest gain,
Though wit, and beauty sigh in vain.
When gen'rous thoughts the breast inspire,
I with its rank, and fortunes higher.

When Sidney's charms again unite
To win the soul, and bless the sight,
Fair, and learn'd, and good, and great!
An earthly goddess is complete.

But when I see a fordid mind
With affluence, and ill-nature join'd,
And pride without a grain of sense,
And without beauty insolence,
The creature with contempt I view,
And sure 'tis like Miss—you know who.

TO A LADY WORKING A PAIR OF RUFFLES.

WHAT means this useless cost, this wanton pride?
To purchase popy'ry from yon' foreign strand!
To spurn our native stores, and arts aside,
And drain the riches of a needy land!

Pleas'd I survey, fair nymph, your happy skill,
Yet view it by no vulgar critic's laws:
With nobler aim I draw my sober quill,
Anxious to list each art in virtue's cause.

Go on, dear maid, your utmost pow'r essay,
And if for fame your little bosom heave,
Know, patriot hands your merit shall display,
And amply pay the graces they receive.

Let ev'ry nymph like you the gift prepare,
And banish foreign pomp, and costly show;
What lover but would burn the prize to wear,
Or blush, by you pronounc'd his country's foe?

Your smiles can win when patriot-speeches fail,
Your frowns controul when justice threatens in vain,

O'er stubborn minds your softness can prevail,
And placemen drop the bribe if you complain.

Then rise the guardians of your country's fame,
Or wheresoever were ye form'd like angels fair?
By beauty's force our venal hearts reclaim,
And save the drooping virtues from despair.

FEMALE EMPIRE.

'A TRUE HISTORY.

LIKE Bruin's was Avaro's breast,
No softness harbour'd there;

While Sylvio some concern express'd,
When beauty shed a tear.

In Hymen's hands they both were tied,
As * Cupid's archives show ye;
Proud Celia was Avaro's bride,
And Sylvio's gentle Chloe.

Like other nymphs, at church they swore,
To honour and obey,
Which, with each learned nymph before,
They soon explain'd away.

If Chloe now would have her will,
Her streaming eyes prevail'd,
Or if her swain prov'd cruel still,
Hysteries never fail'd.

But Celia scorn'd the plaintive moan,
And heart-dissolving thow'r;
With flashing eye, and angry tone,
She best maintain'd her pow'r.

Yet once the mandates of his Turk
Avaro durst refuse;
For why? important was his work,
"To regitter old shoes!"

And does, said she, the wretch dispute
My claim such clowns to rule?
If Celia cannot charm a brute,
She can chastise a fool.

'Then strait she to his closet flew,
His private thoughts she tore,
And from its place the joker drew,
'That fell'd him on the floor.

Henceforth, said she, my calls regard,
Own mine the stronger plea,
Nor let thy vulgar cares retard
'The female rites of tea.

Victorious sex! alike your art,
And puillance we dread;
For if you cannot break our heart,
'Tis plain you'll break our head.

Place me, ye gods, beneath the throne
'Which gentle smiles environ,
And I'll submission gladly own,
'Without a rod of iron.

ON MR. SAMUEL COOKE'S POEMS.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1749.

INDEED, Master Cooke!
You have made such a book,
As the learned in patry admire;
But other wits joke
To see, such a smoke
Without any visible fire.

What a nice bill of fare,
Of whatever is rare,
And approv'd by the critics of taste!
Not a classical bit,
Ev'ry fancy to hit,
But here in due order is plac'd.

* The parish-registrar.
Y y ij

Yet, for all this parade,
You are but a dull blade,
And your lines are all scragged, and raw;
And though you've hack'd, and have hew'd,
And have squeeze'd, and have stew'd,
Your forc'd-meat isn't all worth a straw.

Though your satire you spit,
'Tisn't season'd a bit,
And your puffs are as heavy as lead;
Call each dish what you will,
Boil, roast, hash, or grill,
Yet still it is all a calve's head.

I don't mind your huffing,
For you've put such vile stuffin,
I protest I'm as sick as a dog;
Were you leaner, or fatter,
I'd not mince the matter,
You're not fit to dress Æsop a frog.

Then, good master Slice!
Shut up shop, if your wife,
And th' unwary no longer trepan;
Such advice indeed is hard,
And may stick in your gizzard,
But digest it as well as you can.

THE MISTAKE.

ON CAPTAIN BLUFF. 1750.

SAYS a gossing, almost frighten'd out of her wits,
Help mother, or else I shall go into fits.
I have had such a fright, I shall never recover,
O! that hawk, that you've told us of over and over.

See, there, where he sits, with his terrible face,
And his coat how it glitters all over with lace.
With his sharp hooked nose, and his sword at his heel,
How my heart it goes pit-a-pat, pray, mother, feel.
Says the goose, very gravely, pray don't talk so wild,
Those looks are as harmless as mine are, my child.

And as for his sword there, so bright, and so nice,
I'll be sworn 'twill hurt nothing besides frogs, and mice.

Nay, prithee don't hang so about me, let loose,
I tell thee he dares not say—ho to a goose.
In short there is not a more innocent fowl,
Why, instead of a hawk, look ye, child 'tis an owl.

TO A LADY,

WITH A BASKET OF FRUIT.

ONCE of forbidden fruit the mortal taste
Chang'd beauteous Eden to a dreary waste.
Here you may freely eat, secure the while
From latent poison, or insidious guile.
Yet O! could I but happily infuse
Some secret charm into the sav'ry juice,
Of pow'r to tempt your gentle breast to share
With me the peaceful cot, and rural fare:
A diff'rent fate should crown the best device,
And change my desert to a paradise.

PEYTOE'S GHOST *

To Craven's health, and social joy,
The festive night was kept,
While mirth and patriot spirit flow'd,
And dulness only slept.

When from the jovial crowd I stole,
And homeward flap'd my way;
And pass'd along by Chester-ton,
All at the close of day.

The sky with clouds was overcast:
An hollow tempest blow'd,
And rains and foaming cataracts
Had delug'd all the road.

When through the dark and lonesome shade,
Shone forth a sudden light;
And soon distinct an human form,
Engag'd my wondering sight.

Onward it mov'd with graceful port,
And soon o'ertook my speed;
Then thrice I lifted up my hands,
And thrice I check'd my steed.

Who art thou, passenger, it cry'd,
From yonder mirth retir'd?
That here pursuit thy cheerless way,
Benighted, and bemir'd.

I am, said I, a country clerk,
A clerk of low degree,
And yonder gay and gallant scene,
Suits not a curacy.

But I have seen such sights to-day,
As make my heart full glad,
Although it is but dark, 'tis true,
And eke—my road is bad.

For I have seen lords, knights, and squires,
Of great and high renown,
To choose a knight for this fair shire,
All met at Warwick town.

A wight of skill to ken our laws,
Of courage to defend,
Of worth to serve the public cause,
Before a private end.

And such they found, if right I guef—
Of gentle blood he came;
Of morals firm, of manners mild,
And † Craven is his name.

Did half the British tribunes share
Experienc'd † Mordaunt's truth,
Another half, like Craven, boast
A free unbias'd youth:

The sun I trow, in all his race,
No happier realm should find;
Nor Britons hope for aught in vain,
From warmth with prudence join'd.

* Was the late Lord Willoughby de Broke.
† Hon. William Craven, of Wykin; he was afterwards Lord Craven.
‡ The late Sir Charles Mordaunt, Bart.

“ Go on, my country, favour'd foil,
Such patriots to produce!
Go on, my countrymen, he cry'd,
Such patriots still to choofe ”

This said, the placid form retir'd,
Behind the veil of night:
Yet badé me, for my country's good,
The solemn tale recite.

TO A LADY,

FURNISHING HER LIBRARY, AT *, IN WAR-WICKSHIRE.

When just proportion in each part,
And colours mix'd with nicest art,
Conspire to show the grace and mien
Of Cloe, or the Cyprian queen:
With elegance throughout refin'd,
That speaks the passions of the mind,
The glowing canvas will proclaim,
A Raphael's, or a Titian's name.
So where through ev'ry learned page,
Each distant clime, each distant age
Display a rich variety,
Of wisdom in epitome:
Such elegance and taste will tell
The hand, that could select so well.
But when we all their beauties view,
United and improv'd by you,
We needs must own an emblem faint,
T' express those charms no art can paint.
Books must, with such correctness writ,
Refine another's taste and wit;
'Tis to your merit only due,
That theirs can be refin'd by you.

TO WILLIAM SHENSTONE, ESQ.

ON RECEIVING A GILT POCKET-BOOK. 1751.

THESE spotless leaves, this neat atray,
Might well invite your charming quill,
In fair assemblage to display
The power of learning, wit, and skill.

But since you carelessly refuse,
And to my pen the task assign;
O! let your genius guide my muse,
And every vulgar thought refine.

Teach me your best, your best lov'd art,
With frugal care to store my mind;
In this to play the miser's part,
And give mean lucre to the wind:

To shun the coxcomb's empty noise,
To scorn the villain's artful mask;
Nor trust gay pleasure's fleeting joys
Nor urge ambition's endless talk.

Teach me to stem youth's boisterous tide,
To regulate its giddy rage;
By reason's aid my bark to guide,
Into the friendly port of age:

To share what classic culture yields,
Through rhet'ric's painted meads to roam;

With you to reap historic fields,
And bring the golden harvest home.

To taste the genuine sweets of wit;
To quaff in humour's sprightly bowl;
The philosophic mean to hit,
And prize the dignity of foul.

Teach me to read fair nature's book,
Wide opening in each flow'ry plain;
And with judicious eye to look
On all the glories of her reign;

To hail her, seated on her throne,
By awful woods encompass'd round,
Or her divine extraction own,
Though with a wreath of rushes crown'd.

Through arched walks, o'er spreading lawns,
Near solemn rocks, with her to rove;
Or court her, 'mid her gentle fawns,
In mossy cell, or maple grove.

Whether the prospect strain the sight,
Or in the nearer landscapes charm,
Where hills, vales, fountains, woods unite,
'To grace your sweet Arcadian farm:

There let me sit, and gaze with you,
On nature's works by art refin'd:
And own, while we their contest view,
Both fair, but fairest, thus combin'd!

AN ELEGY ON MAN.

WRITTEN JANUARY, 1752.

BEHOLD earth's lord, imperial man,
In ripen'd vigour gay;
His outward form attentive scan,
And all within survey.

Behold his plans of future life,
His care, his hope, his love,
Relations dear of child, and wife,
The dome, the lawn, the grove.

Now see within his active mind,
More gen'rous passions share,
Friend, neighbour, country, all his kind,
By turns engage his care.

Behold him range with curious eye,
O'er earth from pole to pole,
And through th' illimitable sky
Explore with daring soul.

Yet pass some twenty fleeting years,
And all his glory flies,
His languid eye is bath'd in tears,
He sickens, groans, and dies.

And is this all his destin'd lot,
This all his boasted sway?
For ever now to be forgot,
Amid the mould'ring clay!

Ah gloomy thought! ah worse than death,
Life sickens at the sound;
Better it were not draw our breath,
Than run this empty round.

Hence, cheating fancy, then, away
O let us better try,

By reason's more enlighten'd ray,
What 'tis indeed to die.

Observe yon mass of putrid earth,
It holds an embryo-brood,
Ev'n now the reptiles crawl to birth,
And seek their leafy food.

Yet stay till some few suns are past,
Each forms a silken tomb,
And seems, like man, imprison'd fast,
To meet his final doom.

Yet from this silent mansion too
Anon you see him rise,
No more a crawling worm to view,
But tenant of the skies.

And what forbids that man should share,
Some more auspicious day,
To range at large in open air,
As light and free as they?

There was a time when life first warm'd
Our flesh in shades of night,
Then was th' imperfect substance form'd,
And sent to view this light.

There was a time, when ev'ry sense
In straiter limits dwelt,
Yet each its task could then dispense,
We saw, we heard, we felt.

And times there are, when through the veins
The blood forgets to flow,
Yet then a living pow'r remains,
Though not in active show.

Times too there be, when friendly sleep's
Soft charms the senses bind,
Yet fancy then her vigils keeps,
And ranges unconfin'd.

And reason holds her separate sway,
Though all the senses wake,
And forms in mem'ry's storehouse play,
Of no material make.

What are these then, this eye, this ear,
But nicer organs found,
A glass to read, a trumpet to hear,
The modes of shape, or sound?

And blows may maim, or time impair
These instruments of clay,
And death may ravish what they spare,
Completing their decay.

But are these then that living pow'r
That thinks, compares, and rules?
Then say a scaffold is a tow'r,
A workman is his tools.

For aught appears that death can do,
That still survives his stroke,
Its workings plac'd beyond our view,
Its present commerce broke.

But what connections it may find,
* Boots much to hope, and fear,

* Vid. Butler's Analogy.

And if instruction courts the mind,
'Tis madness not to hear.

ON RECEIVING A LITTLE IVORY BOX FROM A LADY,

CURIOSLY WROUGHT BY HER OWN HANDS.

LITTLE box of matchless grace!
Fairer than the fairest face,
Smooth as was her parent-hand,
That did thy wondrous form command.
Spotless as her infant mind,
As her riper age refin'd,
Beauty with the graces join'd.

Let me clothe the lovely stranger,
Let me lodge thee safe from danger,
Let me guard thy soft repose,
From giddy fortune's random blows.
From thoughtless mirth, barbaric hate,
From the iron-hand of fate,
And oppression's deadly weight.

Thou art not of a sort, or number.
Fashion'd for a poet's lumber;
Though more capacious than his purse,
Too small to hold his store of verse.
Too delicate for homely toil,
Too neat for vulgar hands to soil.

O! would the fates permit the muse,
Thy future destiny to choose!
In thy circle's fairy round,
With a golden fillet bound:
Like the snow-drop silvery white,
Like the glow worm's humid light,
Like the dew at early dawn,
Like the moon-light on the lawn,
Lucid rows of pearls shou'd dwell,
Pleas'd as in their native shell;
Or the brilliant's sparkling rays,
Shou'd emit a starry blaze.

And if the fair whose magic skill,
Wrought thee passive to her will,
Deign to regard thy poet's love,
Nor his aspiring suit reprove,
Her form should crown the fair design,
Goddess sit for such a shrine!

VALENTINE'S DAY.

THE tuneful choir in amorous strains,
Accoit their feather'd loves;
While each fond mate with equal pains,
The tender suit approves.

With cheerful hop from spray to spray,
They sport along the meads;
In social bliss together stray,
Where love or fancy leads.

Through spring's gay scenes each happy pair
Their fluttering joys pursue;
Its various charms and produce share,
For ever kind and true.

Their sprightly notes from every shade,
Their mutual loves proclaim;
Till winter's chilling blasts invade,
And damp th' enlivening flame.

Then all the jocund scene declines,
Nor woods nor meads delight;
The drooping tribe in secret pines,
And mourns th' unwelcome fight.

Go, blissful warblers! timely wise,
Th' instructive moral tell!
Nor thou their meaning lays despise,
My charming Annabelle!

HAMLET'S SOLILOQUY,

IMITATED.

To print, or not to print—that is the question.
Whether 'tis better in a trunk to bury
The quirks and crotchets of outrageous fancy,
Or send a well-wrote copy to the press,
And by disclosing, end them? To print, to doubt!
No more; and by one act to say we end
The headach, and a thousand natural shocks
Of scribbling frenzy—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wish'd. To print—to beam
From the same shelf with Pope, in calf well bound!
To sleep, perchance, with Quarles—Ay, there's the rub—

For to what class a writer may be doom'd,
When he hath shuffled off some paltry stuff,
Must give us pause.—There's the respect that makes

Th' unwilling poet keep his piece nine years.
For who would bear th' impatient thirst of fame,
The pride of conscious merit, and 'bove all,
The tedious importunity of friends,
When as himself might his quietus make
With a bare inkhorn? Who would fardles bear?
To groan and sweat under a load of wit?
But that the tread of steep Parnassus' hill,
That undiscover'd country, with whose bays
Few travellers return, puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear to live unknown,
Than run the hazard to be known, and damn'd.
Thus critics do make cowards of us all.
And thus the healthful face of many a poem,
Is sickly'd o'er with a pale manuscript;
And enterprisers of great fire, and spirit,
With this regard from Dodley turn away,
And lose the name of authors.

ROUNDELAY,

Written for the Jubilee at Stratford upon Avon, Celebrated by Mr. Garrick in honour of Shakspeare, September 1769.

SET TO MUSIC BY MR. DIBDIN.

SISTERS of the tuneful train,
Attend your parent's jocund strain,
'Tis fancy calls you; follow me
To celebrate the jubilee.

On Avon's banks, where Shakspeare's bust
Points out, and guards his sleeping dust;
The sons of scenic mirth agree,
To celebrate the jubilee.

Come, daughters, come, and bring with you
Th' aerial sprites and fairy crew,

And the sister graces thrée,
To celebrate the jubilee.

Hang around the sculptur'd tomb
The 'broider'd vest, the nodding plume,
And the mask of comic glee,
To celebrate the jubilee.

From Birnam wood, and Bosworth field,
Bring the standard, bring the shield,
With drums, and martial symphony,
To celebrate the jubilee.

In mournful numbers now relate
Poor Deidemonia's hapless fate,
With frantic deeds of jealousy,
To celebrate the jubilee.

Nor be Windsor's wives forgot,
With their harmless merry plot,
The whitening mead, and haunted tree,
To celebrate the jubilee.

Now in jocund strains recite
The humours of the braggart knight,
Fat knight, and ancient Pitcol he,
To celebrate the jubilee.

But see in crowds the gay, the fair,
To the splendid scene repair,
A scene as fine, as fine can be,
To celebrate the jubilee.

THE BLACKBIRDS.

AN ELEGY.

THE sun had chas'd the mountain-snow,
His beams had pierc'd the stubborn soil,
The melting streams began to flow,
And plowmen urg'd their annual toil.

'Twas then, amidst the vocal throng,
Whom nature wak'd to mirth, and love,
A blackbird rais'd his am'rous song,
And thus it echo'd through the grove:

O fairest of the feather'd train!
For whom I sing, for whom I burn,
Attend with pity to my strain,
And grant my love a kind return.

For see, the wintry storms are flown,
And zephyrs gently fan the air;
Let us the genial influence own,
Let us the vernal pastime share.

The raven plumes his jetty wing,
To please his croaking paramour,
The larks responsive carols sing,
And tell their passion as they soar:

But does the raven's sable wing
Excel the glossy jet of mine?
Or can the lark more sweetly sing,
Than we, who strength with softness join?

O let me then thy steps attend!
I'll point new treasures to thy sight:
Whether the grove thy wish befriend,
Or hedge-rows green, or meadows bright.

X y iiii

I'll guide thee to the clearest rill,
Whose streams among the pebbles stray;
There will we sip, and sip our fill,
Or on the flow'ry margin play.

I'll lead thee to the thickest brake,
Impervious to the school-boy's eye;
For thee the plaster'd nest I'll make,
And to thy downy bosom fly.

When, prompted by a mother's care,
Thy warmth shall form th' imprison'd young,
The pleasing task I'll gladly share,
Or cheer thy labours with a song.

To bring thee food I'll range the fields,
And cull the best of ev'ry kind,
Whatever nature's bounty yields,
And love's assiduous care can find.

And when my lovely mate would stray,
To taste the summer sweets at large,
I'll wait at home the live-long day,
And fondly tend our little charge.

Then prove with me the sweets of love,
With me divide the cares of life,
No bush shall boast in all the grove,
A mate so fond, so blest a wife.

He ceas'd his song—the plummy dame
Heard with delight the love-sick strain,
Nor long conceal'd a mutual flame,
Nor long repress'd his am'rous pain.

He led her to the nuptial bow'r,
And perch'd with triumph by her side;
What gilded roof could boast that hour
A sonder mate, or happier bride?

Next morn he wak'd her with a song;
Behold, he said, the new-born day,
The lark his morn-peal has rung,
Arise, my love, and come away.

Together through the fields they stray'd,
And to the murmur'ing riv'let's side,
Renew'd their vows, and hopp'd, and play'd
With artless joy, and decent pride.

When O! with grief my muse relates
What dire misfortune clos'd the tale,
Sent by an order from the fates,
A gunner met them in the vale.

Alarm'd, the lover cried, my dear,
Haste, haste away, from danger fly;
Here, gunner, point thy thunder here,
O spare my love, and let me die.

At him the gunner took his aim,
Too sure the volley'd thunder flew!
O had he chose some other game,
Or thot—as he was wont to do!

Divided pair!—forgive the wrong,
While I with tears your fate rehearse,
I'll join the widow's plaintive song,
And save the lover in my verse.

THE GOLDFINCHES.

AN ELEGY.

To William Shenstone, Esq.

“ Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes
“ Emollit mores, nec finit esse feros.

To you, whose groves protect the feather'd choir,
Who lend their artless notes a willing ear,
To you, whom pity moves, and taste inspires,
The Doric strain belongs, O Shenstone, hear.

'Twas gentle Spring, when all the plummy race,
By nature taught, in nuptial leagues combine!
A goldfinch joy'd to meet the warm embrace,
And with her mate in love's delights to join.

All in a garden, on a currant bush,
With wond'rous art they built their airy seat;
In the next orchard liv'd a friendly thrush,
Nor distant far a woodlark's soft retreat.

Here blest with ease, and in each other blest,
With early songs they wak'd the neighb'ring
groves,
Till time matur'd their joys, and crown'd their nest
With infant pledges of their faithful loves.

And now what transport glow'd in either's eye!
What equal fondness dealt th' allotted food?
What joy each other's likeness to descry,
And future sonnets in the chirping brood!

But ah! what earthly happiness can last?
How does the fairest purpose often fail?
A truant schoolboy's wantonness could blast
Their flatt'ring hopes, and leave them both to wail.

The most ungentle of his tribe was he,
No gen'rous precept ever touch'd his heart,
With concord false, and hideous profudy
He scrawl'd his talk, and blunder'd o'er his part.

On mischief bent, he mark'd, with rav'nous eyes,
Where wrapt in down the callow songsters lay,
Then rushing, rudely seiz'd the glitt'ring prize,
And bore it in his impious hands away!

But how shall I describe, in numbers rude,
The pangs for poor Chryfomitris decreed,
When from her secret stand aghast she view'd
The cruel spoiler perpetrate the deed?

O grief of griefs! with shrieking voice she cried,
What fight is this that I have liv'd to see!
O! that I had in youth's fair season died,
From love's false joys, and bitter sorrows free.

Was it for this, alas! with weary bill,
Was it for this I pois'd th' unwieldy straw?
For this I bore the moss from yonder bill,
Nor shunn'd the pond'rous stick along to draw?

Was it for this I pick'd the wool with care,
Intent with nicer skill our work to crown;

For this, with pain, I bent the stubborn hair,
And lin'd our cradle with the thistle's down?

Was it for this my freedom I resign'd,
And ceas'd to rove at large from plain to plain;
For this I sat at home whole days confin'd,
To bear the scorching heat, and pealing rain?

Was it for this my watchful eyes grow dim?
For this the roses on my cheek turn pale?
Pale is my golden plumage, once so trim!
And all my wonted mirth and spirits fail!

O plund'r'er vile! O more than adders fell!
More murd'rous than the cat, with prudish face!
Fiercer than kites in whom the furies dwell,
And thievish as the cuckow's pill'ring race!

May juicy plumbs for thee forbear to grow,
For thee no flow'r unveil its charming dies;
May birch trees thrive to work thee sharper woe,
And list'ning itarlings mock thy frantic cries.

Thus sang the mournful bird her piteous tale,
'The piteous tale her mournful mate return'd,
Then side by side they fought the distant vale,
And there in secret sadness inly mourn'd.

THE SWALLOWS.

AN ELEGY.

PART I.

ERE yellow Autumn from our plains retir'd,
And gave to wint'ry storms the varied year,
The swallow-race with prescient gift inspir'd,
To southern climes prepar'd their course to steer.

On Damon's roof a large assembly fate,
His roof a refuge to the feather'd kind!
With serious look he mark'd the grave debate,
And to his Delia thus address'd his mind:

Observe yon twitt'ring flock, my gentle maid!
Observe, and read the wond'rous ways of Heav'n!
With us through Summer's genial reign they stay'd,
And food, and sunshine to their wants were giv'n.

But now, by secret instinct taught, they know
The near approach of elemental strife,
Of blust'ring tempests, and of chilling snow,
With ev'ry pang, and scourge of tender life.

Thus warn'd they meditate a speedy flight,
From this ev'n now they prune their vig'rous wing.

For this each other to the toil excite,
And prove their strength in many a sportive ring.

No sorrow loads their breasts, or dims their eye,
To quit their wonted haunts, or native home,
Nor fear they launching on the boundless sky,
In search of future settlements to roam.

They feel a pow'r, an impulse all divine,
That warns them hence, they feel it, and obey,

To this direction all their cares resign,
Unknown their destin'd stage, unmark'd their way.

Peace to your flight! ye mild domestic race!
O! for your wings to travel with the sun!
Health brace your nerves, and zephyrs aid your pace,
Till your long voyage happily be done.

See, Delia, on my roof your guests to-day,
To-morrow on my roof your guests no more,
Ere yet 'tis night with haste they wing away,
To-morrow lands them on some happier shore.

How just the moral in this scene convey'd!
And what without a moral? would we read?
Then mark what Damon tells his gentle maid,
And with his lesson register the deed.

So youthful joys fly like the Summer's gale,
So threatens the winter of inclement age,
Life's busy plot a short, fantastic tale!
And nature's changeful scenes the shifting stage!

And does no friendly pow'r to man dispense
The joyful tidings of some happier climate?
Find we no guide in gracious Providence
Beyond the gloomy grave, and short-liv'd time?

Yes, yes the sacred oracles we hear,
That point the path to realms of endless joy,
That bid our trembling hearts no danger fear,
Though clouds surround, and angry skies annoy.

Then let us wisely for our flight prepare,
Nor count this stormy world our fix'd abode,
Obey the call, and trust our Leader's care,
To smooth the rough, and light the darksome road.

Moses, by grant divine, led Israel's host
Through dreary paths to Jordan's fruitful side;
But we a loftier theme than theirs can boast,
A better promise, and a nobler guide.

PART II.

At length Winter's howling blasts are o'er,
Array'd in smiles the lovely Spring returns,
Now suell'd hearths attractive blaze no more,
And ev'ry breast with inward fervour burns.

Again the daisies peep, the violets blow,
Again the vocal tenants of the grove
Forgot the patt'ring hail, or driving snow,
Renew the lay to melody, and love.

And see, my Delia, see o'er yonder stream,
Where, on the bank, the lambs in gambols play,
Alike attracted by the sunny gleam,
Again the swallows take their wonted way.

Welcome, ye gentle tribe, your sports pursue,
Welcome again to Delia, and to me,
Your peaceful councils on my roof renew,
And plan new settlements from danger free.

Again I'll listen to your grave debates,
Again I'll hear your twitt'ring songs unfold

What policy directs your wand'ring states,
What bounds are settled and what tribes en-
roll'd.

Again I'll hear you tell of distant lands,
What infect nations rise from Egypt's mud,
What painted swarms subsist on Lybia's sands,
What Ganges yields, and what th' Euphratean flood.

Thrice happy race! whom nature's call invites
To travel o'er her realms with active wing,
To taste her various stores, her best delights,
The Summer's radiance, and the sweets of Spring.

While we are doom'd to bear the restless change
Of varying seasons, vapours dank, and dry,

Forbid like you in milder climes to range,
When wintry storms usurp the low'ring sky.

Yet know the period to your joys assign'd,
Know ruin hovers o'er this earthly ball,
As lofty tow'rs stoop prostrate to the wind,
Its secret props of adamant shall fall.

But when you radiant sun shall shine no more,
The spirit, freed from sin's tyrannic sway,
On lighter pinions borne than yours shall soar
To fairer realms beneath a brighter ray.

To plains ethereal, and celestial bow'rs,
Where wintry storms no rude access obtain,
Where blasts no lightning, and no tempest low'rs,
But ever-smiling Spring and pleasure reign.

THE LIFE OF SCOTT.

FOR the life of SCOTT, "the poet of Amwell," the world is obliged to John Hoole, Esq., the translator of "Tasso," and editor of his Critical Essays, who was his intimate friend, and wrote from personal knowledge.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from Mr. Hoole's narrative, with such additional information as the "European Magazine" for 1782, the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1783, and subsequent publications, have supplied.

John Scott was born in the Grange-Walk, in the parish of St. Bermondsey, Southwark, Jan. 9. 1730. He was descended from two ancient and respectable families in the counties of York and Warwick. His father, Mr. Samuel Scott, was a linen-draper and citizen of London; a man of plain and irreproachable manners, and one of the society of the people called Quakers; among whom he was esteemed as an eminent preacher. His mother's maiden name was Martha Wilkins. He was the youngest of two sons, their only children that lived to be brought up, the rest dying very soon.

At about seven years of age, he was put under the tuition of one John Clarke, who kept a little school in Barnaby Street, and used to come home to his father's house, to instruct him in the rudiments of the Latin tongue.

He himself gives the following account of his tutor:—"My Caledonian tutor's name was John Clarke; he was, I believe, a native of the Shetland islands; he was ingenious and learned, but rather a severe pedagogue; yet, spite of the domination which he exercised over his pupils, I respected him; and there was something in the man, and in his manner, that I even now faintly recollect with pleasure."

In 1740, being then only ten years of age, his father removing to Amwell, near Ware in Hertfordshire, he was deprived of the benefit that might have arisen to him from the skill and attention of so able a master as Clarke; who continued to teach school in the same place, till death carried him off, probably as little known as he had lived.

Soon after the removal of the family to Amwell, he was sent to a private day-school kept at Ware; the master of which was named Hall, who is said to have been an admirable penman; but does not appear to have afforded, in his school, any opportunities of classical improvement.

He continued with him but a short time, and pursued his education in a lax and desultory manner; for, not having had the small pox, he was frequently kept at home, through fear of that distemper, and never persisted in a regular system of education.

Whatever disadvantages might result from these circumstances, he must have repaired by his own application, as no mark of it is visible in his writings.

He is said to have applied himself to reading about the age of seventeen, when he discovered an ardent propensity to the study of poetry; in which he was greatly encouraged by an acquaintance which he contracted about 1747 or 1748, with Charles Frogley, a man of strong parts, but without education, who had improved his mind by solitary reading and reflection; and had a peculiar predilection for that branch of study which soon became the favourite pursuit of Scott.

Frogley was by trade a bricklayer: "His occupation in life first introduced him into the family. A similarity of disposition soon brought on an intimacy between them, and Frogley gave his young friend the first perception of good poetry, by putting into his hands the "Paradise Lost" of Milton.

His father carried on, for some time, the malting trade; but lived in a very retired manner, having little intercourse with any but those of his own persuasion; who, though not without frequent instances of great ingenuity and ability among individuals, are not often much connected with the literary part of mankind.

The neighbourhood of Amwell affording little of such society, his conversations and reflections on his favourite studies, must have been therefore chiefly confined to his communications with Frogley, whose critical discernment was so accurate, that he seldom found reason, in his advancing state of judgment, to dissent from the opinion of his friend.

Besides the advantage of so sincere an adviser as Frogley, he had formed an acquaintance with Mr. John Turner, who resided at Ware, and who seems first to have been introduced to him by Frogley, in 1753 or 1754.

Mr. Turner was born at Hertford in 1734; and was removed to Ware at about three years old, where he received the rudiments of his education. At about sixteen years of age he was sent to London, to continue his studies at a dissenting academy, under the care of Dr. Jennings. He, however, made occasional visits to his friends at Ware, and neglected no opportunity of improving his intimacy with Scott. He passed many hours with him and Frogley; and during his absence, continued to correspond with him by letter.

It appears from his letters, that he supplied him from time to time with books; among which are particularly mentioned, Glover's "Leonidas," Thomson's "Seasons," and Pope's original works and translations. He likewise sent him a telescope, with directions to use it; for the curiosity and desire of knowledge in Scott now grew every day more general.

In the company of Frogley, who was accustomed to visit him when the business of the day was over, he passed most of his evenings; and to him and his friend Turner, from time to time, he communicated his performances, receiving from them such advice as tended greatly to ripen his judgment; but he was always dissuaded from too early publication; by which many have precluded themselves from that reputation which they might otherwise have obtained.

"It has been asserted by some," says Mr. Hoole, "that his early poetical essays were made in consequence of a tender passion, and that love first taught him to cultivate the muses; which opinion may not only have some countenance from the smaller poems at the end of his poetical volume, but may be farther strengthened from the correspondence between him and his friend Turner, during the residence of the latter in London and Devonshire."

His first poetical essays appeared in the "Gentleman's Magazine," to which he was afterwards a frequent contributor. His version of the 12th chapter of Ecclesiastes, intitled, Epidemic Mortality, in December Magazine 1753; Verses occasioned by the description of the Æolian Harp, in November Magazine 1754; and verses on Fear, in July Magazine 1758,—are all that can be traced with certainty. He likewise wrote several Passerals about the same time; but it cannot be known if any, or what use was made of them in his last publications.

In 1754, his elder brother Samuel, who till then had made one of the family at Amwell, was married, and went to settle at Hertford, "in which town," says Mr. Hoole, "he now [1785] resides, beloved and esteemed by all, for his manly sense, unbiassed integrity, and universal philanthropy."

In 1757, his friend Turner, who had been some time preparing for the ministry, left Dr. Jennings, on account of some difference of opinion in matters of religion, and removed to Taunton in Somersetshire, where he finished his studies. About 1758, he became pastor of a dissenting congregation at Lymington in Devonshire; and about 1762, he engaged with the Rev. Mr. Hogg and another gentleman, as tutor and manager of an academy at Exeter; but he continued still to correspond with Scott, and in time of vacation paid several visits to Ware. The verses To an Absent Friend, are supposed to have been addressed to Turner.

While thou far hence, on Albion's southern shore,
View'st her white rocks, and hear'st her ocean roar;
Through scenes where we together stray'd, I stray,
And think o'er talk of many a long past day.

He also addressed to him, Winter Amusements in the Country, an epistle, which was intended for the "Gentleman's Magazine," but appeared in "Pearch's Collection of Poems," 1770.

For about twenty years after the removal of the family to Amwell, he led a very retired life; for his father and mother being very apprehensive of the danger that might be incurred from the infection of the small-pox, he seldom went from home; and, however extraordinary it may appear, though only at the distance of twenty miles, he is said to have visited London but once during so long a period.

Though he very early acquired the friendship and esteem of a large circle of acquaintance, yet he does not appear to have been known to any literary characters till 1760; after which he began to make occasional, though cautious and short visits to London.

In the spring 1760, being then thirty years of age, after many repeated revisions and corrections, he published his four Elegies, Descriptive and Moral, 4to, which were honoured with a very particular and liberal approbation, and publicly praised and recommended by Young, Mrs. Talbot, Mrs. Carter, and other eminent characters.

When the author of the "Night Thoughts" received a copy of the Elegies from his bookseller, he returned his acknowledgment in these words: "Sir, I thank you for your present; I admire the poetry and piety of the author, and shall do myself the credit to recommend it to all my friends." This praise was truly valuable, as it was not the voice of adulation to greatness, of ignorance to celebrity, or of partiality to friendship; but the sanction of learning, taste, and genius, given to modest and retired merit.

His acquaintance was now considerably enlarged, and he was introduced to several of the literati, with whom he had little or no connection before the appearance of his Elegies. But the praise which he received upon this occasion, did not in the least excite his vanity to claim again the attention of the public. He wrote little, and printed nothing till 1768. His natural caution and diffidence seemed to increase: he always expressed the strongest sense of the necessity of frequent revival before publication; and no writer adhered more strictly than himself, to the well-known precept of Horace—nonum prematur in annum.

In 1761, the small-pox being prevalent in the town of Ware, he removed for some time to St. Margarets, a small hamlet, at the distance of about two miles from Amwell, where Mr. Hoole was introduced to his acquaintance by Mr. Bennet, then master of the grammar school at Hoddeson, where they accidentally met.

"I shall always recollect with pleasure," says Mr. Hoole, "my first conversation with Mr. Scott at St. Margarets, where he showed me the early sketch of his poem of Amwell, which he then called a Prospect of Ware, and the Country adjacent. This sketch was afterwards greatly enlarged before its appearance in 1776; and in the course of our conversation, he showed me several manuscript pieces, some of which were made part of his poetical volume."

Having found the frequent disadvantages and inconveniencies arising from his apprehension of the small-pox, which prevented him from mixing frequently with the world, and improving that acquaintance at London, of which his increasing reputation and love of knowledge made him now more desirous, he resolved at once to remove every fear of that distemper, by submitting to the operation of inoculation, which he accordingly did, under the care of Dr. Dinwale, in 1776, with Mr. Joseph Cockfield, a gentleman with whom he had lived for some years in great intimacy, and to whom he addressed his 12th Ode. He writes to a friend, that "they had not one day's confinement, though sufficient tokens to secure them from future fear or danger."

About this time, Mr. Hoole introduced him to the acquaintance of his friend Dr. Johnson; "and notwithstanding," says his biographer, "the great difference of their political principles, Scott had too much love for goodness and genius, not to be highly gratified in the opportunity of cultivating a friendship with that great exemplar of human virtues, and that great veteran of human learning; while the Doctor, with a mind superior to the distinction of party, delighted with equal complacency in the amiable qualities of Scott, of whom he always spoke with feeling regard."

He had a very early passion for gardening; and in 1765 and 1766, he amused himself in laying out and embellishing a few acres of his own ground, which are thought not unworthy the attention of strangers who come accidentally into that neighbourhood. In these plantations is a grotto, of his own design, considered as one of the curiosities of the country. His friend Turner, procured him fossils and shells for the completion of this work, in which he frequently exerted his own manual labour; and he told Mr. Hoole that, in making the excavation under the hill for the subterraneous passage, he marched first, like a pioneer, with his pick-ax in his hand, to encourage his rustic assistants. These pleasure grounds have given rise to an epistle intitled The Garden.

In 1766, he lost his mother, who died on the 14th of December, aged eighty years. A Sonnet to her is said to have been found among his manuscripts.

In 1767, he was married to Sarah Frogley, the daughter of his friend Frogley, of whom such deserved and honourable mention has been made. The bride was, previous to her nuptials, admitted a member of the society to which he belonged; and the nuptials were celebrated at the Quaker's meeting-house at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire.

The connection between Scott and Frogley being strengthened by this marriage, Scott showed many acts of kindness to the companion of his early studies, to whom he always continued firmly attached; of which attachment he has left a public testimony in his 11th Ode, addressed to a friend apprehensive of declining friendship; which seems to have been written in order to dissipate some little uneasiness that might have arisen in the mind of Frogley, from a fear of being neglected by Scott.

Too much in man's imperfect state,
Mistake produces useless pain;
Methinks on friendship's frequent fate,
I hear my Frogley's voice complain.—
Deem not that Time's oblivious hand
From Memory's page has raz'd the days,
By Lee's green verge we went to stand,
And on his crystal current gaze.

He was now to experience the most severe stroke he had ever met with; after having lost his father, who died in February 1768, in the 84th year of his age, he was deprived of his wife, who died in childbed in the same year, leaving behind her a child of which she had been delivered, that died the following August.

Till the death of his mother, his life seems to have run in one even tenor, calm and unruffled; but he was now called to an exertion of that philosophy, which made no inconsiderable part of his character. For some time after the death of his wife, he retired to the house of his friend Cockfield, at Upton, that, removed from those scenes which perpetually awakened every tender idea, his mind might, by degrees, recover its tranquillity. Of this circumstance he speaks in his 12th Ode, addressed to him.

'Twas when Misfortune's stroke severe,
And Melancholy's presence drear,
Had made my Amwell's groves displeas'd,
That thine my weary steps receiv'd,
And much the change my mind reliev'd,
And much thy kindness gave me ease, &c.

When the first violence of his grief began to settle into a sedate and gentle sorrow, he solaced his lonely hours by composing an Elegy to the memory of one who had been so dear to him. If we were to estimate the poignancy of his grief by this pathetic performance, we cannot doubt the ardour of a passion which is, of all others, the most tender and sympathetic.

The Elegy was written at Amwell, in 1768; a few copies only were printed, and privately distributed among his friends. At his desire, Mr. Hoole presented a copy to Dr. Hawkefworth, who spoke of it in the highest terms of commendation. A copy also was sent to Langhorne, whose first wife died in childbed in the same month that proved fatal to the wife of Scott; a similarity of circumstance to which he alludes, and to his pathetic "Verses written at Sandgate Castle, in memory of a Lady," in the following stanzas.

Nor mine alone to bear this painful doom;
Nor she alone the tear of song obtains:
The Muse of Blagdon o'er Constantia's tomb,
In all the eloquence of grief complains.
My friend's fair hope, like mine, so lately gain'd,
His heart, like mine, in its true partner blest;
Both from one cause the same distress sustain'd;
The same sad hours beheld us both distress.

This similarity of circumstance and congenial affliction, gave rise to a friendship between these two poets, which was only interrupted by the death of the amiable Langhorne.

In 1769, he met with another loss, in the death of his friend Turner, the companion and associate of his early studies with Frogley. This amiable and ingenious man died, universally lamented, at Colliton in Devonshire, on the 30th of June, in the 35th year of his age. He possessed considerable natural abilities, and much acquired knowledge, with a candid disposition and elegant taste; and by the general tenor of his correspondence with Scott, appears to have been always of a religious and studious turn. A pathetic tribute is paid to his memory by Scott, in his poem of Amwell, speaking of the several losses which he had experienced in the death of his friends.

Of thee, my Turner, who, in vacant youth,
Here oft in converse free, or studious search
Of classic lore, accompany'd my walk!
From Ware's green bowers to Devon's myrtle vales,
He mov'd a while with prospect op'ning fair,
Of useful life, and honour in his view;
As falls the vernal bloom before the breath
Of blasting Eurus, immature he fell!
The tidings reach'd my ear, and in my breast,
Aching with recent wounds, new anguish wak'd.

On the 1st of November 1770, he was married at the Quaker meeting-house at Ratcliffe, to his second wife, M^{ary} De Horne, daughter of the late Abraham De Horne; a lady whose amiable qualities promised him many years of uninterrupted happiness.

About the year 1771, he became acquainted with Dr. Beattie, who paid him two visits at his house at Amwell, one in 1773, and the other in 1781. A similarity of taste and of pursuits soon brought on an intimacy between these two poets, which continued without abatement till the death of Scott.

His settled residence was at Amwell, in the same house where his father resided, when he first retired from London, and which he afterwards greatly enlarged; but he every year spent a considerable part of the winter, and sometimes a week in summer, at a house which he had at Ratcliffe Cross. By his visits to London, the number of his literary friends had been considerably increased. He was introduced to the elegant Mrs. Montague, at whose house he became first acquainted with Lyttleton; and whose defence of "Shakspeare's injur'd page" from "Gallic rage," he has praised in his Ode to Criticism. He had been visited at Amwell by the celebrated Mrs. Macaulay, the "faithful advocate for freedom;" to whom he addressed Sanzas on reading her History of England; 1766; first printed with five Sonnets in Pearch's "Collection of Poems," 1770. He was known to Dr. Hawkesworth, Sir William Jones, James Boswell, Esq. and to the Rev. Mr. Pottér, the excellent translator of "Æschylus and Euripides;" and Mickle, whose "well-known masterly translation of the Lusiad of Camoens, the epic poet of Portugal," he has praised in his Ode on Poetical Enthusiasm.

While he resided in the country, he divided his time between the improvement of his pleasure grounds, the occupations of study, and the public business in the vicinity of his residence. He was very constant in his attendance at turnpike meetings, navigation trusts, and Commissioners of Land Tax. He took the lead in several undertakings, in which his plans proved successful. Ware and Hertford are indebted to him for opening a spacious road between those towns, which was undertaken in 1768, and is justly esteemed one of the greatest conveniencies in that part of the country; and, by his attention and diligence, alterations have been made in the principal streets of Ware, to the great improvement of that town.

In 1733, he showed the world that his studies were not confined to ornamental and elegant literature; but that many of his hours had been spent in such useful inquiries, as might tend to the general benefit of mankind. He published a pamphlet full of good sense and philanthropy, intitled, Observations on the present State of the Parochial and Vagrant Poor; 8vo; in which the cause of that unhappy part of the community is pleaded with much perspicacity of observation, and persuasive energy, against oppressive, or defective laws, and avaricious parish officers. Mr. Gilbert, in a bill brought into the House of Commons, in 1782, seems to have offered expedients for the prevention of imposition on the one hand, and of tyranny on the other, in some cases very similar to those proposed by Scott.

In the summer 1775, Mr. Hoole paid a family visit at Amwell, accompanied with Dr. Johnson and Miss Williams. They staid at Amwell some days, to the mutual satisfaction of Dr. Johnson and Scott; whose kindness for each other was not a little strengthened by this domestic intercourse. Scott led Dr. Johnson to take a view of his gardens, which were then completed; who, with great pleaslantry, termed the grotto Fairy Hall, and said, with a smile, that "none but a poet could have made such a garden." It appears from the epistle intituled The Garden, that the taste of Scott, afterwards more cultivated, would not suffer him always to view his improved grounds with the same complacency.

He had long determined to prove his powers in descriptive poetry, and to celebrate the beauties of his favourite village. He now greatly enlarged the first plan of his Perspective of Ware, and rendered it interesting by the introduction of historical allusions and moral reflections, with the addition of explanatory notes. In 1776, he published his performance, under the title of Amwell, a descriptive Poem, 4to, with his name. He had bestowed much attention on this poem; and its reception by the critics in general, and by poetical readers, was such as, from its merit, might be expected.

He employed his pen, at times, on various anonymous pamphlets, and essays on miscellaneous subjects; and particularly in vindication of the principles of political freedom, which he had invariably espoused. His peculiar attachment to the popular part of our constitution, made him regard, with jealousy, the influence of the Crown and of the Aristocracy. His active and public spirit would not permit him to remain an uninterested spectator, when any occasion offered for showing his exertions for the good of the community. The calm and dispassionate temper of the man of study and retirement, was lost in the season of party and turbulence, when it may reasonably be imputed as a crime for any member of society to observe a frigid neutrality. He disapproved of the conduct of Government in the American war; and notwithstanding his unfeigned veneration for the character of Dr. Johnson, he published two pamphlets in answer to his "Patriot" and "False Alarm;" and is said to have prepared an answer to "Taxation no Tyranny." On these subjects the writings of Scott have much clearness of argument, strength of style, and warmth of zeal for that cause which he had espoused, upon generous and deliberate principles.

When the poems attributed to Rowley were published by Mr. Tyrwhitt, in 1777, Scott openly pronounced them the forgeries of Chatterton, and disputed their authenticity in two judicious and well written letters in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for July and August 1777, and produced the first arguments on that side, except what are contained in a letter in the same magazine for May 1777.

In 1778, he undertook, with a friendly zeal, the defence of his friend Dr. Beattie, from an anonymous attack in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for January, for not continuing his "Essay on Truth," in a letter in the same Magazine for March following, to which he signed his name; and received Dr. Beattie's acknowledgment upon the occasion.

The same year, he favoured the public with a work of great labour and utility, intituled Digest of the General Highway and Turnpike Laws, with the schedule of forms, as directed by Act of Parliament, with remarks. Also an Appendix on the construction and preservation of Roads, 8vo. In this compilation, all the Acts of Parliament in force are collected together, and placed in one point of view; and their contents are arranged under distinct heads. The Appendix on the construction and preservation of Roads, is perhaps the only scientific treatise on the subject. Nothing more distinguishes this work, than the humane and benevolent spirit that breathes through all his observations. The first sketch of this work appeared in 1773, under the title of A Digest of the Highway Laws, 8vo.

The same year he published, without his name, four Moral Eclogues, 4to; in which he professed to have endeavoured to exhibit a specimen of genuine and simple pastoral. But it was now no time for pastoral poetry to attract curiosity, when probably the merits of Theocritus and Virgil infused into an English Muse, could have been little attended to.

The Latin motto from Virgil, prefixed to these eclogues, was given him by Dr. Beattie; who, in one of his letters, speaks highly of the eclogue intituled Arms, which he appears to have seen in manuscript; and he expresses himself, respecting the variety of Scott's publications, in the following manner:

"I am astonished at the activity of your friend, and the versatility of your genius. It is truly amazing, that one and the same person should, in one and the same year, publish the most elegant poems, and a Digest of the Laws relating to the Highways. Go on, Sir, in your laudable resolution of delighting and instructing mankind, of patronizing the poor, and promoting the public weal."

He had long desired to be known to the Wartons, of whose critical and poetical abilities he was a great admirer; and about Christmas 1781, he was introduced by Mr. Hoole to the two brothers, who were highly pleased with his unaffected frankness and amiable simplicity. He expressed the warmest wishes to cultivate their acquaintance, which they were no less desirous to improve; but they parted, to meet no more!

In the Spring 1782, he published a collection of his poems, which he had long projected, under the title of The Poetical Works of John Scott, Esq. in one volume, 8vo; which, besides what had been formerly printed, was enriched by the addition of Arabian Eclogues, Oriental Eclogues, Odes, Epistles, Sonnets, and Miscellaneous Pieces.

The public gave a very favourable reception to this collection, which he had spared no pains to render as correct as possible; and the volume was very elegantly printed, and embellished by a variety of beautiful engravings, particularly a frontispiece by Bartolozzi, from a design of Angelica Kauffman; and a head of the author by Hall, from a painting by Townsend.

The remarks on this article in the "Critical Review," for July 1782, were introduced by some trifling witticisms, and ill-placed railery, highly reprehensible in a literary censor, whose duty it is to deliver his sentiments with impartiality. Speaking of the plates with which the volume is decorated, the Reviewer observes: "To say the truth, there is a profusion of ornament and finery about this book, not quite suitable to the plainness and simplicity of the Barcleian system; but Mr. Scott is fond of the Muses, and wishes, we suppose, like Captain Macheath, to see his ladies well dressed."

Scott, justly offended at this indecent behaviour, and little accustomed to disguise his sentiments, was induced, with inconsiderate warmth, to publish A Letter to the Critical Reviewers, &c. 8vo, 1782. in which he expostulated with them on their conduct. This letter produced a second article in the next Review; and to this Scott replied again, by a letter inserted in one of the newspapers, which closed this unpleasant controversy, in which he had engaged, contrary to the opinion of his friends.

The same year, he addressed an amicable Letter to the Editor of the European Magazine, objecting to the account of his Poetical Works in their September Magazine, which he thought degrading, not "on account of the manner, but the matter of it." "The gentleman," he says, "who wrote the article, has treated me civilly; his strictures, therefore, seem to be the result of incompetent judgment or superficial examination. To the memoirs you have given of my life, I have nothing to object; the information obtained is authentic, and expressed in a liberal and courteous manner." This correspondence has escaped the notice of Mr. Hoole; but it deserves attention, as it contains his opinion of his own compositions, and as it serves to authenticate the particulars of his life, recorded in the "European Magazine."

From the time of his second marriage till his death, he seems to have enjoyed a life of great tranquillity; gratified with the elegant and unblameable pleasures resulting from a well-cultivated mind, and possessed of a wife, whose disposition ensured to him a perpetual source of domestic peace. He mentions her with unaffected tenderness in his poem of Amwell; and addresses a copy of verses to her, written in the same year, and inserted in his Poetical Works, twelve years after his marriage.

He commenced a critic on Denham, Pope, and Thomson, in his correspondence with his friends, Cockfield and Turner, in 1756 and 1761. He had afterwards minutely examined some of the productions of Milton, Dyer, Collins, Gray, and Goldsmith, and had long designed to impart his strictures to the world. He corrected this work for the press, under the title of Critical Essays on some of the Poems of several English Poets, in 1783; but did not live to superintend the publication.

His wife having lately laboured under a very serious complaint, for which he was anxious to have the best advice, he accompanied her to London, Oct. 25. 1783; and on the 1st of December following, was attacked with a putrid fever, the symptoms of which, from the beginning, were judged to be dangerous. On the 12th of December, eleven days after he was seized, having retained his senses to the last, with his understanding at all times clear and unimpaired, he died at his house in Ratcliffe, in the 54th year of his age. He was buried in the Quaker burying-ground at Ratcliffe, on the 18th of the same month, his funeral being attended by a select number of relations and friends. He left behind him a widow and daughter, their only child, about six years old.

After his death, his Critical Essays being nearly ready for publication, it was thought advisable to prefix some account of his life to the posthumous volume. Mr. David Barclay, grandson of the great Apologist, applied to Dr. Johnson, to undertake the arrangement of the materials he would endeavour to furnish. To this application Dr. Johnson returned the following answer, dated Ashbourn, Sept. 16. 1784.

“As I have made some advances towards recovery, and loved Scott, I am willing to do justice to his memory. You will be pleased to get what account you can of his life, with dates, where they can be had; and when I return, we will contrive how our materials can be best employed.”

The death of Dr. Johnson, which happened Dec. 13. having frustrated the kind intentions of Mr. Barclay, and put an end to his expectations of procuring to him so honourable a testimony to the merits of his deceased friend, he prevailed upon Mr. Hoole to become his biographer; who executed the task in a manner that reflects much credit on his candour, modesty, and judgment.

A second edition of his Poetical Works was printed in 8vo, 1786. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1786, with the Description of the Æolian Harp, and the Verses on Fear, reprinted from the “Gentleman’s Magazine,” for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The character of the amiable and benevolent “poet of Amwell,” as delineated by Mr. Hoole, who knew him well, seems to be a powerful rival, in point of philanthropy, to that of the worthy and public-spirited “Man of Rofs.”

“In his person he was tall and slender, but his limbs were remarkably strong and muscular; he was very active, and delighted much in walking; his countenance was cheerful and animated. The active member of society, the public-spirited man, and contemplative student, were all united in Scott. He was not only a lover and cultivator of polite literature, but, though not used to any profession, was no idle member of the community; he busied himself in many concerns that tended to the good of his neighbourhood. He knew how to blend the elegant with the useful; and such as had little predilection for the author of the Elegies, were forward enough to give their suffrage to those merits that promoted the good of general life. As he was well informed in the laws of his country, he was ever disposed to stand forward in the arbitration of any differences between his neighbours; he frequently interfered in the lesser quarrels and distresses of the poor inhabitants; and, to apply his own emphatical words in the Vicar of Amwell,

————— Oft heard and oft reliev’d
Their little wants; oft heard and oft compos’d,
Sole arbiter, their little broils—————

“He is reported to have been at one time a sportsman; but in consequence of a humane and rational opinion, that men had no right to destroy or torment any of the animal creation for mere diversion, he, for many years before his death, totally relinquished the diversions of shooting and fishing.

“He certainly possessed a general knowledge in, and acquaintance with books. That he made any great progress in the languages, there is little reason to suppose; he, indeed, might attain some knowledge of the Latin; but that knowledge was very slender. From his inclination to know something of the excellencies of those poets who have so long held their claim to admiration, he seems, by a few remarks and references, to have looked into some of the Augustan writers, particularly Virgil, whose spirit would have been highly congenial to one whose professed aim was purity and correctness; but I think there is little room to believe, that those occasional researches were ever improved into any thing like the familiar perusal of a Latin classic. He had no acquaintance with the French or Italian.

“He had a constant desire to be acquainted with every character of learning or genius. He often regretted that he had not known the late Mr. Garrick; of whom, though he never went to the theatres, he had conceived a high idea; and, indeed, he has frequently expressed to me a strong curiosity to have seen him act.

“He imparted, without any disguise, his real feeling and sentiments on his own works, or on the works of others. His manner of reading verse was very peculiar, yet such as seemed to give him a strong perception of harmony; at the same time he frequently confessed to me, that he read ill, and was well pleased to have his lines repeated by another. This is a defect very common in authors; Goldsmith, one of the most harmonious and easy poets, was a very unskilful reader.

“He was a great lover of music, but had no practical knowledge of it. He preferred the time for poetical composition, when the rest of the family were in bed; and it was frequently his custom to sit in a dark room, and when he had composed a number of lines, he would go into another room; where a candle was burning, in order to commit them to paper. Though in general very regular in his hour of retiring to rest, he would sometimes be up great part of the night, when he was engaged in any literary work."

On the poetical character of Scott, it is unnecessary to enlarge, as it has been illustrated by Mr. Hoole, with a minuteness of examination, and a justness of discrimination, that leaves little to be supplied.

"The greater part of Mr. Scott's poems, are turned on rural imagery; in which it will be found, that his principal merit is novelty in description, and a laudable endeavour to introduce an occasional simplicity of style, perhaps too much rejected by the present fastidious readers of poetry. He was certainly no fervile copyist of the thoughts of others; for, living in the country, and being a close and accurate observer, he painted what he saw, though he must, unavoidably, sometimes fall on ideas and expressions common to all pastoral writers.

"He cultivated the knowledge of natural history and botany, which enabled him to preserve the truth of nature with many discriminating touches, perhaps not excelled by any descriptive poet since the days of Thomson.

"Perhaps it must be granted, that his first avowed poetical production, intitled Elegies, Moral and Descriptive, has not been excelled by any of his subsequent works, whether we consider the liveliness of the painting, the harmony of the verse, or the amiable strain of benevolence and piety that runs through the whole.

"His Amwell, a descriptive poem, is written in blank verse, the genius of which he professed to have particularly studied; and I think he exhibits a specimen of great strength and harmony in that metre. The face of the country here is very picturesque; but perhaps it will be found, that local description is far more adapted to the powers of the pencil than the pen. Those marking and peculiar features which the painter gives, with a few strokes, to the eye, will lose almost all their discrimination in the words of the poet; a hill, a vale, a forest, a rivulet, and a cataract, can be described only by general terms; the hill must swell, the vale sink, the rivulet murmur, and the cataract foam. On the great defect of words to discriminate material objects, Dr. Johnson once observed to me, that no description, however accurately given, could impress any determinate idea of the different shapes of animals on the mind of one who had never seen those animals. Hence, it must be concluded, that the appearance of nature at large may be the province of poetry, but that the form of particular objects must belong to the painter. Scott has availed himself of every circumstance that could with propriety be introduced to decorate his poem; but nothing shows his taste and judgment more than the tribute paid by him to the memory of Thomas Hassal, the venerable minister of Amwell, which furnishes a passage at once so pathetic and poetical. Though Scott's poem will not raise in the mind of a stranger any strong idea of the place meant to be described, yet it will always be perused with delight by poetical lovers of rural imagery.

"His Moral Eclogues undoubtedly deserve praise, for easy versification and good painting, and for several natural observations of the poet. Several new images may be collected from these poems. In some places, the poet has not unskillfully introduced the names of wild plants and flowers, which, when they are marked with picturesque epithets, have a good effect. I am sensible that some persons have affected to hold mere descriptive poetry in little estimation, but, surely, not to mention that description, must necessarily make great part of every narrative poem, and has ever been considered as a material talent in the poet; a poem consisting of rural painting, may, at least to the ear, have the same merit that landscape-painting has to the eye. But few poems of this kind were ever known to come from the pen of a good writer, without a mixture of moral reflections; and in this, the poetry of Scott, is entitled to no little approbation. But whatever praise is due to the harmony of his numbers, I cannot pass over a peculiarity in his predilection for sometimes laying an uncommon accent on words or syllables, which he thought gave strength to the line. This liberty should, in my opinion, be very sparingly used. Roughness of verse may indeed be emphatical where the image requires it, of which a forcible example is given in the following line:

The slow wain grating bore its cumbrous load.

"The Amwellian Eclogues seems to me the least happy of Mr. Scott's productions; for in his attempt at novelty, he has admitted such names and circumstances, as, in my opinion, no versification, however harmonious, can make poetical; these lines may, in some measure, show the force of my objections,

Old oaken stubs, tough saplings there adorn,
 There hedge-row plashees yield the knotty thorn,
 The swain for different uses these avail,
 And form the traveller's staff, the thresher's flail.

"In his Oriental Eclogues, he has, with judgment, made use of such circumstances as might give them an air of local truth. The Eclogue of Serim, or the Artificial Famine, has much poetical merit. The Chinese Eclogue, called Li-po, or the Good Governor, has picturesque touches of the country, and contains many amiable reflections, political and moral. The vision of Confucius is very poetical.

"The Odes, as he informs us, were written at very different periods, and some appear to be his earliest effusions in poetry. The style of these odes is various, gay and familiar, pathetic and sublime. In the odes on Recruiting and Privateering, the thoughts are new, and singularly characteristic of Mr. Scott's religious tenets, and which ought to reflect no small honour on these tenets, strictly conformable to the dictates of every feeling mind, uncorrupted with the maxims of human policy. The Mexican Ode may admit of much praise. It opens with a spirited abruptness; it ends with equal dignity, after the prophecy of the Mexican idol. The vanishing of the demon is attended with circumstances not very dissimilar from the disappearance of the "Spirit of the Cape," in Camoens.

"The two Epistles that follow the odes, are written in a very familiar and easy strain of versification. The second Epistle describes the occupations and amusements of a contemplative mind in the country, and may be considered as a picture of the author's own manner of living.

"The Essay on Painting is an elegant piece of versification, and shows, in the fullest light, Mr. Scott's turn for the polite arts. He was always a great admirer of painting, and for many years never missed an annual exhibition. The poem is said to be addressed to a young painter, but has no reference to any particular person. It will perhaps be found, that not any very new remarks are introduced on a subject relative to which so much has been written; but the rules and observations are at least delivered with taste and propriety."

Of his success as a critic, in his posthumous volume, Mr. Hoole thinks no less favourably than of his poetical pretensions.

"This volume displays an open, manly spirit of criticism, and may be perused by all lovers of poetry with advantage. He seems, with reason, to have disputed the claim of Denham to the reputation which he has so long enjoyed, and several of the passages adduced by him from Cooper's Hill, very well support his assertions. He has skilfully defended Milton's Lycidas against some of Dr. Johnson's objections, and has well apologized for the profusion of imagery admitted into a poem expressive of grief. He has judiciously pointed out several inaccuracies in the Windfor Forest of Pope, one of the correctest of our poets. His remarks on Gronger Hill, and the Ruins of Rome of Dyer, and the Oriental Eclogues of Collins, are replete with taste, the defects and beauties of each poem being singled out with great discernment. The Elegy of Gray seems to have given him little room for objection, but I think that he has indulged himself too much in his proposed transposition of several passages in that poem. Amidst all the beauties of Goldsmith's Deserted Village, he has very clearly discovered redundancy and incorrectness. His strictures on Thomson are generally just, and several examples are given of false figures, and confused metaphors, wherein the poet's fancy has carried away his judgment."

Such are the criticisms of Mr. Hoole, which, with a few exceptions, will be generally allowed to be the result of a competent judgment, a candid disposition, and an elegant taste. He has estimated the moral and intellectual character of Scott with impartiality, and discriminated the beauties and defects of his compositions with accuracy.

In such an age as this, "when dissipation reigns, and prudence sleeps," too much cannot be said in favour of a man who was not less distinguished by the blameless simplicity of his manners, than the warmth of his friendship, and the activity of his benevolence. But his amiable worth and poetical genius, may be better known from his works, that truly reflect their author's mind, than any formal comments. Though a disciple of Barclay, he is also a legitimate son of Apollo. The present writer is happy to agree with Mr. Hoole, in assigning him a respectable rank among the poets of our nation. His compositions are characterized by elegance, simplicity, and harmony, more than invention or sublimity; neither of which are wanting. They breathe a spirit of tenderness and philanthropy, and display an amiable and virtuous mind. In natural enthusiasm and fire, they are by no means deficient. The subjects on which choice or accident has induced him to write, afford no great room for invention to be exercised. His third and fourth eclogues, and the second and third Oriental odes, and some other poems, have, however, a disposition of conduct not very frequently met with. All his pieces show a propriety of plan, and regularity of connection; their component parts are homogenous and concordant, and close in an easy and agreeable manner. They are distinguished by correctness and neatness of expression; a style free from elliptical abruptness, violent transpositions, or a slovenly recurrence of the same words in one sentence. His lines are seldom cold or prosaic, though sometimes a verse may be found purposely varied from the common structure by trochaic accents, or otherwise: In some instances the limæ labor et mora are too visible, and seem to have destroyed the characteristic relief, the glowing thought, and the ardent language. But his poems have a merit of no common kind; they have no poetical common-places; the sentiments and diction are unborrowed; and his style of composition, as well as his modes of thinking, are entirely his own.

His Elegies, Descriptive and Moral, are characterized by a natural enthusiasm, harmony, and simplicity. The descriptions are truly poetical, and the morality so happily interwoven with them, as to seem almost necessarily connected with the subject; while the melodious gravity of the verse, and the agreeable melancholy spirit of the sentiments and expression, compose a very decent and suitable garb for the elegiac Muse.

His Elegy written at Amwell, 1768, at a time when he was suffering the greatest of human calamities, the death of the object whom he mourns, is fraught with fine poetical feeling, that entitles it to rank with the "Monodies" of Shaw and Lyttleton, and the "Verses," &c. of Langhorne; the most pathetic funeral elegies in the English language.

His Amwell is an easy and melodious descriptive poem; the objects of which are those rural scenes and images that strike upon a young mind impregnated with the seeds of poetry, of course, with an ardent love of nature—that strike with a degree of enthusiasm, which seems, like other generous passions, to have its empire in youth, but can never be divided from memory. He begins with invoking the descriptive Muse, who inspired Thomson, Dyer, and Shenstone; invites his Maria, the second fair partner of his joys, to accompany him in his walk; directs our eye to Hertford's grey towers—which introduces a short episode of the defeat of the Danes by Alfred, in 879; to Berleio and Ware-Park, once the residence of Sir Richard Fanshawe, the translator of the "Lusiad" of Camoens, who is elegantly commemorated; to the New River, brought to London by Sir Hugh Middleton; to Ware, once famous for its tournaments, in one of which an Earl of Pembroke was slain, 25th Hen. III.; to Langley-bottom, an Elyian scene, on which he seriously moralizes. After lamenting, in the close of these melancholy ideas, the death of his friends Turner and De Horne, he proceeds in his pastoral landscape, near and remote, till he rests at last on Amwell, his favourite scene; of which he gives a more particular and more graphical view. Scarcely any thing of the descriptive kind can be more poetical than the farewell address to the scene and subject of this elegant poem. It is rendered interesting by the introduction of historical incidents, apt allusions, and moral reflections. Introduced are Isaac Walton, the scene of whose "Angler's Dialogues" is the Vale of Lee; William Warner, the author of "Albion's England," who resided here; Thomas Hassal, vicar of Amwell, who, like the good Bishop of Marseilles, performed his parochial duty during the plague in 1603 and 1625; and Mr. Hoole, the British Tasso, his future biographer, who thither

— Oft from busy scenes,
To rural calm and letter'd ease retires.

In his Amabaean Eclogues, the rural imagery that is introduced and illustrated by notes, is new and Linnaean; though some of his plants and shrubs, like the barbarous town in Horace, no verification can make poetical—versu dicere non est. They evince, however, strong powers of appropriate and discriminating description, natural and pathetic sentiment, and correct and spirited versification.

His Oriental Eclogues have little to fear from a comparison with any of their predecessors. Like those of Collins, they have description, incident, sentiment, and moral; they have simplicity of thought, and melody of language. To describe the manners and habits of life of a people, and the scenery of a country that is known, and known too but imperfectly, by the description of others, is a task of considerable difficulty. Of the numerous attempts of this kind, whether in prose or verse, there are few, perhaps, will stand the test of examination. Should it possibly be objected to Scott, that he has not wholly escaped the impropriety of sometimes blending European with Asiatic ideas, he has, however, other beauties, that will more than atone for what, perhaps, in an Englishman might be unavoidable. They breathe a spirit of humanity and poetry, that does equal honour to his heart and his understanding. In the East Indian eclogue, intituled Scrim, or the Artificial Famine, the misery and destruction accumulated, some years ago, on the Gentoo natives of Bengal, &c. by the monopoly of rice, are painted in strong colours, and exhibit a picture of our unfeeling countrymen, from which we turn with horror, to scenes not less horrid, though long past in the West.

The Mexican Prophecy is a spirited production. On the approach of Cortex to the neighbourhood of Mexico, the Emperor Montezuma sent a number of magicians to attempt the destruction of the Spanish army. As the forcerers were practising their incantations, a demon appeared to them in the form of their idol Tlactepuca, and foretold the fall of the Mexican empire. On this legend is founded the ode, of which the conclusion approaches to sublimity. Respecting the general poetical merit of his Essay on Painting, Epistles, and Odes, the present writer is happy to coincide in judgment with Mr. Hoole. His Sonnets are correct and elegant, and will be read with pleasure; though they do not possess all the appropriate excellencies of this species of verse. His verses on the Æolian Harp, and on Fear, are spirited and poetical. But there is not, perhaps, in the whole compass of his poetry, any thing more expressive of his philanthropical affections and comprehensive benevolence, than the following little Ode. It is truly British, and truly humane.

I hate that drum's discordant sound,
Parading round, and round, and round;
To thoughtless youth its pleasure yields,
And lures from cities and from fields,
To sell their liberty for charms
Of tawdry lace, and glittering arms;
And when Ambition's voice commands,
To march, and fight, and fall, in foreign lands.

I hate that drum's discordant sound,
Parading round, and round, and round:
To me it talks of ravag'd plains,
And burning towns, and ruin'd swains,
And mangled limbs, and dying groans,
And widows tears, and orphans moans;
And all that Misery's hand bestows,
To fill the catalogue of human woes.

His Critical Essays are no inconsiderable addition to his fame. They have much merit, in the mode of criticism which he has pursued. In the minuteness and rigour of his examination, he approaches to the inquisitorial strictness of Dr. Johnson. This exactness, however, is sometimes misapplied, and sometimes leads him into error. Just observations are sometimes mixed with faults. Some peculiar words and phrases do not produce a pleasing effect; but, on the whole, they may be read by an ardent young poet with advantage.

THE most rational definition of pastoral poetry seems to be that of the learned and ingenious Dr. Johnson, in the 37th number of his Rambler. 'Pastoral,' says he, 'being the representation of a passion or passion, by its effects on a country life, has nothing peculiar, but its confinement to rural imagery, without which it ceases to be pastoral.' This theory the author of the following eclogues has endeavoured to exemplify.

ECLOGUE I.

THERON; OR, THE PRAISE OF RURAL LIFE.

Scene, a Heath:—Season, Spring; Time, Morning.

FAIR Spring o'er nature held her gentlest sway,
Fair morn diffus'd around her brightest ray;
Thin mists hung hovering on the distant trees,
Or roll'd from off the fields before the breeze.
The shepherd Theron watch'd his fleecy train,
Beneath a broad oak, on the grassy plain.
A heath's green wild lay pleasant to his view,
With shrubs and field-flowers deck'd of varied hue:
There hawthorns tall their silver bloom disclos'd,
Here flexile broom's bright yellow interpos'd;
There purple orchis, here pale daisies spread,
And sweet May lilies richest odours shed.
From many a copse and blossom'd orchard near,
The voice of birds melodious charm'd the ear;
There thrill the lark, and soft the linnet sung,
And loud through air the thrush's music rung,

The gentle swain the cheerful scene admir'd;
The cheerful scene the song of joy inspir'd.
'Chant on,' he cry'd, 'ye warblers on the spray!
'Bleat on, ye flocks, that in the pastures play!
'Low on, ye herds, that range the dewy vales!
'Murmur, ye rills! and whisper soft, ye gales!
'How blest my lot, in these sweet fields assign'd,
'Where peace and leisure sooth the tuneful mind;
'Where yet some pleasing vestiges remain
'Of unperverted nature's golden reign.
'When love and virtue rang'd Arcadian shades,
'With undefining youths and artless maids!
'For us, though destin'd to a later time,
'A less luxuriant soil, less genial clime,
'For us the country boasts enough to charm,
'In the wild woodland or the cultur'd farm.
'Come, Cynthia, come! in town no longer stay
'From crowds, and noise, and folly, haste away!
'The fields, the meads, the trees, are all in bloom,
'The vernal showers awake a rich perfume,

' Where Damon's mansion, by the glassy stream,
 ' Rears its white walls that through green vil-
 ' lows gleam,
 ' Annual the neighbours hold their shearing-day;
 ' And blithe youths come, and nymphs in neat array:
 ' Those shear their sheep, upon the smooth turf
 ' laid,
 ' In the broad plane's or trembling poplar's shade;
 ' These for their friends th' expected feast pro-
 ' vide,
 ' Beneath cool bowers along th' enclosure's side.
 ' To view the toil, the glad repast to share,
 ' Thy Delia, my Melania, shall be there;
 ' Each, kind and faithful to her faithful swain,
 ' Loves the calm pleasures of the pastoral plain.
 ' Come, Cynthia, come! If towns and crowds in' vite,
 ' And noise and folly promise high delight;
 ' Soon the tir'd soul disgusted turns from these—
 ' The rural prospect, only, long can please!

ECLOGUE II.

PALEMON; OR, BENEVOLENCE.

Scene, a Wood-side on the Brow of a Hill.—Season, Summer; Time, Forenoon.

BRIGHT fleecy clouds flew scattering o'er the sky,
 And shorten'd shadows show'd that noon was nigh;

When two young shepherds, in the upland shade,
 Their listless limbs upon the greensward laid.
 Surrounding groves the wandering sight confin'd—
 All, save where, westward, one wide landscape
 shin'd,

Down in the dale were neat enclosures seen,
 The winding hedge-row and the thicket green;
 Rich marsh land next a glossy level show'd,
 And through gray willows silver rivers flow'd:
 Beyond, high hills with towers and villas crown'd,
 And waving forests, form'd the prospect's bound.
 Sweet was the covert where the swains reclin'd!
 There spread the wild rose, there the woodbine
 twin'd; [ground,

There stood the green fern; there, o'er the grassy
 Sweet camomile and alehoof crept around;
 And centaury red and yellow cinquefoil grew,
 And scarlet campion, and cyanus blue;
 And tufted thyme, and marjoram's purple bloom,
 And ruddy strawberries yielding rich perfume.
 Gay flies their wings on each fair flower display'd,
 And labouring bees a lulling murmur made.

Along the brow a path delightful lay;
 Slow by the youths Palemon chanc'd to stray,
 A bard, who often to the rural throng,
 At vacant hours rehears'd the moral song!
 The song the shepherds crav'd; the sage reply'd:
 ' As late my steps forsook the fountain side,
 ' Adown the green lane by the beechen grove,
 ' Their flocks young Pironel and Larvon drove;
 ' With us perchance they'll rest a while'—The swains [plains:

Approach'd the shade; and their sheep spread o'er the Silent they view'd the venerable man,
 Whose voice melodious thus the lay began:
 What Alcon sung where Evesham's vales extend,
 I sing; ye swains, your pleas'd attention lend!

' There long with him the rural life I led,
 ' His fields I cultur'd, and his flocks I fed.
 ' Where, by the hamlet road upon the green,
 ' Stood pleasant cots with trees dipers'd between,
 ' Beside his door, as waving o'er his head
 ' A lofty elm its rustling foliage spread,
 ' Looftent he sat; while all the village train
 ' Press'd round his seat, and listen'd to his strain.
 ' And once of fair Benevolence he sung,
 ' And thus the tuneful numbers left his tongue:
 ' Ye youth of Avon's banks, of Bredon's groves,
 ' Sweet scenes, where plenty reigns, and plea-
 ' sure roves!
 ' Woo to your bowers benevolence the fair,
 ' Kind as your soil, and gentle as your air.
 ' She comes! her tranquil step, and placid eye,
 ' Fierce rage, fell hate, and ruthless avarice fly.
 ' She comes! her heav'nly smiles, with power-
 ' ful charm, [arm.
 ' Smooth care's rough brow, and rest toil's weary
 ' She comes! ye shepherds, importune her stay!
 ' While your fair farms exuberant wealth display,
 ' While herds and flocks their annual increase
 ' yield,
 ' And yellow harvests load the fruitful field;
 ' Beneath grim want's inexorable reign,
 ' Pale sickness, oft, and feeble age complain!
 ' Why this unlike allotment, save to show,
 ' That who possess, possess but to bestow?"
 Palemon ceas'd.— Sweet is the sound of gales
 ' Amid green osters in the winding vales;
 ' Sweet is the lark's loud note on sunny hills,
 ' What time fair morn the sky with fragrance fills;
 ' Sweet is the nightingale's love-soothing strain,
 ' Heard by still waters on the moonlight plain?
 ' But not the gales that through green osters play,
 ' Nor lark's nor nightingale's melodious lay,
 ' Please like smooth numbers by the muse in-
 ' spir'd!—
 Larvon reply'd, and homeward all retir'd.

ECLOGUE III.

ARMYN; OR, THE DISCONTENTED.

Scene, a Valley.—Season, Summer; Time, After-noon.

SUMMER o'er heav'n diffus'd serene'st blue,
 And painted earth with many a pleasing hue;
 When Army'n mus'd the vacant hour away,
 Where willows o'er him wav'd their pendant spray.

Cool was the shade, and cool the passing gale,
 And sweet the prospect of the adjacent vale:
 The fertile soil, profuse of plants, bestow'd
 The crowfoot's gold, the trefoil's purple show'd,
 The spiky mint rich fragrance breathing round,
 And mead-sweet tall with tufts of flowret-crown'd,
 And comfrey white, and hoary silver weed,
 The bending osier, and the rustling reed.
 There, where clear streams about green islands
 spread,

Fair flocks and herds, the wealth of Army'n fed;
 There, on the hill's soft slope, delightful view!
 Fair fields of corn, the wealth of Army'n grew;
 His sturdy hinds, a slow laborious band,
 Swept their bright scythes along the level land:

Blithe youths and maidens nimbly near them past,
And the thick swarth in careless wind-rows cast.
Full on the landscape shone the westering sun,
When thus the swain's soliloquy begun :

' Haste down, O sun, and close the tedious day!
' Time to the unhappy slowly moves away.
' Not so to me, in Roden's sylvan bowers, [hours;
' Palf'd youth's short blissful reign of careless
' When to my view the fancy'd future lay,
' A region ever tranquil, ever gay.
' O then, what ardours did my breast inflame!
' What thoughts were mine, of friendship, love
' and fame!

' How tasteless life, now all its joys are try'd,
' And warm pursuits in dull repose subside!' .
He paus'd: his closing words Albino heard,
As down the stream his little boat he steer'd;
His hand releas'd the sail, and dropt the oar,
And moor'd the light skiff on the sedge shore.

' Cease, gentle swain,' he said; ' no more, in vain,
' Thus make past pleasure cause of present pain!
' Cease, gentle swain,' he said; ' from thee alone
' Are youth's best hours and fancy'd prospects
' flown?

' Ah no!—remembrance to my view restores
' Dear native fields, which now my soul deploras;
' Rich hills and vales, and pleasant village scenes
' Of oaks, whose wide arms stretch'd o'er daisied
' greens,

' And windmill's sails slow-circling in the breeze;
' And cottage walls envelop'd half with trees—
' Sweet scenes, where beauty met the ravish'd sight,
' And music often gave the ear delight;
' Where Delia's smile, and Mira's tuneful song,
' And Damon's converse, charm'd the youthful
' throng! [plains,

' How chang'd, alas, how chang'd!—O'er all our
' Proud Norval now in lonely grandeur teigns;
' His wide-spread park a waste of verdure lies,
' And his vast villa's glittering roofs arise.
' For me, hard fate!—But say, shall I complain?
' These limbs yet active, life's support obtain.
' Let us, or good or evil as we share,
' That thankful prize, and this with patience bear.'
The soft reproach touch'd Albino's gentle breast;
His alter'd brow a placid smile express'd.

' Calm as clear ev'nings after vernal rains,
' When all the air a rich perfume retains,
' My mind,' said he, ' its murmurs driv'n away,
' Feels truth's full force, and bows to reason's
' sway!'

He ceas'd: the sun, with horizontal beams,
Gilt the green mountains, and the glittering streams.
Slow down the tide before the sinking breeze
Albino's white sail gleam'd among the trees;
Slow down the tide his winding course he bore
To wat'ry Talgar's aspin-shaded shore.
Slow cross the valley, to the southern hill,
The steps of Armin sought the distant vill, [rose;
Where through tall elms the moss-grown turret
And his fair mansion offer'd sweet repose.

ECLOGUE IV.

LYCORON; OR, THE UNHAPPY.

Scene, a Valley; Season, Autumn; Time, Evening.

THE matron, Autumn, held her sober reign
O'er fading foliage on the russet plain:

Mild evening came; the moon began to rise,
And spread pale lustre o'er unclouded skies.
' 'Twas silence all—save where along the road
The slow wane grating bore its cumb'rous load;
Save where broad rivers roll'd their waves away,
And screaming herons fought their wat'ry prey—
When hapless Damon, in Algerno's vale,
Pour'd his soft sorrows on the passing gale.

' That grace of shape, that elegance of air,
' That blooming face so exquisitely fair;
' That eye of brightness, bright as morning's ray,
' That smile of softness, soft as closing day;
' Which bound my soul to thee; all, all are fled—
' All lost in dreary mansions of the dead!
' Ev'n him, whom distance from his love divides,
' Told on scorch'd sands, or tost on rolling tides,
' Kind hope still cheers, still paints, to sooth' his pain,

' The happy moment when they meet again.
' Far worse my lot! of hope bereft, I mourn!—
' The parted spirit never can return!

Thus Damon spoke, as in the cypress gloom
He hung lamenting o'er his Delia's tomb.
In the still valley where they wander'd near,
Two gentle shepherds chanc'd his voice to hear:
Lycoron's head time's hand had silver'd o'er,
And Milo's cheek youth's rosy blushes bore.

' How mournful,' said Lycoron, ' flows that
' strain!

' It brings past miseries to my mind again.
' When the blithe village, on the vernal green,
' Sees its fair daughters in the dance convene;
' And youth's light step in search of pleasure strays,
' And his fond eyes on beauty fix their gaze;
' Should'st thou, then lingering midst the lovely
' train,

' Wish some young charmer's easy heart to gain,
' Mark well, that reason love's pursuit approve,
' Ere thy soft arts her tender passions move:
' Else, though thy thoughts in summer regions range,

' Calm sunny climes that seem to fear no change;
' Rude winter's rage will soon the scene deform,
' Dark with thick cloud, and rough with battering storm!

' When parents interdict, and friends dissuade,
' The prudent censure, and the proud upbraid;
' Think! all their efforts then shalt thou disdain,
' Thy faith, thy constancy, unmov'd, maintain?
' To Isca's fields me once ill-fortune led;

' In Isca's fields her flocks Zelinda fed:
' There oft, when ev'ning, on the silent plain,
' Commenc'd with sweet serenity her reign,
' Along green groves, or down the winding dales,
' The fair one listen'd to my tender tales;

' Then when her mind, or doubt, or fear, distress'd,
' And doubt, or fear, her anxious eyes oppress'd,
' O no!" said I, " let oxen quit the mead,
' With climbing goats on craggy cliffs to feed;
' Before the hare the hound affrighted fly,
' And larks pursue the falcon through the sky;

' Streams cease to flow, and winds to stir the lake,
' If I, unfaithful, ever thee forsake!—"
' What my tongue utter'd then, my heart be-
' liev'd:

' O wretched heart, self-flatter'd and deceiv'd!
' Fell slander's arts the virgin's fame accus'd;
' And whom my love had chose, my pride refus'd.

' For me, that cheek did tears of grief distain?
 ' To me, that voice in anguish plead in vain?
 ' What fiend relentless then my soul possest?
 ' Oblivion hide! for ever hide the rest!
 ' Too well her innocence and truth were prov'd;
 ' Too late my pity and my justice mov'd! [express;
 ' He ceas'd, with groans that more than words
 And smote in agony his aged breast.

His friend reply'd not; but, with soothing strains
 Of solemn music, fought to ease his pains:
 Soft flow'd the notes, as gales that waft perfume
 From cowslip meads, or linden boughs in bloom.
 Peace o'er their minds a calm composure cast;
 And slowly down the shadowy vale in pensive mood they pass.

ELEGIES; DESCRIPTIVE AND MORAL.

ELEGY I.

WRITTEN AT THE APPROACH OF SPRING.

STERN Winter hence with all his train removes,
 And cheerful skies and limpid streams are seen;
 Thick-sprouting foliage decorates the groves;
 Reviving herbage clothes the fields with green.

Yet lovelier scenes th' approaching months prepare;

Kind spring's full bounty soon will be display'd;
 The smile of beauty ev'ry vale shall wear;
 The voice of song enliven ev'ry shade.

O fancy, paint not coming days too fair!
 Oft for the prospects brightly May should yield.
 Rain-pouring clouds have darken'd all the air,
 Or snows untimely whiten'd o'er the field:

But should kind spring her wonted bounty show'r,
 The smile of beauty, and the voice of song;
 If gloomy thought the human mind o'erpowers,
 Ev'n vernal hours glide unenjoy'd along.

I shun the scenes where madd'ning passion raves,
 Where pride and folly high dominion hold,
 And unrelenting avarice drives her slaves
 O'er prostrate virtue, in pursuit of gold.

The grassy lane, the wood-surrounded field, [gay,
 The rude stone fence with fragrant wallflower's
 The clay-built cot, to me more pleasure yield,
 Than all the pomp imperial domes display:

And yet even here, amid these secret shades,
 These simple scenes of unprov'd delight,
 Affliction's iron hand my breast invades,
 And death's dread dart is ever in my sight.

While genial suns to genial show'rs succeed
 (The air all mildness, and the earth all bloom);
 While herds and flocks range sportive o'er the mead,
 Crop the sweet herb, and snuff the rich perfume;

O why alone to hapless man deny'd
 To taste the bliss inferior beings boast?
 O why this fate, that fear and pain divide
 His few short hours on earth's delightful coast?

Ah cease—no more of Providence complain!
 'Tis sense of guilt that wakes the mind to woe,
 Gives force to fear, adds energy to pain,
 And palls each joy by Heav'n indulg'd below:

Why else the smiling infant-train so blest,
 Ere ill propension ripens into sin,
 Ere wild desire inflames the youthful breast,
 And dear-bought knowledge ends the peace within?

As to the bleating tenants of the field,
 As to the sportive warblers on the trees,
 To them their joys sincere the seasons yield,
 And all their days and all their prospects please;

Such mine, when first from London's crowded streets, [hills,
 Rov'd my young steps to Surry's wood-crown'd
 O'er new-blown meads that breath'd a thousand sweets,
 By shady coverts and by crystal rills.

O happy hours, beyond recovery fled!
 What share I now that can your loss repay,
 While o'er my mind these glooms of thought are spread,
 And veil the light of life's meridian ray?

Is there no power this darkness to remove?
 The long-lost joys of Eden to restore?
 Or raise our views to happier seats above, [more?
 Where fear, and pain, and death, shall be no

Yes, those there are who know a Saviour's love
 The long-lost joys of Eden to restore,
 And raise their views to happier seats above,
 Where fear, and pain, and death, shall be no
 more:

These grateful share the gifts of nature's hand;
 And in the varied scenes that round them shine
 (Minute and beautiful, or rude and grand),
 Admire th' amazing workmanship divine.

Blows not a flow'ret in th' enamell'd vale,
 Shines not a pebble where the riv'let strays,
 Sports not an insect on the spicy gale,
 But claims their wonder, and excites their praise.

For them ev'n vernal nature looks more gay,
 For them more lively hues the fields adorn;
 To them more fair the fairest smile of day,
 To them more sweet the sweetest breath of morn.

They feel the bliss that hope and faith supply;
 They pass serene th' appointed hours that bring

The day that wafts them to the realms on high,
The day that centers in eternal spring.

ELEGY II.

WRITTEN IN THE HOT WEATHER, JULY 1757.

THREE hours from noon the passing shadow shows,
The sultry breeze glides faintly o'er the plains,
The dazzling ether fierce and fiercer glows,
And human nature scarce its rage sustains.

Now still and vacant is the dusky street,
And still and vacant all yon fields extend,
Save where those swains, oppress'd with toil and heat,
The grassy harvest of the mead attend.

Loft is the lively aspect of the ground,
Low are the springs, the reedy ditches dry;
No verdant spot in all the vale is found,
Save what yon stream's unfailing flows supply.

Where are the flow'rs, the garden's rich array?
Where is their beauty, where their fragrance fled?
Their stems relax, fast fall their leaves away,
They fade and mingle with their dusty bed:

All but the natives of the torrid zone,
What Afric's wilds, or Peru's fields display,
Pleas'd with a climate that imitates their own,
They lovelier bloom beneath the parching ray.

Where is wild nature's heart-reviving song,
That fill'd in genial spring the verdant bow'rs?
Silent in gloomy woods the feather'd throng
Pine through this long, long course of sultry hours.

Where is the dream of bliss by summer brought?
The walk along the riv'let-water'd vale?
The field with verdure clad, with fragrance
fraught?
The sun mild-beaming, and the fanning gale?

The weary soul imagination cheers,
Her pleasing colours paint the future gay:
Time passes on, the truth itself appears,
The pleasing colours instant fade away.

In diff'rent seasons diff'rent joys we place,
And these will spring supply, and summer these;
Yet frequent storms the bloom of spring deface,
And summer scarcely brings a day to please.

O for some secret shady cool recess,
Some Gothic dome o'erhUNG with darksome
trees,
Where thick damp walls this raging heat repress,
Where the long aisle invites the lazy breeze!

But why these plaints?—reflect, nor murmur
more—
Far worse their fate in many a foreign land;
The Indian tribes on Darien's swampy shore,
The Arabs wand'ring over Mecca's sand.

Far worse, alas! the feeling mind sustains, [shame;
Rack'd with the poignant pangs of fear or
The hopeless lover bound in beauty's chains,
The bard whom envy robs of hard-earn'd fame;

He, who a father or a mother mourns,
Or lovely consort lost in early bloom;

He, whom fell Febris, rapid fury, burns,
Or Pthifis slow leads ling'ring to the tomb—

Left man should sink beneath the present pain;
Left man should triumph in the present joy;
For him th' unvarying laws of Heav'n ordain,
Hope in his ills, and to his bliss alloy.

Fierce and oppressive is the heat we bear,
Yet not unuseful to our humid foil;
Thence shall our fruits a richer flavour share,
Thence shall our plains with riper harvests smile.

Reflect, nor murmur more—for good in all,
Heaven gives the due degrees of drought or rain;
Perhaps ere morn, refreshing show'rs may fall,
Nor soon yon sun rise blazing fierce again:

Ev'n now behold the grateful change at hand!
Hark, in the east loud-blust'ring gales arise;
Wide and more wide the dark'ning clouds expand,
And distant lightnings flash along the skies!

O, in the awful concert of the storm,
While hail, and rain, and wind, and thunder join;
May deep-felt gratitude my soul inform,
May joyful songs of rev'rent praise be mine!

ELEGY III.

WRITTEN IN HARVEST.

FAREWELL the pleasant violet-scented shade,
The primros'd hill, and daisy-mantled mead;
The furrow'd land, with springing corn array'd;
The sunny wall, with bloomy branches spread:

Farewell the bow'r with blushing roses gay;
Farewell the fragrant trefoil-purple'd field;
Farewell the walk through rows of new-mown hay,
When ev'ning breezes mingled odours yield:

Of these no more—now round the lonely farms,
Where jocund plenty deigns to fix her seat;
Th' autumnal landscape opening all its charms,
Declares kind nature's annual work complete.

In diff'rent parts what diff'rent views delight,
Where on neat ridges waves the golden grain;
Or where the bearded barley dazzling white,
Spreads o'er the steepy slope or wide champaign.

The smile of morning gleams along the hills,
And wakeful labour calls her sons abroad;
They leave with cheerful look their lowly vills,
And bid the fields resign their ripen'd load.

In various tasks engage the rustic bands,
And here the scythe, and there the sickle wield;
Or rear the new-bound sheaves along the lands,
Or range in heaps the swarths upon the field.

Some build the stocks, some load the spacious wains,
Some lead to shelt'ring barns the fragrant corn;
Some form tall ricks, that tow'ring o'er the plains
For many a mile, the homestead yards adorn.—

The rattling car with verdant branches crown'd,
The joyful swains that raise the clam'rous song,
Th' enclosure gates thrown open all around,
The stubble peopled by the gleaning throng.

Soon mark glad harvest o'er—Ye rural lords,
Whose wide domains o'er Albion's isle extend;

Think whose kind hand your annual wealth affords,
And bid to Heaven your grateful praise ascend!

For though no gift spontaneous of the ground
Rose these fair crops that made your valleys smile,
Though the blithe youth of every hamlet round
Pur sued for these through many a day their toil;

Yet what avail your labours or your cares?
Can all your labours, all your cares, supply
Bright suns, or soft'ning show'rs, or tepid airs,
Or one indulgent influence of the sky?

For Providence decrees, that we obtain
With toil each blessing destin'd to our use;
But means to teach us, that our toil is vain
If he the bounty of his hand refuse.

Yet, Albion, blame not what thy crime demands,
While this sad fruct the blushing muse betrays—
More frequent echoes o'er thy harvest lands,
The voice of riot than the voice of praise.

Prolific though thy fields, and mild thy clime,
Realms fam'd for fields as rich, for climes as fair,
Have fall'n the prey of famine, war, and time,
And now no semblance of their glory bear.

Ask Palestine, proud Asia's early boast,
Where now the groves that pour'd her wine and oil; [coast;
Where the fair towns that crown'd her wealthy
Where the glad swains that till'd her fertile soil:

Ask, and behold, and mourn her hapless fall!
Where rose fair towns, where toil'd the jocund
swain,
Thron'd on the naked rock and mould'ring wall,
Pale want and ruin hold their dreary reign.

Where Jordan's valleys smil'd in living green,
Where Sharon's flow'rs disclos'd their varied hues,
The wand'ring pilgrim views the alter'd scene,
And drops the tear of pity as he views.

Ask Grecia, mourning o'er her ruin'd tow'rs,
Where now the prospects charm'd her bards of old,

Her corn-clad mountains and Elysian bow'rs,
And silver streams through fragrant meadows
roll'd?

Where freedom's praise along the vale was heard,
And town to town return'd the fav'rite sound;
Where patriot war her awful standard rear'd,
And brav'd the millions Persia pour'd around?

There freedom's praise no more the valley cheers,
There patriot war no more her banner waves;
Nor bard, nor sage, nor martial chief appears,
But stern barbarians rule a land of slaves.

Of mighty realms are such the poor remains?
Of mighty realms that fell, when mad with
pow'r,

They call'd for vice to revel on their plains;
The monster doom'd their offspring to devour!

O Albion! wouldst thou shun their mournful fate,
To shun their follies and their crimes be thine;

And woo to linger in thy fair retreat,
The radiant virtues, progeny divine!

Fair truth, with dauntless eye and aspect bland;
Sweet peace whose brow no angry frown de-
forms;

Soft charity, with over-open hand;
And courage, calm amid surrounding storms.

O lovely train! O haste to grace our isle!
So may the pow'r who ev'ry blessing yields,
Bid on her clime fiercest seasons smile,
And crown with annual wealth her far-fam'd fields.

ELEGY IV.

WRITTEN AT THE APPROACH OF WINTER.

THE sun far southward bends his annual way,
The bleak north-east wind lays the forests bare,
The fruit ungather'd quits the naked spray,
And dreary winter reigns o'er earth and air.

No mark of vegetable life is seen,
No bird to bird repeats his tuneful call;
Save the dark leaves of some rude evergreen,
Save the lone red-breast on the moss-grown wall.

Where are the sprightly prospects spring supply'd,
The may-flower'd hedges scenting every breeze;
The white flocks scatt'ring o'er th' mountain's side,
The woodlarks warbling on the blooming trees;

Where is gay summer's sportive insect train,
That in green fields on painted pinions play'd?
The herd at morn wide-pasturing o'er the plain,
Or throng'd at noon-tide in the willow shade?

Where is brown autumn's ev'ning mild and still,
What time the ripen'd corn fresh fragrance yields,

What time the village peoples all the hill,
And loud shouts echo o'er the harvest fields?

To former scenes our fancy thus returns,
To former scenes that little pleas'd when here!
Our winter chills us, and our summer burns,
Yet we dislike the changes of the year.

To happier lands then restless fancy flies, [flow;
Where Indian streams through green Savannahs
Where brighter suns and ever tranquil skies
Bid new fruits ripen, and new flow'rets blow.

Let truth these fairer happier lands survey—
There frowning months descend in wat'ry storms;

Or nature faints amid the blaze of day,
And one brown hue the sun-burnt plain deforms.

There oft, as toiling in the sultry fields,
Or homeward passing on the shadeless way,
His joyless life the weary lab'rer yields,
And instant drops beneath the deathful ray.

Who dreams of nature, free from nature's strife?
Who dreams of constant happiness below?
The hope-flush'd ent'rer on the stage of life;
The youth to knowledge unchastis'd by woe.

For me, long toil'd on many a weary road,
Led by false hope in search of many a joy;

I find in earth's bleak clime no blest abode,
No place, no season, sacred from annoy :

For me, while winter rages round the plains,
With his dark days I human life compare ;
Not those more fraught with clouds, and winds, and rains,

Than this with pining pain and anxious care.

O! whence this wondrous turn of mind our fate—

Whate'er the season or the place possess,
We ever murmur at our present state,
And yet the thought of parting breaks our rest?

Why else, when heard in evening's solemn gloom,
Does the sad knell, that founding o'er the plain
Tells some poor lifeless body to the tomb,
Thus thrill my breast with melancholy pain?

The voice of reason thunders in my ear : [clay;
' Thus thou, ere long, must join thy kindred
' No more those nostrils breathe the vital air,
' No more those eyelids open on the day!'

O winter, o'er me hold thy dreary reign!
Spread wide thy knell in darkest horrors dress'd!
Of their dread rage no longer I'll complain
Nor ask an Eden for a transient guest.

Enough has Heaven indulg'd of joy below,
To tempt our rarrance in this lov'd retreat;
Enough has Heaven ordain'd of useful woe,
To make us languish for a happier seat.

There is, who deems all climes, all seasons fair;
There is, who knows no restless passion's strife;
Contentment, smiling at each idle care;
Contentment, thankful for the gift of life!

She finds in winter many a view to please;
The morning landscape fring'd with frost-work
gay,
The sun at noon seen through the leafless trees,
The clear calm ether at the close of day:

She marks th' advantage storms and clouds bestow,
When blust'ring Caurus purifies the air;
When moist Aquarius pours the fleecy snow,
That makes th' impregnate glebe a richer harvest bear:

She bids, for all, our grateful praise arise,
To him whose mandate spake the world to form;
Gay spring's gay bloom, and summer's cheerful
skies,
And autumn's corn-clad field, and winter founding storm.

ELEGY V.

WRITTEN AT AMWELL, IN HERTFORDSHIRE, 1768.

O FRIEND! though silent thus thy tongue remains,
I read inquiry in thy anxious eye,
Why my pale cheek the frequent tear distains,
Why from my bosom bursts the frequent sigh.

Long from these scenes detain'd in distant fields,
My mournful tale perchance escap'd thy ear:
Fresh grief to me the repetition yields;
Thy kind attention gives thee right to hear!

Foe to the world's pursuit of wealth and fame,
Thy Theron early from the world retir'd,
Left to the busy throng each boasted aim,
Nor aught, save peace in solitude, desir'd.

A few choice volumes there could oft engage,
A few choice friends there oft amus'd the day;
There his lov'd parent's slow-declining age,
Life's calm unvary'd evening, wore away.

Foe to the futile manners of the proud,
He chose an humble virgin for his own;
A form with nature's fairest gifts endow'd,
And pure as vernal blossoms newly blown.

Her hand she gave, and with it gave a heart
By love engag'd, with gratitude impress,
Free without folly, prudent without art,
With wit accomplish'd, and with virtue blest.

Swift pass'd the hours; alas, to pass no more!
Flown like the light clouds of a summer's day!
One beauteous pledge the beauteous consort bore;
The fatal gift forbade the giver's stay.

Ere twice the sun perform'd his annual round,
In one sad spot where kindred ashes lie,
O'er wife, and child, and parents, clos'd the
ground;
The final home of man ordain'd to die!

O cease at length, obtrusive mem'ry! cease,
Nor in my view the wretched hours retain,
That saw disease on her dear life increase,
And medicine's lenient arts essay'd in vain.

O the dread scene (in misery how sublime!)
Of love's vain pray'rs to stay her fleeting breath!
Suspense that restless watch'd the flight of time,
And helpless dumb despair awaiting death!

O the dread scene!—'Tis agony to tell,
How o'er the couch of pain declin'd my head,
And took from dying lips the long farewell,
The last, last parting, ere her spirit fled.

' Restore her, Heaven, as from the grave retrieve—
' In each calm moment all things else resign'd,
' Her looks, her language, show how hard to leave
' The lov'd companion she must leave behind.

' Restore her, Heaven! for once in mercy spare—
Thus love's vain prayer in anguish interpos'd;
And soon suspense gave place to dumb despair,
And o'er the past, death's sable curtain clos'd—

In silence clos'd—My thoughts rov'd frantic round,
No hope, no wish beneath the sun remain'd;
Earth, air, and skies one dismal waste I found,
One pale, dead, dreary blank, with horror
stain'd.

O lovely flow'r, too fair for this rude clime!
O lovely morn, too prodigal of light!
O transient beauties, blasted in their prime!
O transient glories, sunk in sudden night!

Sweet excellence, by all who knew thee mourn'd!
Where is that form, that mind, my soul admir'd;
That form, with every pleasing charm adorn'd;
That mind, with every gentle thought inspir'd?

The face with rapture view'd, I view no more;
' The voice with rapture heard, no more I hear:

Yet the lov'd features mem'ry's eyes explore;
Yet the lov'd accents fall on mem'ry's ear.

Ah sad, sad change (sad source of daily pain)!
That sense of loss ineffable renews;
While my rack'd bosom heaves the sigh in vain,
While my pale cheek the tear in vain bedews.
Still o'er the grave that holds the dear remains,
The mould'ring veil her spirit left below,
Fond fancy dwells, and pours funeral strains,
The soul-dissolving melody of woe.

Nor mine alone to bear this painful doom,
Nor she alone the tear of song obtains;
The muse of Blagdon*, o'er Constantia's tomb,
In all the eloquence of grief complains.

My friend's fair hope, like mine, so lately gain'd;
His heart, like mine, in its true partner blest;
Both from one cause the same distress sustain'd,
The same sad hours beheld us both distress'd.

O human life! how mutable, how vain!
How thy wide sorrows circumscribe thy joy—
A sunny island in a stormy main,
A spot of azure in a cloudy sky!

All-gracious Heaven! since man, insatiate man,
Rests in thy works too negligent of thee,
Lays for himself on earth his little plan,
Dreads not, or distant views mortality;

'Tis but to wake to nobler thought the soul,
To rouse us ling'ring on earth's flowery plain,
To virtue's path our wand'rings to controul,
Affliction frowning comes, thy minister of pain!

AMWELL:

A DESCRIPTIVE POEM.

There dwells a fond desire in human minds,
When pleas'd, their pleasure to extend to those
Of kindred taste; and thence th' enchanting arts
Of picture and of song, the semblance fair
Of nature's forms produce. This fond desire
Prompts me to sing the lonely sylvan scenes
Of Amwell; which, so soft in early youth,
While novelty enhanc'd their native charms,
Cave rapture to my soul; and often, still,
On life's calm moments shed serener joy.

Descriptive muse! whose hand along the stream
Of ancient Thames, through Richmond's shady
groves,

And Sheen's fair valleys, once thy † Thomson led,
And once o'er green Carmarthen's woody vales,
And sunny landscapes of Campania's plain,
Thy other favour'd bard ‡; thou, who so late,
In bowers by Clent's wild peakes §, to Shenstone's ear

Didst bring sweet strains of rural melody,
(Alas no longer heard!)—vouchsafe thine aid:

From all our rich varieties of view,
What best may please, assist me to select,
With art dispose, with energy describe,
And its full image on the mind impress.

And ye, who e'er in these delightful fields
Consum'd with me the social hour, while I
Your walk conducted o'er their loveliest spots,
And on their fairest objects fix'd your sight;
Accept this verse, which may to memory call
That social hour, and sweetly varied walk!

And thou, by strong connubial union mine;
Mine, by the stronger union of the heart;
In whom the lofs of parents and of friends,
And her, the first fair partner of my joys,
All recompens'd I find; whose presence cheers
The soft domestic scene: Maria, come!
The country calls us forth; blithe summer's
hand
Sheds sweetest flowers, and morning's brightest smile

Illumes earth and air; Maria, come!
By winding pathways through the waving
corn,

We reach the airy point that prospect yields,
Not vast and awful, but confin'd and fair;
Not the black mountain and the foamy main:
Not the throng'd city and the busy port;
But pleasant interchange of soft ascent,
And level plain, and growth of shady woods,
And twining course of rivers clear, and sight
Of rural towns, and rural cots, whose roofs
Rise scattering round, and animate the whole.

Far tow'rd's the west, close under sheltering hills,
In verdant meads, by Lee's cerulean stream,
Hertford's gray towers * ascends; the rude remains

Of high antiquity, from waste escap'd
Of envious time, and violence of war.
For war there once, so tells th' historic page,
Led desolation's steps: the hardy Dane,
By avarice lur'd, o'er ocean's stormy wave,
To ravage Albion's plains, his favourite feat,
There fix'd awhile; and there his castles rear'd
Among the trees; and there, beneath your ridge
Of piny rocks, his conquering navy moor'd,
With idle sails furl'd on the yard, and oars
Recumbent on the flood, and streamers gay
Triumphant fluttering on the passing winds.
In fear, the shepherd on the lonely heath
Tended his scanty flock; the ploughman turn'd,
In fear, his hasty furrow: oft the din
Of hostile arms alarm'd the ear, and flames
Of plunder'd towns through night's thick gloom from far

Gleam'd dismal on the sight: till Alfred came,
Till Alfred, father of his people, came,
Lee's rapid tide into new channels turn'd,
And left a-ground the Danian fleet, and forc'd

* In the beginning of the Heptarchy, the tower of Hertford was accounted one of the principal cities of the East Saxons, where the kings of that province often kept their courts, and a parliamentary council, or national synod, was held, Sept. 24th, 673. Chauncy's Hist. of Hertfordshire, p. 237.

The foe to speedy flight *. Then freedom's voice
 Reviv'd the drooping swain; then plenty's hand
 Reclot'd the desert fields, and peace and love
 Sat smiling by; as now they smiling sit,
 Obvious to fancy's eye, upon the side
 Of yon bright sunny theatre of hills,
 Where Bengoe's villas rise, and Ware Park's laws

Spread their green surface, interspers'd with groves
 Of broad umbrageous oak, and spiry pine,
 Tall elm, and linden pale, and blossom'd thorn,
 Breathing mild fragrance, like the spicy gales
 Of Indian islands. On the ample brow,
 Where that white temple rears its pillar'd front
 Half hid with glossy foliage, many a chief
 Renown'd for martial deeds, and many a bard
 Renown'd for song, have pass'd the rural hour.
 The gentle Fanshaw † there, from "noise of " camps,

" From courts disease retir'd †," delighted view'd
 The gaudy garden fam'd in Wotton's page †;
 Or in the verdant maze, or cool arcade,
 Sat musing, and from smooth Italian strains
 The soft Guarini's amorous lore transfus'd
 Into rude British verse. The warrior's arm
 Now rests from toil; the poet's useful tongue,
 In silence lies; frail man his lov'd domains
 Soon quits for ever! they themselves, by course
 Of nature often, or caprice of art,
 Experience change: even here, 'tis said of old
 Steep rocky cliffs rose where yon gentle slopes
 Mix with the vale; and fluctuating waves
 Spread wide, where that rich vale with golden flowers

Shines, and where yonder winding chrystal rill,

* Towards the latter end of the year 879, the Danes advanced to the borders of Mercia, and erected two forts at Hertford on the Lee, for the security of their ships, which they had brought up that river. Here they were attacked by the Londoners, who were repulsed. But Alfred advanced with his army, and viewing the nature of their situation, turned the course of the stream, so that their vessels were left on dry ground; a circumstance which terrified them to such a degree, that they abandoned their forts, and, flying towards the Severn, were pursued by Alfred as far as Quatbridge. Smollet's Hist. of England, 8vo. Edition, vol. i. p. 183.

† Sir Richard Fanshaw, translator of Guarini's Raffaello Fido, the Lustad of Camoens, &c. He was son of Sir Henry Fanshaw of Ware-Park, and is said to have resided much there. He was ambassador to Portugal, and afterwards to Spain, and died at Madrid in 1666. His body was brought to England and interred in Ware church, where his monument is still existing. In Cibber's Lives of the Poets, it is erroneously asserted, that he was buried in All-saints church, Hertford.

 With never-ceasing murmur gush'd; or how;

 The silver current o'er Alcant'ra's vale
 Roll'd high in air, as ancient poets feign'd
 Eridanus to roll through heaven: to these

 Existence gave; and unconfin'd, as dew
 Falls from the hand of evening on the fields,
 They flow'd for all. Our mercenary stream;
 No grandeur boasting, here obscurely glides while;

 Ware once was known to fame; to her fair
 fields

Whilom the Gothic tournament's proud pomp Brought Albion's valiant youth and blooming maids:

Pleas'd with ideas of the past, the muse
 Bids fancy's pencil paint the scene, where they
 In gilded barges on the glassy stream
 Circl'd the reedy isles, the sportive dance
 Along the smooth lawn led, or in the groves
 Wander'd conversing, or reclin'd at ease
 To harmony of lutes and voices sweet
 Resign'd the enchanted ear; till sudden heard
 The silver trumpet's animating sound
 Summon'd the champions forth; on stately steeds;
 In splendid armour clad, the ponderous lance
 With strenuous hand sustaining, forth they came.
 Where, gay pavilions rose upon the plain,
 Or azure awnings stretch'd from tree to tree,

Mix'd with thick foliage, form'd a mimic sky
Of grateful shade (as oft in Agra's streets
The silken canopy from side to side
Extends to break the sun's impetuous ray,
While monarchs pass beneath); there sat the fair,
A glittering train on costly carpets rang'd,
A group of beauties all in youthful prime,
Of various feature and of various grace!
The pensive languist, and the sprightly air,
Ta' engaging smile, and all the nameless charms
Which transient hope, or fear, or grief, or joy,
Wak'd in th' expressive eye, th' enamour'd heart
Of each young hero rous'd to daring deeds.
Nor this aught strange, that those whom love in-spir'd

Prov'd ev'ry means the lovely sex to please:
'Tis rance, indeed, how custom thus could teach
The tender breast complacence in the sight
Of barb'rous sport, where friend from hand of friend

The fatal wound full oft receiv'd, and fell
A victim to false glory; as that day
Fell gallant Pembroke, while his pompous flow
Ended in silent gloom*. One pitying tear
To human frailty paid; my roving sight
Pursues its pleasing course o'er neighb'ring hills,
Where frequent hedge-rows intersect rich fields
Of many a different torm and different hue,
Bright with ripe corn, or green with grafs, or dark

With clover's purple bloom; o'er Widbury's
With that fair crescent crown'd of lofty elms,
Its own peculi' boast; and o'er the woods
That round immerse the deep sequester'd dale
Of Langley †, down whole flow'r-embroider'd meads

Swift Ash through pebbly shores meandering rolls,
Elysian scene! as from the living world
Secluded quite; for of that world, to him
Whose wand'rings trace thy winding length, appears

No mark, save one white solitary spire
At distance rising through the tufted trees—
Elysian scene! recluse as that, so fam'd
For solitude, by Warwick's ancient walls,

land.

† This delightful retreat, commonly called Langley-bottom, is situated about half a mile from Ware, and the same distance from Amwell. The scene is adapted to contemplation, and possesses such capabilities of improvement, that the genius of a Shenstone might easily convert it to a second Leafowes. The transition from this solitude to Widbury-Hill, is made in a walk of a few minutes, and the prospect from that hill, in a fine evening,
is beautiful beyond description.

Where under umbrage of the mossy cliff
Victorious Guy, so legends say, reclin'd
His hoary head beside the silver stream,
In meditation rapt—Elysian scene!
At ev'ning often, while the setting sun
On the green summit of thy eastern groves
Pour'd full his yellow radiance; while the voice
Of zephyr whispering 'midst the rustling leaves,
The sound of water murmuring through the sedge,
The turtle's plaintive call, and music soft
Of distant bells, whose ever varying notes
In slow sad measure mov'd, combin'd to soothe
The soul to sweet solemnity of thought;
Beneath thy branchy bowers of thickest gloom,
Much on the imperfect state of man I've mus'd:
How pain o'er half his hours her iron reign
Ruthless extends! how pleasure from the path
Of innocence allures his steps; how hope
Direc'ts his eye to distant joy, that ties
His fond pursuit; how fear his shuddering heart
Alarms with fancy'd ill; how doubt and care
Perplex his thought; how soon the tender rose
Of beauty fades, the sturdy oak of strength
Declines to earth, and over all our pride
Stern time triumphant stands. From general fate
To private woes then oft has memory pass'd,
And mourn'd the loss of many a friend belov'd;
Of thee, de Horné, kind, generous, wife, and good!

And thee, my Turner, who, in vacant youth,
Here oft in converse free, or studious search
Of classic lore, accompany'd my walk!
From Ware's green bowers, to Devon's myrtle vales,

Remov'd a while, with prospect opening fair
Of useful life and honour in his view;
As falls the vernal bloom before the breath
Of blasting Eurus, immature he fell!
The tidings reach'd my ear, and in my breast,
Aching with recent wounds*, new anguish wak'd:
When melancholy thus has chang'd to grief,
That grief in soft forgetfulness to lose,
I've left the gloom for gayer scenes, and sought
Through winding paths of venerable shade,
The airy brow where that tall spreading beech
O'ertops surrounding groves, up rocky steep,
Tree over tree dispos'd; or stretching far
Their shadowy coverts down th' indented side
Of fair corn-fields; or pierc'd with sunny glades,
That yield the casual glimpse of flowery meads
And shining silver rills; on these the eye
Then wont to expatiate pleas'd; or more remote

Survey'd yon vale of Lee, in verdant length
Of level lawn spread out to Kent's blue hills,
And the proud range of glitt'ring spires that rise
In mity air on Thames's crowded shores.

How beautiful, how various, is the view
Of these sweet pastoral landscapes! fair, perhaps—
As those renown'd of old, from Tabor's height,
Or Carmel seen; or those, the pride of Greece,
Tempé or Arcady; or those that grac'd
The banks of clear Elorus, or the skirts
Of thymy Hybla, where Sicilia's ile
Smiles on the azure main; there once was heard

* See Elegy written at Amwell, 1765.

The muse's lofty lay.—How beautiful,
How various is yon view! delicious hills
Bounding smooth vales, smooth vales by winding streams

Divided, that here glide through grassy banks
In open sun, there wander under shade
Of aspen tall, or ancient elm, whose boughs
O'erhang gray castles, and romantic farms,
And humble cots of happy shepherd swains.
Delightful habitations! with the song
Of birds melodious charm'd, and bleat of flocks
From upland pastures heard, and low of kine
Grazing the rusky mead, and mingled sounds
Of falling waters and of whispering winds—
Delightful habitations! o'er the land
Dispers'd around, from Waltham's osier'd isles
To where bleak Nafing's lonely tower o'erlooks
Her verdant fields; from Raydon's pleasant groves
And Hunston's bowers on Storr's irriuous marge,
By Rhye's old walls, to Hoddison's airy street;
From Haly's woodland to the slow'ry meads
Of willow-shaded Stansted, and the slope
Of Amwell's mount, that crown'd with yellow
corn;

There from the green flat, softly swelling, shows
Like some bright vernal cloud by zephyr's breath
Just rais'd above the horizon's azure bound.

As one long travell'd on Italia's plains,
The land of pomp and beauty, still his feet
On his own Albion joys to fix again;
So my pleas'd eye, which o'er the prospect wide
Has wander'd round, and various objects mark'd,
On Amwell rests at last, its favourite scene!
How picturesque the view! where up the side

Of that steep bank, her roofs of russet thatch
Rise mix'd with trees, above whose swelling tops
Ascends the tall church tow'r, and loftier still
The hill's extended ridge. How picturesque!
Where slow beneath that bank the slyer stream
Glides by the flowery isle, and willow groves
Wave on its northern verge, with trembling tufts
Of osier intermix'd. How picturesque
The slender group of airy elm, the clump
Of pollard oak, or ash, with ivy brown
Entwin'd; the walnut's gloomy breadth of boughs,
The orchard's ancient fence of rugged pales,
The haystack's dusky cone, the mois-grown shed,
The clay-built barn; the elder-shaded cot,
Whose white-wash'd gable prominent through green

Of waving branches shows, perchance inscrib'd
With some past owner's name, or rudely grac'd
With rustic dial, that scarcely serves to mark Time's ceaseless flight; the wall with mantling vines

O'erspread, the porch with climbing woodbine
wreath'd,

And under sheltering eaves the sunny bench
Where brown hives range, whose busy tenants sit,

With drowsy hum, the little garden gay,
Whence blooming beans, and spicy herbs, and flowers,

Exhale around a rich perfume! Here rests
The empty wain; there idle lies the plough;
By Summer's hand unharne'd, here the steed,
Short ease enjoying, crops the daisied lawn;

Here bleats the nursing lamb, the heifer there
Waits at the yard-gate lowing. By the road,
Where the neat ale-house stands (so once stood
thine,

Deserted Auburn! in immortal song
Consign'd to fame*), the cottage fire recounts
The praise he earn'd when cross the field he drew
The straightest furrow, or neatest built the rick,
Or led the reaper band in sultry noons
With unabating strength, or won the prize
At many a crowded wake. Beside her door,
The cottage matron whirls her circling wheel,
And jocund chants her lay. The cottage maid
Feeds from her loaded lap her mingled train
Of clamorous hungry fowls; or o'er the stile
Leaning with downcast look, the artless tale
Of ev'ning courtship hears. The sportive troop
Of cottage children on the grassy waste
Mix in rude gambols, or the bounding ball
Circle from hand to hand, or rustic notes
Wake on their pipes of jointed reed: while near
The careful shepherd's frequent-falling strokes
Fix on the fallow lea his hurled fold.

Such rural life! so calm, it little yields
Of interesting act, to swell the page
Of history or song; yet much the soul
Its sweet simplicity delights, and oft
From noise of busy towns, to fields and groves,
The muse's sons have fled to find repose.
Fam'd Walton †, erst, the ingenious fisher swain,
Oft our fair haunts explor'd; upon Lee's shore,
Beneath some green tree oft his angle laid,
His sport suspending to admire their charms.
He, who in verse his country's story told ‡,

* See The Deserted Village, a beautiful poem, by the late Dr. Goldsmith.

† Isaac Walton, author of The Complete Angler, an ingenious biographer, and no despicable poet. The scene of his Angler's Dialogues, is the vale of Lee, between Tottenham and Ware; it seems to have been a place he much frequented: he particularly mentions Amwell-hill.

‡ William Warner, author of Albion's England, an Historical Poem; an episode of which, intitled Argentele and Curan, has been frequently reprinted, and is much admired by the lovers of old English poetry. The ingenious Dr. Percy, who has inserted this piece in his Collection, observes, that, "though Warner's name is so seldom mentioned, his contemporaries ranked him on a level with Spenser, and called him the Homer and Virgil of their age;" that Warner was said to have been a Warwickshire man, and to have been educated at Magdalen Hall; that, in the latter part of his life, he was retained in the service of Henry Cary, Lord Hunston, to whom he dedicates his poem; but that "more of his history is not known." Mrs. Cooper, in her Muse's Library, after highly applauding his poetry, adds, "What were the circumstances and accidents of his life, we have hardly light enough to conjecture; any more than, by his dedication, it appears he was in the service of the Lord Hunston, and acknowledges very gratefully both father and son for his patrons and benefactors."—By the following extract from the Parish Register of Amwell, it may be reasonably concluded, that Warner resided for some time at that village; and, as his profession of an attorney is particularly mentioned, it is pretty evident, that, whatever dependence he might have on Lord Hunston, it could not be in the capacity of a

Here dwelt a while; perchance here sketch'd the scene,

Where his fair Argentile, from crowded courts
For pride self-banish'd, in sequester'd shades
Sojourn'd disguis'd, and met the slighted youth
Who long had sought her love—the gentle bard
Sleeps here, by fame forgotten; (fickle fame Too oft forgets her favourites!) By his side
Sleeps gentle Hassal*, who with tenderest care
Here watch'd his village charge; in nuptial bonds
Their hands oft join'd; oft heard, and oft reliev'd
Their little wants; oft heard and oft compos'd,
Sole arbiter, their little broils; oft urg'd
Their flight from folly and from vice; and oft
Dropt on the graves the tear, to early worth
Or ancient friendship due. In dangerous days,
When death's fell fury, pale-eyed pestilence,
Glar'd horror round, his duty he discharge'd
Unterrified, unhurt; and here, at length,
Clos'd his calm inoffensive useful life
In venerable age: her life with him
His faithful consort clos'd; on earth's cold breast
Both sunk to rest together.—On the turf,
Whence time's rude grasp has torn their rustic tombs,

I strew fresh flowers, and make a moment's pause menial servant. Though Warner's merit, as a poet, may have been too highly rated, it was really not inconceivable; his Argentile and Curan has many beauties; but it has also the faults common to the compositions of his age, especially a most disgusting indelicacy of sentiment and expression.

"Ma. William Warner, a man of good yeares and honest reputation, by his profession, an attorney at the Common Please, author of Albion's England; dying suddenly in the night in his bedde, without any former complaint or sickness, on Thursday night, being the 9th of March, was buried the Saturday following, and lieth in the church at the upper end, under the stone of Gwalter Fader."

Parish Register of Amwell, 1608-9.

* Thomas Hassal, vicar of Amwell; he kept the above-mentioned parish register with uncommon care and precision, enriching it with many entertaining anecdotes of the parties registered. He performed his duty in the most laudable circumstances, it appearing that the plague twice raged in the village during his residence there; in 1603, when 26 persons, and in 1625 when 22 persons died of it, and were buried in his church-yard. The character here given of him must be allowed, strictly speaking, to be imaginary; but his composition, in the said register, appeared to me to breathe such a spirit of piety, simplicity, and benevolence, that I almost think myself authorised to assert that it was his real one. He himself is registered by his son Edmund Hassal, as follows:

"Thomas Hassal, vicar of this parish, where he had continued resident 57 years 7 months and 16 days, in the reigns of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles, departed this life September 24th, Thursday, and was buried September 26th, Saturday. His body was laid in the chancel of this church, under the priests, or marble stone. Etatis 84. Non erat ante, nec erit post te similis. Edmund Hassal."

Register of Amwell, 1657.

Elizabeth Hassal, wife of the said Thomas Hassal, died about the same time, aged 78 years 8 months, married 46 years and 4 months.

Of solemn thought; then seek th' adjacent spot,
From which, through these broad lindens' verdant arch,

The steeple's Gothic wall and window dim
In perspective appear; then homeward turn
By where the muse, enamour'd of our shades,
Deigns still her favouring presence; where my friend,

The British Tasso*, oft from busy scenes
To rural calm and letter'd ease retires.

As some fond lover leaves his favourite nymph,
Oft looking back, and lingering in her view,
So now reluctant this retreat I leave,
Look after look indulging; on the right,
Up to yon airy battlement's broad top [steep
Half veil'd with trees, that, from th' acclivious
Jut like the pendent gardens, fam'd of old,
Beside Euphrates' bank; then, on the left,
Down to those shaded cots, and bright expanse
Of water softly sliding by: once, where
That bright expanse of water softly slides,
O'erhung with shrubs that fring'd the chalky rock,
A little fount pour'd forth its gurgling rill,
In flinty channel trickling o'er the green,
From Emma nam'd; perhaps some faint maid,
For holy life rever'd; to such, erewhile,
Fond superstition many a pleasant grove,
And limpid spring, was wont to consecrate.

Of Emma's story nought tradition speaks;
Conjecture, who, behind oblivion's veil,
Along the doubtful past delights to stray,
Boasts now, indeed, that from her well the place
Receive'd its appellation.——Thou, sweet Vill,
Farewell! and ye, sweet fields, where plenty's horn
Pours liberal boons, and health propitious deigns
Her cheering smile! you not the perching air
Of arid sands, you not the vapours chill
Of humid fens, annoy; Favonius' wing,
From off your thyme-banks and your trefoil meads,
Wafts balmy redolence; robust and gay
Your swains industrious issue to their toil,
Till your rich glebe, or in your granaries store
Its generous produce: annual ye refund
The ploughman's song, as he through reeking soil
Guides slow his shining share; ye annual hear
The shouts of harvest, and the prattling train
Of cheerful gleaners:—and th' alternate strokes
Of loud flails echoing from your loaded barns,
The pallid morn in dark November wake.
But, happy as ye are, in marks of wealth
And population; not for these, or aught
Beside, with I, in hyperbolic strains
Of vain applause, to elevate your fame
Above all other scenes; for scenes as fair
Have charm'd my sight, but transient was the view.
You, through all seasons, in each varied hour
For observation happiest, oft my steps

† In Doomsday-book, this village of Amwell is written Emmeville, perhaps originally Emma's well. When the New River was opened, there was a spring here which was taken into that aqueduct. Chadwell, the other source of that river, evidently received its denomination from the tutelary Saint, St. Chad, who seems to have given name to springs and wells in different parts of England.

AMOEBEAN ECLOGUES.

ADVERTISEMENT.

MUCH of the rural imagery which our country affords, has already been introduced in poetry; but many obvious and pleaſing appearances ſeem to have totally eſcap'd notice. To deſcribe theſe, is the buſineſs of the following Eclogues. The plan of the Carmen Amœbeum, or reſponſive verſe of the ancients, inconfiſtent as it may be deem'd with modern manners, was preferred on this occaſion, as admitting an arbitrary and deſultory diſpoſition of ideas, where it was found difficult to preſerve a regular connection.

ECLOGUE I.

RURAL SCENERY; OR, THE DESCRIBERS.

DECEMBER's froſt had bound the fields and ſtreams,
And noon's bright ſun effuſ'd its cheerful beams:
Where woodland, northward, ſcreen'd a pleaſant
plain,

And on dry fern-banks bronzed the ſteepy train,
Two gentle youths, whom rural ſcenes could pleaſe,
Both ſkill'd to frame the tuneful rhyme with eaſe,
Charm'd with the proſpect, ſlowly ſtray'd along,
Themſelves amuſing with alternate ſong.

Fiſt.

Theſe pollard oaks their tawny leaves retain,
Theſe hardy hornbeams yet unſtripp'd remain;
The wint'ry groves all eſe admit the view
Through naked ſtems of many a varied hue.

Second.

Yon ſhrubby ſlopes a pleaſing mixture ſhow;
There the rough elm and ſmooth white privet
grow,
Strait ſhoots of aſh with bark of gloſſy gray,
Red cornel twigs, and maple's ruſſet ſpray.

Fiſt.

Theſe ſtony ſleeps with ſpreading moſs abound,
Gray on the trees, and green upon the ground;
With tangling brambles ivy interweaves,
And bright mezerion * ſpreads its cluſt'ring leaves.

* Mezerion, Laureola Sempervirens: vulg. Spurge-ſaurel. This beautiful little evergreen is frequent among our woods and coppices. Its ſmooth ſhining leaves are placed on the top of the ſtems in circular tufts or cluſters. Its flowers are ſmall, of a light green, and perfume the

Second.

Old oaken ſtubs tough ſaplings there adorn,
There hedge-row plaſhes yield the knotty thorn;
The ſwain for different uſes theſe avail,
And form the traveller's ſtaff, the threſher's ſail.

Fiſt.

Where yon brown hazel's pendent catkins bear,
And prickly furze unfolds its bloſſoms fair,
The vagrant artiſt off at eaſe reclines,
And broom's green ſhoots in beſom's neat combings.

Second.

See, down the hill, along the ample glade,
The new-fallen wood in even ranges laid!
There his keen bill the buſy workman plies,
And bids in heaps his well-bound faggots riſe.

Fiſt.

Soon ſhall kind ſpring her flowery gifts beſtow,
On ſunny banks when ſilver ſnowdrops blow,
And tufts of primroſe all around arc ſpread,
And purple violets all their fragrance ſhed.

Second.

The woods then white anemonies array,
And lofty fallows their ſweet bloom diſplay,
And ſpicy hyacinths azure bells unfold,
And crowfoot clothes the mead with ſhining gold.

Fiſt.

Then ſoon gay ſummer brings his gaudy train,
His crimſon poppies deck the corn-clad plain;

air at a diſtance in an agreeable manner. It blows very early in mild ſeaſons and warm ſituations. The common deciduous mezerion, frequently planted in gardens, though very different in appearance, is another ſpecies of this genus.

There scabious blue *, and purple knapweed † rise,
And weld ‡ and yarrow flow their various dyes.

Second.

In shady lanes red foxglove bells appear,
And golden spikes the downy mullains rear ‖ ;
The inclosure ditch luxuriant mallows hide,
And branchy succory crowds the pathway side.

First.

The autumnal fields few pleasing plants supply,
Save where pale eyebright grows in pastures dry,
Or vervain blue, for magic rites renown'd,
And in the village precincts only found §.

Second.

Th' autumnal hedges withering leaves embrown,
Save where wild climbers spread their silvery down ¶,
And rugged blackthornes bend with purple flocs,
And the green skewerwood seeds of scarlet flows **.

First.

When healthful fallads crown the board in spring,
And nymphs green parsley from the gardens bring,
Mark well lest hemlock mix its poisonous leaves—
Their semblance oft th' inacious eye deceives.

Second.

Warn, O ye shepherds! warn the youth who play
On hamlet wastes, beside the public way;
There oft rank soils pernicious plants produce,
There nightshade's berry swells with deadly juice.

First.

What varied scenes this pleasant country yields,
Form'd by th' arrangement fair of woods and fields!
On a green hillock, by the shady road,
My dwelling stands—a sweet reclusé abode!
And o'er my darken'd casement intertwine
The fragrant briar, the woodbine, and the vine.

Second.

How different scenes our different tastes delight!
Some seek the hills, and some the vales invite.
Where o'er the brook's moist margin hazels meet,
Gains my lone home—a pleasant, cool retreat!
Stay loofestriife there and pale valerian spring ††,
And tuneful reed-birds midst the fedges sing.

* Scabious: Scabiosa vulgaris.

† Knapweed: Jacea vulgaris.

‡ Weld: Luteola vulgaris, or dyers' weed. —
These plants, with many others not inferior in beauty, are frequent on the balks, or ridges, which separate different kinds of corn in our common fields.

§ The digitalis, or foxglove, is a very beautiful plant;
there are several varieties of it which are honoured with a place in our gardens. The mullain is not inferior in beauty, consequently merits equal notice.

¶ It is a vulgar opinion, that vervain never grows in any place more than a quarter of a mile distant from a bovse.—Vide Miller's Gardener's Dictionary, article vervaina.

¶ Wild climbers: Clematis, viorna, or traveller's joy. The white downy seeds of this plant make a very conspicuous figure on our hedges in autumn.

 Skewerwood: Evonymus; or spindle-tree. The twigs of this shrub are of a fine green; the capsules, or seed-vessels, of a fine purple; and the seeds of a rich scarlet. In autumn, when the capsules open and show the seeds, the plant has a most beautiful appearance.

†† Loofestriife; Lysimachia lutea vulgaris. Dr. Hill observes, that it is so beautiful a plant, in its erect stature,

First.

Before my door the box-edg'd border lies,
Where flowers of mint and thyme and tanfy rise;
Along my wall the yellow floncrop grows,
And the red houfelleek on my brown thatch blows.

Second.

Among green osiers winds my stream away,
Where the blue halcyon skims from spray to spray,
Where waves the bulrush as the waters glide,
And yellow flag-flow'rs deck the sunny side.

First.

Spread o'er the slope of yon steep western hill,
My fruitful orchard shelters all the vill;
There pear-trees tall their tops aspiring show,
And apple-boughs their branches mix below.

Second.

East from my cottage stretch delightful meads,
Where rows of willows rise, and banks of reeds;
There roll clear rivers; there, old elms between,
The mill's white roof and circling wheels are seen.

First.

Palemon's garden hawthorn hedges bound,
With flow'rs of white, or fruit of crimson, crown'd;
There vernal lilacs show their purple bloom,
And sweet syringas all the air perfume;
The fruitful mulberry spreads its umbrage cool,
And the rough quince o'erhangs the little pool.

Second.

Albino's fence green currants hide from view,
With bunches hung of red or amber hue;
Beside his arbour blows the jasmine fair,
And scarlet beans their gaudy blossoms bear;
The lofty hollyhock there its spike displays,
And the broad sunflow'r shows its golden rays.

First.

Where moss-grown pales a funny spot enclos'd,
And pinks and lilies all their hues expos'd,
Beneath a porch, with mantling vines enwreath'd,
The morning breeze the charming Sylvia breath'd:
Not pink nor lily with her face could vie,
And, O how soft the languish of her eye!
I saw and lov'd; but lov'd, alas, in vain!
She check'd my passion with severe disdain.

Second.

When o'er the meads with vernal verdure gay
The village children went at eve to stray,
I pluck'd fresh flow'rets from the grassy ground,
And their green stalks with bending rushes bound;
My wreaths, my nosegays, then my Delia dress'd, Crown'd her fair brow, or bloom'd upon her breast.

Young as I was, the pleasing thought was mine,
One day, fond boy, that beauty will be thine!

First.

Beside his gate, beneath the lofty tree,
Old Thyrsis' well-known seat I vacant see;
There, while his prattling offspring round him
play'd,
He oft, to please them, toys of osiers made:
That seat his weight shall never more sustain,
That offspring round him ne'er shall sport again.

Second.

Yon lone church tow'r that overlooks the hills!—
The sight my soul full oft with sorrow fills:

regular growth, and elegant flowers, that is every way worthy to be taken into our gardens. It is frequent in moist places. The flowers are of a bright gold colour.

There Damon lies;—in prime of youth he died!—
A ford unknown, by night he vent'rous tried:
In vain he struggled with the foaming wave;
No friendly arm, alas, was near to save!

Firſt.

Cease, friend! and, homeward as we bend our
way,

Remark the beauties of the closing day;
See, tow' rds the west, the redd'ning sun declines,
And o'er the fields his level lustre shines.

Second.

How that bright landscape lures the eye to gaze,
Where with his beams the distant windows blaze!
And the gilt vane, high on the steeple spire,
Glews in the air—a dazzling spot of fire!

Firſt.

Behind yon hill he now forsakes our sight,
And yon tall beeches catch his latest light;
The hamlet smokes in amber wreaths arise;
White mist, like water, on the valley lies.

Second.

Where yon chalk cliffs th' horizon eastward
bound,
And spreading elms the ancient hall surround,
The noon's bright orb arises from the main,
And night in silence holds her solemn reign.

ECLOGUE II:

RURAL BUSINESS; OF, THE AGRICULTURISTS.

MAY'S lib'ral hand her fragrant bloom disclos'd,
And herds and flocks on grassy banks repos'd;
Soft evening gave to ease the tranquil hour,
And Philomel's wild warblings fill'd the bow'r.
Where near the village rose the elm-crown'd hill,
And white-leav'd aspens trembled o'er the rill,
Three rural bards, the village youth among,
The pleasing lore of rural business sung.

Firſt.

The care of farms we sing—attend the strain—
What skill, what toil, shall best procure you gain;
How different culture different ground requires;
While wealth rewards whom industry inspires.

Second.

When thy light land on scorching gravel lies,
And to the springing blade support denies;
Fix on the wint'ry tith the frequent fold,
And mend with cooling marl or untried mould.

Third.

If thy strong loam superfluous wet retain,
Lead through thy fields the subterranean drain,
And o'er the surface mellowing stores expand
Of fiery lime, or incoherent sand.

Firſt.

In vacant corners, on the hamlet waste,
The ample dunghill's steaming heap be plac'd;
There may a month fermenting to remain,
Ere thy slow team disperse it o'er the plain.

Second.

The prudent farmer all manure provides,
The mire of roads, the mould of hedge-row sides;
For him their mud the stagnant ponds supply;
For him their soil, the stable and the sty.

Third.

For this the swain, on Kennet's winding shore,
Digs sulphurous peat along the sable moor;
For this, where ocean bounds the stormy strand,
They fetch dank sea-weed to the neighb'ring land.

Firſt.

Who harren heaths to tillage means to turn,
Must, ere he plough, the greenward pare and burn;

Where rise the smoking hillocks o'er the field,
The saline ashes useful compost yield.

Second.

Where sedge or rushes rise on spongy soils,
Or rampant moss th' impoverish'd herbage spoils,
Corrosive soot with liberal hand bestow;
Th' improving pasture soon its use will show.

Third.

Hertfordian swains on airy hills explore
The chalk's white vein, a fertilizing store;
This, from deep pits in copious baskets drawn,
Amends alike the arable and lawn:

Firſt.

Who spends too oft in indolence the day,
Soon fees his farm his base neglect betray;
His useless hedge-greens, docks and nettles bear,
And the tough camcock clogs his shining share*.

Second.

Thy weedy fallows let the plough pervade,
Till on the top th' inverted roots are laid;
There left to wither in the noon-tide ray,
Or by the spiky harrow clear'd away.

Third.

When wheat's green stem the ridge begins to hide,
Let the sharp weedhook's frequent aid be tried,
Lest thy spoil'd crop at harvest thou bemoan,
With twitch and twining bindweed overgrown.

Firſt.

Much will rank melilot thy grain disgrace,
And darnel, fellest of the weedy race:
T' extirpate these might care or cost avail,
T' extirpate these nor care nor cost should fail.

Second.

When the foul furrow fetid mayweed fills,
The weary reaper oft complains of ills;
As his keen sickle grides along the lands,
The acrid herbage oft corrodes his hands.

Third.

Wield oft thy scythe along the grassy layes,
Ere the rude thistle its light down displays;
Else that light down upon the breeze will fly,
And a new store of noxious plants supply.

Firſt.

Would ye from tillage ample gains receive,
With change of crops th' exhausted soil relieve;
Next purple clover let brown wheat be seen,
And bearded barley after turnips green.

Second.

Bid here dark peas or tangled vetches spread,
There buckwheat's white flow'r faintly ting'd with

Or oats their ample panicles extend;
There rest thy glebe, lest fallow not in vain,
To feel the summer's sun and winter's rain.

The skill'd in culture oft repay their toil
By choice of plants adapted to their soil;
The spiky faintfoin best on chalk succeds,
The lucern hates cold clays and moory meads.

Best on loose sands, where brakes and briars

Its deep fring'd leaves the yellow carrot shows;
Best on stiff loam rough teasels* rear their heads,

Would these sweet scenes of sylvan shade refuse,
And seek the black waste of the barren wold,
That yields no shelter from the heat or cold?

Dull are slow Ousa's mist-exhaling plains,
Where long rank grass the morning dew retains:
Who pastures there in autumn's humid reign,

ORIENTAL ECLOGUES.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE Oriental Eclogues of Collins have such excellence, that it may be supposed they must preclude the appearance of any subsequent work with the same title. This consideration did not escape the author of the following poems; but as the scenery and sentiment of his predecessor were totally different from his own, he thought it matter of little consequence.

This kind of composition is, in general, subject to one disadvantage, for which allowance should be made. He, who describes what he has seen, may describe correctly: he, who describes what he has not seen, must depend for much on the accounts of others, and supply the rest from his own imagination.

ZERAD: OR, THE ABSENT LOVER.

AN ARABIAN ECLOGUE.

THE learned and ingenious Mr. Jones, in his elegant and judicious essay on the poetry of the Eastern Nations, speaking of the Arabians, has the following passage: "It sometimes happens," says he, "that the young men of one tribe are in love with the damsels of another; and, as the tents are frequently removed on a sudden, the lovers are often separated in the progress of the courtship. Hence, almost all the Arabic poems opens in this manner: The author bewails the sudden departure of his mistress, Hinda, Maia, Zeineb, or Azza, and describes her beauty; comparing her to a wanton

"fawn that plays among the aromatic shrubs. His friends endeavour to comfort him; but he refuses consolation; he declares his resolution of visiting his beloved, though the way to her tribe lie through a dreadful wilderness, or even through a den of lions."—The author of the following eclogue was struck with this outline, and has attempted to fill it up. An apology for expatiating on the pleasing subjects of love and beauty, when nothing is said to offend the ear of chastity, he supposes needless. If any, however, there be, who question the utility of at all describing those subjects; such may remember, that there is an eastern poem, generally esteemed ſaired, which abounds with the most ardent expressions of the one, and luxuriant pictures of the other.

KORASA'S tribe, a frequent-wandering train,
From Zenan's pastures sought Negiran's plain.
With them Semira left her favourite shades,
The loveliest nymph of Yemen's sportive maids!
Her parting hand her fair companions press'd;
A transient sorrow touch'd each tender breast;
As some thin cloud across the morning ray
Casts one short moment's gloom, and glides away:
Their cares, their sports, they hasten soon to end,
And lost in them the memory of their friend.

But gallant Zerad ill her absence bore,—
A wealthy emir from Katara's shore;
A warrior he, the bravest of his race;
A bard high-honour'd in his native place;
Age oft learn'd knowledge from his tuneful tongue,
And listening beauty languish'd while he sung.
What time the tribes in camp contiguous lay,
Oft with the fair-one he was wont to stray;
There oft for her fresh fruits and flow'rs he fought,

And oft her flocks to crystal fountains brought.
Where the tall palm-grove grac'd Alzobah's
green,

And sable tents in many a rank were seen*;
While evening's steps the setting sun pursu'd,
And the still fields her balmy tears bedew'd;
The pensive lover, there reclin'd apart,
Indulg'd the sorrows of his anxious heart.
His graceful head the costly turban dress'd;
The crimson sash confin'd his azure vest;
His hand the founding arabeb† sustain'd;
And thus his voice in melody complain'd—
Soft as the night-bird's amorous music flows,
In Zibit's gardens, when she woos the rose †:

'Bright star of Sora's sky, whose matchless
blaze

'Gilds thy proud tribe with mild, benignant rays!
'Sweet flow'r of Azem's vale, whose matchless
bloom

'O'er thy fam'd house spreads exquisite perfume!
'Blithe fawn of Kofa, at the break of dawn,
'Midst groves of cassia, sporting on the lawn!
'Too charming beauty! why must I bemoan
'Thee from my presence thus abruptly flown?
'Ere the shrill trump to march the signal gave,
'And banners high in air began to wave;
'Ere the tall camel felt his wonted load,
'And herds and flocks slow mov'd along the road;
'Ere slow behind them march'd the warrior train,
'And the struck tents left vacant all the plain;
'Could no foud plea obtain a longer stay;
'Would no kind hand th' intelligence convey?
'Ah, hapless me! to Aden's port I stray'd,
'Sought gold and gems, but lost my lovely maid!

'My friends, they come my sorrows to allay—
'Azor the wise, and Soliman the gay—
'One cries, "Let reason hold her sober reign,
'Nor love's light trifles give thy bosom pain!

"For thee kind science all her lore displays,
"And fame awaits thee with the wreath of praise."
"O why," cries one, "is she alone thy care?
"She's fair, indeed, but other maids are fair:
"Negima's eyes with dazzling lustre shine,
"And her black tresses curl like Zebid's vine;
"On Hinda's brow Kufhemon's lily blows,
"And on her cheek unfolds Nisnapor's rose!
"With them the tale, the song, the dance, shall
"please, [ease."

"When nirth's free banquet fills the bow'r of
"Ah cease," said I; 'of love he little knows,
'Who with sage counsel hopes to cure its woes!
'Go, bid in air Yamama's lightnings stay,
'Or Perath's lion quit his trembling prey:
'Kind science' lore with beauty best we share,
'And beauty's hands fame's fairest wreaths prepare.

'I praise Negima's lovely hair and eyes;
'Nor Hinda's lily, nor her rose despise;
'But Omman's pearls diffuse a brighter beam
'Than the gay pebbles of Kalafa's stream.—
'O lov'd Semira! whither dost thou rove?

'Tread thy soft steps by Sada's jaff mine grove?
'Dost thou thy flocks on Ocah's mountain keep?
'Do Ared's olives whisper o'er thy sleep?—
'Ah no!—the maid, perhaps, remote from these,

'Some hostile troop, in ambush laid, may seize:
'Too lovely captive! she, in triumph borne,
'The proud Pacha's throng'd haram shall adorn.
'Vain fear! around her march her valiant friends;
'Brave Omar's hand the bow of Ishmael bends;
'Strong Hassan's arm Kaaba's spear can wield,
'And rear on high El-makin's ponderous shield!
'Ah, shame to me! Shall sloth's dishonouring
chain

'From love, from glory, Zerad here detain,
'Till grief my cheek with sickly saffron spread,
'And my eyes, weeping, match th' Argavan's
'red*?

'Haste, bring my steed, supreme in strength and grace,

'First in the fight, and fleetest in the chase;
'His fire renown'd on Gebel's hills was bred,
'His beautiful dam in Derar's pastures fed:
'Bring my strong lance that, ne'er impell'd in vain,
'Pierc'd the fierce tyger on Hegefa's plain.
'Across the desert I her steps pursue;

'Toil at my side, and danger in my view!
'There thirst, fell demon, haunts the sultry air,
'And his wild eyeballs roll with horrid glare;
'Their deadly Samuel †, striding o'er the land,
'Sweeps his red wing, and whirls the burning sand;

'As winds the weary caravan along,
'The fiery storm involves the hapless throng,
'I go, I go, nor toil nor danger heed;
'The faithful lover safety's hand shall lead.

* *D'Herbelot informs us, that saffron faces, and argavan eyes, are expressions commonly used in the east; to describe passionate lovers, whose melancholy appears in their countenances, and whose eyes become red with weeping.  ' There drop rich gums of every high perfume;
 ' There sing sweet birds of every gaudy plume;
 ' There soft-ey'd Houries tread th' enamell'd

 ' Once, and no more, the happy feat was seen;
 ' As his stray'd camel 'midst the wild he sought,
 ' Chance to the spot the wandering Esfar brought;
 ' A blissful Irem, 'midst the desert drear,

 ' Thus the moon rising lights the wilder'd swain.
 ' O raise thy voice! the sound shall give delight,
 ' Like songs of pilgrims distant heard by night!
 ' I come, I come!—He spoke, and seiz'd the ' rein,
 And his fleet courser spurn'd the sandy plain.

SERIM;

OR, THE ARTIFICIAL FAMINE.

An East Indian Eclogue.

THE following account of British conduct, and its consequences, in Bengal and the adjacent provinces, some years ago, will afford a sufficient idea of the subject of the following eclogue.
 After describing the monopoly of salt, betelnut, and tobacco, the historian thus proceeds:
 " Money, in this current, came but by drops;
 " it could not quench the thirst of those who " waited in India to receive it. An expedient
 " such as it was, remained to quicken its pace.—
 " The natives could live with little salt, but not " without food. Some of the agents saw them" selves well situated for collecting the rice into
 " stores; they did so. They knew the Gentoos
 " would rather die, than violate the precepts of " their religion by eating flesh. The alterna" tive would therefore be, between giving what " they had, and dying. The inhabitants sunk;
 " they that cultivated the land, and saw the " harvest at the disposal of others, planted in " doubt—scarcity ensued—then the monopoly
 " was easier managed. The people took to roots,
 " and food they had been unaccustomed to eat.
 " Sicknefs ensued. In some districts, the languid

* "Mabommed in his Alcoran, in the Chapter of the Morning, mentions a garden called Irem, which is no less celebrated by the Asiatic poets, than that of the Hesperides by the Greeks. It was planted, as the commentators say, by a king, named Shedad; and was once seen by an Arabian, who wandered far into the desert, in search of a lost camel." Jones's Essay on the Poetry of the Eastern Nations.

" living left the bodies of their numerous dead
 " unburied." Short History of English Transactions in the East Indies, p. 145.
 The above quotation sufficiently proves, that the general plan of the following poem is founded on fact. And even with regard to its particular incidents, there can be little doubt, but that, among the varied miseries of millions, every picture of distress which the author has drawn, had its original.

' O GUARDIAN genius of this sacred wave * !
 ' O save thy sons, if thine the power to save!
 So Serim spoke, as sad on Ganges' shore
 He sat, his country's miseries to deplore—
 ' O guardian genius of this sacred wave!
 ' O save thy sons, if thine the power to save!
 ' From Agra's tow'rs to Muxadab's † walls,
 ' On thee for aid the suffering Hindoo calls:
 ' Europe's fell race controul the wide domain,
 ' Engross the harvest, and enslave the swain.
 ' Why rise these cumbrous piles along thy tide?
 ' They hold the plenty to our prayers deny'd!
 ' Guards at their gates perpetual watch maintain,
 ' Where want in anguish craves relief in vain.
 " Bring gold, bring gems," the insatiate plunder-
 ' ers cry; [dic.]
 " Who hoards his wealth, by hunger's rage shall
 ' Ye fiends! ye've ravish'd all our little store;
 ' Ye see ye perish, yet ye ask for more!
 ' Go ye yourselves, and search for gold the mine;
 ' Go, dive where pearls beneath the ocean shine!
 ' What right have ye to plague our peaceful land?
 ' No ships of ours e'er fought your western strand:
 ' Ne'er from your fields we snatch'd their crops
 ' away,
 ' Nor hoard your daughters, or your sons our prey.
 ' Not ev'n in thought we quit our native place—
 ' A calm, contented, inoffensive race!
 ' By avarice led, ye range remotest climes,
 ' And every nation execrates your crimes.
 ' When Timur's house ‡ renown'd in Delhi
 ' reign'd,
 ' Distress, assistance unimplor'd obtain'd:
 ' When famine o'er the afflicted region frown'd,
 ' And sicknefs languish'd on the barren ground,
 ' The Imperial granaries wide display'd their doors,
 ' And ships provision brought from distant shores;

 about two hundred miles above Calcutta. The name is commonly pronounced with the accent on the last syllable:

 and some few other words, to my verse, by altering the accentuation; a matter, I apprehend, of little consequence to the English reader.*

‡ The famous Mahometan tyrant, Aurangzeb, during a famine which prevailed in different parts of India, exerted himself to alleviate the distress of his subjects. "He remitted the taxes that were due; he employed those already collected in the purchase of corn, which was distributed among the poorer sort. He even expended immense sums out of the treasury, in conveying grain, by land and water, into the interior provinces, from Bengal, and the countries which lie on the five branches of the Indus."

* “Those who now made the things the English most wanted, were pressed on all sides—by their own necessities, their neighbours, and the agents employed to procure the Company's investments, as the goods sent to Europe are called. These importunities were united, and urged so much, so often, and in such ways, as to produce, among the people in the silk business, instances of their cutting off their thumbs, that the want of them might excuse them from following their trade, and the inconveniences to which they were exposed beyond the common lot of their neighbours.” History of the English Transactions in the East Indics.

† Drugah, a Hindoo goddess. “Drugah Poojah is the grand general feast of the Gentoos, usually visited by all Europeans (by invitation), who are treated by the proprietors of the feast with the fruits and flowers in season, and are entertained every evening with bands of singers and dancers.” Vide Howell's Indostan, vol. ii.

‡ Bishen, Bishnoo, or Jaggernaut, is one of the principal Hindoo deities. “This fast, dedicated to him, is called the Sinan Jattrra, or general washing in the Ganges:
 and it is almost incredible to think the immense multitude, of every age and sex, that appears on both sides of the river, throughout its whole course, at one and the same time.” Vide Mr. Howell, vol. ii. p. 124. 128.

 • O guardian genius of this sacred wave,
 • Save, save thy sons, if thine the power to save!

So Scrim spoke—while by the moon's pale beam,
 The frequent corse came floating down the stream *.
 He sigh'd, and rising turn'd his steps to rove
 Where wav'd o'er Nizim's vale the cocoa-grove;
 There, 'midst scorch'd ruins, one lone roof re-
 main'd,

And one forlorn inhabitant contain'd.
 The sound of feet he near his threshold heard;
 Slow from the ground his languid limbs he rear'd:
 Come, tyrant come! perform a generous part,
 Lift thy keen steel, and pierce this fainting heart!
 Com'st thou for gold? my gold, alas, I gave,
 My darling daughter in distress to save!
 Thy faithless brethren took the shining store,
 Then from my arms the trembling virgin tore!
 Three days, three nights, I've languish'd here alone—

• Three foodless days, three nights to sleep un-
 • known!

• Come, tyrant come! perform a generous part,
 • Lift thy keen steel, and pierce this fainting heart!
 • “No hostile steps the haunt of woe invade,”

Scrim replied—and, passing where the glade
 A length of prospect down the vale display'd,
 Another sight of misery met his view;
 Another mournful voice his notice drew!
 There, near a temple's recent ruin, stood
 A white-rob'd Bramin by the sacred flood:
 His wives, his children, dead beside him lay—
 Of hunger these, and those of grief the prey
 Thrice he with dust desil'd his aged head;
 Thrice o'er the stream his hands uplifted spread:
 Hear, all ye powers to whom we bend in prayer!
 Hear, all who rule o'er water, earth, and air!
 'Tis not for them, though lifeless there they lie;
 'Tis not for me, though innocent I die:—
 My country's breast the tyger, avarice, rends,
 And loud to you her parting groan ascends.
 Hear, all ye powers to whom we bend in prayer!
 Hear, all who rule o'er water, earth, and air!
 Hear and avenge! [sphere,
 • But hark! what voice from yonder slary
 • Slides like the breeze of evening o'er my ear?

 ' Go, plant the grove, and bid the lake expand,
 ' And on green hills the pompous palace stand:
 ' Let luxury's hand adorn the gaudy room,
 ' Smooth the soft couch, and shed the rich per-
 " fume— [vite,
 ' There night's kind calm in vain shall sleep in-
 ' While fancied omens warn, and spectres fright;
 ' Sad sounds shall issue from your guilty walls,
 ' The widow'd wife's, the sonless mother's calls;
 ' And infant Rajahs' bleeding forms shall rise,
 ' And lift to you their supplicating eyes:
 ' Remorse intolerable your hearts will feel,
 ' And your own hands plunge deep the avenging
 " steel §. [dain,
 ' (For Europe's cowards Heaven's command dif-
 ' To death's cold arms they fly for ease in vain.)
 ' For us, each painful transmigration o'er,
 ' Sweet fields receive us to resign no more;
 ' Where safety's fence for ever round us grows,
 ' And peace, fair flower, with bloom unfading

* Birmah is a principal deity of the Hindoos, in whose person they worship the Divine Attribute of Wisdom. From the best accounts we have of India, the intelligent part of the natives do not worship "stocks and stones," merely as such: but rather the Supreme Existence, in a variety of attributes or manifestations.

† The Hindoo author of evil, similar to our Satan.

‡ An Indian dagger.

|| The reader must readily perceive the propriety of this turn of thought in a poem designed to have a moral tendency. There is much difference between a person wishing evil to his enemy, and praying that evil will be the consequence of that enemy's crimes. The first is an immoral act of the will; the second, a neutral act of the judgment.

§ The Hindoo religion strongly prohibits suicide. Mr. Howell gives us the following passage from the Shastab: "Whoever of the delinquent Debitab shall dare to free himself from the mortal form wherewith I shall enclose him, thou Sieb shalt plunge him into the Ounderab for ever: he shall not again have the benefit of the fifteen Bobcons of purgation, probation, and purification."

' Light's sun unsetting shines with cheering beam;
 ' And pleasure's river rolls its golden stream!
 ' Enrapt he spoke—then ceas'd the lofty strain,
 ' And Orel's rocks return'd the sound again.—
 ' A British ruffian, near in ambush laid,
 ' Rush'd sudden from the cane-isle's secret shade;
 ' Go to thy gods! with rage infernal cried,
 ' And headlong plung'd the hapless sage into the foaming tide.

LI-PO;

OR, THE GOOD GOVERNOR.

A Chinese Eclogue.

THOSE who are conversant in the best accounts of China, particularly Du Halde's History, must have remarked, that the Chinese government, though arbitrary, is well regulated and mild; and that a prince in that country can acquire no glory, but by attention to the welfare of his subjects. On this general idea is founded the plan of the following poem.

WHERE Honan's hills Kianfi's vale enclose,
 ' And Xifa's lake its glassy level shows,
 ' Li-po's fair island lay—delightful scene!—
 ' With swelling slopes, and groves of every green:
 ' On azure rocks his rich pavilion plac'd,
 ' Rear'd its light front with golden columns grac'd;
 ' High o'er the roof a weeping willow hung,
 ' And jasmine boughs the lattice twin'd among;
 ' In porcelain vases crested amaranth grew,
 ' And starry after, crimson, white, and blue;
 ' Lien-hoa flowers upon the water spread;
 ' Bright shells and corals varied lustre shed;
 ' From spary grottos crystal drops distill'd
 ' On sounding brass, and air with music fill'd;
 ' Soft through the bending canes the breezes play'd,
 ' The rustling leaves continual murmur made;
 ' Gay shoals of gold-fish glitter'd in the tide,
 ' And gaudy birds flew sportive by its side.
 ' The distant prospects well the sight might please,
 ' With pointed mountains, and romantic trees:
 ' From craggy cliffs, between the verdant shades,
 ' The silver rills rush'd down in bright cascades,
 ' O'er terrac'd steps rich cotton harvests * wav'd,
 ' And smooth canals the rice-clad valley law'd;
 ' Long rows of cypress † parted all the land,
 ' And tall pagodas crown'd the river's strand!

* 'Twas here, from business and its pomp and pain,
 ' The pensive master sought relief in vain.

Li-po, mild prince, a viceroy's sceptre sway'd,
 ' And ten fair towns his gentle rule obey'd:
 ' The morn's transactions to his memory came,
 ' And some he found to praise, and some to blame;
 ' Mark'd here how justice, pity there prevail'd,
 ' And how from haste or indolence he fail'd.

' Beneath a bower of sweet ka-fa, whose bloom
 ' Fill'd all the adjacent lawn with rich perfume,

* The Chinese reduce the steep slopes of their hills into little terraces, on which they grow cotton, potatoes, &c. They plant the edges of their terraces with trees, which keep up the ground, and make a very fine appearance.

† Their rice-grounds are separated by broad ditches, the sides of which are planted with cypresses. Vide Osbeck's Voyage to China.

His slaves at distance sat—a beautiful train!—
 One wak'd the lute, and one the vocal strain:
 They saw his brow with care all clouded o'er,
 And wish'd to ease th' anxiety he bore.
 Amusive tales their soothing lay disclos'd,
 Of heroes brave to perils strange expos'd;
 Of tyrants proud, from power's high summit cast;
 And lovers, long desponding, blest at last.
 They ceas'd; the warblings softly died away,
 Like zephyrs ceasing at the close of day.
 ' This scene,' said he, 'how fair! to please the ' sight,
 ' How nature's charms, art's ornaments unite!
 ' Those maids, what magic in the strains they ' sung! [tongue.
 ' Song sweetest flows from beauty's tuneful
 ' Yet say, did Tien bid power and wealth be mine,
 ' For me my soul to pleasure to resign?
 ' What boots, that annual, on our fathers' tombs,
 ' We strew fair flowers, and offer choice perfumes;
 ' Our veneration of their memories show,
 ' And not their steps in virtue's path pursue?
 ' When, from his province as the prince returns,
 ' Rich feasts for him are spread, and incense burns,
 ' And gilded barks unfold their streamers gay,
 ' And following crowds their loud applauses pay;
 ' Avails all this, if he from right has swerv'd,
 ' And conscience tells him all is undeserv'd?
 ' Arise, Li-po! 'tis duty calls, arise!
 ' The sun sinks reddening in Tartarian skies.
 ' Yon walls that tower o'er Xenfi's neighbouring
 ' plain,
 ' Yon walls unnumber'd miseries contain.
 ' Think, why did Tien superior rank impart,
 ' Force of the mind, or feelings of the heart.
 ' Last night in sleep, to fancy's sight display'd,
 ' Lay lovelier scenes than e'er my eyes survey'd;
 ' With purple shone the hills, with gold the vales,
 ' And greenest foliage way'd in gentlest gales:
 ' 'Midst palmy fields, with sunshine ever bright,
 ' A palace rear'd its walls of silvery white;

' The gates of pearl a shady hall disclos'd,
 ' Where old Confucius' rev'rend form repos'd:
 ' Loose o'er his limbs the silk's light texture flow'd,
 ' His eye serene ethereal lustre show'd:
 ' " My son," said he, as near his feat I drew,
 ' " Cast round this wonderful spot thy dazzled
 ' view;
 ' " See how, by lucid founts in myrtle bowers,
 ' " The host inhabitants consume their hours!
 ' " They ne'er to war, fell fiend! commission gave
 ' " To murder, ravish, banish, and enslave; [pile,
 ' " They ne'er bade grandeur raise her gorgeous
 ' " With tribute ravish'd from the hand of toil;
 ' " But parents, guardians of the people reign'd,
 ' " The weak defended, and the poor sustain'd."
 ' Smiling he ceas'd—the vision seem'd to fly,
 ' Like fleecy clouds dispersing in the sky.
 ' Arise, Li-po! and cast thy robes aside,
 ' Disguise thy form, thy well-known features hide;
 ' Go forth, yon streets, yon crowded streets per-
 ' vade, [aid:
 ' Mix with the throng, and mark who seeks thy
 ' There avarice stern o'er poverty bears sway,
 ' And age and sickness fall his easy prey;
 ' There hands that justice' sacred ensigns bear,
 ' Protect the plunderer, and the plunder share;
 ' Perhaps there discord's desperate rage prevails,
 ' And wisdom's voice to calm the tumult fails;
 ' Perhaps revenge gives victims to the grave,
 ' Perhaps they perish, ere I haste to save!
 He spoke, and rose; but now along the way
 That from the city-gate fair-winding lay, Stretch'd through green meads where lowing cattle graz'd,
 Amid the lake's wide silver level rais'd,
 Led up steep rocks by painted bridges join'd,
 Or near thin trees that o'er the tide inclin'd,
 Slow tow'rds his palace came a suppliant train:—
 Whoe'er his presence sought ne'er fought in vain—
 The ready vessel, waiting at his call,
 Receiv'd, and bore him to the audience-hall.

O D E S.

THE Horatian, or Lesser Ode, is characterized principally by ease and correctness. The following little pieces, attempted on that plan, were the production of very different periods; and, on revival, were thought not undeserving a place in this collection.

ODE I.

TO LEISURE.

GENTLE leisure, whom of yore
 To wealth the fair contentment bore,
 When peace with them her dwelling made,
 And health her kind attendance paid;
 As wandering o'er the sunny plains
 They fed their herds and fleecy trains:—
 O thou! who country scenes and air
 Prefer'st to courts, and crowds, and care;
 With thee I've often pass'd the day,
 To thee I wake the grateful lay.

With thee on Chadwell's thymy brow*,
 Beneath the hazel's bending bough,

* The New River Head, near Ware.

I've sat to breathe the fragrance cool
 Exhaling from the glassy pool;
 Where, through th' unfulfill'd crystal seen,
 The bottom show'd its shining green:
 As all attentive these I view'd,
 And many a pleasing thought pursu'd,
 Whate'er of pleasure they bestow'd,
 Still I to thee that pleasure ow'd!

With thee, on Musla's † corn-clad height
 The landscape oft has charm'd my sight;
 Delightful hills, and vales, and woods,
 And dusty roads, and winding floods;
 And towns, that through thin groups of shade
 Their roofs of varied form display'd:

† A hill on the north side of Ware.

As all attentive these I view'd,
And many a pleasing thought pursu'd,
Whate'er of pleasure they bestow'd,
Still I to thee that pleasure ow'd!

With thee, where Eafna's * horn-beam grove
Its foliage o'er me interwove,
Along the lonely path I've stray'd,
By banks in hoary moss array'd;
Where tufts of azure orpine grew,
And branchy fern of brighter hue:
As all attentive these I view'd,
And many a pleasing thought pursu'd,
Whate'er of pleasure they bestow'd,
Still I to thee that pleasure ow'd!

With thee, by Stansted's † farms enclos'd,
With aged elms in rows dispos'd;
Or where her chapel's walls appear,
The silver winding river near,
Beneath the broad-leav'd sycamore,
I've linger'd on the shady shore:
As all attentive these I view'd,
And many a pleasing thought pursu'd,
Whate'er of pleasure they bestow'd,
Still I to thee that pleasure ow'd!

With thee, where Thames his waters leads,
Round Poplar's Isle ‡ of verdant meads,
Along the undulating tide,
I've seen the white-sail'd vessels glide;
Or gaz'd on London's lofty towers,
Or Dulwich hills, or Greenwich bowers:
As all attentive these I view'd,
And many a pleasing thought pursu'd,
Whate'er of pleasure they bestow'd,
Still I to thee that pleasure ow'd!

O gentle leisure!—absent long—
I woo thee with this tuneful song:
If e'er, allur'd by grateful change,
O'er scenes yet unbeheld I range,
And Albion's east or western shore
For rural solitudes explore:
As all attentive these I view,
And many a pleasing thought pursue,
Whate'er of pleasure they bestow,
To thee that pleasure I must owe!

ODE II.

THE EVENING WALK.

WHAT time fair spring, with dewy hand,
Awakes her cowslip bloom;
And hawthorn boughs, by breezes fann'd,
Diffuse a rich perfume:

Young Theron down the valley stray'd
At evening's silent hour,
When bright the setting sunbeams play'd
On Hertford's distant tower.

He sigh'd, and cast around his eye
O'er all the pleasing scene,
Now tow'rd's the golden-clouded sky,
Now on the fields of green.

* A pleasant wood, east of Ware.

† A village in the same neighbourhood.

‡ Commonly called The Isle of Dog, opposite Greenwich.

' Thrice has fair spring her cowslip bloom
' Awak'd with dewy hand,
' And hawthorn boughs diffus'd perfume,
' By western breezes fann'd;

' Since here, at evening's silent hour,
' Delighted oft I stray'd,
' While bright on Hertford's distant tower
' The setting sunbeams play'd:

' 'Twas then the flatterer hope was near,
' And sung this soothing strain:
' Where through the trees yon tow'rs appear
' Far o'er the level plain;

' There oft thy pleasant evening walk
' Thy favourite maid shall join,
' And all the charms of tender talk
' And tuneful song be thine:

' With thee she'll hear the bleat of flocks,
' The thistle's mellow lay,
' The rills that murmur o'er the rocks,
' The whispers of the spray."—

' So sung false hope—Deceiv'd I heard,
' And set my heart at ease;
' The future then so fair appear'd,
' It made the present please.

' So sung false hope—The approaching years,
' That distant look'd so gay,
' With clouds of cares and storms of fears
' All fraught, have pass'd away.

' As glides yon sun adown the sky,
' As rolls yon rapid stream;
' So fast our joys and sorrows fly,
' And flown appear a dream.

' Be then the events that time has brought ' To me not brought in vain;
' By painful disappointment taught,
' Let wisdom be my gain!

Thus Theron spoke, and earnest ey'd
The sun's departing ray;
Again he look'd, again he sigh'd,
And homeward bent his way.

ODE III.

TO CHILDHOOD.

CHILDHOOD, happiest stage of life!
Free from care and free from strife,
Free from memory's ruthless reign,
Fraught with scenes of former pain;
Free from fancy's cruel skill,
Fabricating future ill;
Time, when all that meets the view,
All can charm, for all is new;
How thy long-lost hours I mourn,
Never, never to return!

Then to tofs the circling ball,
Caught rebounding from the wall;
Then the mimic ship to guide
Down the kennel's dirty tide;
Then the hoop's revolving pace
Through the dusty street to chase;
O what joy!—it once was mine,
Childhood, matchless boon of thine!
How thy long-lost hours I mourn,
Never, never to return!

ODE IV.

HEARING MUSIC.

Yon organ! hark!—how soft, how sweet,
The warbling notes in concert meet!

The found my fancy leads
To climes where Phœbus' brightest beams
Gild jasmine groves and crystal streams
And lily-mantled meads;

Where myrtle bowers their bloom unfold,
Where citrons bend with fruit of gold,
Where grapes depress the vines;
Where, on the bank with roses gay,
Love, innocence, and pleasure play,
And beauty's form reclines.

Now different tones and measures flow,
And, gravely deep, and sadly slow,
Involve the mind in gloom;
I seem to join the mournful train,
Attendant round the couch of pain,
Or leaning o'er the tomb:

To where the orphan'd infant sleeps,
To where the love-lorn damsel weeps,
I pitying seem to stray;
Methinks I watch his cradle near,
Methinks her drooping thoughts I cheer,
And wipe her tears away.

Now loud the tuneful thunders roll,
And rouse and elevate the soul
O'er earth and all its care;
I seem to hear from heavenly plains
Angelic choirs responsive strains,
And in their raptures share.

ODE V.

A LANDSCAPE.

On the eastern hill's steep side
Spreads the rural hamlet wide;
Cross the vale, where willows rise,
Further still another lies;
And, beneath a steeper hill,
Lies another further still:
Near them many a field and grove—
Scenes where health and labour rove!

Northward swelling slopes are seen,
Clad with corn-fields neat and green;
There, through grassy plains below,
Broad and smooth the waters flow;
While the town, their banks along,
Bids its clustering houses throng,
In the sunshine glittering fair;
Haunts of business, haunts of care!

Westward o'er the yellow meads
Wind the rills through waving reeds;
From dark elms a shadow falls
On the abbey's whiten'd walls;
Wide the park's green lawns expand;
Thick its tufted lindens stand:
Fair retreat! that well might please
Wealth, and elegance, and ease.

Hark! amidst the distant shades
Murmuring drop the deep cascades;

Hark! amidst the rustling trees
Softly sighs the gentle breeze;
And the Æolian harp, reclin'd
Obvious to the stream of wind,
Pours its wildly-warbled strain,
Rising now, now sunk again.

How the view detains the sight!
How the sounds the ear delight!—
Sweet the scene! but think not there
Happiness sincere to share:
Reason still regrets the day
Passing rapidly away;
Lessening life's too little store;
Passing, to return no more!

ODE VI.

TO A FRIEND, ON HIS MARRIAGE, AND REMOVAL
INTO THE COUNTRY.

Written at Starway-Hall, in Essex.

WHATE'ER of lighter strain the muse
Essay'd, in vacant hours of ease,
At thy expence to raise a smile,
I deem thy candour will excuse;
For sure I meant not to displease,
For sure I wish'd thee well the while.

And now the nuptial knot is ty'd,
That muse no idle flattery brings,
Nor talks of joy unmixt with care—
I trust that none who e'er has try'd
The sober state of human things,
Will give thee hope such joy to share.

Domestic life must soon be thine—
'Tis various as an April day;
'Tis pleasure now, and now 'tis pain:
Through storms of foul and gleams of fine
Contented hold thy steady way,
And these enjoy, and those sustain.

From London's streets to solitude,
From brilliant shops to dirty fields,
From beaux and belles to rugged hind—
The change I own is strange and rude:
Yet scarce a place so little yields,
But he who seeks amusement finds.

Perchance thou'lt not disdain to hear
The ploughman's hist'ry of the plain;
Thy sight the prospect's scenes may charm:
And sure fastidious is the ear
That flights the milkmaid's simple strain
At evening echoing from the farm.

The market lore of artful swains,
The price of cattle and of corn,
The sportsman's feats of dogs and guns;—
To practise that will cost thee pains;
And these with patience must be borne,
For he will be disdain'd who shuns.

Courage, my friend! whate'er our fate;
So versatile the human mind,

* The author alludes to some trifling pieces of Enmour, written on his friend, for the amusement of a few intimate acquaintance.

That oft, when novelty is o'er,
To objects of our former hate
Assimilated and resign'd,
We wonder they displeas'd before.

'Twas on the festive social day,
Where beauty cast her smiles around,
And mirth the mind from care reliev'd;
What time our hands in harmless play
Thy brow with wreaths of myrtle bound,
My thoughts this grateful lay conceiv'd.

From Stanway's groves, from fields of Layer*,
To other scenes and other friends
To-morrow calls my steps away;
Yet memory them in view shall bear;
Yet them the wish of health attends,
And many a moment calm and gay.

ODE VII.

WRITTEN IN WINTER.

WHILE in the sky black clouds impend,
And fogs arise, and rains descend,
And one brown prospect opens round
Of leafless trees and furrow'd ground;
Save where unmelted spots of snow
Upon the shaded hill-side flow;
While chill winds blow, and torrents roll,
The scene disgusts the sight, depresses all the soul.

Yet worse what polar climate share—
Vast regions, dreary, bleak, and bare!—
There, on an icy mountain's height,
Seen only by the moon's pale light,
Stern Winter rears his giant form,
His robe a mist, his voice a storm:
His frown the shivering nations fly,
And hid for half the year in smoky caverns lie.

Yet there the lamp's perpetual blaze
Can pierce the gloom with cheering rays;
Yet there the heroic tale or song
Can urge the lingering hours along;
Yet there their hands with timely care
The kajak † and the dart prepare,
On summer seas to work their way,
And wage the wat'ry war, and make the seals their prey.

Too delicate! reproach no more
The seasons of thy native shore—
There soon shall Spring descend the sky,
With smiling brow and placid eye;
A primrose wreath surrounds her hair,
Her green robe floats upon the air;
And scatter'd from her liberal hand,
Fair blossoms deck the trees, fair flow'rs adorn the land.

ODE VIII.

TO A FRIEND.

WHERE Grove-hill‡ shows thy villa fair,
But late, my Lettſom, there with thee

* Layer Breton, a village in Essex.

† A Greenland fishing boat.

‡ At Camberwell, in Surrey.

VOE. XI.

'Twas mine the tranquil hour to share—
The social hour of converse free;
To mark the arrangement of thy ground,
And all the pleasing prospect round,
Where, while we gaz'd, new beauties still were found.

There, as the impending cloud of smoke
Fled various from the varying gale,
Full on the view fresh objects broke
Along the extensive peopled vale,
Beside Thames's bending stream,
From ancient Lambeth's west extreme,
To Limehouse glittering in the evening beam.

And now and then the glancing eye
Caught glimpse of spots remoter still,
On Hampstead's street-clad slope so high,
Or Harrow's fair conspicuous hill;
Or eastward wander'd to explore
All Peckham's pleasant level o'er,
To busy Deptford's vessel-crowded shore:

Or sought that southern landscape's bound,
Those swelling mounts—one smooth and green,
And one with oaken coverts crown'd,
And one where scattering trees are seen*.
'Twas these, with Summer's radiance bright,
That gave my earliest youth delight,
Of rural scenes the first that met my sight †.

That business with fatiguing cares,
For this delightful seat of thine
Such scanty store of moments spares,
Say, friend, shall I for thee repine?
Were it the commerce of the main,
Or culture of the teeming plain,
From blame or pity I should scarce refrain.

But O! to alleviate human woes,
To banish sickness, banish pain,
To give the sleepless eye repose,
The nerveless arm its strength again;
From parent eyes to dry the tear,
The wife's distressful thought to cheer,
And end the husband's and the lover's fear;

Where want sits pining, faint, and ill,
To lend thy kind unpurchas'd aid,
And bear the exertions of thy skill
With many a grateful blessing paid—
'Tis luxury to the feeling heart,
Beyond what social hours impart, [art.
Or nature's beautiful scenes, or curious works o

ODE IX.

LEAVING BATH. M.DCC.LXXVI.

BATH! ere I quit thy pleasing scene,
Thy beechen cliff I'll climb again,
To view thy mountains vivid green,
To view thy hill-surrounded plain;
To see distinct beneath the eye,
As in a pictur'd prospect nigh,

* The Dulwich hills.

† The author was born in the environs of London, on the Surrey side.

Those Attic structures shining white,
That form thy sunny crescent's bend,
Or by thy dusty streets extend,
Or near thy winding river's site.

Did commerce these proud piles upraise !
For thee she ne'er unfurl'd her sails—
Hygeia gave thy fountains praise,
And pain and languor fought thy vales :
But these suffic'd an humble cell,
If they with strength and ease might dwell.
Then fashion call'd ; his potent voice
Proud wealth with ready step obey'd,
And pleasure all her arts essay'd,
To fix with thee the fickle choice.

Precarious gift !—Thy mansions gay,
Where peers and beauties lead the ball,
Neglected soon may feel decay ;
Forsaken, moulder to their fall—
Palmyra, once like thee renown'd,
Now lies a ruin on the ground.—
But still thy environs so fair,
Thy waters salutary aid,
Will surely always some persuade
To render thee their care.

ODE X.

TO J. PAYNE, ESQ. ACCOUNTANT-GENERAL OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

O FRIEND ! to thee, whose lib'ral mind
Was form'd with taste for joys refin'd,
For all the extended country fields,
Of azure skies and verdant fields ;
For all that genius' hand displays,—
The painter's forms, the poet's lays :—
To thee, restraint to that dull room,
Where sunshine never breaks the gloom ;
To thee, restraint to that dull lot
Of books, with numbers cypher'd o'er—
How hard the lot ! I see with pain,
And wish it oft exchang'd in vain.

Yet not for thee I ask the stores
Which rapine rends from foreign shores,
Nor those oppression's power procures
From ills that poverty endures.
Far happier thou ! thy honest gain
Can life with decency sustain ;
For thee, content, with thought serene,
Surveys the present changeful scene ;
And piety her view sublime
Extends beyond the realm of time.

ODE XI.

TO A FRIEND, APREHENSIVE OF DECLINING
FRIENDSHIP.

Too much in man's imperfect state
Mistake produces useless pain.—
Methinks, of friendship's frequent fate
I hear my Frogley's voice complain.
This heart, I hope, forgives its foes ;
I know it ne'er forgets its friends ;

Where'er may chance my steps dispose,
The absent oft my thought attends.

Deem not that time's oblivious hand
From mem'ry's page has raz'd the days,
By Lee's green verge we wont to stand
And on his crystal current gaze.

From Chadwell's cliffs, o'erhung with shade,
From Widbury's prospect-yielding hill,
Sweet look'd the scenes we then survey'd,
While fancy fought for sweeter still :

Then how did learning's stores delight !
From books what pleasures then we drew !
For then their charms first met our sight,
And then their faults we little knew.

Alas ! life's Summer swiftly flies,
And few its hours of bright and fair !
Why bid distrust's chill east-wind rise,
To blast the scanty blooms they bear ?

ODE XII.

TO A FRIEND.

No, Cockfield, no ! I'll not disdain
Thy Upton's elm-divided plain ;
Nor scorn the varied views it yields,
O'er Bromley's creeks and isles of reeds,
Or Ham's or Plaistow's level meads,
To Woolwich streets, or Charlton fields :
Thy hedge-row paths I'll pleasant call,
And praise the lonely lane that leads
To that old tower upon the wall.

'Twas when misfortune's stroke severe,
And melancholy's preference drear,
Had made my Amwell's groves displeas'd,
That thine my weary steps receiv'd,
And much the change my mind reliev'd,
And much thy kindness gave me ease ;
For o'er the past as thought would stray,
That thought thy voice as oft retriev'd,
To scenes which fair before us lay.

And there in happier hours, the walk
Has frequent pleas'd with friendly talk ;
From theme to theme that wander'd still—
The long detail of where we had been,
And what we had heard, and what we had seen ;
And what the poet's tuneful skill,
And what the painter's graphic art,
Or antiquarian's searches keen,
Of calm amusement could impart.

'Then oft did nature's works engage,
And oft we search'd Linnæus' page ;
The Scanian sage, whose wond'rous toil
Had class'd the vegetable race :
And curious, oft, from place to place
We rang'd, and sought each different soil,
Each different plant intent to view,
And all the marks minute to trace,
Whence he his nice distinctions drew.

O moments these, not ill employ'd !
O moments, better far enjoy'd
Than those in crowded cities pass'd ;
Where oft to luxury's gaudy reign

Trade lends her feeble aid in vain,
Till pride, a bankrupt wretch at last,
Bids fraud his specious wiles essay,
Youth's easy confidence to gain,
Or industry's poor pittance rend away.

ODE XIII.

I HATE that drum's discordant sound,
Parading round, and round, and round,
To thoughtless youth it pleasure yields,
And lure's from cities and from fields,
To sell their liberty for charms
Of tawdry lace, and glittering arms;
And when ambition's voice commands,
To march, and fight, and fall, in foreign lands.

I hate that drum's discordant sound
Parading round, and round, and round:
To me it talks of ravag'd plains,
And burning towns, and ruin'd swains,
And mangled limbs, and dying groans,
And widows tears, and orphans moans;
And all that misery's hand bestows,
To fill the catalogue of human woes.

ODE XIV.

WRITTEN AFTER READING SOME MODERN LOVE-VERSES.

TAKE hence this tuneful trifler's lays!
I'll hear no more the unmeaning strain
Of Venus' doves, and Cupid's darts,
And killing eyes, and wounded hearts;
All flatt'ry's round of fulsome praise,
All falsehood's cant of fabled pain.

Bring me the muse whose tongue has told
Love's genuine plaintive tender tale;
Bring me the muse whose sounds of woe
'Midst death's dread scenes so sweetly flow,
When friendship's faithful breast lies cold,
When beauty's blooming cheek is pale:
Bring these—I like their grief sincere;
It sooths my sympathetic gloom:
For, oh! love's genuine pains I've borne,
And death's dread rage has made me mourn;
I've wept o'er friendship's early bier,
And dropt the tear on beauty's tomb.

ODE XV.

THE MUSE; OR, POETICAL ENTHUSIASM.

THE muse! whate'er the muse inspires,
My soul the tuneful strain admires;
The poet's birth, I ask not where,
His place, his name, they're not my care;
Nor Greece nor Rome delights me more
Than Tagus' bank*, or Thames's shore †:
From silver Avon's flowery side
Though Shakspere's numbers sweetly glide,

* Alluding to Camoens, the epic poet of Portugal; of whose Lusad we have a well-known masterly translation by Mr. Mickle.

† Alluding to Milton, Pope, &c.

As sweet, from Morven's desert hills,
My ear the voice of Ossian fills.

The muse! whate'er the muse inspires,
My soul the tuneful strain admires:
Nor bigot zeal, nor party rage
Prevail, to make me blame the page;
I scorn not all that Dryden sings,
Because he flatters courts and kings;
And from the master lyre of Gray
When pomp of music breaks away,
Not less the found my notice draws,
For that is heard in freedom's cause.

The muse! whate'er the muse inspires,
My soul the tuneful strain admires:
Where wealth's bright sun propitious shines,
No added lustre marks the lines;
Where want extends her chilling shades,
No pleasing flower of fancy fades,
A scribbling peer's applauded lays
Might claim, but claim in vain, my praise
From that poor youth, whose tales relate
Sad Jugg's fears and Bawdin's fate*.

The muse! whate'er the muse inspires,
My soul the tuneful strain admires:
When fame her wreaths well-earn'd bestows,
My breast no latent envy knows;
My Langhorne's verse I lov'd to hear,
And Beattie's song delights my ear;
And his whom Athen's tragic maid
Now leads through Scarning's lonely glade;
While he for British nymphs bid flow
Her notes of terror and of woe †.

The muse! whate'er the muse inspires,
My soul the tuneful strain admires:
Or be the verse or blank or rhyme,
The theme, or humble or sublime;
If pastoral's hand my journey leads
Through harvest fields or new-mown meads;
If epic's voice sonorous calls
To Oeta's cliffs † or Salem's walls †;
Enough—the muse, the muse inspires!
My soul the tuneful strain admires.

ODE XVI.

VIEWING THE RUINS OF AN ABBEY.

To a Friend.

How steep yon mountains rise around,
How bold yon gloomy woods ascend!
How loud the rushing torrents sound
That 'midst these heaps of ruin bend,
Where one arch'd gateway yet remains,

* See Rowley's poems, supposed to have been written by Chatterton, an unhappy youth born at Bristol.

† See Mr. Potter's excellent translation of Æschylus and Euripides.

‡ See Mr. Glover's Leonidas, alluded to as an example of classical dignity and simplicity.

§ See Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, alluded to as an example of Gothic fancy and magnificence.

And one lone aisle its roof retains,
And one tall turret's walls impend :

Here once a self-sequester'd train
Renounc'd life's tempting pomp and glare ;
Rejected power, relinquish'd gain,
And shunn'd the great, and shunn'd the fair :
The voluntary slaves of toil,
By day they till'd their little soil,
By night they awoke and rose to prayer.

Though superstition much we blame,
That bade them thus consume their years ;
Their motive still our praise must claim,
Their constancy our thought reveres :
And sure their solitary scheme
Must check each passion's wild extremē,
And save them cares, and save them fears.

Their convent's round contain'd their all ;
Their minds no sad presage oppress,
What fate might absent wealth besal,
How absent friends might be distress :
Domestic ills ne'er hurt their ease ;
Their nought of pain could feel from these,
Who no domestic joys possess.

But imperfection haunts each place :
Would this kind calm atone to thee
For fame's or fortune's sprightly chase,
Whose prize in prospect still we see ;
Or Hymen's happy moments blest,
With beauty leaning on thy breast,
Or childhood prattling at thy knee ?

ODE XVII.

PRIVATEERING.

Now custom steels the human breast
To deeds that nature's thoughts detest !
How custom consecrates to fame
What reason else would give to shame !
Fair Spring supplies the favouring gale,
The naval plunderer spreads his sail,
And ploughing wide the wat'ry way,
Explores with anxious eyes his prey.

The man he never saw before,
The man who him no quarrel bore,
He meets, and avarice prompts the fight ;
And rage enjoys the dreadful sight
Of decks with streaming crimson dy'd,
And wretches struggling in the tide,
Or, 'midst th' explosion's horrid glare,
Dispers'd with quivering limbs in air.

The merchant now on foreign shores
His captur'd wealth in vain deposes ;
Quits his fair home, O mournful change !
For the dark prison's scanty range ;
By plenty's hand so lately fed,
Depends on casual alms for bread ;
And with a father's anguish torn,
Sees his poor offspring left forlorn.

And yet, such man's misjudging mind,
For all this injury to his kind,

The prosperous robber's native plain
Shall bid him welcome home again ;
His name the song of every street,
His acts the theme of all we meet,
And oft the artist's skill shall place
To public view his pictur'd face !

If glory thus be earn'd, for me
My object glory ne'er shall be ;
No, first in Cambria's loneliest dale
Be mine to hear the shepherd's tale !
No, first on Scotia's bleakest hill
Be mine the stubborn foil to till !
Remote from wealth, to dwell alone,
And die, to guilty praise unknown !

ODE XVIII.

ON HOSPITALITY.

DOMESTIC powers ! erewhile rever'd,
Where Syria spread her palmy plain,
Where Greece her tuneful muses heard,
Where Rome beheld her patriot train ;
Thou to Albion too wert known,
'Midst the moat and moss-grown wall
That girt her Gothic-structur'd hall
With rural trophies strown.

The traveller, doubtful of his way,
Upon the pathless forest wild ;
The huntsman, in the heat of day,
And with the tedious chase o'er toil'd ;
Wide their view around them cast,
Mark'd the distant rustic tower,
And fought and found the festive bower,
And shar'd the free repast.

E'en now, on Caledonia's shore,
When eve's dun robe the sky arrays,
Thy punctual hand unfolds the door,
Thy eye the mountain road surveys ;
Pleas'd to spy the casual guest,
Pleas'd with food his heart to cheer,
With pipe or song to sooth his ear,
And spread his couch for rest.

Nor yet e'en here disdain'd thy sway,
Where grandeur's splendid modern seat
Far o'er the landscape glitters gay ;
Or where fair quiet's lone retreat
Hides beneath the hoary hill,
Near the dusky upland shade,
Between the willow's glossy glade,
And by the tinkling rill.

There thine the pleasing interviews
That friends and relatives endear,
When scenes not often seen amuse,
When tales not often told we hear ;
There the scholar's liberal mind
Oft instruction gives and gains,
And oft the lover's lore obtains
His fair-one's audience kind.

O gentle power ! where'er thy reign,
May health and peace attend thee still ;

Nor folly's presence cause thee pain,
Nor vice reward thy good with ill;
Gratitude thy altar raise,
Wealth to thee her offerings pay,
And genius wake his tuneful lay
To celebrate thy praise.

ODE XIX.

THE APOLOGY.

PASTORAL, and elegy, and ode!
Who hopes, by these, applause to gain,
Believe me, friend, may hope in vain—
These classic things are not the mode;
Our taste polite, to much refin'd,
Demands a strain of different kind.

Go, court the muse of Chevy Chase,
To tell in Sternhold's simple rhimes
Some tale of ancient English times;
Or try to win rude satire's grace,
That scold, who dirt around her throws,
And many a random stain bestows.

Or dull trite thoughts in songs combine,
And bid the tuneful accents fall,
To wake the echoes of Vauxhall;
Or tow'rd's the stage thy thoughts incline,
And furnish some half-pilgrim'd play,
To shine the meteor of the day.*

O! no—though such the crowd amuse,
And peals of noisy praise procure;
Will they the critic eye endure,
And pass the ordeal of reviews?
And who is he for whom they'll gain
A niche in fame's immortal fane?

The plan that Virgil's choice could claim,
The plan that Horace deign'd to choose,
Trust me, I wish not to refuse:—
To Akenfide's or Shenstone's name
The praise that future days shall pay,
Methinks may well content my lay.

ODE XX.

THIS scene how rich from Thames's side,
While evening suns their amber beam
Spread o'er the glassy-surface'd tide,
And 'midst the masts and cordage gleam;
Blaze on the roofs with turrets crown'd,
And gild green pastures stretch'd around,
And gild the slope of that high ground,
Whose cornfields bright the prospect bound *!

The white sails glide along the shore,
Red streamers on the breezes play,
The boatmen ply the dashing oar,
And wide their various freight convey;
Some Neptune's hardy thoughtless-train,
And some the careful sons of gain,

* Shooter's Hill. This view was taken on the north side of the Thames, at Ratcliff.

And some the enamour'd nymph and swain
Liftening to music's soothing strain.

But there, while these the sight allure,
Still fancy wings her flight away
To woods seclude, and vales obscure,
And streams that solitary stray;
To view the pine-grove on the hill,
The rocks that trickling springs distill,
The meads that quivering aspens fill,
Or alders crowding o'er the rill.

And where the trees unfold their bloom,
And where the banks their floriage bear,
And all effuse a rich perfume
That hovers in the soft calm air;
The hedge-row path to wind along,
To hear the bleating fleecy throng,
To hear the skylark's airy song,
And throistle's note so clear and strong.

But say, if these our steps were brought,
Would these their pow'r to please retain?
Say, would not restless, roving thought
Turn back to busy scenes again?
O strange formation of the mind!
Still, though the present fair we find,
Still tow'rd's the absent thus inclin'd,
Thus fix'd on objects left behind!

ODE XXI.

WRITTEN AFTER A JOURNEY TO BRISTOL.

THEE, Bristol, oft my thoughts recal,
Thy Kingdown brow and Brandon hill;
The space, once circled by thy wall,
Which tow'rs and spires of churches fill;
And masts and sails of vessels tall,
With trees and houses intermingled still!

From Clifton's rocks how grand the sight,
When Avon's dark tide rush'd between!
How grand, from Henbury's woody height,
The Severn's wide-spread wat'ry scene,
Her waves with trembling sunshine bright,
And Cambrian hills beyond them rising green!

To Mendip's ridge how stretch'd away
My view, while fancy sought the plain
Where Blagdon's groves secluded lay,
And heard my much-lov'd poet's strain*!
Ah! why so near, nor thither stray
To meet the friend I ne'er shall meet again?

Occasion's call averse to prize,
Irresolute we oft remain—
She soon irrevocably flies,
And then we mourn her flown in vain;
While pleasure's imag'd forms arise,
Whose fancied lo's regret beholds with pain.

And Bristol! why thy scenes explore,
And why those scenes so soon resign,
And fail to seek the spot that bore
That wonderous tuneful youth of thine,

* The late ingenious Dr. John Langborne, then resident at Blagdon, near Bristol.

The bard *, whose boasted ancient store
Rose recent from his own exhaustless mine †!

Though fortune all her gifts denied,
Though learning made him not her choice,
The muse still plac'd him at her side,
And bade him in her smile rejoice—
Description still his pen supplied,
Pathos his thought, and melody his voice!

Conscious and proud of merit high,
Fame's wreath he boldly claim'd to wear;
But fame, regardless, pass'd him by,
Unknown, or deem'd unworth her care:
The fun of hope forsook his sky;
And all his land look'd dreary, bleak, and bare!

Then poverty, grim spectre, rose,
And horror o'er the prospect threw—
His deep distress too nice t' expose;
Too nice for common aid to sue,
A dire alternative he chose,
And rashly from the painful scene withdrew.

Ah! why for genius' headstrong rage
Did virtue's hand no curb prepare?
What boots, poor youth! that now thy page
Can boast the public praise to share,
The learn'd in deep research engage,
And lightly entertain the gentle fair?

Ye, who superfluous wealth command,
O why your kind relief delay'd?
O why not snatch'd his desperate hand?
His foot on fate's dread brink not stay'd?
What thanks had you your native land
For a new Shakspeare or new Milton paid?

For me—Imagination's power
Leads oft insensibly my way,
To where, at midnight's silent hour,
The crescent moon's slow-vestering ray
Pours full on Redcliff's lofty tower,
And gilds with yellow light its walls of gray.

'Midst toil and commerce slumbering round,
Lull'd by the rising tide's hoarse roar,
There Frome and Avon willow-crown'd,
I view sad-wandering by the shore,
With streaming tears, and notes of mournful
found,
Too late their hapless bard, untimely lost, deplore.

ODE XXII.

TO CRITICISM.

FAIR nymph! of taste and learning born,
Whom truth's and candour's gifts adorn,

* Chatterton.

† This is at least the author's opinion, not withstanding all that has hitherto appeared on the other side of the question. The last line alludes to one of the ingenious Mr. Mason, in his elegy to a young nobleman:

"See from the depths of his exhaustless mine
"His glittering stores the tuneful spendthrift
"throws."

The muse's friend! to thee she sings:
Accept the grateful verse she brings.
When genius, ranging nature o'er,
Collects his tributary store,
What matter's tract immense supplies,
Or wide in mind's vast region lies,
And every thought with skill combines,
And all transmits in tuneful lines;
Then rapture sparkling in thine eye,
Then rais'd thy solemn voice on high;
Thy comment still his work pursues,
The plan explains, the style reviews,
And marks its strength, and marks its ease;
And tells us why and how they please.
And when, perhaps, disdainful care,
He blends with faults his products fair;
Whate'er of such thy sight surveys,
Thy tongue in triumph ne'er displays,
But hints, as spots that dim the sun,
Or rocks that future sails should shun.

'Twas thee whom once Stagyra's grove
Oft with her sage * allur'd to rove;
'Twas thee to whom in Tadmore's bowers,
Her statesman † vow'd his vacant hours;
'Twas thee whom, Tibur's vines among,
Her bard ‡ in careless measures sung;
'Twas thou who thence to Albion's plain
Remov'd, to teach her tuneful train,
When Dryden's age by thee inspir'd,
Condemn'd the sights his youth admir'd;
And Pope, intent on higher praise,
So polish'd all his pleasing lays:
And now, by thee, our favour'd coast
A Warton, Hurd, and Burke can boast;
Her bard † in careless measures sung;
Defended Shakspeare's injur'd page §.

Give me, bright power! with ready ear,
Another's plea for fame to hear,
And bid my willing voice allow
The bays to merit's modest brow:
And when the muse her presence deigns,
And prompts my own unstudied strains,
Instruct me them, with view severe,
To inspect, and keep from error clear;
Nor spare, though fancy'd e'er so fine,
One ill-plac'd thought, or useless line.

ODE XXIII.

TO DISEASE.

DISEASE! man's dread, relentless foe,
Fell source of fear, and pain, and woe:
O say, on what ill-fated coast,
They mourn thy tyrant reign the most?
On Java's bogs, or Gambia's sand,
Or Persia's sultry southern strand;
Or Egypt's annual-flooded plain,
Or Rome's neglected, waste domain;
Or where her walls Byzantium rears,
And mosques and turrets crescent-crown'd,

* Aristotle. † Longinus. ‡ Horace.
§ The ingenious Mrs. Montague, who has so ably vindicated Shakspeare from the cavils of Voltaire.

And from his high ferial the sultan hears
The wide Proponitis' beating waves resound *.
I'll ask no more—Our clime, though fair,
Enough thy tyrant reign must share ;
And lovers there, and friends, complain,
By thee their friends and lovers slain :
And yet our avarice and our pride
Combine to spread thy mischiefs wide ;
While that the captive wretch confines,
To hunger, cold, and filth resigns,—
And this the funeral pomp attends
To vaults, where mouldering corpes lie,—
Amid foul air thy form unseen ascends,
And like a vulture hovers in the sky †.

ODE XXIV.

THE TEMPESTUOUS EVENING.

THERE'S grandeur in this founding storm,
That drives the hurrying clouds along
That on each other seem to throng,
And mix in many a varied form ;
While, bursting now and then between,
The moon's dim misty orb is seen,
And casts faint glimpses on the green.

Beneath the blast the forests bend,
And thick the branchy ruin lies,
And wide the shower of foliage flies ;
The lake's black waves in tumult blend,
Revolving o'er and o'er and o'er,
And foaming on the rocky shore,
Whose caverns echo to their roar.

The sight sublime enrapt's my thought,
And swift along the past it strays,
And much of strange event surveys,
What history's faithful tongue has taught,
Or fancy form'd, whose plastic skill
The page with fabled change can fill
Of ill to good, or good to ill.

But can my soul the scene enjoy,
That rends another's breast with pain ?
O hapless he, who, near the main,
Now sees its billowy rage destroy !
Beholds the foundering bark descend,
Nor knows, but what its fate may end
The moments of his dearest friend !

ODE XXV.

THE MELANCHOLY EVENING.

O HASTE, ye hovering clouds away,
Ye clouds so fleecy, dim, and pale,
Through which the moon's obstructed ray
Sheds this sad whiteness o'er the vale !

* Byzantium: Constantinople; subject to frequent visitations of that dreadful fever, the plague.

† Alluding to the too frequent miserable situation of prisoners of war, debtors, &c.; and the absurd custom of burying in churches; circumstances contributing greatly to the propagation of disease.

Forbear, ye bells, that languid strain !
The sight, the sound, are fraught with pain ;
The words of dying friends I hear,
The open grave I linger near,
Take the last look, and drop the parting tear !

Before my view dire phantoms rise,
The plagues of hapless human-kind !
Pale fear, who unpurs'd still flies,
And starts, and turns, and looks behind ;
Remorse, whose own indignant aim
Deforms with useless wounds her frame ;
Despair, whose tongue no speech will deign,
Whose ghastly brow looks dark disdain,
And bends from steep rocks o'er the foaming
main.

And rage, whose bosom inly burns,
While reason's call he scorns to hear ;
And jealousy, who ruthless turns
From suppliant beauty's prayer and tear ;
Revenge, whose thoughts tumultuous roll
To seek the poniard or the bowl ;
And phrensy, wildly passing by,
With her chain'd arm and starting eye,
And voice that with loud curses rends the sky !

Ambition, here, to heights of power
His course with daring step pursues,
Though danger's frown against him lour,
Though guilt his path with blood bestrews ;
There avarice grasps his useless store,
Though mercy's plaints his aid implore,
Though he her ruin'd cottage nigh,
Beholds her famish'd infants lie,
And hears their faint, their last expiring cry !

Ye dreadful band ! O spare, O spare !
Alas, your ear no prayers persuade !
But, ah ! if man your reign must bear,
Sure man had better ne'er been made !
Say, will religion clear this gloom,
And point to bliss beyond the tomb ?
Yes, haply for her chosen train ;
The rest, they say, severe decrees ordain
To realms of endless night, and everlasting pain * !

ODE XXVI.

THE PLEASANT EVENING.

DELIGHTFUL looks this clear, calm sky,
With Cynthia's orb on high !
Delightful looks this smooth green ground,
With shadows cast from cots around ;
Quick-twinkling lustre decks the tide ;
And cheerful radiance gently falls
On that white town, and castle walls,
That crown the spacious river's further side.

And now along the echoing hills
The night-bird's strain melodious trills ;

* The author does not give these as his own sentiments, but merely such as the gloomy moment described might naturally suggest. That the above dreadful idea is adopted by a large body of Christians, is sufficient to authorize its admission into a poem, professing to paint the dark side of things.

And now the echoing dale along
Soft flows the shepherd's tuneful song:
And now, wide o'er the water borne,
'The city's mingled murmur swells,
And lively change of distant bells,
And varied warbling of the deep-ton'd horn.

Their influence calms the soften'd soul,
The passions feel their strong controul:
While fancy's eye, where'er it strays,
A scene of happiness surveys;
Through all the various walks of life
No natural ill nor moral fees,
No famine fell, nor dire disease,
Nor war's infernal unrelenting strife.

For these, behold a heavenly band
Their white wings waving o'er the land!
Sweet innocence, a cherub fair,
And peace and joy, a sister pair:
And kindness mild, their kindred grace,
Whose brow serene complacence wears,
Whose hand her liberal bounty bears
O'er the vast range of animated space!

Blest vision! O for ever stay!
O far be guilt and pain away!
And yet, perhaps, with him, whose view
Looks at one glance creation through,
To general good our partial ill
Seems but a sand upon the plain,
Seems but a drop amid the main,
And some wise unknown purpose may fulfil.

ODE XXVII.

AFTER READING AKENSIDE'S POEMS.

To fancy's view what visions rise,
Remote amid yon azure skies!
What goddess-form descends in air?
The Grecian muse, severely fair!
What sage is he, to whom the deigns
Her lyre of elevated strains?
The bard of Tyne—his master hand
Awakes new music o'er the land;
And much his voice of right and wrong
Attempts to teach the unheeding throng.

What mean those crystal rocks serene,
Those laureate groves for ever green,
Those Parian domes?—Sublime retreats,
Of freedom's sons the happy seats!—
There dwell the few who dar'd disdain
The lust of power and lust of gain;
The patriot names of old renown'd,
And those in later ages found;
The Athenian, Spartan, Roman boast,
The pride of Britain's sea-girt coast!

But, oh! what darkness intervenes!
But, oh! beneath, what different scenes!
What matron she, to grief resign'd,
Beside that ruin'd arch reclin'd?
Her sons, who once so well could wield,
The warrior-spear, the warrior shield,
A turban'd ruffian's scourge constrains
To toil on desolated plains!—

And she who leans that column nigh,
Where trampled arms and eagles lie;
Whose veil essays her blush to hide,
Who checks the tear that hastes to glide?
A mitred priest's oppressive sway
She sees her drooping race obey:
Their vines unprun'd, their fields untill'd,
Their streets with want and misery fill'd.

And who is she, the martial maid
Along that cliff so careless laid,
Whose brow such laugh unmeaning wears,
Whose eye such insolence declares,
Whose tongue descants, with scorn so vain,
On slaves of Ebro or of Seine?
What grisly Churl*, what harlot bold †,
Behind her, chains enormous hold?
Though virtue's warning voice be near,
Alas, she will not, will not hear!
And now she sinks in sleep profound,
And now they bind her to the ground.

O what is he, his ghastly form,
So half obscur'd in cloud and storm,
Swift striding on ‡—beneath his strides
Proud empire's firmest base subsides;
Behind him dreary wastes remain,
Oblivion's dark chaotic reign!

THE MEXICAN PROPHECY: AN ODE.

DE SOLIS, in his History of the Conquest of Mexico, informs us, that, on the approach of Cortez to the neighbourhood of that city, the Emperor Montezuma sent a number of magicians to attempt the destruction of the Spanish army. As the forcerers were practising their incantations, a demon appeared to them in the form of their idol Teatlēpuca, and foretold the fall of the Mexican empire. On this legend is founded the following poem. The conquest of Mexico was undertaken from motives of avarice, and accompanied with circumstances of cruelty; but it produced the subversion of a tyrannical government, and the abolition of a detestable religion of horrid rites and human sacrifices.

FROM Cholula's hostile plain*,
Left her treacherous legions slain,

* Cholula was a large city, not far distant from Mexico. The inhabitants were in league with the Mexi-

Left her temples all in flame,
Cortez' conquering army came.

cans; and after professing friendship for the Spaniards, endeavoured to surprise and destroy them.

High on Chalco's stormy steep
Shone their phalanx broad and deep;
High the Hispanian banner rais'd;
Bore the cross in gold emblaz'd *.
Thick the gleaming spears appear'd,
Loud the neighing steeds were heard;
Flash'd the muskets lightnings round,
Roll'd their thunders o'er the ground,
Echo'd from a thousand caves,
Down to Tenustitan's waves—†;
Spacious lake, that far below
Bade its lucid level flow:
There the ever-sunny shore—
Groves of palm and coco bore;
Maize-fields rich, savannas green,
Stretch'd a round, with towus between.
Tacubá, Tezeico fair,
Rear'd their shining roofs in air;
Mexico's imperial pride
Glitter'd 'midst the glassy tide,
Bright with gold, with silver bright,
Dazzling, charming all the sight ‡.
From their post the war-worn baud
Raptur'd view'd the happy land:
Haste to victory, haste to ease,
Mark the spot that gives us these!
On the exulting heroes strode,
Shunn'd the smooth insidious road,
Shunn'd the rock's impending shade,
Shunn'd the expecting ambuscade §.

Deep within a gloomy wood
Motezume's magicians stood:
Tlcatlepuca's horrid form,
God of famine, plague and storm,
High on magic stones they rais'd;
Magic fires before him blaz'd;
Round the lurid flames they drew,
Flames whence steams of sulphur flew;
There, while bleeding victims smok'd,
Thus his aid they loud invok'd:
Minister supreme of ill,
Prompt to punish, prompt to kill,
Motezuma asks thy aid!
Foreign foes his realms invade;
Vengeance on the strangers shed,
Mix them instant with the dead!
By thy temple's sable floor,
By thy altar stain'd with gore,
Stain'd with gore and strew'd with bones,
Echoing shrieks, and echoing groans!
Vengeance on the strangers shed,
Mix them instant with the dead!

* The device on Cortes's standard was the sign of the cross.—Vide De Solis.

† Tenustitan, otherwise Tenuchtitlan, the ancient name of the Lake of Mexico.

‡ The Spanish historians assert, that the walls and houses of the Indian cities were composed of a peculiar kind of glittering stone or plaster, which at a distance resembled silver.

§ The Indians had blocked up the usual road to Mexico, and opened another broader, and smooth at the entrance, but which led among rocks and precipices, where they had placed parties in ambush. Cortes discovered the stratagem, and ordered his troops to remove the obstructions. Being asked by the Mexican ambassadors the reason of this procedure, he replied, that the Spaniards always chuse to encounter difficulties.

Ordaz heard, Velasquez heard—
Swift their sauchions' blaze appear'd;
Alvarado rushing near,
Furious rais'd his glittering spear;
Calm, Olmedo mark'd the scene *,
Calm he mark'd, and stepp'd between:
Vain their rites and vain their prayer,
Weak attempts beneath your care;
Warriors! let the wretches live!
Christians! pity, and forgive!
Sudden darkness o'er them spread,
Glow'd the woods with dusky red;
Vast the idol's stature grew,
Look'd his face of ghastly hue,
Frowning rage, and frowning hate,
Angry at his nation's fate;
Fierce his fiery eyes he roll'd,
Thus his tongue the future told;
Cortes' veterans paus'd to hear,
Wondering all, though void of fear;
Mourn, devoted city, mourn!
Mourn, devoted city, mourn!
Doom'd for all thy crimes to know
Scenes of battle, scenes of woe!
Who is he—O spare the sight!—
Rob'd in gold, with jewels bright?
Hark! he deigns the crowd to call;
Chiefs and warriors prostrate fall †.
Reverence now to fury yields;
Strangers o'er him spread your shields!
Thick the darts, the arrows, fly;
Hapless monarch! he must die!
Mark the solemn funeral state,
Passing through the western gate!
Chapulteacas cave contains Mighty Motezume's remains.
Cease the strife! alas, 'tis vain!
Myriads throng Otumba's plain;
Wide their feathery crests they wave,
All the strong and all the brave ‡.
Gleaming glory through the skies,
See the imperial standard flies!
Down by force resiftless torn;
Off in haughty triumph borne.
Slaughter heaps the vale with dead,
Fugitives the mountains spread.
Mexico, 'tis thine to know
More of battle, more of woe!—
Bright in arms the stranger train
O'er thy causeways move again.

* Bartholeme de Olmedo, chaplain to Cortes: he seems to have been a man of enlarged ideas, much prudence, moderation, and humanity.

† Motezuma, who was resident in the Spanish quarters when they were attacked by the Mexicans, proposed showing himself to the people, in order to appease the tumult. At his first appearance he was regarded with veneration, which was soon exchanged for rage, to the effects whereof he fell a victim.

‡ Cortes, in his retreat from Mexico, after the death of Motezuma, was followed and surrounded by the whole collective force of the empire, in the plains of Otumba. After repelling the attacks of his enemies on every side, with ind fatigable valour, he found himself overpowered by numbers; when, making one desperate effort, with a few select friends, he seized the imperial standard, killed the general, and routed the army.

' Bend the bow, the shaft prepare,
 ' Join the breastplate's folds with care;
 ' Raise the sacrificial fire,
 ' Bid the captive youths expire *;
 ' Wake the sacred trumpets' breath,
 ' Pouring anguish, pouring death †;
 ' Troops from every street repair,
 ' Close them in the fatal snare;
 ' Valiant as they are, they fly,
 ' Here they yield, and there they die.
 ' Cease the strife! 'tis fruitless all,
 ' Mexico at last must fall!
 ' Lo! the dauntless band return,
 ' Furious for the fight they burn!
 ' Lo! auxiliar nations round,
 ' Crowding o'er the darken'd ground!
 ' Corfes fill thy trenches deep;
 ' Down thy temple's lofty steep
 ' See thy priests, thy princes thrown—
 ' Hark! I hear their parting groan!
 ' Blood thy lake with crimson dyes,
 ' Flames from all thy domes arise!
 ' What are those that round thy shore
 ' Launch thy troubled water's o'er?
 ' Swift canoes that from the fight
 ' Aid their vanquish'd monarch's flight;

* De Solis relates, that the Mexicans sacrificed to their idols a number of Spaniards, whom they had taken prisoners, and whose cries and groans were distinctly heard in the Spanish camp, exciting sentiments of horror and revenge in their surviving companions.

† The above author observes, that the sacred trumpet of the Mexicans was so called, because it was not permitted to any but the priests to sound it; and that only when they denounced war, and animated the people on the part of their gods.

' Ambush'd in the reedy shade,
 ' Them the stranger barks invade;
 ' Soon thy lord a captive bends,
 ' Soon thy far-fam'd empire ends *;
 ' Otomèca shares thy spoils,
 ' Tlāscalā in triumph smiles †.
 ' Mourn, devoted city, mourn!
 ' Mourn, devoted city, mourn!
 ' Cease your boast, O stranger band,
 ' Conquerors of my fallen land!
 ' Avarice strides your van before,
 ' Phantom meagre, pale, and hoar!
 ' Discord follows, breathing flame,
 ' Still opposing claim to claim ‡;
 ' Kindred demons haste along!
 ' Haste, avenge my country's wrong!
 ' Ceas'd the voice with dreadful sounds,
 ' Loud as tides that burst their bounds;
 ' Roll'd the form in smoke away,
 ' Amaz'd on earth the exorcists lay;
 ' Pondering on the dreadful lore,
 ' Their course the Iberians downward bore;
 ' Their helmets glittering o'er the vale,
 ' And wide their ensigns fluttering in the gale.

* When the Spaniards had forced their way to the centre of Mexico, Guatimozin, the reigning emperor, endeavoured to escape in his canoes across the lake; but was pursued and taken prisoner by Garcia de Holguin, captain of one of the Spanish brigantines.

† The Otomies were a fierce, savage nation, never thoroughly subdued by the Mexicans. Tlāscalā was a powerful neighbouring republic, the rival of Mexico.

‡ Alluding to the dissensions which ensued among the Spaniards, after the conquest of America.

THE GARDEN.

To a Friend.

FROM Whitby's rocks steep rising o'er the main,
 From Esk's vales, or Ewecot's lonely plain,
 Say rove thy thoughts to Amwell's distant bow'rs,
 To mark how pass thy friends sequester'd hours?

' Perhaps, think'st thou, ' he seeks his pleasing ' scenes
 ' Of winding walks, smooth lawns, and shady
 ' greens:
 ' Where China's willow hangs its foliage fair,
 ' And Po's tall poplar waves its top in air,
 ' And the dark maple spreads its umbrage wide,
 ' And the white bench adorns the basin side;
 ' At morn reclin'd, perhaps, he sits to view
 ' The bank's neat slope, the water's silver hue.

' Where, 'midst thick oaks, the subterraneous way
 ' To the arch'd grot admits a feeble ray;
 ' Where glossy pebbles pave the varied floors,
 ' And rough flint-walls are deck'd with shells and
 ' ores,
 ' And silvery pearls, spread o'er the roofs on high,
 ' Glimmer like faint stars in a twilight sky;
 ' From noon's fierce glare, perhaps, he pleas'd re-
 ' tires,
 ' Indulging musings which the place inspires.
 ' Now where the airy octagon ascends,
 ' And wide the prospect o'er the vale extends,
 ' 'Midst evening's calm, intent perhaps he stands,
 ' And looks o'er all that length of sun-gilt lands,
 ' Of bright green pastures, stretch'd by rivers clear,
 ' And willow groves, or other islands near.
 ' Alas, my friend, how strangely men mistake,
 ' Who guess what others most their pleasure make!
 ' These garden scenes, which fashion o'er our plains
 ' Spreads round the villas of our wealthy swains,

Though envy grudge, or friendship wish to share,
They claim but little of their owners' care.

For me, my groves not oft my steps invite,
And far less oft they fail to offend my sight:
In vain the fenna waves its glossy gold,
In vain the cistus' spotted flowers unfold,
In vain the acacia's snowy bloom depends,
In vain the fumuch's scarlet spike ascends,
In vain the woodbine's spicy tufts disclose,
And green slopes reddened with the shedding rose:
These neat-shorn hawthorns uselefs verdant bound,
This long straight walk, that pools unmeaning round,

These short-curv'd paths that twist beneath the trees,

Disgust the eye, and make the whole displeas'd.

' No scene like this,' I say, ' did nature raise,
' Brown's fancy form, or Walpole's * judgment
' praise;

' No prototype for this did I survey

' In Woollett's landscapes †, or in Mason's lay.'

But might thy genius, friend, an Eden frame,
Profuse of beauty, and secure from blame;
Where round the lawn might wind the varied way,

Now lost in gloom, and now with prospect gay;
Now screen'd with clumps of green, for wint'ry bow'rs;

Now edg'd with sunny banks, for summer flow'rs;

Now led by crystal lakes with lilies dress'd.

Or where light temples court the step to rest—

Times gradual change, or tempest's sudden rage,

There with thy peace perpetual war would wage.

That tyrant oak, whose arms so far o'ergrow,

Shades some poor shrub that pines with drought

below;

These rampant elms, those hazels branching wide,

Crowd the broad pine, the spiry larix hide.

That lilac brow, where May's unsparring hand

Bade one vast swell of purple bloom expand,

Soon past its prime, shows signs of quick decay,

The naked stem, and scanty-cover'd spray.

Fierce Boreas calls, and ruin waits his call;

Thy fair catalpa's broken branches fall;

Thy soft magnolia mourns her blasted green,

And blighted laurel's yellowing leaves are seen.

But discontent alone, thou' t say, complains

For ill success, where none perfection gains:

True is the charge; but from that tyrant's sway

What art, what power, can e'er redeem our day?

To me, indeed, short ease he sometimes yields,

When my lone walk furrounds the rural fields;

There no past errors of my own upbraid,

No time, no wealth, expended unrepaid:

There nature dwells, and throws profuse around

Each pastoral sight and every pastoral sound;

From spring's green copse, that pours the cuckoo's

strain,

And evening bleatings of the fleecy train,

To autumn's yellow field and clamorous horn *

That wakes the slumbering harvesters at morn.

There fancy too, with fond delighted eyes,

Sees o'er the scene ideal people rise;

There calm contentment, in his cot reclin'd,

Hears the gray poplars whisper in the wind;

There love's sweet song adown the echoing dale

To beauty's ear conveys the tender tale;

And there devotion lifts his brow to heaven,

With grateful thanks for many a blessing given.

Thus oft through Maylan's shady lane I stray,

Trace Rushgreen's paths, or Postwood's winding

way;

Thus oft to Eastfield's airy height I haste;

(All well-known spots thy feet have frequent trac'd!)

While memory, as my sight around I cast,

Suggests the pleasing thought of moments past;

Or hope, amid the future, forms again

The dream of bliss experience broke in vain.

EPISTLE II.

WINTER AMUSEMENTS IN THE COUNTRY.

To a Friend in London.

WHILE thee my friend, the city's scenes detain,—
The cheerful scenes where trade and pleasure
reign;

Where glittering shops their varied stores display,

And passing thousands crowd the public way;

Where paintings forms and music's sounds delight,

And fashions frequent novelties invite,

And conversations sober social hours

Engage the mind, and elevate its powers—

Far different scenes for us the country yields,

Deserted roads and unfrequented fields:

Yet deem not, lonely as they are, that these

Boast nought to charm the eye, the ear to please.

Though here the tyrant winter holds command,

And bids rude tempests desolate the land;

Sometimes the sun extends his cheering beam,

And all the landscape casts a golden gleam:

Clear is the sky, and calm and soft the air,

And through thin mist each object looks more

fair.

Then, where the villa rears its sheltering grove,

Along the southern lawn 'tis sweet to rove:

There dark green pines, behind, their boughs extend,

And bright spruce firs like pyramids ascend,

And round their tops, in many a pendant row,

Their scaly cones of shining auburn shew;

There the broad cedar's level branches spread,

And the tall cypress lifts its spiry head;

* See Mr. Walpole's ingenious History of Modern Taste in Gardening, at the end of the fourth volume of his Anecdotes of Painting.

† The above-named excellent artist, several years ago, drew and engraved a number of beautiful views in some of our most celebrated modern gardens.

* There is a custom, frequent in many parts of England, of calling the barrow-men to and from work by the sound of a horn. This practice, as well as that of the barrow-singing, seems much on the decline. The latter could boast its origin from high antiquity, as appears from that beautiful stroke of Eastern poetry, Ishab, chap. xvi. "I will water thee with my tears "O Hebbon and Elkah; for the shouting for thy summer fruits, and for thy barrow, is fallen!"

With alaternus ilex interweaves,
And laurels mix their glossy oval leaves;
And gilded holly crimson fruit displays,
And white viburnum * o'er the border strays.

Where these from storms the spacious green-house screen,

Ev'n now the eye beholds a flow'ry scene;
There crystal fashes ward the injurious
And rows of benches fair exotics hold;
Rich plants, that Afric's funny cape supplies,
Or o'er the isles of either India rise.

While strip'd geranium shows its tufts of red,
And verdant myrtles grateful fragrance shed;
A moment stay to mark the vivid bloom,
A moment stay to catch the high perfume,
And then to rural scenes—Yon path, that leads Down the steep burn and 'cross the level meads,
Soon mounts the opponent hill, and soon conveys
To where the farm its pleasing group displays:
The rustic mansion's form, antequely fair;
The yew-hedg'd garden, with its grass-plat square;
The barns long ridge, and doors expanded wide:
The stable's straw-clad eves and clay-built side;
The cartshed's roof, of rough-hewn round wood made,

And loofe on heads of old fere pollards laid;
The granary's floor that smooth-wrought posts sustain,

Where hungry vermin strive to climb in vain;
And many an ash that wild around them grows,
And many an elm that shelter o'er them throws.

Then round the moat we turn, with pales in-clos'd,

And 'midst the orchard's trees in rows dispos'd,
Whose boughs thick tufts of mistletoe adorn
With fruit of lucid white on joints of yellow borne.

Thence up the lane, romantic woods among,
Beneath old oaks with ivy overhung
(O'er their rough trunks the hairy stalks intwine,
And on their arms the fable berries shine):
Here oft the fight, on banks bestrewn with leaves,
The early primrose's opening bud perceives;
And oft steep dells or ragged cliffs unfold
The prickly furze with bloom of brightest gold;
Here oft the redbreast hops along the way,
And 'midst grey mo's explores his insect prey;
Or the green woodpigeon † flies with outcry shrill,
And delves the fere bough with his sounding bill;
Or the rous'd hare starts rustling from the brake,
And gaudy jays incessant clamour make;
Or echoing hills return from stubbles nigh
The sportman's gun, and spaniel's yelping cry.

And now the covert ends in open ground,
That spreads wide views beneath us all around;
There turbid waters, edg'd with yellow reeds,
Roll through the russet herd-forfaken meads;
There from the meads th' enclosures sloping rise,
And 'midst th' enclosures, dusky woodland lies;
While pointed spires and curling smokes, between,
Mark towns and vills and cottages unseen.
And now, for now the breeze and noontide ray
Clear the last remnants of the mist away,—

* That well-known beautiful flowering evergreen, commonly called Laurustinus.

† Th: Green Woodpecker.—Vide Pennant's Brittish Zoology, folio, p. 78.

Far, far o'er all extends the aching eye,
Where azure mountains mingle with the sky:
To these the curious optic tube apply'd
Reveals each object distance else would hide;
Their seats or homesteads, plac'd in pleasant shades,
Show their white walls and windows through the glades;

There rears the hamlet church its hoary tow'r
(The clock's bright index points the passing hour);
There green-robd' huntmen o'er the funny lawn
Lead home their beagles from the chase withdrawn, [paign,
And ploughs slow moving turn the broad cham-
And on steep summits feed the fleecy train.

But wintry months few days like these supply,
And their few moments far too swiftly fly:
Dank thaws, chill fogs, rough winds, and beating rain,

To sheltering rooms th' unwilling step detain;
Yet there, my friend, shall liberal science find
Amusement various for th' inquiring mind.

While history's hand her sanguine record brings,
With woes of nations fraught, and crimes of kings;
Plague thins the street, and famine blasts the plain,
War wields his sword, oppression binds his chain;
Curiosity pursues the unfolding tale,
Which reason blames, and pity's tears bewail.

While fancy's powers the eventful novel frame,
And virtues care directs its constant aim;
As fiction's pen domestic life portrays,
Its hopes, and fears, and joys, and griefs displays;
By Grandison's or Clinton's * story mov'd,
We read delighted, and we rise improv'd.

Then with bold voyagers our thought explores
Vast tracks of ocean and untrodden shores;
Now views rude climes, where ice-rocks drear aspire,

Or red volcanoes shoot their streams of fire:
Now seeks sweet isles, where lofty palm-groves
wave,

And many banks translucent rivers lave;
Where plenty's gifts luxuriant load the soil,
And ease repose, charm'd with beauty's smile.
Such, hapless Cook †! amid the southern main,
Rose thy Ta-heite's peaks and flowery plain;
Why, daring wanderer! quit that blissful land,
To seek new dangers on a barbarous strand?
Why doom'd, so long escap'd from storms and foes,
Upon that strand thy dying eyes to close;
Remote each place by habit render'd dear,
Nor British friends nor Otaheitean near?

Nor less than books the engraver's works invite,
Where past and distant come before the sight;
Where, all the painter's lively tints convey'd,
The skilful copyist gives in light and shade:
While faithful views the prospect's charms display,
From coast to coast, and town to town, we stray;
While faithful portraits human features trace,
We gaze delighted on the speaking face;
Survey the port that bards and heroes bore,
Or mark the smiles that high-born beauties wore.

* Vide the Fool of Quality, a well-known novel by Mr Henry Brooke, author of Gustavus Vasa, &c.

† This celebrated circumnavigator, after surmounting numerous difficulties, and escaping many dangers, was at length slain by the inhabitants of Owybee, a little island in the Pacific Ocean.

Cease these to please? philosophy attends
With arts where knowledge with diversion blends;
The sun's vast system in a model shows;
Bids the clear lens new forms to fight expose;
Constructs machines, whose wond'rous powers declare

The effects of light, and properties of air;
With whirling globes excites electric fires,
And all their force and all their use inquires.
O nature! how immense thy secret store,
Beyond what ev'n a Priestley can explore!

Such, friend, the employments may his time divide,
Whom rural shades from scenes of business hide;
While o'er his ear unnotic'd glide away
The noise and nonsense of the passing day *

* A short epistle, partly on the same plan as the foregoing was, some years ago, inadvertently suffered to appear in a collection of poems, by several hands, published by G. Pearce.—Such lines of that piece as were thought worth preservation, are here retained.

AN ESSAY ON PAINTING.

TO A YOUNG ARTIST.

The author had conceived a design of writing a pretty extensive poem on the subject of painting, long before Mr. Hayley's ingenious "Poetic Epistle to an eminent painter" appeared. That performance anticipated and precluded part of his intended work, but seemed not to render the suppression of the following lines necessary.

FROM funny Adria's sea-surrounded towers,
From Tyber's vales and Arno's viny bowers,
The muse of painting seeks Britannia's plain,
And leads to Thames's bank her favourite train:
There, where a nation's wealth her dome has plac'd,
With her kind sister's * Attic beauties grac'd,
She, like the spring, as liberal and as gay,
Bids her rich hand its annual stores display;
And mimic being glowing round the walls,
From scene to scene the rapt attention calls.
There, where the public gives the palm of praise,
And only merit to renown can raise,
Doubtless, my friend, the just ambition's thine
To see thy future works distinguish'd shine.
Hear then thy poet's monitory lay,
That hints not useless may perchance convey:
No artist I, like him of Gallia's shore †,
Whose pencil practis'd, ere he taught his lore;
Yet taste incites nie others' works to view,
And risk a judgment hereby not untrue

Were painting's path my pleasing road to fame,
The choice of subject much my care should claim;
His graphic power he sure but ill bestows,
Who best a trifle's nice resemblance shows.
Though the rich tints so finely blended fall,
When carps and pheasants deck the rural hall,
That oft, like Zeuxis' grapes, they scarcely fail,
To tempt to touch the feather or the scale,—
Yet not ev'n Elmer's ‡ skill can make us prize
What every field or every pond supplies;

* Architecture.

‡ The author must here once for all remark, that whatever he may say respecting the works of any painter, is solely the result of impartial, though possibly mistaken opinion. He cannot be misled by friendship; for, excepting a slight acquaintance with those amiable characters, Mr. West and Mrs. Kauffman, he has not the pleasure of knowing any artist whose name he has taken the liberty to mention.

Regret gives pain to view such wonderous art
Tried on no theme that interests the heart.

The pride of genius should thy hand restrain
From all that life's inferior ranks contain *;
Thy conscious pallet ne'er its hues should spare
To draw a sportsman's hound or racer's mare;
Nor thy reluctant crayon stoop to trace
A fool's dull eye or villain's ill-mark'd face.
But deem not portrait's gifts I mean to slight,— Portrait, the source of many a pure delight!
When bards' or fages works our wishes fire
To see their forms whose minds we there admire,
The feat'rd canvas full to view displays
Reason's deep calm or fancy's glowing rays.
When beauty's charms their varied graces wear,
Love's gentle smile, or mirth's vivacious air,
The pleasing image strikes remotest climes,
And goes unalter'd down to distant times.
When death's relentless hand in dust has laid
The school-companion, or the first-lov'd maid;
The father kind, with filial awe rever'd;
The tender mother by her cares endear'd;
When from our arms the darling child is torn,
Or when the husband or the wife we mourn—
As on their picture many a glance we cast,
Remembrance wanders to the vanish'd past;
Our thoughts o'er numberless minutæ roll,
And pain-mix'd pleasure solaces the soul.
To portrait's study should thy choice incline,
Ev'n there to aim at excellence be thine;
And strive to reach the point that few can gain,
Preserve the likeness, yet the sp'rit retain.

Of landscape's province wide extends the range,
From the deep vale, and humble rural grange,
To Cambrian heaths sublimely brown and bare †,
Or Alpine ice-points glittering white in air:

* This is meant only of such objects, when considered as the principal subject of a picture. Almost every class of animals may be occasionally introduced as ornaments in landscape, and often in history.

† That celebrated artist, Mr. Wilson, has painted a set of beautiful views from nature, in different parts of Wales.

And not from nature only she designs,
But diff'rent parts of diff'rent scenes combines;
Or new creations of her own the forms,
Illumes with sunshine, or involves in storms *.

Familiar prospects would thy hand bestow?
Mark what our hay-fields and our hop-grounds
flow;

Where in neat rows the ruffet-cocks are seen,
Or from tall poles depend festoons of green;
And long straight paths in perspective extend,
And yellow sandhills close behind ascend †.
Nor sweeter contrast sure can meet the eye,
Than village lanes in vernal months supply,
When amber clouds, in sky of soft bright blue,
Hang o'er the copse just crown'd with verdure
new;

Or where the orchard's sun-gilt branches spread
Their bloom of white or faintly-blushing red.
The fairest scenes, when peopled, look more fair,
But these to people asks peculiar care:
We wish not here for Virgil's classic swains,
Nor dryad nymphs light tripping o'er the plains;
Nor yet the grinning hobbinols of Gay,
Nor cottage Marians in their torn array:
The rustic life in ev'ry varied place,
Can boast its few of beauty and of grace;
From them select the forms that most may please,
And clothe with simple elegance and ease:
Such forms in Smith's † delightful spots we prize,
And such in Sandby's pleasant fields arise.

Th' observant artist much from travel gains;
Increase of knowledge well rewards his pains.
Now his pleas'd eye o'er Tuscan prospects roves,
Their funny corn-fields and their cypress groves;
Their roads, where sports from tree to tree the vine,
And through broad leaves its crystal clusters
shine †;

Their white Cafines, with olive groves around;
And glitt'ring cliffs with towns and castles crown'd.
Now his pleas'd step a wider circuit tries,
Where Nile's vast flood on Egypt's level lies;
While 'midst the tide tall palms their tops appear,
And caufeways broad, and cities fair appear §.
Now Indian climes he east or west explores,
Quits the dull fact'ry and the sandy shores ¶,
Climbs craggy hills, pervades romantic woods,
Or winds along the cataracts of the floods;
Through beasts, and birds, and insects, fruits and flow'rs,

In shape and colour all distinct from ours;
Or strays o'er isles that spicy vales unfold,
'Midst skies of glory and 'midst seas of gold;

* These circumstances, termed by the painters accidents of nature, often agreeably diversify landscape.

† For this imagery the author is indebted to Mr. Walpole, who, in his Anecdotes of Painting, vol. iv. p. 65, proposes our hay-fields and hop-grounds as new subjects of landscape.

‡ The late Mr. George Smith of Chichester. § The bedgerow trees in Tuscany are covered with vines.—Vide Smollet's Travels, vol. ii. p. 46.

¶ Vide Rollin's Ancient History, 18mo. vol. i. p. 22.

¶ Several of our artists have attended to this circumstance of foreign scenery. The ingenious Mr. George Robertson has painted several fine romantic views in Jamaica, which have been engraved.

Such skies, such seas, as Hodge's pencil drew,
And round the rocks of Ulitea threw.*

Whate'er we copy, or whate'er we feign,
Through all the piece one character should reign:
When Claude's bright morn on Mola's precincts dawns, [lawns!

What sweet quietness marks the groves and
How calm his herds among the ruins gaze!
How calm his curious peasant stands to gaze †!
When bold Salvator under turbid skies
Bids his scath'd hills and blasted trees arise,
Behind wild rocks bids his wild stream be lost,
And from vast cliffs shows broken fragments tost;
'Midst them no shepherds lead their flocks along,
Nor village maidens seem to tunc their song;
But solemn augurs flights of birds survey,
Or Aern-ey'd robbers wait the passing prey ‡.
In Rubens' forest, when the wounded boar,
Plung'd in the stream, attempts the further shore,
How the fierce dogs retard his awkward speed!
How the fierce hunters urge the straining steed!
And eager one the winged arrow sends,
And one firm fix'd th' expectant spear pretends ‖.

To hist'ry's group, where passion'd thought express'd,
Strikes kindred feelings on the gazer's breast,—
To hist'ry's group, the epic of thy art,
Proceed we now, and what we can, impart.

The mighty masters of Italian namé,
All Rome, all Florence, and Bologna claim;
Whose fresco forms still animate their walls,
Whose living canvass decks their domes and halls:
What various powers for these their glory won,
And what of theirs to choofe, and what to shun,
Illustrious Reynolds much in prose has told,
And more my verse pretends not to unfold.
These still thy study but with caution make,
Nor prize the picture for the painter's sake;
Raffaello himself, beneath himself oft fell,
And meaner hands' best works his worst excel §.

'Tis general nature, in thy art and mine,
Must give our fame in future times to shine:
Sublime and pathos, like the sun's fix'd flame,
Remain, and please through ev'ry age the same;
Humour's light shapes, like vapours in the sky,
Rise, pass, and vary, and for ever fly:

* Several beautiful landscapes, taken in different parts of the new discovered islands, by Mr. Hodges, who attended Captain Cook in one of his voyages, must be well remembered by those who attend the annual exhibitions of the Royal Academy.

† Vide a beautiful engraving, by Vivarez, from a capital picture of Claude Lorrain, called the Morning, in which he introduces himself drawing an antique temple on the banks of the Tyber, between Ponte Mola and Rome.

‡ Vide Salvator Rosa's landscapes, engraved by Goupy. See also Sir Joshua Reynolds's Discourses, p. 175.

‖ Vide Rubens's landscape of boar-hunting, engraved by Boffuvert.

§ For this assertion the author has the highest authority, viz. that of Sir Joshua Reynolds. "I have no desire," says he, "to degrade Raffaele from the high rank he deservedly holds; but, in comparing him with himself, he does not appear to me to be the same man in oil as in fresco."—Discourses, p. 165.

Hogarth and Swift, if living, might deplore
Half their keen jokes, that now are jokes no
more.

What truth's rich page of real event supplies,
What fancy's pow'r of fabled act devise,
Before thee lie—but where the field so wide,
There judgment's hand selection's step must guide.

To horror's form the mind aversion feels,
To Spaniolet's * flea'd faints and tort'ring wheels;
Nor praise for nauseous images we win,
For Spenser's error, or for Milton's sin.

Mythology, that Greek enchants, long
Has reign'd the idol of the painting throng:
But reason's thought disdains Ovidian dreams
Aburd, of nymphs transform'd to trees and streams;

And virtue Homer's wanton gods abhors,
With all their lewd amours and all their idle wars.

The battle's conflicts ample scope bestow,
Th' effects of fury, fear, and pain to show;
As diff'rent features these unlike express,
The contrast's force affects us more or less.
But here confusion holds his crowded reign,
And the tir'd eye attempts to rest in vain;
And o'er the scene humanity complains,
Where mangled corpes lie, and blood the land dittains.

When in the fore-ground kings or gen' rals stand,
Direct th' attack, or head the charging band,
Their graceful forms we unconcern'd survey,
Who fight for conquest, or who fight for pay:
Nor in their postures can there much be prais'd,
Their pistols levell'd, or their fauchions rais'd;
And to dull fameness here so oft we fall,
That who beholds one piece, beholds them all.

But war's dire field, not all confin'd to these,
Affords us often incidents that please:
For oft th' historian's, oft the poet's art,
Can win our wishes on some hero's part;
His country nam'd, his place and parents known,
Our hufy thought his perils makes its own.
To fierce Pelides, 'midst Scamander's waves,
When young Lycaon's voice for pity craves †;
The chief's stern brow, and lance suspended high,
The youth's bent knee and deprecating eye,
Not West's rich pencil need disdain to trace,
Or Romney's stroke with glowing colours grace.
When Dithyrambus, on Oeta's plain,
Mourns the brave Persian whom his hand has slain,

* Spaniolet, Gioseppe Ribera, a native of Valencia in Spain. He was noted for painting horrid subjects; such as Prometheus with the Vulture, feeding on his liver; Ixion tortured on the wheel; and St. Bartholomew with the skin flayed from his body.—Vide Dryden's Translation of Frenoy, p. 352.

† Vide the Iliad, book xxi.—This story of Lycaon is perhaps, one of the most affecting passages in the whole poem. Vide Pope's Note, vol. v. p. 208. of his translation. The countenance of Achilles, at the moment when the death of Patroclus, occurring to his thought, determined him to kill Lycaon, would afford a fine expression:

“Talk not of life or ransom, he replies;
“Patroclus dead, whoever meets me dies.”

Nor marks his danger from th' approaching foe,
Nor his bold friend prepar'd to ward the blow;
In one what grief, in one what vengeful rage,
In one what ardour might the fight engage * †

The gentle Kauffman's traits can best declare
The sentimental feelings of the fair,
When soft Erininia in the sylvan shade
Leaves Tancred's name on ev'ry tree display'd † †;
Or kind Louisa pens the friendly scroll,
To sooth the mournful sister of her soul †.
The same skill'd hand more strong expression tries,

At Edward's feet when Woodville's daughter lies † †;

Or, 'midst th' admiring weeping train around,
Fond Eleanora sucks the poison'd wound §.
Delightful artist!—Grace her pencil guides,
And delicacy o'er its stroke presides!
Th' immortal swans, appointed to redeem
Genius and worth from Lethe's silent stream,
Pleas'd with their charge shall bear her medall'd name

To the fair priestesses of the fane of fame ¶.
Now from the page of Richardson bestow
On Clementina's face the lines of woe;
Or let sweet Harriet's livelier beauty wear
The soul-fraught eye and apprehensive air;
Or draw the proud Olivia's rage-flush'd charms,
When the calm hero seiz'd her deadly arms;
And paint that hero, firm in trial prov'd,
Unaw'd by danger, and by vice unmov'd **.

Such tender subjects, if thy choice they gain,
Enough for thee as yet untouch'd remain.

“Who, while his gallant enemy expir'd,
“While Hyperanthes tenderly receiv'd
“The last embraces of his gasping friend,

“And in the pride of victory repin'd.
“Unmark'd his foe approach'd. But forward

 The history of Sir Charles Grandison, vol. iv. p. 176. The interview between Grandison and Olivia, at the instant of his seizing her poniard, would make a noble picture. This work of Richardson's abounds with fine situations. Brookes's Fool of Quality, and the Adventurer of Hawkesworth, are also books worthy the perusal of an artist who wishes for choice of interesting incidents.

To Sterne's soft Maniac let thy hand impart
The languid cheek, the look that pierc'd his heart,

When to her virgin faint the vesper song she rais'd,
Or earnest view'd him as he sat and gaz'd *.
Mark, if thou canst, philanthropy divine,
That swells the breast and bids the features shine,
When the tear glist'ning starts from Toby's eyes
Fix'd on the couch where poor Le Fevre dies.

The Grecian classics' venerable lore
I see thee often diligent explore;
What Homer's muse to Chian cities taught,
Or pity's priest † to Athens' audience brought.
Methinks, now rising from thy plastic hand,
Troy's hoary monarch shall a suppliant stand;
To stern Achilles all his griefs explain,
And ask his Hector's corse, nor ask in vain †.
Now Jove's kind son to Thebes's forr'wing king
Shall his restor'd unknown Alcestis bring;
Admetus' eyes his anguish'd thoughts declare,
And turn disgusted from the proffer'd fair ‖.

The dark sublime of extra-natural scenes
The vulgar magic's puerile rite demans;
Where hags their cauldrons fraught with toads prepare,

Or glide on broomsticks through the midnight air.
Chain'd on the rock let bold Prometheus lie,
And cast wild looks, upbraiding, to the sky §;
Bid Milton's Satan from the burning steep
Call his wide legions, slumb'ring on the deep;
Or Camoens' spirit of the Cape upraise,
And show him only by the lightning's blaze;
Or place sad Hoster's ghost amid the tide,
Where by the pale moon anchor'd navies ride ¶.

O where is he, whose thought such grandeur gave

To bold Fitzwalter and the barons brave,
When, rang'd in arms along their Thames's
strand,

They snatch'd their charter from a tyrant's hand **?

* This subject has been attempted by several ingenious artists, who have given very pleasing figures; but, perhaps, none that convey the precise idea of Sterne. This author being mentioned, a trite observation must be indulg'd, viz. That there probably never was a more striking instance of misapplication of talents than in him. With superior powers for the pathos, he chose to descend to ribaldry, that affronted the taste and corrupted the morals of the public. What pity that the gold had not been separated from the dross, and the latter consigned to that oblivion it so richly merits.

 Vide the late Mr. Mortimer's picture of King John delivering Magna Charta to the Barons. That ingenious artist's obvious powers of imagination promised the attainment of a high degree of excellence in his profession.

Through all the scenes his rapid stroke bestow'd,
Rosa's wild grace and daring spirit glow'd;
In him—ah lost ere half his pow'rs were shown!—
Britain, perhaps, an Angelo had known!

Wouldst thou his honours emulous pursue,
And give the patriot energy to view,—
Deep in the gloom of Dalecarlia's mine,
Bid freedom's flame in Vasa's visage shine *;
The pass of fam'd Thermopylae display,
And Sparta's monarch's port august portray †.

For pontiffs and for kings, the painter's skill
From sacred story toils their walls to fill;
Where'er we turn, its subjects strike the eye,
And few untry'd are left for us to try.
Yet who has Jephthah's matchless woe express'd,
By his lov'd daughter's sudden sight distress'd;
Or shown the patriarchs, struck with wild amazement,
As on the victor's hidden cup they gaze ‡?
Or who, when Israel's hosts on Edom's plain
Despairing lie,—a thirst-afflicted train!—
Has bade the prophet and his minstrel stand,
And call new waters o'er the burning sand ‖?
When David's chiefs, with gen'rous thought in-spir'd,

Bring the clear wave his sick'ning soul desir'd;
What dignity might to his act be giv'n,
The pure libation pouring out to Heav'n §!

No more of theme; design must now succeed—
The mind's strong picture when we hear or read ¶.
Where ev'ry person finds his proper place,
And turn of attitude and turn of face:
The artist's pow'rs in this must greatly fail,
Whose figures point not out at once his tale **.

† Vide Leonidas, book x. where the hero of the poem repeats to the assembled council the message of Argestes; while Alpheus, at the same instant, brings news of the Persians having passed the Upper Strait. This would make a noble picture; the dauntless appearance of the Greeks might be well contrasted with the fear and shame of the ambassador of Xerxes—The Banquet of Melissa, Priests of the Muses, where Leonidas and Æschylus are supposed present, book vii. is another fine subject. Such pictures would hardly be popular; but to some minds they would afford singular pleasure.

‡ The author does not recollect seeing or bearing of any celebrated picture on those interesting subjects, of Jephthah's return, and the discovery of Joseph's cup in the sack of Benjamin.

§ Vide 2 Kings, chap. iii.—This subject would afford a variety of noble expression in the different characters of the kings, the pious confidence of Jephthah, and the desponding anxiety of Jeoram, the distress of the soldiers, and the enthusiasm of Eliza. The streams of water might appear in the distance, seemingly visible only to the Prophet, from his situation.

tween,

In distant view discriminates the scene †.

As in the drama all events should tend
In course unbroken to the purpos'd end;
So must the picture's bus'ness still maintain
The same connective unity of train.

When Copley's youth, swift-struggling through the wave,

The anxious boatmen strain each nerve to save;
As strives the rav'nous shark to reach his prey,
One lifts the jav'lin to arrest his way;
And now, as near his dreadful jaws expand,
And casts the cord, and one extends the hand:
What care, what pity, mark their eager eyes!
What hopes, what terrors in our bosoms rise ‡!

The skilful painter, at whose option lie
Positions various, fails not all to try;
And those prefers, where ev'ry part the best
Accordance keeps, illustrating the rest.
By diff'rent modes effect he oft obtains;
To one chief figure now th' attention gains;
Now force on second characters bestows,
And all his meaning by reflection shows;
Now through the whole, each rank, and sex, and
age,

One common ruling passion bids engage.

VOL. XI.

With steps slow-moving o'er Brundisium's strand,
Meets her lov'd friends—a numerous mourning band—

Her gentle frame no gestures rude disgrace,
No vulgar grief deforms her beauteous face;
Her downcast eyes immovable remain,
Fix'd on the urn her careful hands sustain.
The widow'd mother, by her garments folds,
Close on each side each tender offspring holds;
While melancholy all the train o'erfhaides,
Of hoary warriors and of blooming maids,
And all their breasts with pity seem to heave,
And for the dead and for the living grieve *.

The great sublime with energy t' express
Exert thy utmost power, nor fear excess.
When passion's tumults in the bosom rise,
Inflate the features, and enrage the eyes;
To nature's outline can we draw too true,
Or nature's colours give too full to view?
Did Reynolds' hand with force too strong disclose
Those looks that mark th' unutterable woes,
When Ugoline the wretch in prison lies,
And hears his dying children's piercing cries;
And while fell hunger haunts the impervious walls,
And one by one the suffering victims calls,
Invokes the lightning's bolt those walls to rend,
Or earth to open, and his miseries end †?

Our bards indeed, I own, here often fail,
And spoil with bombast and conceit their tale;
Their heroes rant in many a curious strain [pain.
Of thought, that none could think in anger or in
Celestial scenes with caution must be try'd,
Where knowledge fails, and fancy sole can guide;
The Great First Cause no form reveals to sight,
We mark his presence by excess of light ‡;
While angel shapes at ease on wing remain,
Or on thin clouds their airy steps sustain.

But though, fair painting! thus by just design,
And strong expression, much to please is thine,
Yet, not from these thy utmost praises rise,
For useful moral oft thy work supplies.
When, 'midst Poussin's Arcadian vale serene,
The virgin's sculptur'd monument is seen,
And the sad shepherd pointing seems to say,
' O death, no place is sacred from thy sway!
Our mournful thoughts the well-known truth reveal,

That youth and beauty oft untimely fall §.

disium, with the ashes of Germanicus*, is, in the author's

Count Ugolino and his children in the dungeon, where they were confined and starved to death by the Archbishop Puggieri. This circumstance is described by the

‡ The author could not here omit censuring the practice of some celebrated painters, who have presumptuously and absurdly represented the Supreme Being in the form of an aged man.

§ Vide Poussin's picture, called The Shepherds in Arcadia, engraved by Ravenet, in Mr. Boydell's Collection of Prints: Also the Abbé Du Bos's Reflections on Poetry, Painting, and Music; and Dr. Warton's ingenious Essay on Didactic Poetry, in his Translation of Virgil.

On Carthage's plains, when Marius meets the eye,
And the stern prætor's mandate bids him fly,
Fresh from the view the strong reflection springs,
How strange the vast vicissitude of things!
Rome's rival city to the dust deprest;
Her haughty consul there deny'd to rest *!
When Persia's conqueror, 'midst her female train,
Appears the chaste, the generous, and humane,
His look, his action, on the mind impress
The needful knowledge how to bear success †.

Thus may thy art, O friend, for ever prove
Of force to virtue, and from vice to move!
To statesmen, thoughtless on the heights of pow'r,
Mark Wolfey's fall, or show his final hour;
To patriot eyes give Marvell's calm disdain,
When Danby urg'd the tempting bribe in vain ‡;
Or bid th' inconstant her own doom deplore
In the sad exit of the hapless Shore §.

Without the Entheus nature's self bestows,
The world no painter nor no poet knows:
But think not mind in its own depth contains
A source of wealth that no disbursement drains:
Quick observation, ever on the wing,
Home, like the bee, its useful stores must bring;
From hills, and vales, and rocks, and streams, and trees,
And towns, and all that people those and these;
From meanest objects that may hints inspire,
Discolour'd walls, or heaps of glowing fire §.
Care too beside thee still must take her place,
Retouch each stroke, and polish every grace;

* There is a fine picture of Mortimer's on this subject. The reply of Marius, to the messenger who came with orders for him to depart, was nobly concise and affecting: "Go, tell the Prætor thou hast seen Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage."

For when we join not dignity with ease,
Nor thou canst paint, nor I can write, to please,
Perfection's point the artist nearest gains
Who with his work unsatisfied remains:
Da Vinci's thought an excellence conceiv'd,
That his eye mis'd in all his hand achiev'd *.

The clear-obscure how happiest to produce,
And what of various tints the various use,
My lay to that presumes not to aspire,
Nor with trite precept this thy ear shall tire:
Coreggio's practice that describes the best;
In Fresnoy's theory this we find express'd.

No rude incongruence should thy piece disgrace,

No motley modes of different time and place;
By Grecian chiefs no Gallic airs be worn †,
Nor in their hands be modern weapons borne;
Nor mix the crested helm or coat of mail
With the vast curl'd peruke, or pointed tail.
And sacred ever be the solemn scene
From base intrusion of burlesque and mean;
Nor in a patriarch's or apostle's fight
Set snarling dogs and growling cats to fight.
One caution further must the muse impart;
Shun naked form, that scandal of thy art:
Even Dryden blames them who refuse to spare
The painful blushes of the modest fair.
Let decency her veil of drapery throw,
And grace diffuse its folds in easy flow ‡.

And now, my friend, for thee may fortune find
Employ congenial to thy liberal mind;
Not tasks impos'd by power, or chosen for gain,
Begun reluctant, and pursu'd with pain,
What warms the heart, the hand with force reveals,
And all that force the charm'd spectator feels:
For genius, piercing as th' electric flame,
When wak'd in one, in others wakes the same.

SONNETS*.

SONNET I.

APOLOGY FOR RETIREMENT. 1766.

WHY asks my friend what cheers my passing day,
Where these lone fields my rural home enclose,
That all the pomp the crowded city shows
Ne'er from that home allures my steps away?

Now through the upland shade I musing stray,
And catch the gale that o'er the woodbine blows;
Now in the meads on river banks repose,
And breathe the rich odour from the new-mown hay:

* First published in Pearch's Collection of Poems, 1770.

Now pleas'd I read the poet's lofty lay,
Where music fraught with useful knowledge flows;
Now Delia's converse makes the moments gay,
The maid for love and innocence I chose:
O friend! the man who joys like these can taste,
On vice and folly needs no hour to waste.

SONNET II.

TO DELIA. 1766.

THRICE has the year its varied circuit run,
And swiftly, Delia, have the moments flown,
Since with my love for thee my care begun,
To improve thy tender mind to science prone.

The flatteries of my sex I bade thee shun,
I bade thee shun the manners of thy own;
Fictitious manners, by example won,
That ill for loss of innocence atone!

Say, generous maiden, in whose gentle breast
Dwells simple nature, undisguis'd by art,
Now amply try'd by time's unerring test,
How just the dictates of this faithful heart;
Which, with the joys thy favouring smiles impart,
Deems all its care repaid, itself supremely blest!

SONNET III.

AFTER READING SHENSTONE'S ELEGIES. 1766.

THE gentle Shenstone much of fortune 'plain'd,
Where nature's hand the liberal spirit gave;
Partial, her bounty she too oft restrain'd,
But pour'd it full on folly's tasteless slave.

By her alike my humble prayer disdain'd,
She stern denies the only boon I crave;
O'er my fields, fair as those Elysian feign'd,
To bid the green walk wind, the green wood wave.
On the high hill to raise the higher tower,

To ope wide prospects over distant plains,
Where by broad rivers towns and villas rise,
Taste prompts the wish, but fortune bounds the power:

Yet while health cheers, and competence sustains,
These more than all contentment bids me prize.

SONNET IV.

PREFIXED TO LANGHORNE'S POETICAL WORKS. 1766.

LANGHORNE! unknown to me (sequester'd swain!)
Save by the muse's soul-enchanting lay,

To kindred spirits never sung in vain,
Accept the tribute of this light essay.

Sweet are thy songs; they oft amuse my day,
Of fancy's visions while I hear thee 'plain,
While Scotland's honours claim thy pastoral strain;
Or music comes o'er Handel tears to pay.

For all thy Irwan's flowery banks display,
Thy Persian lover, and his Indian fair;
For all Theodosius' mournful lines convey,
When pride and avarice part a matchless pair;
Receive just praise, and wreaths that ne'er decay,

By fame and virtue twin'd for thee to wear.

March 16. 1766.

SONNET V.

TO BRITAIN. 1766.

RENOWN'D Britannia! lov'd parental land!
Regard thy welfare with a watchful eye!
When'er the weight of want's afflicting hand
Wakes in thy vales the poor's persuasive cry—

When wealth enormous sets the oppressor high,
When bribes thy ductile senators command,
And slaves in office freemen's rights withstand,
Then mourn, for then thy fate approacheth
nigh!

Not from perfidious Gaul or haughty Spain,
Nor all the neighbouring nations of the main,
Though leagu'd in war tremendous round thy shore—

But from thyself, thy ruin must proceed!
Nor boast thy power; for know it is decreed,
Thy freedom lost, thy power shall be no more!

STANZAS

ON READING MRS. MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. 1766.

To Albion's bards the muse of history spoke:
' Record the glories of your native land,
' How power's rude chain her sons' brave efforts
' broke, [hand.
' And the keen scourge tore from oppression's
' Give to renown the patriot's noble deeds;
' Brand with disgrace the tyrant's hated name;
' Though falsehood oft a while the mind misleads,
' Impartial time bestows impartial fame.'

She said; and soon the lofty lyre they strung,
But artful chang'd the subject and the lore;
Of kings, and courts, and courtly slaves they sung,
And gloss'd with vain applause their actions o'er.

The servile strain the muse indignant heard;
Anxious for truth, for public virtue warm,

* First published in Pearsall's Collection of Poems, 1770.

And bore on earth the fair Macaulay's form.

ELEGY,

IN THE MANNER OF HAMMOND.

Supposed to have been Written in the Author's Garden during a Storm. 1756.

Blow on, ye winds! exert your utmost rage,
Sweep o'er the dome, or through the forest howl!
Could north with south, or east with west engage,
What were their war to that within my soul?

There adverse passions fierce contention hold,
There love and pride maintain alternate sway,
There fell despair's dark clouds on clouds are
roll'd,
And veil hope's transient, faint, delusive ray!

Too charming Sylvia! dear capricious fair!
What strange perplexing change of mind is thine!
No more thy smiles I'll trust, thy frowns I'll bear;
I'll shun the beauty that must ne'er be mine!

Was it for thee I form'd this fair retreat,
Bade through the grove the smooth walk wind
away,
Adorn'd that walk with many a rustic seat,
And by those seats bade tinkling runnels stray;

Along my sunny wall the fruit-tree spread,
Upon my eves expos'd the curling vine,
Around my door the spicy woodbine led,
Beneath my window saw the jasmint twine?

Blow on, ye winds! exert your utmost power
Rage through my groves, and bear down every tree;

Blast the fair fruit, and crush the blooming flower—
For Sylvia's lost, and these are nought to me!

THE AUTHOR TO HIS WIFE. 1776.

FRIEND of my heart, by favouring Heaven beflow'd,

My lov'd companion on life's various road!
Now six swift years have wing'd their flight away
Since yon bright sun adorn'd our nuptial day—
For thy sweet smiles, that all my cares remove,
Sooth all my griefs, and all my joys improve;
For thy sweet converse, ever fram'd to please,
With prudence lively, sensible with ease;
To thee the muse awakes her tuneful lay,
The thanks of gratitude sincere to pay!
Thus long may Hymen hold for us his reign,
And twine with wreaths of flowers his easy chain;
Still may fond love and firmest faith be mine,
Still health, and peace, and happiness, be thine!

STANZAS

Written at Medhurst in Sussex, on the Author's return from Chichester, where he had attempted in vain to find the Burial-place of Collins.

To view the beauties of my native land,
O'er many a pleasing distant scene I rove;
Now climb the rock, or wander on the strand,
Or trace the rill, or penetrate the grove.

From Baia's hills, from Portsea's spreading wave,
To fair Cicestria's lonely walls I stray;
To her fam'd poet's venerated grave,
Anxious my tribute of respect to pay*.

O'er the dim pavement of the solemn fanes,
Midst the rude stones that crowd th' adjoining space,
The sacred spot I seek, but seek in vain;
In vain I ask—for none can point the place.

What boots the eye whose quick observant glance
Marks every nobler, every fairer form?
What the skill'd ear that found's sweet charms entrance,
And the fond breast with generous passion warm?

What boots the power each image to portray,
The power with force each feeling to express?
How vain the hope that through life's little day
The soul with thought of future fame can bless?

* Collins was born at Chichester, died, and probably was interred there.

While folly frequent boasts th' ensculptur'd
tomb,

By flattery's pen inscrib'd with purchas'd praise;
While rustic labour's undistinguish'd doom
Fond friendship's hand records in humble phrase;

Of genius oft and learning worse the lot;
For them no care, to them no honour shown*:
Alive neglected, and when dead forgot,
Even Collins slumbers in a grave unknown.

Flow, Lavant, flow! along thy scdgy shore
Bear the fraught vessel from the neighbouring main!

Enrich thy sons!—but on thy banks no more
May lofty poet breathe his tuneful strain!

VERSES

TO A FRIEND PLANTING.

PROCEED, my friend, pursue thy healthful toil,
Dispose thy ground, and meliorate thy soil;
Range thy young plants in walks, or clumps, or
bowers,

Diffuse o'er sunny banks thy fragrant flowers;
And, while the new creation round thee springs,
Enjoy uncheck'd the guiltless bliss it frings;
But hope no more. Though fancy forward stray
There scenes of distant pleasure to survey,
To expatiate fondly o'er the future grove,
The happy haunt of friendship and of love;
Know, each fair image form'd within thy mind,
Far wide of truth thy sickening fight shall find!

TO AN ABSENT FRIEND.

WHILE thou far hence on Albion's southern shore
View'st her white rocks, and hear'st her ocean
roar;

Through scenes, where we together stray'd, I stray,
And think o'er talk of many a long-past day.

That favourite park now tempts my steps again,
On whose green turf so oft at ease we've lain;
While Hertford's turrets rose in prospect fair,
And my fond thought beheld my Sylvia there;
And much the muse rehears'd in careless lays
The lover's sufferings, and the beauty's praise.

Those elm-crown'd fields now oft my walk invite,

Whence Lec's wide vale lies pleasant to the sight;
Where, as our view o'er towns and villas roll'd,
Our fancy imag'd how they look'd of old;
When Gothic mansions there uprear'd their towers,
Their halls for banquet, and for rest their bowers.

But, O my friend! whenever I seek these scenes
Of lovely prospects and delightful greens;
Regardless idly of the joys possess'd,
I dream of days to come, of days more blest,
When thou with me shalt wander here once more,
And we shall talk again our favourite topics o'er.

On time's smooth current, as we glide along,
Thus expectation ever tunes her song:

* This censure may seem too general—perhaps it is so. But must it not be allowed that the public is capricious in bestowing its honours? Does not Westminster Abbey show monuments erected to men, as poets, who had little or no title to the name, while it contains no memorials of writers of far superior merit?

' Fair these green banks with gaudy flow'rets
' bloom,
' Sweet breathe these gales, diffusing rich perfume;
' Heed, heed them not, but carelessly pass by,
' To-morrow fairer, sweeter will supply.'
To-morrow comes—the same the Syren's lay—
' To-morrow sweeter gales, and flow'rets still ' more gay.'

THE SHEPHERD'S ELEGY,

OCCASIONED BY THE DEATH OF AN INGENIOUS
FRIEND.

UPON a bank, with spreading boughs o'erhung,
Of pollard oak, brown elm, and hornbeam gray,
The faded fern and russet grass among,
While rude winds swept the yellow leaves away,
And scatter'd o'er the ground the wild fruits lay;
As from the churchyard came the village throng,
Down fat a rural bard, and rais'd his mournful
song.

' Nature's best gifts, alas, in vain we prize!
' The powers that please, the powers that pleasure
' gain!
' For O with them, in full proportion, rise
' The powers of giving and of feeling pain!
' Why from my breast now hurst this plaintive
' strain!
' Genius, my friend! with all its charms was thine,
' And sensibility too exquisite is mine!

' There low he lies!—that head in dust repos'd
' Whose active thought scann'd every various
' theme!
' Clos'd is that eye, for ever, ever clos'd,
' Whence wont the blaze of sentiment to beam!
' Mute is that tongue, whence flow'd the copious
' stream
' Of eloquence, whose moral lore so rare
' Delighted and improv'd the listening young and
' fair.

' Witness for me, ye rain-polluted rills;
' Ye defart meads, that one brown hue display;
' Ye rude east winds, whose breath the dank air
' chills;
' Ye hovering clouds, that veil the sun's faint ray!
' Witness, as annual here my steps shall stray,
' How his dear image thought shall still recal,
' And oft the sigh shall heave, and oft the tear
' shall fall!

As cease the murmurs of the mantling pool,
As cease the whispers of the poplar spray,
While o'er the vale the white mist rises cool
At the calm sunset of a summer's day—
So softly, sweetly cease'd the shepherd's lay:
While down the pathway to the hamlet plain Return'd, with lingering steps, the pensive rural train.

THE Asian muse, a stranger fair!
Becomes at length Britannia's care;
And Haf's lays, and Sadi's strains,
Resound along our Thames's plains.

They sing not all of streams and bowers,
Or banquet scenes, or social hours;
Nor all of beauty's blooming charms,
Or war's rude fields, or feats of arms;
But freedom's lofty notes sincere,
And virtue's moral lore severe,
But ah! they sing for us no more!
The scarcely-tasted pleasure's o'er!
For he, the bard whose tuneful art
Can best their varied themes impart—
For he, alas! the task declines,
And taste at loss irreparable repines.

HYMN FROM PSALM VIII.

ALMIGHTY Pow'r! amazing are thy ways;
Above our knowledge, and above our praise!
How all thy works thy excellence display!
How fair, how great, how wonderful are they!
Thy hand yon wide-extended heav'n uprais'd,
Yon wide-extended heav'n with stars emblaz'd,
Where each bright orb, since time his course begun,
Has roll'd a mighty world, or shin'd a sun:
Stupendous thought! how sinks all human race!
A point an atom in the field of space!
Yet ev'n to us, O Lord, thy care extends,
Thy bounty feeds us, and thy pow'r defends;
Yet ev'n to us, as delegates of thee,
Thou giv'st dominion o'er land and sea.
Whate'er or walks on earth, or flits in air;
Whate'er of life the wat'ry regions bear;
All these are ours; and, for th' extensive claim,
We owe due homage to thy sacred name!
Almighty pow'r! how wond'rous are thy ways!
How far above our knowledge and our praise!

CONCLUSION.

TO A FRIEND.

WHEN erst th' enthusiast fancy's reign
Indulg'd the wild romantic thought,
That wander'd 'midst Arcadian vales,
Sicilian streams, Arabian gales;
Blest climes with wond'rous pleasures fraught,
Sweet pleasures, unalloy'd with pain!

When observat'ion's calmer view
Remark'd the real state of things,
Whate'er amusive one obtain'd,
Whate'er of use the other gain'd,
To thee my verse a-tribute brings,
A tribute to thy friendship due.

Accept then this, nor more require;
The muse no further talk essays;
But, 'midst the sylvan scenes, she loves
The falling rills, and whispering groves;
With smiles her labours past surveys,
And quits the syrinx and the lyre.

VERSES *

Occasioned by the Description of the Æolian Harp, in the Gentleman's Magazine, for February 1754.

UNTAUGHT o'er strings to draw the rosin'd bow,
Or melting strains on the soft lute to blow,

* This and the following poem are reprinted from the Gentleman's Magazine for 1754 and 1758.

With others long I mourn'd the want of skill,
 Refounding roofs with harmony to fill,
 'Till happy now the Æolian lyre is known,
 And all the powers of music are my own.
 Swell all thy notes, delightful harp, O! swell!
 In flame thy poet to describe thee well.
 When the full chorus rises with the breeze,
 Or, slowly sinking, lessens by degrees,
 To sounds more soft than amorous gales disclose,
 At evening panting on the blushing rose.
 More sweet than all the notes that organs breathe,
 Or tuneful echoes, when they die, bequeath;
 Oft where some sylvan temple decks the grove,
 The slave of easy indolence I rove;
 There the wing'd breeze the lifted fash pervades,
 Its breath is music, vocal all the shades;
 Charm'd with the soothing sound, at ease reclin'd,
 To fancy's pleasing power I yield my mind;
 And now enchanted scenes around me rise,
 And some kind Ariel the soft air supplies;
 Now lofty Pindus through the shades I view,
 Where all the nine their tuneful art pursue;
 To me the sound the panting gale conveys,
 And all my heart is ecstasy and praise.
 Now to Arcadian plains, at once convey'd,
 Some shepherd's pipe delights his favourite maid.
 Mix'd with the murmurs of a neighbouring stream,
 I hear soft notes that suit an amorous theme!
 Ah! then a victim to the fond deceit,
 My heart begins with fierce desires to beat,
 'To fancy'd sighs, I real sighs return,
 By turns I languish, and by turns I burn.
 Ah! Delia haile! and here attentive prove,
 Like me, that "music is the voice of love:"
 So shall I mourn my rustic strains no more,
 While pleas'd you listen, who could frown before.

TO FEAR.

Ο τροου, dread foe of honour, wealth, and fame,
 Whose touch can quell the strong, the fierce can tame,
 Relentless fear! ah! why did fate ordain
 My trembling heart to own thy iron reign?
 There are, thrice happy! who disdain thy sway,
 The merchant wand'ring o'er the wat'ry way;
 The chief serene before th' assaulted wall;
 The climbing statesmen thoughtless of his fall;
 All whom the love of wealth or pow'r inspires,
 And all who burn with proud ambition's fires;
 But peaceful bards thy constant presence know,
 O thou of ev'ry glorious deed the foe!
 Of thee the silent studious race complains,
 And learning groans a captive in thy chains:
 The secret wish when some fair object moves,
 And cautious reason what we wish approves,
 Thy gorgon front forbids to grasp the prize,
 And seas are spread between, and mountains rise:
 Thy magic arts a thousand phantoms raise,
 And fancy'd deaths and dangers fill our ways;
 With smiling hope you wage eternal strife,
 And envious snatch the cup of joy from life.
 O leave, tremendous pow'r! the blameless breast,
 Of guilt alone, the tyrant, and the guest;
 Go, and thy train of fable horrors spread
 Where murder meditates the future dead,

Where rapine watches for the gloom of night,
 And lawless passion pants for other's right;
 Go to the bad, but from the good recede,
 No more the foe of ev'ry glorious deed.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE author, in the course of his literary inquiries, has had reason to believe that the productions of some writers have not unfrequently received very considerable alterations and improvements from the hands of their friends. What he has been told of others, may possibly be suspected of himself; he therefore takes the liberty to observe, that, although he has often derived advantage from the judicious remarks of a few kind acquaintance, to whom his MSS. have been shown, he is not indebted to them, nor indeed to any person, for the insertion of a single line.

From the works of preceding poets, memory has sometimes supplied him with turns of expression, which, at the instant of composing, he imagined were his own; and at other times he has happened on lines used by writers, whose performances he had not then seen. Some instances of such unconscionable plagiarism, and accidental coincidence, are here pointed out as matter of curiosity; others may possibly exist, though he is not apprized of them.

This Eclogue was written in 1777. In a volume of Poems by the ingenious Mr. Maurice, printed in 1779, the Author met with the following near resemblance:

Full fifty steeds I boast of swiftest pace,
Fierce in the fight, and foremost in the race.

In the Amæbian Eclogue, intitled The Describers, p. 101, 102, a part of the imagery bear a considerable resemblance to some descriptions in a little collection of pleasing sonnets, by Mr. Bamfylde, 1778; which collection the Author never saw till after his own volume was printed. This is a proof, that two writers, both painting from nature, will often unknowingly coincide very nearly in selection, arrangement, and expression.

The first of these is the fact that the country was a part of the British Empire. It was not until the year
 1763 that the British government declared that the territory between the Appalachian Mountains and the Mississippi River was to be reserved for the Indians. This policy was known as the Proclamation of 1763. It was a result of the Seven Years' War, which had ended in 1763. The British government had won the war, but it was faced with a large debt.
 One way to pay off the debt was to sell the land. However, the British government decided to reserve the land for the Indians.
 This was done to prevent the Indians from selling the land to the British. The British government also wanted to prevent the Indians from selling the land to the French. The French had been in the area for many years and had a strong influence over the Indians. The British government wanted to prevent the French from gaining more influence over the Indians. The Proclamation of 1763 was a result of the British government's desire to pay off its debt and to prevent the French from gaining more influence over the Indians.

Transcendent genius, whose prolific vein
Ne'er knew the frigid poet's toil and pain,
To whom Apollo opens all his store,
And every Muse presents her sacred lore;
Say, pow'rful JOHNSON, whence thy verse is fraught
With so much grace, such energy of thought;
Whether thy Juvenal instructs the age
In chaster numbers, and new-points his rage;
Or fair Irene sees, alas, too late,
Her innocence exchange'd for guilty state:
Whate'er you write, in every golden line
Sublimity and elegance combine;
Thy nervous phrase impresses every soul,
While harmony gives rapture to the whole.

THE LIFE OF JOHNSON.

THE events of the life of JOHNSON, "the brightest ornament of the eighteenth century," who has written the lives of so many eminent persons, and so much enriched our national stock of criticism and biography, have been related by friend and foe, by panegyrists and satirical defamers, by the lovers of anecdote, and the followers of party, with a diligence of research, a minuteness of detail, a variety of illustration, and a felicity of description, unexampled in the records of literary biography.

Besides several slight sketches of his life, by unknown authors, taken, sometimes with a favourable, flattering pencil, sometimes in the broader style of caricature, which lie scattered in the periodical publications of the last ten years; voluminous biographical accounts of him have been given to the world by Thomas Tyers, Esq. Mrs. Piozzi, Dr. Towers, Sir John Hawkins, James Boswell, Esq. and Arthur Murphy, Esq. who were his most intimate friends, and wrote from personal knowledge. Their several publications, which place his character in very different, and often opposite points of light, by exhibiting a striking likeness of the features of his mind, which were strong and prominent, and by recording so considerable a portion of his wisdom and wit, have exquisitely gratified the lovers of literary anecdotes, and largely contributed to the instruction and entertainment of mankind. The publications of Mr. Tyers, Mrs. Piozzi, Dr. Towers, and Mr. Murphy, come under the description of "biographical Sketches," "Anecdotes," and "Essays." Those of Sir John Hawkins and Mr. Boswell are more elaborately composed, and entitle them to the exclusive appellation of his biographers.

On an attentive perusal, it will be found that the narrative of Sir John Hawkins contains a collection of curious anecdotes and observations, which few men but its author could have brought together; but a very small part of it relates to the person who is the subject of the work. He appears to be a worthy, and often a well-informed man, but he possesses neither animation nor correctness, expansion of intellect, nor elegance of taste. He writes without much feeling or sentiment; his work is heavy, cold, and prolix; but we discover in it many gleams of good sense, and openings of humanity, sometimes checked by ignorance, and sometimes by prejudice.

The narrative of Mr. Boswell is written with more comprehension of mind, accuracy of intelligence, clearness of narration, and elegance of language; and is more strongly marked by the decorum chari capitis, which is the first feature of affectionate remembrance. He was peculiarly fitted for the task of recording the sayings and actions of this extraordinary man, by his assiduous attention. From the commencement of his acquaintance with him in 1763, he had the scheme of writing his life constantly in view; and continued his collections, with his approbation and assistance, with unwearied diligence, and meritorious perseverance, for upwards of twenty years. He gave a specimen of his being able to preserve his conversation, in an authentic and lively manner, in his "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," 8vo, 1786. His veneration and esteem for his friend, induced him, at a subsequent period, to go through the laborious task of digesting and arranging the immense mass of materials, which his own diligence, and the kindness of others, had furnished him, and of forming the history of his life; which was published in 2 vols. 4to, 1791, and was received by the world with most extraordinary avidity.

Xenophon's Memorabilia of Socrates may possibly have suggested to Mr. Boswell the idea of preserving and giving to the world the Memorabilia of his venerable friend; but he professes to have followed the model of Mason in his "Memoirs of Gray." He has, however, the advantage of Mason, in the quantity, variety, and richness of his materials. His work may be referred to that class of complements known by the name of "Books in Ana." To compare it with Monnoye's edition of the Menagiana, one of the most esteemed of these publications, would not be doing justice to it. The incidental conversations between so eminent an instructor of mankind, and his friends, the numerous body of anecdotes, literary and biographical, and the letters which are occasionally interperfed, and naturally introduced, in the narrative part of Mr. Boswell's ample performance, open and disclose to the eager curiosity of rational and laudable inquiry, an immense storehouse of mental treasure, which far exceeds, in merit and value, the voluminous collections of the wise and witty sayings of the learned and ingenious men of other nations. With some venial exceptions on the score of egotism and indiscriminate admiration, his work exhibits the most copious, interesting, and finished picture of the life and opinions of an eminent man, that was ever executed; and is justly esteemed one of the most instructive and entertaining books in the English language.

The eccentricities of Mr. Boswell, it is useless to detail. They have already been the subject of ridicule in various different forms and publications, by men of superficial understanding, and ludicrous fancy. Many have supposed him to be a mere relater of the sayings of others; but he possessed considerable intellectual powers, for which he has not had sufficient credit. It is manifest to every reader of any discernment, that he could never have collected such a mass of information, and just observations on human life, as his very valuable work contains, without great strength of mind, and much various knowledge; as he never could have displayed his collections in so lively a manner, had he not possessed a very picturesque imagination, or, in other words, had he not had a very happy turn for poetry, as well as for humour and for wit.

This lively and ingenious biographer, is now beyond the reach of praise or censure. He died at London, May 19. 1795, in the 55th year of his age. His death is an irreparable loss to English literature. He had many failings; and many virtues, and many amiable qualities, which predominated over the frailties incident to human nature. He will be long regretted by a wide circle of friends, to whom his good qualities and social talents always made his company a valuable accession.

The facts stated in the present account are chiefly taken from the narratives of Sir John Hawkins, and Mr. Boswell; with the addition of such particulars of the progress of his mind and fortunes, as the subsequent narrative of Mr. Murphy, and the most respectable periodical publications of the last ten years, have supplied.

SAMUEL JOHNSON was born at Litchfield in Staffordshire, September 7. 1709. His father, Michael Johnson, was a native of Cubley, in Derbyshire, of obscure extraction, who settled in Litchfield as a bookfeller, and carried on that business at all the neighbouring towns on market days; but was so respectable as to be made one of the magistrates of that city. He was a man of a large and robust body, and of a strong and active mind; but was always subject to a morbid melancholy. He was a zealous high-church-man and Jacobite; though he reconciled himself by casuistical arguments of expediency and necessity, to take the oaths imposed by the prevailing power. He was a pretty good Latin scholar, and being a man of good sense and skill in his trade, he acquired a reasonable share of wealth, of which he afterwards lost the greatest part, by engaging unsuccessfully in the manufacture of parchment. His mother, Sarah Ford, descended of an ancient race of substantial yeomanry in Warwickshire, was the sister of Dr. Joseph Ford, a physician of considerable eminence, and father of the famous Cornelius Ford, Chaplain to Lord Chesterfield, supposed to be the Parson in Hogarth's "Modern Midnight Conversation," a man of great parts, but of very profliigate manners. She was a woman of distinguished understanding, prudence, and piety. They were well advanced in years when they married, and had only another child, named Nathaniel, who seems to have succeeded his father in his business; but died in 1737, in the 25th year of his age.

During the period of infancy, all children are prodigies of form and understanding to their parents. With a natural fondness, they exaggerate every symptom of sense into the perfection of wisdom, and describe every feature with an adventitious grace. If the object of their admiration should at more mature years become distinguished for excellence, it is hoped that we may believe wonders of the child, because we have seen greatness in the man. Hence, in our fondness for the marvellous, the traditions of the nursery, respecting such persons, are amplified beyond the bounds of credibility, and recited with all the confidence of truth.

Every great genius must begin with a prodigy; and it is not to be supposed that Johnson should be without attestations of these miracles of early genius, which are believed by some, to be as necessary to the attainment of future pre-eminence, as that fruits should be preceded by the blossom. Among other stories of his infant precocity generally circulated, and generally believed, we are told by Mrs. Piozzi, and Sir John Hawkins, that, at the age of three years, he trod by accident upon one of a brood of eleven ducks, and killed it, and upon that occasion made the following verses:

Here lies good master duck,
Whom Samuel Johnson trod on;
If it had liv'd, it had been good luck,
For then we'd had an odd one.

This prodigy is scarcely exceeded by the bees on Plato's lips, or the doves that covered the infant poet with leaves and flowers; for, how should a child of three years old make regular verses, and in alternate rhyme? The internal evidence is sufficient to counterbalance any testimony that these verses could be the production of a child of such an early age. But, fortunately, credulity is relieved from the burden of doubt, by Johnson's having himself assured Mr. Boswell, that they were made by his father, who wished them to pass for his son's. He added, "my father was a foolish old man, that is to say, foolish in talking of his children."

He derived from his parents, or from an unwholesome nurse, the distemper called the King's Evil. Jacobites at that time believed in the efficacy of the royal touch. His mother, yielding to this superstitious notion, in her anxiety for his cure, when he was two years old (by the advice of Sir John Floyer, then a physician at Litchfield), carried him to London, where he was actually touched by Queen Anne. But the disease, too obstinate to yield to remedies more powerful, greatly disfigured his countenance, naturally harsh and rugged, impaired his hearing, and deprived him of the sight of his left eye.

He was first taught to read English by Dame Oliver, a widow, who kept a school for young children in Litchfield. His next instructor, in English, was a master whom he familiarly called Tom Brown, who he said "published a spelling book, and dedicated it to the UNIVERSE." He began to learn Latin in the free-school of Litchfield, at first under the care of Mr. Hawkins, the under-master, whom he has described as "a man skilful in his little way." In about two years he rose to be under the tuition of Mr. Hunter, the head-master, a very respectable teacher, and a worthy man; but who, according to his account, was "very severe, and wrong headedly severe." He had for his school fellows, Dr. James, inventor of the fever-powder, Mr. Lowe, canon of Windsor, Dr. Taylor, rector of Ashbourne, and Mr. Hector, surgeon in Birmingham, with whom he contracted a particular intimacy.

While at school, he is said by Mr. Hector to have been indolent and averse from study. But the procrastination of his duties seems neither to have prevented the timely performance of his exercises, nor to have blemished them with inaccuracies; for "he was never known to have been corrected at school, unless for talking and diverting other boys from their business." Indeed, such was the superiority of his talents above those of his companions, that three of the boys, of whom Mr. Hector was sometimes one, are said to have assembled submissively every morning, to carry him triumphantly upon their shoulders to school. This ovation is believed by Mr. Boswell, to have been an honour paid to the early predominance of his intellectual powers alone; but they who remember what boys are, and who consider that Johnson's corporeal prowess was by no means despicable, will be apt to suspect that the homage was enforced, at least as much by awe of the one, as by admiration of the other.

After having resided for some months at the house of his cousin, Cornelius Ford, who assisted him in the classics, he was, by his advice, at the age of fifteen, removed to the school of Stourbridge in Worcestershire, of which Mr. Wentworth was then master, whom he has described as "a very able man; but an idle man, and to me unreasonably severe. Yet he taught me a great deal." He seems to have been there in the double capacity of a scholar and usher, repaying the learning he acquired from his master, by the instruction he gave to the younger boys. Parson Ford he has described in his "Life of Fenton," as "a clergyman at that time too well known, whose abilities, instead of furnishing convivial merriment to the voluptuous and the dissolute, might have enabled him to excel among the virtuous and the wise."

He thus discriminated to Dr. Percy, Bishop of Dromore, his progress at his two grammar-schools: "At one I learnt much in the school, but little from the master; in the other I learnt much from the master, but little in the school."

He remained at Stourbridge little more than a year, and then returned home, where he pursued his studies; but not upon any regular plan. Of this method of attaining knowledge, he seems ever after to have entertained a favourable opinion, and to have recommended it, not without reason, to young men, as the surest means of enticing them to learn. What he read was not works of mere amusement. "They were not voyages and travels, but all literature, all ancient authors, all manly; though but little Greek, only some of Anacreon and Hesiod. But in this irregular manner, I had looked into a great many books, which were not commonly known at the universities, where they seldom read any books but what are put into their hands by their tutors; so that when I came to Oxford, Dr. Adams told me I was the best qualified for the university, that he had ever known come there."

He had already given several proofs of his poetical genius, both in his school exercises, and in other occasional compositions. Of these Mr. Boswell obtained a considerable collection, from Mr. Wentworth, the son of his master, and Mr. Hector, his school-fellow; of which he has preserved some translations from Homer, Virgil, Horace, &c. Unfortunately the communications of Mr. Wentworth are not distinguished from those of Mr. Hector. Such a precaution would have enabled us to have distinguished with certainty, the efforts of the boy, from the production of riper years. His translation of the first eclogue of Virgil, is not so harmonious as that from the sixth book of Homer; and both are inferior in this respect to those which he has made of the odes of Horace. Indeed, in the style and manner of versification used in the last, and in some other of his juvenile pieces, he seems to have made little alteration in his more experienced days; and it must be added, that in point of smoothness, little improvement could have been made.

After a residence of two years at home, Mr. Andrew Corbet, a gentleman of Shropshire, undertook to support him at Oxford, in the character of companion to his son, one of his school-fellows, "though, in fact," says Mr. Boswell, upon the authority of Dr. Taylor, "he never received any assistance whatever from that gentleman." He was accordingly entered a Commoner of Pembroke College, Oxford, October 31, 1728, being then in his nineteenth year.

On the night of his arrival at Oxford, his father, who had anxiously accompanied him, found means to have him introduced to Mr. Jorden, Fellow of Pembroke, who was to be his tutor. According to Dr. Adams, who was present, he seemed very full of the merits of his son, and told the company he was a good scholar and a poet, and wrote Latin verses. His figure and manner seemed strange to them; but he behaved modestly, and sat silent, till, upon something which occurred in the course of conversation, he suddenly struck in, and quoted Macrobius; and this gave the first impression of that extensive reading in which he had indulged himself.

Of his tutor, Mr. Jorden, he gave Mr. Boswell the following account: "He was a very worthy man, but a heavy man, and I did not profit much by his instruction. Indeed, I did not attend him much." He had, however, a love and respect for Jorden, not for his literature, but for his worth. "Whenever (said he) a young man becomes Jorden's pupil, he becomes his son."

The fifth of November was at that time kept with great solemnity at Pembroke College, and exercises upon the gunpowder plot were required. Johnson neglected to perform his. To apologize for his neglect, he gave in a short copy of verses, intitled, Somnium, containing a common thought, "that the muse had come to him in his sleep, and whispered that it did not become him to write on such subjects as politics; he should confine himself to humbler themes;" but the verification was truly Virgilian.

Having given such a specimen of his poetical powers, he was asked by Mr. Jorden to translate Pope's Messiah into Latin hexameter verse, as a Christmas exercise. He performed it with uncommon rapidity, and in so masterly a manner, that he obtained great applause from it, which ever after kept him high in the estimation of his college, and, indeed, of all the university. Pope, impelled by gratitude and taste, perhaps not unassisted by vanity, is reported to have said concerning it, "that the author would leave it a question for posterity, whether his or mine be the original?" It was first printed by his father, without his knowledge; and afterwards inserted in a "Miscellany," published by subscription at Oxford, in 1731, by Mr. John Husbands, Fellow of Pembroke College.

The particular course of his reading while at Oxford, and during the time of vacation which he passed at home, cannot be traced. From his earliest years he loved to read poetry and romances of chivalry. He read Shakspeare at a period so early, that the speech of the ghost in "Hamlet" terrified him when he was alone. Horace's odes were the compositions he most liked in early life; but it was long before he could relish his satires and epistles. He told Mr. Boswell, what he read solidly at Oxford was Greek, not the Grecian historians, but Homer and Euripides, and now and then a little epigram; that the study of which he was most fond was metaphysics; but he had not read much even in that way. We may be absolutely certain, however, both from his writings and his conversation, that his reading was very extensive. He projected a common-place book to the extent of six folio volumes, but according to Sir John Hawkins, the blank leaves far exceeded the written ones.

In 1729, while at Litchfield, during the college vacation, the "morbid melancholy" which was lurking in his constitution, gathered such strength as to afflict him in a dreadful manner. He was overwhelmed with an horrible hypochondria, with perpetual irritation, fretfulness and impatience, and with a dejection, gloom, and despair, that made existence misery. He fancied himself seized by, or approaching to insanity, in conformity with which notion, he applied, when he was at the very worst, to his godfather, Dr. Swinfen, physician in Litchfield, and put into his hand a state of his case, written in Latin; "which showed," as Mr. Boswell expresses it "an uncommon vigour, not only of fancy and taste, but of judgment." That he should have supposed himself approaching to insanity, at the very time when he was giving proofs of a more than ordinary soundness and vigour of judgment, is less strange than that Mr. Boswell should consider the vigour of fancy, which he displayed on such a subject, a proof of his sanity. It is a common effect of melancholy to make those who are afflicted with it imagine that they are actually suffering those evils which happen to be most strongly presented to their minds. But there is a clear distinction between a disorder which affects only the imagination and spirits, while the judgment is sound, and a disorder by which the judgment itself is impaired. Whatever be the arguments in favour of free-will, of volition unrestrained by the force and prevalence of motives, it must be allowed that the effects of reason on the human mind are not at all times, and on all subjects, equally powerful. The mind, like the body, has its weak organs; in other words, the impressions on some subjects are so deeply fixed, that the judgment is no longer able to guide the operations of the mind in reasoning on, or in judging of them. The imagination seizes the rein, and till the force of the idea is lessened from habit, the usual powers are suspended. But this is not madness; for strong impressions of various kinds, will, in different minds, produce similar effects. From this dismal malady, which he "did not then know how to manage," he never afterwards was perfectly relieved; and all his labours, and all his employments, were but temporary interruptions of its baleful influence.

In the history of his mind, his religious progress is an important article. He had been early instructed in the doctrines of the church of England, by his mother, who continued her pious care with assiduity, but in his opinion, not with judgment. "Sunday" said he "was a heavy day to me when I was a boy. My mother confined me on Sundays, and made me read "The Whole Duty of Man," from a great part of which I could derive no instruction. When, for instance, I read the chapter on theft, which, from infancy, I had been taught was wrong, I was no more convinced that theft was wrong than before; so there was no accession of knowledge. A boy should be introduced to such books by having his attention directed to the arrangement, to the style, and other excellencies of composition, that the mind being thus engaged by an amusing variety of objects, may not grow weary."

He communicated to Mr. Boswell the following account of "the first occasion of his thinking in earnest of religion." I fell into an inattention to religion, or an indifference about it, in my ninth year. The church at Litchfield, in which we had a feat, wanted reparation: so I was to go and find a feat in other churches; and having bad eyes, and being awkward about this, I used to go and read in the fields on Sunday. This habit continued till my fourteenth year, and still I find a great reluctance to go to church. I then became a sort of lax talker against religion, for I did not much think about it; and this lasted till I went to Oxford, where it would not be suffered. When at Oxford, I took up Law's "Serious Call to the Unconverted," expecting to find it a dull book (as such books generally are), and perhaps to laugh at it. But I found Law quite an over-match for me; and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion, after I became capable of rational inquiry."

Serious impressions of religion, from particular incidents, it is certain have been experienced by many pious persons; though it must be acknowledged, that weak minds, from an erroneous supposition, that no man is in a state of grace, who has not felt a particular conversion, have, in some cases, brought a degree of ridicule upon them; a ridicule of which it is inconsiderate or unfair to make a general application. How seriously Johnson was impressed with a sense of religion, from this time forward, appears from the whole tenor of his life and writings. Religion was the predominant object of his thoughts; though he seems not to have attained all the tranquillity and assurance in his practice of its duties that are so earnestly to be desired. His sentiments, upon points of abstract virtue and rectitude, were in the highest degree elevated and generous, but he was unfortunate enough to have the sublimity of his mind degraded by the hypochondriacal propensities of his animal constitution. The serenity, the independence, and the exultation of religion, were sentiments to which he was a stranger. He saw the Almighty in a different light from what he is represented in the purer page of the gospel; and he trembled in the presence of Infinite Goodness. Those tenets of the church of England, which are most nearly allied to Calvinism, were congenial to his general feelings, and they made an early impression, which habits confirmed, and which reason, if ever exerted, could not efface. At the latter part of his life these terrors had a considerable effect; nor was their influence lost, till disease had weakened his powers, and blunted his feelings.

The year following, 1730, Mr. Corbet left the university, and his father, to whom, according to Sir John Hawkins, he trusted for support, declined contributing any farther to Johnson's maintenance, than paying for his Commons. His father's business was by no means lucrative. His remittances, consequently, were too small even to supply the decencies of external appearance; and the very shoes that he wore were so much torn, that they could no longer conceal his feet. So jealous, however, was he of appearing an object of eleemosynary contribution, that a new pair having been placed at his door, by some unknown hand, he flung them away with indignation.

While thus oppressed by want, he seems to have yielded to that indifference to fame and improvement, which is the offspring of despair. "He was generally seen," says Dr. Percy, "lounging at the college gate, with a circle of young students round him, whom he was entertaining with wit, and keeping from their studies, if not spiring them up to rebellion against the college discipline, which in his maturer years, he so much extolled." The account of his conduct given by Dr. Adams, who was at least his nominal tutor for some time before he quitted the college, is more favourable to his happiness, but is less true. "Johnson," says he, "while he was at Pembroke College, was caressed and loved by all about him; he was a gay and frolicsome fellow, and passed there the happiest part of his life." But his own comment upon this opinion, when mentioned to him by Mr. Boswell, shows how fallacious it is to estimate human happiness by external appearances: "Ah Sir, I was mad and violent. It was bitterness which they mistook for frolic. I was miserably poor, and I thought to fight my way by my literature and my wit; so I disregarded all power and all authority."

He struggled for another year in this unequal conflict, and professed a desire to practise either the Civil or the Common Law; but his debts in college increasing, and his scanty remittances from Litchfield, which had all along been made with great difficulty, being discontinued, his father having fallen into a state of insolvency, he was compelled, by irresistible necessity, to relinquish his scheme, and left the college in autumn 1731, without a degree, having been a member of it little more than three years. This was a circumstance, which, in the subsequent part of his life, he had occasion to regret, as the want of it was an obstacle to his obtaining a settlement, whence he might have derived that subsistence, of which he was certain by no other means.

From the university he returned to his native city, destitute, and not knowing how he should gain even a decent livelihood. But he was so far fortunate, that the respectable character of his parents, and his own merit, secured him a kind reception in the best families of Litchfield. Mr. Gilbert Walmley, Register of the Prerogative Court at Litchfield, "was one of the first friends that literature procured" him; and he passed much time in the families of Mr. Howard, and Dr. Swinfen, Mr. Simpson, Mr. Levett, and Captain Garrick, father of the great ornament of the British stage. He has drawn the character of Mr. Walmley in his "Life of Smith," in the glowing colours of gratitude, intermingled with the dark hues of political prejudice. In his abhorrence of whiggism, he has imputed to his friend and benefactor, "all the virulence and malevolence of his party." Yet Mr. Walmley, whose real character is a noble one, loved Johnson enough to endure in lim the principles he despised.

In the circles of Litchfield, he was frequently in the company of ladies, particularly at Mr. Walmley's, whose wife and sister-in-law, of the name of Aston, and the daughters of a Baronet, were remarkable for elegance and good breeding. Of Miss Molly Aston, who was afterwards married to Captain Brodie of the Navy, he used to speak with the warmest admiration. "Molly," (said he,) "was a beauty and a scholar, a wit and a whig, and she talked all in praise of liberty; and so I made this epigram upon her. She was the loveliest creature I ever saw!

Liber ut esse velim, suavis, pulchra Maria,
Ut maneam liber; pulchra Maria, vale."

Of this epigram, Mrs. Piozzi, and Mr. Jodrel, and Mr. Boswell, among others, have offered translations. The following version is given by Mr. Boswell:

Adieu Maria! since you'd have me free:
For who beholds thy charms, a slave must be.

In December 1731 his father died, in the 79th year of his age, in very narrow circumstances; for, after providing for his mother, that portion of the effects which fell to his share amounted only to twenty pounds.

In the forlorn state of his circumstances, he accepted the employment of usher in the school of Market-Bosworth in Leicestershire, to which he went on foot, July 16. 1732. He resided in the house of Sir Woolston Dixie, the patron of the school, to whom he officiated as a kind of domestic chaplain; and who treated him with intolerable harshness. His employment was irksome to him in every respect; and after suffering for a few months, what Mr. Boswell terms "complicated misery," he relinquished a situation which he ever afterwards remembered with a degree of horror.

Being now again totally unoccupied, he was invited by Mr. Hector to pass some time with him at Birmingham, as his guest, at the house of Mr. Warren, with whom he lodged. Mr. Warren was the first established bookseller in Birmingham, and was very attentive to Johnson, and obtained the assistance of his pen, in furnishing some periodical essays in a newspaper of which he was proprietor.

In June 1733, he resided in the house of a person named Jarvis, in another part of the town, where he translated and abridged, from the French of the Abbé Le Grand, a Voyage to Abyssinia, written originally by Jerome Lobo, a Portuguese Jesuit. For this work, which was printed in Birmingham, and published by Bettesworth and Hitch of Pater-noster Row, London, 8vo, 1735, but without the translator's name, he had from Mr. Warren only five guineas. It is the first prose work of Johnson; but it exhibits no specimen of elegance; neither is it marked by any character of style, which would lead to a discovery of the translator, from an acquaintance with his latter productions. It has, however, been justly remarked by Mr. Boswell, that the Preface and Dedication contain strong and not unfavourable specimens of that style of thought and manner of expression, which he afterwards adopted.

In February 1734, he returned to Litchfield, and in August following, published proposals for printing by subscription an edition of the Latin poems of Politian, Angeli Politiani Poemata Latina, quibus notas, cum historia Latinæ poeseos, a Petrarchæ ævo ad Politiani tempora deducta et vitæ Politiani fusius quam ante hac enarrata, addidit SAM. JOHNSON; the work to be printed in thirty 8vo sheets, price 5s. "subscriptions taken in by the editor, or N. Johnson, bookfeller of Litchfield," his brother, who had taken up his father's trade. For want of encouragement, the work never appeared, and probably never was executed.

We find him again this year at Birmingham; and in order to procure some little subsistence by his pen, he addressed a letter, under the name of S. Smith, to Mr. Edward Cave, the proprietor of the "Gentleman's Magazine," November 25. 1734, in which he proposed, "on reasonable terms, sometimes to supply him with poems, inscriptions, &c. never printed before, and short literary dissertations in Latin or English, critical remarks on authors, ancient or modern, forgotten poems that deserve revival, loose pieces, like Floyer's, worth preserving." To this letter Mr. Cave returned an answer, dated December 2. 1734; but it does not appear that any thing was done in consequence of it.

He had, from his infancy, been sensible to the influence of female charms. When at Stourbridge school he was much enamoured of Olivia Lloyd, a young Quaker, to whom he wrote a copy of verses; he conceived a tender passion for Lucy Porter, whose mother he afterwards married, and whom he had frequent opportunities of seeing at the house of Mr. Hunter of Litchfield, whose second wife was her aunt. He addressed to her, as she herself informed Miss Seward, "when he was a lad," the verses to a Lady, on her presenting the author with a sprig of myrtle; which Mr. Hector says were written at his request, in 1731, for his friend Mr. Morgan Graves; but the two accounts are not irreconcilable, for he might give them to Mr. Hector, without thinking it material to mention their pre-existence.

His juvenile attachments to the fair sex were, however, very transient, and he never had a criminal connection. In 1735, he became the fervent admirer of Mrs. Porter, widow of Mr. Henry Porter, mercer in Birmingham, to whose family he had probably been introduced by his sister Mrs. Hunter of Litchfield, or through his acquaintance with Jarvis, who might be a relation of Mrs. Porter, whose maiden name was Jarvis. "It was," he said, "a love match on both sides," and judging from the description of their persons, we must suppose that the passion was not inspired by the beauties of form, or graces of manner, but by a mutual admiration of each others mind. Johnson's appearance is described as being very forbidding: "He was then lean and lank, so that his immense structure of bones was hideously striking to the eye, and the scars of the scrophula were deeply visible. He also wore his hair, which was straight and stiff, and separated behind; and he often had seemingly convulsive starts and odd gesticulations, which tended at once to excite surprise and ridicule." Mrs. Porter was double the age of Johnson, and her person and manner, as described by Garrick, were by no means pleasing to others. "She was very fat, with a bosom of more than ordinary protuberance. Her swelled cheeks were of a florid red, produced by thick painting, and increased by the liberal use of cordials, flaring and fantastic in her dress, and affected both in her speech and in her general behaviour."

It is to be observed, however, that whatever her real charms may have been, Johnson thought her beautiful, for in her Epitaph he has recorded her as such; and in his Prayers and Meditations, we find very remarkable evidence that his regard and fondness for her never ceased, even after death.

The marriage ceremony was performed, July 9th, at Derby, for which place the bride and bridegroom set out on horseback; and it must be allowed that the capricious and fantastic behaviour of the bride, during the journey to church, upon the nuptial morn, as related by Mr. Boswell, was a singular beginning of connubial felicity.

She was worth about 800l., which, to a person in Johnson's circumstances, made it a desirable match. To turn this sum to the best advantage, he hired a large house at Edial, near Litchfield, and set up a private classical academy, in which he was encouraged by his friend Mr. Walmley. In the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1736, there is the following "ADVERTISEMENT—At Edial, near Litchfield, in Staffordshire, young gentlemen are boarded and taught the Latin and Greek languages, by SAMUEL JOHNSON." The plan, notwithstanding, proved abortive. The only pupils that were put under his care, were Garrick, and his brother George, and a Mr. Offely, a young gentleman of a good fortune, who died early.

About this time we find him diligently employed on his Irene, a tragedy, with which Mr. Walmley was so well pleased that he advised him to proceed with it. It is founded upon a passage in Knolles's "History of the Turks," a book which he afterwards highly praised and recommended in the Rambler.

Disappointed in his expectation of deriving subsistence from the establishment of a boarding-school, he now thought of trying his fortune in London, the great field of genius and exertion, where talents of every kind have the fullest scope, and the highest encouragement.

On the 2d of March 1737, being the 28th year of his age, he set out for London, and it is a memorable circumstance, that his pupil Garrick went thither at the same time, with intention to complete his education, and follow the profession of the law. They were recommended to Mr. Colson, master of the mathematical school at Rochester, by a letter from Mr. Walmley, who mentions the joint expedition of these two eminent men to the metropolis, in the following manner:

"This young gentleman, and another neighbour of mine, one Mr. Samuel Johnson, set out this morning for London together. Davy Garrick is to be with you early the next week, and Mr. Johnson, to try his fate with a tragedy, and to see to get himself employed in some translation, either from the Latin or the French. Johnson is a very good scholar and poet, and I have great hopes will turn out a fine tragedy writer."

How he employed himself upon his first coming to London, is not certainly known. His first lodgings were at the house of Mr. Norris a staymaker in Exeter-Street, in the Strand. Here he found it necessary to practise the most rigid economy; and his Ofellus in the Art of Living in London, is a real character of an Irish painter, who initiated him in the art of living cheaply in London.

Soon after his arrival in London, he renewed his acquaintance with Mr. Henry Hervey, one of the branches of the Bristol family, whom he had known when he was quartered at Litchfield as an officer of the army. At his house he was entertained with a kindness and hospitality of which he ever afterwards retained a warm remembrance. Not very long before his death, he described this early friend "Harry Hervey," thus: "he was a vicious man, but very kind to me. If you call a dog Hervey, I shall love him."

He had now written three acts of his Irene; and he retired for some time to lodgings at Greenwich, where he proceeded in it somewhat farther, and used to compose walking in the Park; but he did not stay long enough in that place to finish it.

At this period, he wished to engage more closely with Mr. Cave, and proposed to him, in a letter dated Greenwich, July 12. 1737, to undertake a translation of Father Paul Sarpi's "History of the Council of Trent," from the French edition of Dr. Le Courayer. His proposal was accepted; but it should seem from this letter, though subscribed with his own name, that he had not yet been introduced to Mr. Cave.

In the course of the summer, he returned to Litchfield, where he had left his wife; and there he at last finished his tragedy; which was not executed with his rapidity of composition upon other occasions, but was slowly and painfully elaborated. The original unformed sketch of this tragedy, partly in the raw materials of prose, and partly worked up in verse, in his own hand-writing, is preserved in the King's Library.

In three months after, he removed to London with his wife; but her daughter, who had lived with them at Edial, was left with her relations in the country. His lodgings were for some time in Woodstock-Street, near Hanover-Square, and afterwards in Castle-Street, near Cavendish-Square. His tragedy being, as he thought, completely finished, and fit for the stage, he solicited Mr. Fleetwood, the manager of Drury-Lane Theatre, to have it acted at his house; but Mr. Fleetwood would not accept it.

Upon his coming to London, he was enlisted by Mr. Cave, as a regular coadjutor in his magazine, which, for many years, was his principal resource for employment and support. A considerable period of his life is lost in saying that he was the hireling of Mr. Cave. The narrative is little diversified by the enumeration of his contributions. But the publications of a writer, like the battles and sieges of a general, are the circumstances which must fix the several eras of his life. In this part of the narrative, the pieces acknowledged by Johnson to be of his writing, are printed in Italics, and those which are ascribed to him upon good authority, or internal evidence, are distinguished by inverted commas.

His first performance in the "Gentleman's Magazine," was a Latin Ode, Ad Urbanum, in March 1738, a translation of which, by an unknown correspondent, appeared in the Magazine for May following.

At this period, the misfortunes and misconduct of Savage had reduced him to the lowest state of wretchedness as a writer for bread; and his visits at St. John's Gate, where the "Gentleman's Magazine" was originally printed, naturally brought Johnson and him together. Johnson commenced an intimacy with this extraordinary man. Both had great parts, and they were equally under the pressure of want. They had a fellow-feeling, and sympathy united them closer.

It is melancholy to reflect, that Johnson and Savage were sometimes in such extreme indigence, that they could not pay for a lodging, so that they have wandered together whole nights in the streets. Yet as Savage had seen life in all its varieties, and been much in the company of the statesmen and wits of his time, we may suppose, in these scenes of distress, that he communicated to Johnson an abundant supply of such materials as his philosophical curiosity most eagerly desired, and mentioned many of the anecdotes with which he afterwards enriched the life of his unhappy companion.

He mentioned to Sir Joshua Reynolds, that one night in particular, when Savage and he walked round St. James's Square, for want of a lodging, they were not at all depressed by their situation, but in high spirits, and brimful of patriotism, traversed the Square for several hours, inveighed against the minister, and "resolved they would stand by their country."

Sir John Hawkins supposes that "Johnson was captivated by the address and demeanour of Savage, who, as to his exterior, was to a remarkable degree accomplished; he was a handsome well-made man, and very courteous in the modes of salutation." He took off his hat, he tells us, with a good air, made a graceful bow, and was a good swordsman. "These accomplishments," he adds, "and the ease and pleasantry of his conversation, were probably the charms that wrought on Johnson, who at this time had not been accustomed to the conversation of gentlemen." But if, according to his biographer's notion, he "never saw the charms of his wife," how should he perceive the graces of Savage?

Johnson, indeed, describes him as having "a graceful and manly deportment, a solemn dignity of mien, but which, upon a nearer acquaintance, softened into an engaging easiness of manners." How highly he admired him for that knowledge, which he himself so much cultivated, and what kindness he entertained for him, appears in the following verses in the Gentleman's Magazine for April 1738.

Ad RICARDUM SAVAGE Armi. humani generis amatorem;
Humani studium generis cui pectore fervet,
O! colat humanum te foveatque genus!

About this time he became acquainted with Miss Elizabeth Carter, the learned translator of "Epicætus," to whom he paid a friendly attention, and in the same Magazine complimented her in An Enigma to Eliza, both in Greek and Latin. He writes Mr. Cave, "I think she ought to be celebrated in as many different languages as Lewis le Grand." His verses to a Lady, (Miss Molly Aston) who spoke in defence of liberty, first appeared in the same Magazine.

In May 1738, he published his London, a Poem, written in imitation of the 3d satire of Juvenal. It has been generally said, that he offered it to several booksellers, none of whom would purchase it. Mr. Cave, at last, communicated it to Doddsley, who had taste enough to perceive its uncommon merit, and thought it "creditable to be concerned with it." Doddsley gave him 10l. for the copy. It is remarkable, that it came out on the same morning with Pope's satire, intitled, "1738." One of its warmest patrons was General Oglethorpe. Pope also was so struck with its merit, that he sought to discover the author, and professed his future fame. "He will," said he "soon be asteris," and it appears from his note to Lord Gower, he himself was successful in his inquiries.

To "a short extract from London," in the Gentleman's Magazine for May, is added, "Become remarkable for having got to the second edition in the space of a week." This admirable poem laid the first foundation of his fame. Sir John Hawkins observes, that in this poem he has adopted the vulgar topic of the time, to gratify the malevolence of the Tory faction; and Mr. Boswell candidly allows, that "the flame of patriotism and zeal for popular resistance with which it is fraught, had no just cause." It contains the most spirited invectives against tyranny and oppression, the warmest predilection for his own country, and the purest love of virtue, interspersed with traits of his own particular character and situation. He heated his mind with the ardour of Juvenal, and he wrote with the spirit and energy of a fine poet, and a sharp critic of the times. Boileau had imitated the same satire with great success, applying it to Paris; but an attentive comparison will satisfy every reader that he is much excelled by Johnson. Oldham had also imitated it, and applied it to London; but there is scarcely any coincidence between the two performances, though upon the very same subject.

In the course of his engagement with Mr. Cave, he composed the Debates in the Senate of Magna Lilliputia, the first number of which appeared in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for June 1738, sometimes with feigned names of the several speeches, sometimes with denominations formed of the letters of their real names, so that they might be easily decyphered. Parliament then kept the press in a kind of mysterious awe, which made it necessary to have recourse to such devices. The debates for some time were brought home and digested by Guthrie, and afterwards sent by Mr. Cave to Johnson for his revision. When Guthrie had attained to a greater variety of employment, and the speeches were more and more enriched by the accession of Johnson's genius, it was resolved that he should do the whole himself, from notes furnished by persons employed to attend in both houses of Parliament. His sole composition of them began November 19. 1740, and ended February 23. 1742-3. From that time they were written by Hawkesworth to the year 1760. Johnson acknowledged the debates to be spurious, long after the world had considered them as genuine; and some days previous to his death, declared, that of all his writings they gave him the most uneasiness. The deceit, however, could not be very pernicious, in the effects of which so many persons were involved. Neither are they so completely his own composition as is generally supposed. That notes of the speeches were taken in the Houses of Parliament, and given to him, is evident from his own declarations. And it does not appear probable that Mr. Cave, who was ever attentive to the improvement of his Magazine, should be more negligent in procuring notes as accurate as he could, during the time when Johnson executed this department, than when it was in the hands of Guthrie. It seems at least most likely, therefore, that the language and illustrations are Johnson's own, but that the arguments and general arrangements were taken from the several speeches spoken in either house.

The trade of writing was, however, so little profitable, that notwithstanding the success of his London, he wished to accept an offer made to him, of becoming master of the free-school at Appleby in Leicestershire (Pope says in Shropshire), the salary of which was sixty pounds a-year. But the statutes of the school required that he should be a Master of Arts, and it was then thought too great a favour to be asked of the University of Oxford. Pope, without any knowledge of him, but from his London, recommended him to Lord Gower, who, by a letter which has been often printed, to a friend of Swift, dated Trentham, August 1. 1738, endeavoured to procure him a degree from Trinity-College, Dublin. This expedient failed. There is reason to think that Swift declined to meddle in the business; and to this circumstance Johnson's known dislike of Swift has been often imputed.

He made one other effort to emancipate himself from the drudgery of authorship, by endeavouring to be introduced to the bar at Doctor's Commons; but here the want of a Doctor's degree in Civil Law, was also an unfurmountable impediment.

He was, therefore, under the necessity of persevering in that course into which he was forced; and we find him prosecuting his design of translating Father Paul's "History of the Council of Trent," in 2 vols. 4to, which was announced in the "Weekly Miscellany," October 21. 1738. Twelve sheets of this translation were printed off; but the design was dropped, for it happened, that another Samuel Johnson, Librarian of St. Martin's in the Fields, and Curate, of that parish, had engaged in the same undertaking, under the patronage of Dr. Pearce; the consequence of which was, an opposition, which mutually destroyed each others hopes of success.

In the "Gentleman's Magazine" of this year, besides the pieces already mentioned, he gave a Life of Father Paul in the November Magazine, and wrote the "Preface" to the volume. The "Apotheosis of Milton, a Vision," printed in the Magazine for 1738 and 1739, given to him by Sir John Hawkins, was the production of Guthrie. The Translation of Cronfaz's "Examination of Pope's Essay on Man," and printed by Cave in November 1738, has been ascribed to him; but Miss Carter has lately acknowledged that she was the translator.

In 1739, beside the assistance he gave to the Debates in the Senate of Lilliput, his writings in the "Gentleman's Magazine" were, The Life of Boerhaave, An Appeal to the Public in behalf of the Editor, Verses to Eliza, a Greek Epigram to Dr. Birch, and "Considerations on the case of Dr. Trapp's Sermons," reprinted in the Magazine for July 1787.

The same year he joined in the clamour against Walpole, and published his famous Jacobite pamphlet, entitled, Marmor Norfolciense, or an Essay on an Ancient Prophectical inscription in Monks's rhyme, lately discovered near Lynne, in Norfolk, by Probus Britannicus. In this performance, he inveighs against the Brunswick succession, and the measures of Government consequent upon it, with warm anti-Hanoverian zeal. The Jacobite principles inculcated by it, according to Sir John Hawkins, aroused the vigilance of the Ministry. A warrant was issued, and messengers were employed to apprehend the author, who, it seems, was known. To elude his pursuers, he retired with his wife to Lambeth-marsh, and there lay concealed in an obscure lodging till the scent grew cold. Mr. Boswell however denies that there is any foundation for this story; for that Mr. Steele, one of the late secretaries of the Treasury, had directed every possible search to be made in the records of the Treasury and Secretary of State's Office, but could find no trace of any warrant having been issued to apprehend the author of this pamphlet." His Marmor Norfolciense obtained also the honour of Pope's commendation, as appears from the following note concerning Johnson, copied with minute exactness, by Mr. Boswell, from the original in the possession of Dr. Percy:

"This [London] is imitated by one Johnson, who put in for a public school in Shropshire, but was disappointed. He has an infirmity of the convulsive kind, that attacks him sometimes, so as to make him a sad spectacle. Mr. P. from the merit of this work, which was all the knowledge he had of him, endeavoured to serve him without his own application; and wrote to my Lord Gower, but he did not succeed; Mr. Johnson published afterwards another poem in Latin, with notes, the whole very humorous, called the Norfolk Prophecy."

In the same year 1739, he published A complete Vindication of the Licensors of the Stage, from the malicious and scandalous aspersions of Mr. Brooke, author of Gustavus Vasa, in 4to. This was an ironical, but a very proper attack upon the Lord Chamberlain, for the unjustifiable suppression of that tragedy. Indeed the power vested in that officer, respecting dramatic pieces, is a disgrace to a free country, and the act which gave him that power ought to be repealed. To justify the rejection of this play, Sir John Hawkins selects a few passages, not one of which would give umbrage at this day.

In July 1739, a subscription was completed for Savage, who was to retire to Swansea, and he parted with the companion of his midnight rambles, never to see him more. This separation was perhaps a real advantage to Johnson. By associating with Savage, who was habituated to the licentiousness and dissipation of the town, Johnson, though his good principles remained steady, did not entirely preserve that temperance for which he was remarkable, in days of greater simplicity, but was imperceptibly led into some indulgences, which occasioned much distress to his virtuous mind. It is said by Sir John Hawkins, that during his connection with Savage, a short separation took place between Johnson and his wife. They were, however, soon brought together again. Johnson loved her, and showed his affection in various modes of gallantry, which Garrick used to mimic. The affectation of fashionable airs did not sit easy on Johnson; his gallantry was received by the wife with the flutter of a coquette, and both, we may believe, exposed themselves to ridicule.

In 1740, he contributed to the "Gentleman's Magazine," the "Preface," Life of Admiral Blake, and the first parts of those of Sir Francis Drake, and of Philip Barrett, both which he finished the year after; An "Essay on Epitaphs," and an Epitaph on Philips, a musician, which was afterwards published, with some other pieces of his Miss Williams's "Miscellanies."

In 1741, he wrote for the "Gentleman's Magazine," the "Preface," conclusion of his Lives of Drake and Baretier; "A free translation of the jests of Hierocles, with an Introduction," "Debate on the Proposal of Parliament to Cromwell, to assume the title of King, abridged, methodized, and digested;" "translation of Abbé Guyon's Dissertation on the Amazons;" "translation of Fontenelle's Panegyric on Dr. Morin." He, this year, and the two following, wrote the Parliamentary Debates. The eloquence, the force of argument, and the splendour of language displayed in the several speeches, are well known, and universally admired. To one who praised his impartiality, observing that he had dealt out reason and eloquence with an equal hand to both parties, "That is not quite true, Sir, said Johnson, I saved appearances well enough, but I took care that the White Dogs should not have the best of it." They have been collected in 2 vols. 8vo, 1787, and recommended to the notice of parliamentary speakers as orations upon questions of public importance, by a "Preface," written by George Chalmers, Esq. whose commercial and biographical writings are well known, and esteemed.

In 1742, he wrote for the "Gentleman's Magazine," the "Preface;" the Parliamentary Debates; Essay on the Account of the Conduct of the Dukes of Marlborough, then the popular topic of conversation; The Life of Peter Burman; Additions to his Life of Baretier; The Life of Sydenham, afterwards prefixed to Swan's edition of his works; the "Foreign History," for December; "Essay on the Description of China, from the French of Du Halde;" Proposals for printing Bibliotheca Harleiana, or a Catalogue of the Library of the Earl of Oxford. It was afterwards prefixed to the first volume of the "Catalogue," in which the Latin account of books were written by him. He was employed in this business by Mr. Thomas Osborne, bookfeller in Gray's Inn, who purchased the library for 13,000*l.* a sum which, Mr. Oldys says in one of his manuscripts, was not more than the binding of the books had cost; yet the slowness of the sale was such, that there was not much gained by it. It has been confidently related, with many embellishments, that Johnson knocked Osborne down in his shop with a folio, and put his foot upon his neck. Johnson himself relates it differently to Mr. Boswell. "Sir, he was impertinent to me, and I beat him; but it was not in his shop, it was in my own chamber. This anecdote has been often told to prove Johnson's ferocity; but merit cannot always take the spurns of the unworthy with patience and a forbearing spirit.

He wrote in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1743, the "Preface;" the Parliamentary Debates for January and February; "Considerations on the Dispute between Cronfaz and Warburton, on Pope's Essay on Man," in which he defends Cronfaz; Ad Lauram parituram Epigramma; A Latin translation of Pope's verses on his Grotto; an exquisitely beautiful Ode on Friendship; and an "Advertisement" for Osborne, concerning the Harleian Catalogue.

The same year he wrote for his school-fellow, Dr. James's "Medicinal Dictionary," in 3 vols. folio, the Dedication to Dr. Mead, which is conceived with great address, to conciliate the patronage of that very eminent man. He had also written or assisted in writing the proposals for this work, and being very fond of the study of physic, in which Dr. James was his master, he furnished some of the articles.

At this time, his circumstances were much embarrassed, yet such was his liberal affection for his mother, that he took upon himself a debt of hers, to Mr. Levett of Litchfield, which, though only twelve pounds, was then considerable to him.

In 1744, he wrote the "Preface" for the Gentleman's Magazine, and the Preface to the Harleian Miscellany. The selection of the pamphlets of which it was composed was made by Mr. Oldys, a man of eager curiosity, and indefatigable diligence, to whom English literature owes many obligations.

The same year he produced one work fully sufficient to maintain the high reputation which he had acquired. This was the Life of Savage, which he had announced his intention of writing in the "Gentleman's Magazine," for August 1743. It is said by Sir John Hawkins that he composed the whole of it in thirty-six hours; but Mr. Boswell states, upon Johnson's own authority, that he composed forty-eight of the present octavo pages at a sitting, but that he sat up all night. It came out in February, from the shop of Roberts, who, in April following, republished his Life of Baretier, in a separate pamphlet. It was no sooner published than the following liberal praise was given to it by Fielding, in "The Champion," which was copied into the "Gentleman's Magazine" for April, and confirmed by the approbation of the public.

" This pamphlet is without flattery to its author, as just and well-written a piece as of its kind I ever saw. It is certainly penned with equal accuracy and spirit, of which I am so much the better judge, as I knew many of the facts to be strictly true, and very fairly related. It is a very amusing, and withal a very instructive and valuable performance. The author's observations are short, significant, and just, as his narrative is remarkably smooth, and well disposed. His reflections open to all the recesses of the human heart; and, in a word, a more just or pleasant, a more engaging, or a more instructive treatise on all the excellencies and defects of human nature, is scarce to be found in our own, or perhaps any other language."

Johnson had now lived nearly half his days, without friends or lucrative profession; he had toiled and laboured, yet still, as he himself expresses it, was " to provide for the day, that was passing over him." Of the profession of an unfriended author he saw the danger and the difficulties. Amburst, who had conducted " The Craftsman," Savage, Boyle, and others who had laboured in literature, without emerging from distress, were recent examples, and clouded his prospect.

Sir John Hawkins has preserved a list of literary projects, not less than thirty-nine articles, which he had formed in the course of his studies; but such was his want of encouragement or the versatility of his temper, that not one of all his schemes was ever executed.

A new edition of Shakspeare now occurred to him, and as a prelude to it, in April 1745, he published a pamphlet, intitled Miscellaneous observations on the Tragedy of Macbeth, with Remarks on Sir Thomas Hanmer's edition of Shakspeare. To which is affixed, proposals for a new edition of Shakspeare, with a Specimen, 8vo. The notice of the public was, however, not excited to his anonymous proposals for the execution of a task which Warburton was known to have undertaken; the project, therefore, died at that time, to revive at a future period. His pamphlet, however, was highly esteemed, and even the supercilious Warburton, in the " Preface" to his Shakspeare, published two years afterwards, had the candour to exempt it from his general censure " of those things which have been published under the titles of " Essays," " Remarks," " Observations," &c. on " Shakspeare," and spoke of it as the work of " a man of great parts and genius." This obligation Johnson always acknowledged in terms of gratitude. " He praised me (said he) at a time when praise was of value to me."

In the year 1746, which was marked by a civil war in Britain, when a rash attempt was made to restore the house of Stuart to the throne, his literary career appears to have been almost totally suspended. His attachment to that unfortunate family is well known; some may imagine that a sympathetic anxiety impeded the exertion of his intellectual powers; but it is probable that he was, during that time, employed upon his Shakspeare, or sketching the out-lines of his Dictionary of the English Language.

Having formed and digested the plan of his great philological work, which might then be esteemed one of the desiderata of English literature, he communicated it to the public, in 1747, in a pamphlet, intitled, The Plan of a Dictionary of the English Language, addressed to the Right Honourable Philip Dormer, Earl of Chesterfield, one of his Majesty's Secretaries of State. The hint of undertaking this work is said to have been first suggested to Johnson by Doddsley, who contracted with him for the execution of it in conjunction with Mr. Charles Hitch, Mr. Andrew Millar, the two Messrs. Longman, and the two Messrs. Knapton. The price stipulated was 1575 l.

The Plan has not only the substantial merit of comprehension, perspicuity, and precision, but the language of it is unexceptionably excellent; and never was there a more dignified strain of compliment than that in which he courts the attention of Chesterfield, who was very ambitious of literary distinction, and who, upon being informed of the design, had expressed himself in terms very favourable to its success. The way in which it came to be inscribed to Chesterfield was this: " I had neglected," says he, " to write it by the time appointed. Doddsley suggested a desire to have it addressed to Lord Chesterfield. I laid hold of this as a pretext for delay, that it might be better done, and let Doddsley have his desire." The Plan itself, however, proves, that the Earl not only favoured the design, but that there had been a particular communication with his Lordship concerning it.

To enable him to complete this vast undertaking, he hired a house in Gough-Square, Fleet-Street, fitted up one of the upper rooms after the manner of a counting house, and employed six amanuenses there in transcribing; five of whom were natives of North Britain, Mr. Macbean author of "A System of Ancient Geography," &c. Mr. Shiels, the principal collector and digester of the materials for the "Lives of the Poets 1753," to which the name of Mr. Theo. Cibber is prefixed; Mr. Stewart, son of Mr. George Stewart, bookfeller in Edinburgh, and a Mr. Maitland; the sixth was Mr. Peyton, a French master, who published some elementary tracts. The words, partly taken from other dictionaries, and partly supplied by himself, having been first written down, with spaces left between them, he delivered in writing their etymologies, definitions, and various significations. The authorities were copied from the books themselves, in which he had marked the passages with a black lead pencil, the traces of which could easily be effaced.

This year he contributed to the "Gentleman's Magazine," for May, five short poetical pieces. "A translation of a Latin Epitaph on Sir Thomas Hanmer," "To Miss ——, on her giving the author a gold and silk net-work purse of her own weaving," "Stella in Mourning," "The Winter's Walk," "An Ode," and "To Lyce, an elderly Lady," distinguished by three asterisks. In the Magazine for December, he inserted an Ode on Winter, which is one of the best of his lyric compositions.

In September, this year, his fortunate pupil, Garrick, having become joint-patentee and manager of Drury-lane theatre, he furnished him with a Prologue at the opening of it, which, for just and manly criticism, as well as for poetical excellence, is unrivalled in that species of composition.

In 1748, while he was employed in his Dictionary, he exerted his talents in occasional composition, very different from lexicography, and formed a club that met at Horleman's chop-house in Ivy-lane, Pater-noster Row, every Tuesday evening, with a view to enjoy literary discussion, and the pleasure of animated relaxation. The members associated with him in this little society, were his beloved friend, Dr. Richard Bathurst, a physician, Dr. Hawkesworth, Dr. Salter, father of the late master of the charter-house, Mr. Ryland, a merchant, Mr. John Payne, then a bookfeller in Pater-noster Row, Mr. Samuel Dyer, a learned young man, intended for the dissenting ministry, Dr. William M'Ghie, a Scotch physician, Dr. Edmund Barker, a young physician, and Sir John Hawkins. The endowments of Mr. Dyer are represented by Sir John Hawkins as of such a superior kind, "that in some instances Johnson might almost be said to have looked up to him." They used to dispute in this club, about the moral sense and the fitness of things, but Johnson was not uniform in his opinions; contending as often for victory as truth. This infirmity attended him through life.

In this year he published, in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for May, The Life of Roscommon, which has since been inserted in his "Lives of the Poets." He wrote also the Preface to Doddley's "Preceptor," and the Vision of Theodore, the Hermit of Teneriffe, found in his cell, a most beautiful allegory of human life, under the figure of ascending the mountain of existence, which he himself thought the best of his writings.

In January 1749, he published The Vanity of Human Wishes, being the tenth Satire of Juvenal imitated, with his name. Of this poem, he composed seventy lines in one day, without putting one of them upon paper till they were finished. He received of Doddley, for the copy, only fifteen guineas. It has been thought to have less of common life, and more of a philosophic dignity than his London. It is characterized by profound reflection, more than pointed spirit. It has, however, always been held in high esteem, and is certainly as great an effort of ethic poetry as any language can show. The instances of the variety of disappointment are chosen so judiciously, and painted so strongly, that the moment they are read, they bring conviction to every thinking mind.

On the 8th of February this year, his tragedy of Irene, which had been long kept back for want of encouragement, was brought upon the stage at Drury-Lane, by the kindness of Garrick. A violent dispute arose between him and the manager, relative to the alterations necessary to be made to fit it for the theatre. The poet for a long time refused to submit his lines to the critical amputation of the actor, and the latter was obliged to apply to Dr. Taylor to become a mediator in the dispute. Johnson's pride at length gave way to alterations; but whether to the full extent of the manager's wishes, is not known. Dr. Adams was present the first night of the representation, and gave Mr. Boswell the following account: "Before the curtain drew up, there were catcalls whistling, which alarmed Johnson's friends. The prologue, which was written by himself, in a manly strain, soothed the audience, and the play went off tolerably till it came to the conclusion, when Mrs. Pritchard, the heroine of the piece, was to be strangled upon the stage, and was to speak two lines with the bow-string round her neck. The audience cried out, "Murder! Murder!" She several times attempted to speak, but in vain. At last she was obliged to go off the stage alive." This passage was afterwards struck out, and she was carried off to be put to death behind the scenes, as the play now has it: Mr. Boswell ascribes the epilogue to Sir William Yonge; but upon no good foundation.

In the unfavourable decision of the public upon his tragedy, Johnson acquiesced without a murmur. He was convinced that he had not the talents necessary to write successfully for the stage, and never made another attempt in that species of composition.

In December this year, he wrote the Preface and Postscript to Lauder's "Essay on Milton's Use, and Imitation of the Moderns, in his Paradise Lost," 8vo, a book made up of forgeries, and published to impose upon mankind. Sir John Hawkins tells us, that Johnson assisted Lauder from motives of enmity to the memory of Milton; but it appears, that while Lauder's work was in the press, the proof sheets were submitted to the inspection of the Ivy-Lane Club. If Johnson approved of the design, it was no longer than while he believed it founded in fact. With the rest of the club, he was in one common error. As soon as Dr. Douglas, now Bishop of Salisbury, espoused the cause of truth, and with ability that will ever do him honour, dragged the impostor to open daylight, Johnson made ample reparation to the genius of Milton. He not only disclaimed the fraud, but insisted on the impostor confessing his offence; and for this purpose drew up a recantation, which Lauder signed and published, intitled, "A Letter to the Rev. Mr. Douglas, occasioned by his Vindication of Milton," by William Lauder, M. A. 4to, 1751. The frankness of this confession would have made some atonement for the baseness of the attempt, and its abject humility been deemed a sufficient punishment of the impostor, if that unhappy man had not had the folly and wickedness afterwards to deny this apology, and reassert his former accusation, in a pamphlet intitled, "King Charles Vindicated from the Charge of Plagiarism, brought against him by Milton, and Milton himself convicted of Forgery and a gross imposition on the Public," 8vo, 1755. This effort of spleen and malice was also abortive; and Lauder soon afterwards retired to Barbadoes, where he died, as he had lived, an object of general contempt, in 1771.

On the 20th March 1750, he published the first paper of the Rambling, and continued it without interruption every Tuesday and Friday, till the 17th of March 1752, when it closed. In carrying on this periodical publication, he seems neither to have courted, nor to have met with much assistance, the number of papers contributed by others amounting only to five in number, four billets in No. 10, by Mrs. Chapone, No. 30, by Mrs. Talbot, by Richardson, and Nos. 44, and 100, by Miss Carter. These admirable essays, we are told by Mr. Boswell, were written in haste, just as they were wanted for the press, without even being read over by him before they were printed.

Making every allowance for powers far exceeding the usual lot of man, still there are bounds which we must set to our belief upon this head. It is not at every season that the mind can concentrate its faculties to a particular subject with equal strength, or that the fancy can create imagery spontaneously to adorn and enforce its reasonings. That Johnson sometimes selected his subject, culled his images, and arranged his arguments for these papers, is evident from the notes of his common-place book, preserved by Sir John Hawkins and Mr. Boswell. When he planned some essays with such minute carefulness, it is not likely that he trusted wholly to the sudden effusions of his mind for the remainder. Those which are taken from the notes of his common-place book, do not manifest by an excellence superior to the rest, peculiar labours of mind in the conception, or pains in the composition; and we cannot suppose a man so happy in his genius, that the new-born offspring of his brain should invariably appear as strong and perfect as those which have been matured, fashioned, and polished by sedulous reflection. This, therefore, appears to be most probable, with respect to the wonderful faculty which he is said to have manifested in this and other of his works; that during his sleepless nights and frequent abstractions from company, he conceived and sketched much of an impending work; that though he had in some degree preconceived his materials, he committed nothing to paper, just as he is known to have done in composing his Vanity of Human Wishes. If this supposition strips the account of wonder, it invests it with probability, since a man of his powers of mind and habits of composition, might well write an essay at a sitting and without a blot, when he had little more to attend to, than to clothe his conceptions in vigorous language, modulated into sonorous periods.

The Rambler was not successful as a periodical work, not more than five hundred copies of any one number having been ever printed. Of course, the bookfeller, who paid Johnson four guineas a week, did not carry on a very successful trade; his generosity and perseverance are to be commended. While it was coming out in single papers at London, Mr. James Elphinstone suggested, and took the charge of an edition at Edinburgh, which followed progressively the London publication, printed by Sands, Murray and Cochrane, with uncommon elegance, upon writing paper, of a duodecimo size, and was completed in eight volumes. Soon after the first folio edition was concluded, it was published in four octavo volumes; and Johnson lived to see a just tribute of approbation paid to its merit in the extensiveness of its sale, ten numerous editions of it having been printed in London, before his death, besides those of Ireland and Scotland.

This year he wrote a Prologue, which was spoken by Garrick, before the acting of "Comus," at Drury-Lane theatre, April 5, for the benefit of Mrs. Elizabeth Foster, Milton's grand-daughter, and the only surviving branch of his family, and took a very zealous interest in the success of the charity. Tonson, the bookfeller, gave 20 l. and Dr. Newton brought a large contribution; yet all their efforts, joined to the allurements of Johnson's pen, and Garrick's performance, procured only 130 l.

In 1751, while he was employed both on the Rambler and his Dictionary, he wrote the Life of Cbeynell, in "The Student, or the Oxford and Cambridge Miscellany," a periodical work, in which Smart, Colman, Thornton, and other wits of both the universities distinguished their talents.

Sir John Hawkins relates, that in the spring of this year, he indulged himself in a frolic of midnight revelry. This was to celebrate the birth of Mrs. Lennox's first literary child, the novel of "Harriet Stuart." He drew the members of the Ivy-Lane Club, and others, to the number of twenty, to the Devil Tavern, where Mrs. Lennox and her husband met them. Johnson, after an invocation of the muses, and some other ceremonies of his own invention, invested the authoress with a laurel crown. The festivity was protracted till morning, and Johnson through the night was a Bacchannalian, without the use of wine.

Though his circumstances, at this time, were far from being easy, he received as a constant visitor at his house, Miss Anna Williams, daughter of a Welsh physician, and a woman of more than ordinary talents and literature, who had just lost her sight. She had contracted a close intimacy with his wife, and after her death, she had an apartment from him, at all times when he had a house. In 1755, Garrick gave her a benefit, which produced 200 l. In 1766, she published a quarto volume of "Miscellanies," and thereby increased her little stock to 300 l. This and Johnson's protection supported her during the rest of her life.

In 1752, he republished his version of Pope's Messiah, in the Gentleman's Magazine. Soon after his closing the Rambler, March 2, he suffered a loss which affected him with the deepest distress. On the 17th of March, O. S. his wife died; and after a cohabitation of seventeen years, left him a childless widower, abandoned to sorrow, and incapable of consolation. She was buried in the chapel of Bromley, in Kent, under the care of his friend, Dr. Hawkesworth, who resided at that place. In the interval, between her death and burial, he composed a funeral sermon for her, which was never preached; but, being given to Dr. Taylor, has been published since his death. With the singularity of his prayers for Tetty, from that time to the end of his life, the world is sufficiently acquainted. By her first husband she left a daughter, and a son, a captain in the navy, who, at his death, left 10,000 l. to his sister.

On this melancholy event Johnson felt the most poignant distress. She is, however, reported not to have been worthy of this sincere attachment. Mrs. Desmoulin, who lived for some time with her at Hampstead, told Mr. Boswell, that she indulged herself in country air and nice living, at an unsuitable expence, while her husband was drudging in the smoke of London; that she was negligent of economy in her domestic affairs; and that she by no means treated him with that complacency which is the most engaging quality in a wife. But all this is perfectly compatible with his fondness for her; especially when it is remembered, that he had a high opinion of her understanding; and that the impression which her beauty, real, or imaginary, had originally made upon his imagination, being continued by habit, had not been effaced, though she herself was, doubtless, much altered for the worse. Sir John Hawkins has declared himself inclined to think, "that if this fondness of Johnson for his wife was not difsembled, it was a lesson that he had learned by rote; and that when he practised it, he knew not where to stop, until he became ridiculous." To argue from her being much older than Johnson, or any other circumstances, that he could not really love her, is absurd; for love is not a subject of reasoning, but of feeling; and, therefore, there are no common principles upon which one can persuade another concerning it. That Johnson married her for love is believed. During her life he was fond and indulgent. At her death he was agonized; and, ever after, cherished her image as the companion of his most solemn hours. If seventeen years passed in acts of tenderness during their union, and a longer period spent in regret after death had divided them, cannot fix our opinion that Johnson's fondness was not the effect of dissimulation, or the unfeeling lesson of a parrot, where shall we fix bounds to suspicion, or place limits to the presumption of man, in passing sentence upon the feelings of his neighbour?

The following authentic and artless account of his situation after his wife's death, was given to Mr. Boswell, by Francis Barber, his faithful negro-servant, who was brought from Jamaica by Colonel Bathurst, father of his friend Dr. Bathurst, and came into his family about a fortnight after the dismal event.

"He was in great affliction:—Miss Williams was then living in his house, which was in Gough-square. He was busy with his Dictionary; Mr. Shiels, and some others of the gentlemen who had formerly written for him, used to come about him. He had then little for himself; but frequently sent money to Mr. Shiels when in distress. The friends who visited him at that time, were chiefly Dr. Bathurst, and Mr. Diamond, an apothecary in Cork-street, Burlington-Gardens, with whom he and Miss Williams generally dined every Sunday. There was a talk of his going to Ireland with him, which would probably have happened had he lived. There were also Mr. Cave, Dr. Hawkefworth, Mr. Ryland, merchant on Tower-hill, Mrs. Masters the poetess, who lived with Mr. Cave, Mrs. Carter, and sometimes Mrs. Macaulay; also Mrs. Gardiner, wife of a tallow-chandler in Snow-hill, not in the learned way, but a worthy good woman; Mr. (now) Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Millar, Mr. Doddsley, Mr. Bouquet, Mr. Payne of Pater-noster Row, bookseller; Mr. Strahan the printer; the Earl of Orrery, Lord Southwell, Mr. Garrick."

Johnson seems to have sought a remedy for this deprivation of domestic society, in the company of his acquaintance, the circle of which was now very extensive. Among his more intimate companions at this time, are to be reckoned, Dr. Bathurst, Dr. Hawkefworth, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Bennet Langton, Esq.; and Topham Beauclerck, Esq. eldest son of Lord Sidney Beauclerck, young men of elegant manners, who conceived for him the most sincere veneration and esteem. Innumerable were the scenes in which he was amused by them, who, though their opinions and modes of life were different, formed an agreeable attachment.

Mr. Boswell has given the following account of an adventure of Johnson's, with his gay companions, which displays the author of the Rambler in a new light, and shows that his conduct was not always so solemn as his essays.

"One night when Beauclerck and Langton had supped at a tavern in London, and sat till about three in the morning, it came into their heads to go and knock up Johnson, and see if they could prevail on him to join them in a ramble. They rapped violently at the door of his chambers in the Temple, till, at last, he appeared in his shirt, with his little black wig on the top of his head, instead of a night cap, and a poker in his hand; imagining, probably, that some ruffians were coming to attack him. When he discovered who they were, and was told their errand, he smiled, and with great good humour, agreed to their proposal. "What! is it you, ye dogs! I'll have a frisk with you." He was soon dressed; and they sallied forth together into Covent-Garden, where the green grocers and fruiterers were beginning to arrange their hampers just come in from the country. Johnson made some attempts to help them; but the honest gardeners stared so at his figure and manner, and odd interference, that he soon saw his services were not relished. They then repaired to one of the neighbouring taverns, and made a bowl of that liquor called Bishop, which Johnson had always liked; while in joyous contempt of sleep, from which he had been roused, he repeated the festive lines,

Short, O short then be thy reign,
And give us to the world again!

“ They did not stay long, but walked down to the Thames, took a boat, and rowed to Billingsgate. Beauclerk and Johnson were so well pleased with their amusement, that they resolved to persevere in dissipation for the rest of the day; but Langton deserted them, being engaged to breakfast with some young ladies.”

In the catalogue of Johnson's visitants, given by his servant, many are, no doubt omitted; in particular, his humble friend Robert Levet, an obscure practitioner in physic amongst the lower people, with whom he had been acquainted from the year 1746. Such was his predilection for him, and fanciful estimation of his moderate abilities, that he consulted him in all that related to his health, and “ made him so necessary to him, as hardly to be able to live without him.” He now drew him into a closer intimacy with him, and not long after, gave him an apartment in his house; of which he continued a constant inmate during the remainder of his life. He waited upon him every morning through the whole course of his tedious breakfast, and was seen generally no more by him till midnight. He was of a strange grotesque appearance; stiff and formal in his manner, and seldom said a word while any company was present. He married, when he was near sixty, a street-walker, who persuaded him that she was a woman of family and fortune. His character was rendered valuable, by repeated proofs of honesty, tenderness, and gratitude to his benefactor, as well as by an unceasing diligence in his profession. His single failing was an occasional departure from sobriety.

In a short time after the Rambler ceased, Dr. Hawkeworth projected the “Adventurer,” in connection with Bonnel Thornton, Dr. Bathurst, and others. The first number was published, Nov. 7. 1752, and the paper continued twice a-week, till March 9. 1754. Thornton's assistance was soon withdrawn; and he set up a new paper, in conjunction with Colman, called the “Connoisseur.”

Johnson was zealous for the success of the “Adventurer,” which was at first rather more successful than the Rambler. He engaged the assistance of Dr. Warton, whose admirable essays are well known. April 10. 1753, he began to write in it, marking his papers with the signature T; all of which, except those which have also the signature Misfargyrus (by Dr. Bathurst), are his. His price was two guineas for each paper. Of all these papers, he gave both the fame and the profit to Dr. Bathurst. Indeed, the latter wrote them while Johnson dictated; though he considered it as a point of honour not to own them. He even used to say he did not write them, on the pretext that he dictated them only; allowing himself, by this casuistry, to be “necessary to the propagation of falsehood,” though his conscience had been hurt by even the appearance of imposition in writing the Parliamentary Debates. This year he wrote for Mrs. Lennox, the Dedication to the Earl of Orrery, of her “Shakspeare Illustrated,” 2 vol. 12mo.

The death of Mr. Cave, Jan. 10. 1754, gave him an opportunity of shewing his regard for his early patron, by writing his Life, which was published in the “Gentleman's Magazine” for February. This seems to have been the only new performance of that year, except his papers in the “Adventurer.” In the end of July, he found leisure to make an excursion to Oxford, for the purpose of consulting the libraries there. “He stayed,” says Mr. Warton, “about five weeks; but he collected nothing in the libraries for his Dictionary.”

As the Dictionary drew towards a conclusion, Chesterfield, who had previously treated Johnson with unpardonable neglect (which was the real cause of the breach between them, and not the commonly received story of Johnson's being denied admittance while Cibber was with his lordship), now as meanly courted a reconciliation with him, in hopes of being immortalized in a dedication. With this view, he wrote two essays in “The World” in praise of the Dictionary, and, according to Sir John Hawkins, sent Sir Thomas Robinson, to him, for the same purpose. But Johnson, who had not renounced the connection, but upon the just grounds of continued neglect, was sensible, that to listen to an accommodation, would be to exchange dignity for a friendship, trifling in its value, and precarious in its tenure. He therefore rejected his advances, and spurned his proffered patronage, by the following letter, dated February 1755, which is preserved here as a model of courtly sarcasm, and manly reprehension, couched in terms equally respectful in their form, and cutting in their essence. It affords the noblest lesson to both authors and patrons that stands upon record in the annals of literary history.

“ I have been lately informed by the proprietor of “ The World,” that two papers in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your Lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honour, which, being very little accustomed to favours from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

“ When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by your address, and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre, that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found my attendance so little encouraged, that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing, which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could; and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

“ Seven years, my Lord, have now past, since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time, I have been pushing on my work through difficulties, of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favour. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before.

“ The Shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.

“ Is not a patron, my Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it, till I am solitary, and cannot impart it, till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity, not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing that to a patron, which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

“ Having carried on my work thus far, with so little obligation to any favourer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less; for I have been long wakened from that dream of hope, in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation,— My Lord, your, &c.”

Johnson, however, acknowledged to Mr. Langton, that “ he did once receive ten pounds from Lord Chesterfield; but that, as that was so inconsiderable a sum, he thought the mention of it could not properly find place in a letter of the kind that this was.” Chesterfield read the letter to Dodley with an air of indifference, “ smiled at the several passages, and observed how well they were expressed.” He excused his neglect of Johnson, by saying, “ that he had heard he had changed his lodgings, and did not know where he lived;” and declared, “ that he would have turned off the best servant he ever had, if he had known that he denied him to a man who would have been always more than welcome.” Of Chesterfield’s general affability and easiness of access, especially to literary men, the evidence is unquestionable; but, from the character which he gave of Johnson, in his “ Letters to his Son” [Lett. 112.], and the difference in their manners, little union or friendship could be looked for between them. Certain it is, however, that Johnson remained under an obligation to Chesterfield, to the value of ten pounds.

On the 10th of February, previous to the publication of his Dictionary, the University of Oxford, in anticipation of the excellence of this work, at the solicitation of his friend Mr. Warton, unanimously conferred upon him the degree of Master of Arts; which, it has been observed, could not be obtained for him at an early period, but was now considered as an honour of considerable importance, in order to grace the title-page of his Dictionary.

At length, in May following, his Dictionary, with a Grammar and History of the English Language, was published in 2 vols. folio; and was received by the learned world, who had long wished for its appearance, with an applause proportionable to the impatience which the promise of it had excited. Though we may believe him, in the declaration at the end of his Preface, that he “ dismissed it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise;” we cannot but suppose that he was pleased “ in the gloom of solitude,” with the honour it procured him, both abroad and at home. The Earl of Corke and Orrery, being at Florence, presented it to the Accademia della Crusca. That academy sent Johnson their Vocabulario, and the French Academy sent him their Dictionnaire, by Mr. Langton. As though he had foreseen some of the circumstances which would attend this publication, he observes, "A few wild blunders and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish Folly with laughter, and harden Ignorance into contempt; but useful Diligence will at last prevail, and there can never be wanting some who distinguish desert." Among those who amused themselves and the public on this occasion, Mr. Wilkes, in an Essay printed in the Public Advertiser, ridiculed the following passage in the Grammar. "H seldom, perhaps never begins any but the first syllable." The position is undoubtedly expressed with too much latitude; but Johnson never altered the passage. Dr. Kenrick's threatened attack several years after, in his Review of Johnson's Shakspeare, never saw the light. Campbell's ridicule of his style under the title of "Lexiphanes," 1767, and Callender's "Deformities of Dr. Johnson," 1782, though laughable, from the application of Johnson's "words of large meaning" to insignificant matters, are scarcely worthy of notice. His old pupil, Garrick, complimented him on its coming out first, in the following "Epigram," alluding to the ill-success of the forty members of the French Academy employed in settling their language.

Talk of war with a Briton, he'll boldly advance
That one English soldier will beat ten of France;
Would we alter the boast, from the sword to the pen,
Our odds are still greater, still greater our men;
In the deep mines of science, though Frenchmen may toil,
Can their strength be compar'd to Locke, Newton and Boyle;
Let them rally their heroes, send forth all their powers,
Their versè-men, and prose-men; then match them with our's;
First Shakspeare and Milton, like gods in the fight,
Have put their whole drama and epic to flight;
In satires, epistles, and odes would they cope,
Their numbers retreat before Dryden and Pope,
And Johnson, well-arm'd like a hero of yore,
Has beat forty French, and will beat forty more!

In this year, he afforded his assistance to Mr. Zechariah Williams, father of the blind lady whom he had humanely received under his roof, who had quitted his profession in hopes of obtaining the great parliamentary reward for the discovering of the longitude; and benevolently wrote for him, "An account of an attempt to ascertain the longitude at sea, by an exact theory of the variation of the magnetical needle; with a table of the variations at the most remarkable cities in Europe, from the year 1660, to 1860, 4to. by Zechariah Williams." This pamphlet was published in English and Italian, the translation being the work, as it is supposed, of Mr. Baretti. Mr. Williams failed of success, and died July 12, 1755, in his 83d year. Johnson placed this pamphlet in the Bodleian library, and for fear of any omission or mistake, he entered, in the great catalogue, the title page of it, with his own hand. It appears from his correspondence with Mr. Warton, that he "intended in the winter, 1755, to open a Bibliothèque, or Literary Journal, to be intitled, The Annals of Literature, Foreign as well as Domestic, for which he had made some provision of materials; but the scheme was dropped.

Having spent, during the progress of the work, the money for which he had contracted to write his Dictionary, he was still under the necessity of exerting his talents, "in making provision for the day that was passing over him." The subscriptions taken in for his edition of Shakspeare, and the profits of his miscellaneous essays, were now his principal resource for subsistence; and it appears from the following letter to Richardson, dated Gough-Square, March 16, 1756, that they were insufficient to ward off the distress of an arrest, on a particular emergency.

"I am obliged to entreat your assistance; I am now under an arrest for five pounds eighteen shillings. Mr. Strahan, from whom I should have received the necessary help in this case is not at home, and I am afraid of not finding Mr. Millar. If you could be so good as to send me this sum, I will very gratefully repay you, and add it to all former obligations." In the margin of this letter, there is a memorandum in these words:—"March 16. 1756. Sent six guineas. Witness William Richardson."

"For the honour of an admired writer," says Mr. Murphy, "it is to be regretted that we do not find a more liberal entry." This anecdote may appear to support the parsimony of the author, whose hero gives most profusely; but something may still be said in favour of Richardson. All that Johnson asked was a temporary supply, and that was granted. There was certainly no ostentatious liberality, but a kind action seems to have been done, without delay, and without grudging.

In 1756, he published an abridgment of his Dictionary, in 2 vols, 8vo, and contributed to a publication called "The Universal Visitor," for the assistance of Smart, one of the stated undertakers, with whose unhappy vacillation of mind he sincerely sympathized, all the essays marked with two asterisks, except the "Life of Chaucer," "Reflections on the State of Portugal," and "Essay on Architecture," which want all the characteristic marks of his composition. "Further thoughts on Agriculture," being the sequel of a very inferior essay on the same subject, "A Dissertation on the State of Literature and Authors," and "A Dissertation on the Epitaphs written by Pope," though not marked in the same manner, appear to be the production of Johnson. The last of these, indeed, he afterwards added to his Idler.

He engaged also to superintend and contribute largely to another monthly publication, intituled, "The Literary Magazine, or Universal Review;" the first number of which came out on the 15th of May this year. He continued to write in it, with intermissions, till the fifteenth number. His original essays are, "The Preliminary Address," "An Introduction to the Political State of Great Britain," "Remarks on the Militia Bill," "Observations on his Britannic Majesty's Treaties with the Empress of Russia, and the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel," "Observations on the Present State of Affairs," and "Memoirs of Frederick II. King of Prussia." His reviews of the works of others are, "Birch's History of the Royal Society," "Murphy's Gray's-Inn Journal," "Warton's Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, vol. 1st," "Hampton's Translation of Polybius," "Blackwell's Memoirs of the Court of Augustus," "Ruffel's Natural-History of Aleppo," "Sir Isaac Newton's Arguments in proof of a Deity," "Borlase's History of the Isles of Scilly," "Home's Experiments on Bleaching," "Brown's Christian Morals," "Hales on Distilling Sea-Water, &c." "Lucas's Essay on Waters," "Keith's Catalogue of the Scottish Bishops," "Browne's History of Jamaica," "Philosophical Transactions, vol. 49th," "Mrs. Lenox's Translation of Sully's Memoirs," "Miscellanies by Elizabeth Harrison," "Evans's Map, and Account of the Middle Colonies in America," "Letter on the Case of Admiral Byng," "Appeal to the People concerning Admiral Byng," "Hanway's Eight Day's Journey, and Essay on Tea," "The Cadet, a Military Treatise," "Some further Particulars in relation to the Case of Admiral Byng, by a Gentleman of Oxford," "The Conduct of the Ministry relating to the present War, impartially examined," and "Jenyns's Free Inquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil." Mr. Davies, in his "Miscellaneous and Fugitive Pieces," has ascribed to him the "Review of Burke's Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime, and Sir John Hawkins has inserted it in his collection of Johnson's works; but it was written by Mr. Murphy. In his original essays, he displays extensive political knowledge, expressed with uncommon energy and perspicuity. Some of his reviews are very short accounts of the pieces noticed; but many of them are examples of elaborate criticism, in the most masterly style, particularly the review of Jenyns's "Inquiry into the Origin of Evil." In his defence of tea, against Mr. Hanway's violent attack upon that popular beverage, he describes himself as "a hardened and shameless tea-drinker, who has for many years diluted his meals with only the infusion of this fascinating plant; whose kettle has scarcely time to cool; who with tea amuses the evening, with tea solaces the midnight, and with tea welcomes the morning," te veniente die, te decedente. Mr. Hanway wrote an angry answer to Johnson's review of his "Essay," and Johnson, after a full and deliberate pause, made a reply to it; the only instance in the whole course of his life, when he condescended to oppose any thing that was written against him. Of the good Mr. Hanway he said, "he is a man whose failings may be well pardoned for his virtues."

The same year he gave an edition of Sir Thomas Browne's "Christian Morals," with his Life prefixed to it, which is one of his best biographical performances. He wrote also a Dedication and Preface to the Earl of Rochford to Payne's "Essay on the Game of Draughts," and accepted of a guinea from Dodley, for writing the Introduction to "The London Chronicle;" and even in so slight a performance exhibited peculiar talents. At the same time he issued Proposals of considerable length for his edition of Shakspeare, with notes; and his fancied activity was such, that he promised his work should be published before Christmas 1757, though it was nine years before it saw the light.

About this period he was offered by Mr. Langton, the father of his much valued friend, a living of considerable value in Lincolnshire, if he would accept it and take orders; "but he chose not to put off his lay habit." This year the Ivy-lane club was dissolved, by the dispersion of the members.

In 1757, it does not appear that he published any thing, except some of these essays in the "Literary Magazine," which have been mentioned. That magazine, after he ceased to write in it, gradually declined; and in July 1758, it expired. He dictated, this year, a "Speech on the Subject of an Address to the Throne," after the expedition to Rochefort, which was delivered by one of his friends in a public meeting. It is printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for October 1785.

On the 15th of April 1758, he began The Idler, which came out every Saturday, in a weekly newspaper called the "Universal Chronicle," published by Newbery, and was continued till April 5th 1760. Of 103, the total number of essays, twelve were contributed by his friends; of which Nos. 33, 93, and 96, were written by Mr. Warton, No. 67 by Mr. Langton, and Nos. 76, 79, and 82, by Sir Joshua Reynolds; the concluding words of No. 83, "and pollute his canvas with deformity," being added by Johnson. The Idler is evidently the work of the same mind which produced the Rambler, but has less body and force. It has more variety of real life, and greater facility of language. Yet Nos. 14, 24, 41, 43, 51, 52, 58, and 89, show as much profundity of thought, and labour of language as any of his writings. To The Idler, when collected in volumes, he added (beside the Essay on Epitaphs, and the Dissertation on those of Pope), an Essay on the Bravery of the English Common Soldiers.

In January 1759, his mother died, at the age of ninety; an event which deeply affected him. He regretted his not having gone to visit her for several years previous to her death; but he had long contributed liberally to her support.

Soon after this event, he wrote his Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, that, with the profits, he might defray the expence of his mother's funeral, and pay some little debts which she had left. He told Sir Joshua Reynolds, that he composed it in the evenings of one week, sent it to the press in portions as it was written, and had never since read it over. He received for the copy 100 l. and 25 l. when it came to a second edition. The applause given to the history of Rasselas has been such, as must satisfy an author the most avaricious of fame. It has been translated into various modern languages, and received the admiration of Europe.

During all this year he carried on his Idler, and was proceeding, though slowly, in his edition of Shakspeare. He, however, found time to translate for Mrs. Lenox's English version of Brumoy's "Greek Theatre," "A Dissertation on the Greek Comedy," and the general "conclusion" of the book. On the controversy arising concerning the elliptical or circular form of arches for Blackfriar's bridge, Johnson engaged in it, on behalf of his friend Mr. Gwyn, and wrote three letters in the "Gazetteer," in opposition to the elliptical side of the question; but without any illiberal antipathy to Mr. Mylne, with whom he afterwards lived upon very agreeable terms of acquaintance.

While he was employed in writing The Idler, he quitted his house in Gough-Square, and retired to Gray's-Inn; and soon after Miss Williams went to lodgings. This year he removed to chambers in the Inner-Temple Lane, "where he lived," says Mr. Murphy, "in poverty, total idleness, and the pride of literature, Magni stat nominis umbra. Mr. Fitzherbert (the father of Lord St. Helens), used to say that he paid a morning visit to Johnson, intending from his chambers to send a letter into the city, but, to his great surprize, he found an author by profession, without pen, ink, or paper."

His black servant Francis Barber having left him, and entered on board a man of war, "he was humble enough to desire the assistance" of Smollet in procuring his release. Smollet made interest through Mr. Wilkes, and he was discharged without any wish of his own, in the latter end of 1759, and returned to his master's service.

In 1760, he wrote the "Address of the Painters to George III. on his accession," an "Introduction" to the proceedings of the Committee for Clothing the French prisoners, the "Dedication" for Mr. Baret's, of his "Italian and English dictionary," to the Marquis of Abreu, the Spanish ambassador; and an account of Mr. Tytler's Vindication of Mary, Queen of Scots, in the Gentleman's Magazine for October.

This year Mr. Murphy having thought himself ill treated by Dr. Franklin, in his "Dissertation on Tragedy," published an indignant vindication in "A Poetical Epistle to Samuel Johnson, A. M.," in which he complimented Johnson in a just and elegant manner. This epistle has been reprinted, with considerable alterations and additions, in the collection of his works, in 7 vols, 8vo, 1786. As an ingenious, an elegant, and moral writer, Mr. Murphy is entitled to rank in a superior class. In collecting his works, it is to be regretted that he should have taken so much pains to rescue from oblivion this epistle, written during the violence of literary dissension, and which bears evident marks of an exasperated mind. The expulsion of the respectable names of Dr. Warton and Mr. Maſon from their former places, cannot easily be defended upon any other ground than caprice, or personal dislike.

An acquaintance first commenced between Johnson and Mr. Murphy in the following manner: During the publication of his "Gray's-Inn Journal," Mr. Murphy happened to be in the country with Foote, and having mentioned that he was obliged to go to London to get ready for the press one of the numbers, Foote said to him, "You need not go on that account. Here is a French magazine, in which you will find a very pretty oriental tale; translate that, and send it to your printer." Mr. Murphy having read the tale, was highly pleased with it, and followed Foote's advice. When he returned to town, this tale was pointed out to him in the Rambler, from whence it had been translated into the French Magazine. Mr. Murphy then waited upon Johnson, to explain this curious incident; and a friendship was formed, that continued without interruption till the death of Johnson.

In 1761, he wrote for the booksellers the "Preface" to Rolt's Dictionary of Trade and Commerce: which displays a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the subject, though he "never (as he said) saw the man, and never read the book." He also corrected a pamphlet written by Mr. Gwyn, intitled "Thoughts on the Coronation of George III." and wrote for Mr. Newbery the Introduction to a collection of voyages and travels published by him, under the title of "The World Displayed;" which contains, in a pleasing style, the history of navigation, and the discovery of America and the islands of the West Indies.

In 1762, he wrote for Dr. Kennedy, in a strain of very courtly elegance, A Dedication to the King, of his "Complete System of Astronomical Chronology," "Dedication" for Mrs. Lenox, to the Earl of Middlesex, of her "Female Quixotte," and the "Preface" to the "Catalogue of the Artist's Exhibition."

In this year, Fortune, who had hitherto left him to struggle with the inconveniencies of a precarious subsistence, arising entirely from his own labours, gave him that independence which his talents and virtues long before ought to have obtained for him. In the month of July he was graced with a pension of 300 l. per annum, by the King, as a recompence for the honour which the excellence of his writings, and the benefit which their moral tendency had been of to these kingdoms. He obtained it by the interference of Lord Bute, then first Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, upon the suggestion of Mr. Wedderburn, now Lord Loughborough, at the instance of Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Murphy. For this independence he paid the usual tax. Envy and resentment soon made him the mark to shoot their arrows at. Some appeared to think themselves more entitled to royal favour, and others recollected his political opinions and sentiments of the reigning family. By some he was censured as an apostate, and by others ridiculed for becoming a pensioner. The "North Briton" supplied himself with arguments against the Minister for rewarding a Tory and a Jacobite, and Churchill satirized his political versatility with the most poignant severity.

How to all principles untrue,
Not fix'd to old friends, nor to new;
He damns the pension which he takes,
And loves the Stuart he forsakes.

By this acceptance of the king's bounty, he had undoubtedly subjected himself to the appellation of a pensioner, to which he had annexed an ignominious definition in his Dictionary. He had received a favour from two Scotchmen, against whose country he had joined in the rabble cry of indiscriminating invective. It was thus that even-handed Justice commended the poisoned chalice to his own lips, and compelled him to an awkward, though not unpleasant penance, for indulging in a splenetic prejudice, equally unworthy of his understanding and his heart.

The affair itself was equally honourable to the giver and the receiver. The offer was clogged with no stipulations for party services, and accepted under no implied idea of being recompensed by political writings. It was perfectly understood by all parties, that the pension was merely honorary.

It is true that Johnson did afterwards write political pamphlets in favour of administration, but it was at a period long subsequent to the grant of his pension, and in support of a minister to whom he owed no personal obligation. It was for the establishment of opinions, which, however unconstitutional, he had uniformly held, and publicly avowed.

In 1763, he furnished to "The Poetical Calendar," published by Fawkes and Woty, a Character of Collins, which he afterwards engrafted into his entire Life of Collins. He also favoured Mr. Hoole with the Dedication of his translation of Tasso to the Queen.

This year Mr. Boswell was introduced to Johnson, by Mr. Davies the bookseller, and continued to live in the greatest intimacy with him from that time till his death.

Churchill, in his "Ghost," availed himself of the common opinion of Johnson's credulity, and drew a caricature of him, under the name of Pomposo; representing him as one of the believers of the story of a ghost in Cock-Lane, which in 1762 had gained very general credit in London. Johnson made no reply; "for with other wife folks he sat up with the ghost." Posterity must be allowed to smile at the credulity of that period. Contrary, however, to the common opinion of Johnson's credulity, Mr. Boswell asserts that he was a principal agent in detecting the imposture; and undeceived the world, by publishing an account of it in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for January 1762. Yet by the circumstances of the examination, he seems to have gone with almost a willingness to believe, and a mind scarcely in suspense. He would have been glad to see a traveller from that undiscovered country, over which, like the rest of mankind, he saw nothing but clouds and darkness.

In one of the conversations at the Mitre Tavern this year, Mr. Boswell relates the following instance of Johnson's profound and liberal way of thinking, on a very nice constitutional point, which may, in some measure, render people cautious of pronouncing decisively on his political creed.

"Goldsmith disputed very warmly with Johnson, against the well-known maxim of the British constitution, "The king can do no wrong," affirming, that what was morally false, could not be politically true; and as the king might, in the exercise of his regal power, command, and cause the doing of what was wrong, it certainly might be said, in sense and in reason, that he could do wrong." Johnson. "Sir, you are to consider, that in our constitution, according to its true principles, the king is the head, he is supreme, he is above every thing, and there is no power by which he can be tried. Therefore it is, Sir, that we hold the king can do no wrong; that whatever may happen to be wrong in government may not be above our reach, by being ascribed to majesty. Redress is always to be had against oppression, by punishing the immediate agents. The king, though he should command, cannot force a judge to condemn a man unjustly; therefore it is the judge whom we prosecute and punish. Political institutions are formed on the consideration of what will most frequently tend to the good of the whole, although now and then exceptions may occur. Thus it is better that a nation should have a supreme legislative power, although it may at times be abused. And then, Sir, there is this consideration, that, if the abuse be enormous, nature will rise up, and claiming her original right, overturn a corrupt political system."

"This generous sentiment," Mr. Boswell adds, "which he uttered with great fervour, struck me exceedingly, and stirred my blood to that pitch of fancied resistance, the possibility of which I am glad to keep in mind, but to which, I trust, I shall never be forced."

In this year, he also wrote the "Life of Asham," and the "Dedication to the Earl of Shaftsbury," prefixed to the edition of his English works, published by Mr. Bennet.

To enlarge his circle, and to find opportunities for conversation, Johnson once more had recourse to a club. In February 1764, was founded that club, which afterwards became distinguished by the title of the LITERARY CLUB. Sir Joshua Reynolds was the first proposer, to which Johnson acceded; and the original members were, beside himself, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Burke, Dr. Nugent, Mr. Beauclerk, Mr. Langton, Mr. Chancier, Sir John Hawkins, and Goldsmith. They met at the Turk's Head, in Gerard Street, Soho, on every Monday evening through the year.

He wrote this year "A Review" of Grainger's "Sugar Cane," in the "London Chronicle," in conjunction with Dr. Percy, and an account of Goldsmith's "Traveller," in the "Critical Review."

About this time, he was afflicted with a severe return of the hypochondriac disorder, which was ever lurking about him. He was so ill as to be entirely averse to society, the most fatal symptom of that malady.

The succeeding year, 1765, was remarkable for the commencement of his acquaintance with Henry Thrale, Esq. one of the most eminent brewers in England, and member of parliament for Southwark. Mr. Murphy, who was intimate with Mr. Thrale, having spoken very highly of Johnson's conversation, he was requested to make them acquainted. This being mentioned to Johnson, he accepted an invitation to dinner at Mr. Thrale's, and was so much pleased with his reception, both by Mr. and Mrs. Thrale, and they so much pleased with him, that his invitations to their house were more and more frequent; till at last, in 1776, he became one of the family, and an apartment was appropriated to him, both in their house in Southwark, and in their villa at Streatham.

Nothing could be more fortunate for Johnson than this connection. He had at Mr. Thrale's all the comforts, and even the luxuries of life; his melancholy was diverted, and his irregular habits lessened by association with an agreeable and well-ordered family. He was treated with the utmost respect and even affection. Johnson had a very sincere esteem for Mr. Thrale, as a man of excellent principles, a good scholar, well-skilled in trade, of a sound understanding, and of manners such as presented the character of a plain independent English squire. He understood and valued Johnson, without remission, from their first acquaintance to the day of his death. Of Mrs. Thrale, now Mrs. Piozzi, a lady of lively parts, improved by education, "less cannot be said," says Mr. Tyers, "than that in one of the latter opinions of Johnson:" "If she was not the wisest woman in the world, she was undoubtedly one of the wittiest." She took such care of him, during an illness of some continuance, that Goldsmith told her, "he owed his life to her attention." "To a natural vivacity in conversation, she had reading enough, and the gods had made her poetical." The vivacity of Mrs. Thrale's literary talk roused him to cheerfulness and attention, even when they were alone. But this was not often the case; for he found here a constant succession of what gave him the highest enjoyment. The society of the learned, the witty, and the eminent in every way, who were assembled in numerous companies, called forth his wonderful powers, and gratified him with admiration, to which no man could be insensible.

There is something in the conduct of this worthy possessor of wealth, which the mind loves to contemplate. Next to the possession of great powers, the most enviable qualities, are a capacity to discover, and an inclination to honour them. To the credit of Thrale, let it be recorded, that the patron of literature and talents, of which Johnson sought in vain for the traces in Chesterfield, he found realized in Thrale.

In July of this year, he was complimented by the University of Dublin with the degree of Doctor of Laws, as the Diploma expresses 'it, ob ægegiæ scriptorum elegantiam et utilitatem, though he does not appear to have taken the title in consequence of it. In October, he at length gave to the world his edition of The Plays of William Shakespeare, with the Corrections and Illustrations of various Commentators; to which are added, Notes by Sam. Johnson, 8vo; which, as far as it fell short of affording that ample satisfaction which was expected from it, may be ascribed to his not having "read the books which the author read, traced his knowledge to the source, and compared his copies with their originals;" a promise he gave, but was not able to perform. Sir John Hawkins thinks it a meagre work; he complains of the paucity of the notes, of Johnson's want of industry, and indeed unfitness for the office of a Scholiast. It was treated with great illiberality by Dr. Kenrick, in the first part of a "Review" of it, which was never completed. It is to be admitted, that he has neither so fully reformed the text, by accurate collations of the first editions, nor so fairly illustrated his author, in his notes, by quotations from the "writers who lived at the same time, immediately preceded, or immediately followed him," as has been done by other able and ingenious critics, who have followed him; Mr. Steevens, Mr. Capel, Mr. Malone, Mr. Reed, &c. whose labours have left little to add to the commentaries on Shakspeare. But what he did as a commentator, has no small share of merit, though his researches were not so ample, and his investigations so acute as they might have been. He has enriched his edition with a concise account of each play, and of its characteristic excellence. In the sagacity of his emendatory criticisms, and the happiness of his interpretations of obscure passages, he surpasses every editor of this poet. Mr. Malone confesses, "that Johnson's vigorous and comprehensive understanding threw more light on his author, than all his predecessors had done." His Preface has been pronounced by Mr. Malone, to be the finest composition in our language; and having regard to its subject and extent, it certainly would be difficult to name one possessing a superior claim to such superlative praise. Whether we consider the beauty and vigour of its composition, the abundance and classical selection of its allusions, the justness of the general precepts of criticism, and its accurate estimate of the excellencies or defects of his author, it is equally admirable. He seems to raise his talents upon a level with those of his poet, upon whose works he sits as a critical judge, to rival, by the lustre of his praises, the splendour of the original, and to follow this eagle of British poetry through all his gyres, with as keen an eye, and upon as strong a wing. The Preface to his Dictionary, correct as it is, must yield the palm of excellence to that prefixed to his Shakspeare; but it yields it only because the subject was less favourable to the full display of his powers.

In 1766, he removed from the Inner-Temple Lane, to a good house in Johnson's-Court, Fleet Street, in which he accommodated Miss Williams with an apartment on the ground floor, while Mr. Levett occupied his post in the garret.

This year he only wrote the Dedication to the King, of Gwyn's "London and Westminster Improved," and furnished the Preface, and the following pieces for Miss Williams's "Miscellanies in Prose and Verse," 4to: The Ant, "To Miss —, on her giving the Author a Gold and Silk Net-work Purse of her own weaving;" "The Happy Life, On the Death of Stephen Gray, the Electrician," and "The Fountains," a Fairy Tale, in Prose. The first sketch of the poem on Stephen Gray, was written by Miss Williams, but Johnson told Mr. Boswell, "that he wrote it all over again, except two lines." This publication was encouraged by a genteel subscription.

In 1767, he only wrote the Dedication to the King, for Mr. Adams's "Treatise on the Globes." In February, he was honoured by a private conversation with the king, in the library at Buckingham House, "which gratified his monarchic enthusiasm." The interview was sought by the king without the knowledge of Johnson. His majesty, among other things, asked the author of so many valuable works, if he intended to publish any more. Johnson modestly answered, that he thought he had written enough. "And so should I too," replied the king, "if you had not written so well." Johnson was highly pleased with his majesty's courtesies; and afterwards observed to Mr. Langton, "Sir, his manners are those of as fine a gentleman, as we may suppose Lewis XIV. or Charles II."

Johnson had now arrived at that eminence which is the prize that cultivated genius always struggles for, and but seldom obtains. His fortune, though not great, was adequate to his wants, and of most honourable acquisition; for it was derived from the produce of his labours, and the rewards which his country had bestowed upon merit. He received during life that unqualified applause from the world which is in general paid only to departed excellence, and he beheld his fame seated firmly in the public mind, without the danger of its being shaken by obloquy, or the hazard of its being shared by a rival. He could number among his friends the greatest and most improved talents of the country. His company was courted by wealth, dignity, and beauty; his many peculiarities were overlooked, or forgotten in the admiration of his understanding, while his virtues were regarded with veneration, and his opinions adopted with submission. Of the usual insensibility of mankind to living merit, Johnson, at least, had no reason to complain.

In 1768, nothing of his writing was given to the public, except the Prologue to his friend Goldsmith's comedy of the "Good Natured Man."

In 1769, he was altogether quiescent as an author. On the establishment of the Royal Academy this year, he accepted the title of Professor of Ancient Literature.

In 1770, he published a political pamphlet, intituled The False Alarm, 8vo.; intended to justify the conduct of ministry, and their majority in the House of Commons, for having virtually assumed it as an axiom, that the expulsion of a member of parliament was equivalent to exclusion, and their having declared Colonel Luttrell to be duly elected for the county of Middlesex, notwithstanding Mr. Wilkes had a great majority of votes. This being very justly considered as a gross violation of the right of election; an alarm for the constitution extended itself all over the kingdom. To prove this alarm to be false, was the purpose of Johnson's pamphlet; but his arguments and eloquence failed of effect, and the House of Commons has since erased the offensive resolution from the Journals. This pamphlet has great merit in point of language; but it contains much gross misrepresentation, and much malignity, and abounds with such arbitrary principles, as are totally inconsistent with a free constitution.

The next year, 1771, he defended the measures adopted by the ministry, in the dispute with the court of Spain, in a pamphlet intitled Thoughts on the late Transactions respecting Falkland's Island, 8vo. On the subject of Falkland's Islands, spots "thrown aside from human use, barren in summer, and stormy in winter," he appears to have followed the direction, and adopted the opinions which a pusillanimous administration wished to inculcate. They were certainly erroneous in a political view and if they were his own, show that on such subjects he was incapable of forming a just opinion. His description of the miseries of war, in this pamphlet, is a fine piece of eloquence, and his character of Junius is executed with all the force of his genius, and with the highest care.

When Johnson shone in the plenitude of his political glory, from the celebrity of his ministerial pamphlets, an attempt was made to bring him into the House of Commons, by Mr. Strahan, the king's printer, who was himself in parliament, and wrote to the secretary of the treasury upon the subject; but the application was unsuccessful. Whether there were any particular reasons for the refusal, has not transpired. That Johnson very much wished to "try his hand" in the senate, he has himself declared; but that he would have succeeded as a parliamentary speaker, is at least doubtful. Few have distinguished themselves as orators, who have not begun the practice of speaking in public early in life; and it may be doubted whether the habits of regular and correct composition are not unfavourable to that quick unpremeditated elocution which is so much admired, and so useful in animated debate. This at least is certain, that of the many persons eminent for literary abilities, who have had seats in parliament, none have gained a reputation for eloquence commensurate with their talents and information; and of Johnson, in particular, it is reported upon the authority of Sir William Scott, that he had several times tried to speak in the Society of Arts &c. but "had found that he could not get on." It was observed by the late Henry Flood, Esq. who was himself an eminent orator, that "Johnson having been long used to sententious brevity, and the short flights of conversation, might have failed in that continued and expanded kind of argument which is requisite in stating complicated matters in public speaking."

In 1772, he produced no literary performance. His only publication in 1773, was a new edition of his Dictionary, with additions and corrections. In the autumn of 1773, he gratified a "wish which he had so long entertained, that he scarcely remembered how it was formed, of visiting the Hebrides, or western islands of Scotland." He was accompanied by Mr. Boswell, "whose acuteness," he afterwards observed, "would help his inquiry, and whose gaiety of conversation, and civility of manners, were sufficient to counteract the inconveniencies of travel in countries less hospitable than those they were to pass."

His stay in Scotland was from the 18th of August, till the 22d of November, when he set out on his return to London. His various adventures, and the force and vivacity of his mind, as exercised during his tour, have been described by Mr. Boswell, in his "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," 8vo, 1786, in a style that shows he possessed, in an eminent degree, the skill to give connection to miscellaneous matter, and vivacity to the whole of his narrative.

At the approach of the general election, in 1774, he published a short political pamphlet, intitled The Patriot; addressed to the Electors of Great Britain, 8vo, not with any visible application to Mr. Wilkes, but to teach the people to reject the leaders of opposition, who called themselves patriots. It was called for, he tells us, by his political friends, on Friday, and was written on Saturday.

The first effort of his pen, in 1775, was "Proposals for publishing by subscription, the works of Mrs. Charlotte Lennox, in 3 vols. 4to," which was soon succeeded by a pamphlet, intitled Taxation no Tyranny: An Answer to the Resolutions and Address of the American Congress, 8vo. The scope of the argument was, that distant colonies which had in their assemblies a legislature of their own; were, notwithstanding, liable to be taxed in a British Parliament, where they had neither peers in one house, nor representatives in the other. The principle has been long abandoned; but Johnson was of opinion, that this country was strong enough to enforce obedience; "When" says he, "an Englishman is told that the Americans shoot up like a hydra, he naturally considers how the hydra was destroyed." The event has shown how much he was mistaken. This pamphlet was written at the desire of the ministry, and in some places corrected by them. It contained the same positive assertions, sarcastical severity, extravagant ridicule, and arbitrary principles with his former political pieces, and the grossest and most virulent abuse of the Americans.

These pamphlets were published on his own account, and were afterwards collected by him into a volume under the title of Political Tracts, by the Author of the Rambler, 8vo. 1775.

In the month of March, this year, he was gratified by the title of Doctor of Laws, conferred on him by the University of Oxford, at the solicitation of Lord North. In September he visited France, for the first time, with Mr. and Mrs. Thrale, and Mr. Baretti; and returned to England in about two months after he quitted it. Footc, who happened to be in Paris at the same time, said, that the French were perfectly astonished at his figure and manner, and at his dress; which was exactly the same with what he was accustomed to in London: his brown clothes, black stockings, and plain shirt. Of the occurrences of this tour, he kept a journal, in all probability, with a design of writing an account of it. The world has to regret, that from want of leisure or inclination, he never perfected it.

This year he also wrote the Preface to Mr. Baretti's "Lessons, Italian and English," and published an account of his Tour to the Hebrides, under the title of A Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland, 8vo. This elegant narrative has been variously praised and abused in the newspapers, magazines, and other fugitive publications. It was formally attacked by the Rev. Donald M'Nicol, in his "Remarks" &c. 8vo. 1780. That it is written with an undue prejudice against both the country and people of Scotland, must be allowed; but it abounds in extensive philosophical views of society, and in ingenious sentiments, and lively description. Among many other disquisitions equally instructive and amusing, he expresses his disbelief of the authenticity of the poems of Ossian, presented to the public as a translation from the Eric, in such terms as honest indignation is apt to hurl against imposition. If there was a manuscript, in what age was it written? and where is it? If it was collected from oral recitation in different parts of the Highlands, who put it together in its present form? These, and such like observations, provoked the resentment of Mr. Macpherson; he sent a threatening letter to the author, and Johnson answered him in the rough phrase of stern defiance.

"I received your foolish and impudent letter. Any violence offered me, I shall do my best to repel; and what I cannot do for myself, the law shall do for me. I hope I shall never be deterred from detecting what I think a cheat by the menaces of a ruffian.

"What would you have me retract? I thought your book an imposture; I think it an imposture still. For this opinion I have given my reasons to the public, which I here dare you to refute. Your rage, I defy. Your abilities, since your Homer, are not so formidable; and what I hear of your morals inclines me to pay regard not to what you shall say, but what you shall prove. You may print this if you will."

The threats alluded to in this letter never were attempted to be put in execution. But Johnson, as a provision for defence, furnished himself with a large oaken plant, six feet in height, of the diameter of an inch at the lower end, increasing to three inches at the top, and terminating in a head (once the root) of the size of a large orange. This he kept in his bed-chamber, so near his chair, as to be within his reach.

In 1776, he wrote nothing for the public. This year he removed from No. 7. Johnson's Court, to a larger house, No. 8. Bolt-Court, Fleet-Street, with a garden "which he took delight in watering." A room on the ground-floor was assigned to Miss Williams, and the whole of the two pair of stairs floors was made a repository for his books, consisting of about 5000 volumes. Here, in the intervals of his residence at Streatham, he sat every morning receiving visits, and hearing the topics of the day, and indolently trifling away the time; and to the most intimate of his friends, Dr. Burney, Mr. Hoole, Mr. Murphy, Mr. Davies, Mr. Baretti, Mr. Boswell, Mr. Langton, &c. sometimes gave, not elegant dinners. Chemistry afforded some amusement. In Gough-Square, and in Johnson's Court, he had an apparatus for that purpose; and the same, with perhaps a few additions, was now fixed up in Bolt-Court. He had also a sort of laboratory at Streatham, and diverted himself with drawing essences, and colouring liquors for Mrs. Thrale.

Johnson's benevolence to the unfortunate, was, at all periods of his life, very remarkable. In his house at Bolt-Court, an apartment was appropriated to Mrs. Desmoulins, daughter of his god-father, Dr. Swinfen, and widow of Mr. Desmoulins, a writing-master, and her daughter, and a Miss Carmichael. Such was his humanity, and such his generosity, that he allowed Mrs. Desmoulins half-a-guinea a-week, which was above a twelfth part of his pension.

"It seems" says Mrs. Piozzi, "at once vexatious and comical, to reflect that the dissensions those people chose to live in, distressed and mortified him exceedingly. He really was oftentimes afraid of going home, because he was sure to be met at the door with numberless complaints, and he used to lament pathetically to me, and to Mr. Sastres, the Italian master, who was much his favourite, that they made his life miserable, from the impossibility he found of making theirs happy; when every favour he bestowed on one, was wormwood to the rest. If, however, I ventured to blame their ingratitude, and condemn their conduct, he would instantly set about softening the one, and justifying the other; and finished commonly by telling me, that I knew not to make allowances for situations I never experienced.

To thee no reason, who know'st only good,
But evil halt not try'd. Milton."

In 1777, the fate of Dr. Dodd excited Johnson's compassion, and called forth the strenuous exertion of his vast comprehensive mind. He thought his sentence just; yet, perhaps, fearing that religion might suffer from the errors of one of its ministers, he endeavoured to prevent the last ignominious spectacle. He wrote for that unhappy man, his Speech to the Recorder of London, at the Old Bailey, when the sentence of death was about to be pronounced upon him; The Convict's Address to his Unhappy Brethren, a sermon delivered by him in the chapel of Newgate; two Letters, one to Lord Chancellor Bathurst, and one to Lord Mansfield; A Petition from Dr. Dodd to the King; A Petition from Mrs. Dodd to the Queen; Observations in the newspapers, on occasion of Earl Percy's having presented a petition for mercy to Dodd, signed by twenty thousand people; A Petition from the city of London, and Dr. Dodd's Last Solemn Declaration, which he left with the sheriff at the place of execution.

In the summer he wrote a Prologue to Kelly's comedy of "A Word to the Wife," acted at Covent-Garden theatre, for one night, for the benefit of the author's widow and children. He also made some additions to the life of Bishop Pearce (who assisted him with some etymologies in the compilation of his dictionary), prefixed to his posthumous works, in 2 vols. 4to., and wrote the Dedication to the King.

This year he engaged to write a concise account of the Lives of the English Poets, whose works were inserted in an edition undertaken by the London booksellers, at that time, in opposition to the edition of the "British Poets," printing by the Martins at Edinburgh, and to be sold by Mr. Bell in London. As a recompence for an undertaking, as he thought, "not very tedious or difficult," he bargained for two hundred guineas; and was afterwards presented by the proprietors with one hundred pounds. His design was only to have allotted to every poet an Advertisement, like that which we find in the French miscellanies, containing a few dates, and a general character, which would have conferred not much reputation upon the writer, nor have communicated much information to his readers. Happily for both, "the honest desire of giving useful pleasure," led him beyond his first intention. In executing this limited design, he found his attention so much engaged, that he enlarged his scheme, and entered more fully into the merits and value of the principal writers; and produced an ample, rich, and entertaining view of them in every respect. The first four volumes of this work were published in 1779, under the title of Biographical and Critical Prefaces, and the remaining five in 1781. "Some time in March" he says, in his Meditations, "I finished the Lives of the Poets, which I wrote in my usual way, dilatorily and hastily, unwilling to work, and working with vigour and haste." In a memorandum previous to this, he says of them: "Written, I hope, in such a manner, as may tend to the promotion of piety."

In the selection of the poets he had no responsible concern; but Blackmore, Watts, Pomfret, and Yalden, were inserted by his recommendation; and Mr. Nichols tells us, he was frequently consulted during the printing of the collection, and revised many of the sheets.

This was the last of Johnson's literary labours; and though completed when he was in his seventy-first year, shows that his faculties were in as vigorous a state as ever. His judgment and his taste, his quickness in the discrimination of motives, and facility of moral reflection, shine as strongly in these narratives, as in any of his more early performances, and his style, if not so energetic, is at least more smoothed down to the taste of the generality of critical objectors.

The Lives of the English Poets formed a memorable era in Johnson's life. It is a work which has contributed to immortalize his name, and has secured that rational esteem which party or partiality could not procure, and which even the injudicious zeal of his friends has not been able to lessen.

From the close of his last great work, the malady that persecuted him through life came upon him with redoubled force. His constitution declined fast, and the fabric of his mind seemed to be tottering. The contemplation of his approaching end was constantly before his eyes; and the prospect of death, he declared, was terrible.

On the 4th of May 1781, he lost his valuable friend Thrale, who appointed him one of his executors, with a legacy of 200l. "I felt," he said, "almost the last flutter of his pulse, and looked for the last time upon the face that, for fifteen years, had never been turned upon me, but with respect and benignity." Of his departed friend he has given a true character in a Latin epitaph, to be seen in the church of Streatham.

With Thrale, many of the comforts of Johnson's life may be said to have expired. In the course of 1782, he complains that he "passed the summer at Streatham, but there was no Thrale." In the same year he received another shock. He was suddenly deprived of his old domestic companion Levett, and paid a tribute to his memory in an affecting and characteristic Elegy.

The successive losses of those acquaintances whom kindness had rendered dear, or habit made necessary to him, reminded Johnson of his own mortality.

After the death of Thrale, his visits to Streatham, where he no longer looked upon himself as a welcome guest, became less and less frequent; and on the 5th of April 1783, he took his final leave of Mrs. Thrale, to whom, for near twenty years, he was under the highest obligations.

"The original reason of our connection," says Mrs. Piozzi, in her lively and entertaining "Anecdotes," his particularly disordered health and spirits, had been long at an end. Veneration for his virtue, reverence for his talents, delight in his conversation, and habitual endurance of a yoke my husband first put upon me, and of which he contentedly bore his share for sixteen or seventeen years, made me go on so long with Mr. Johnson; but the perpetual confinement, I will own to have been terrifying in the first years of our friendship, and irksome in the last; nor would I pretend to support it without help, when my coadjutor was no more."

A friendly correspondence continued, however, between Johnson and Mrs. Thrale, without interruption, till the Summer following, when she retired to Bath, and informed him, that she was going to dispose of herself in marriage, to Signior Piozzi, an Italian music master. Johnson, in his relation of executor to her husband, as also in gratitude to his memory, was under an obligation to promote the welfare of his family. He endeavoured, therefore, by prudent counsels and friendly admonition, to prevent that which he thought one of the greatest evils which could befall the children of his friend, the alienation of the affections of their mother. "The answer to his friendly monition," says Sir John Hawkins, "I have seen; it is written from Bath, and contains an indignant vindication, as well of her conduct as her fame, an inhibition of Johnson from following her to Bath, and a farewell, concluding, "Till you have changed your opinion of ———, let us converse no more." In his last letter, 8th July 1784, directed to Mrs. Piozzi, who then had announced her marriage to him: "he says, "I breathe out one sigh more of tenderness, perhaps useless, but at least sincere." He gives her his best advice, and adds, "the tears stand in my eyes."

Excluded from the dwelling and family of his friend, he was compelled to return to his own house, to spend cheerless hours among the objects of his bounty, when increasing age and infirmities had made their company more obnoxious than when he left them, and the society of which he had been recently deprived, rendered him, by comparison, less patient to endure it.

From this time, the narrative of his life is little more than a recital of the pressures of melancholy and disease, and of numberless excursions, taken to calm his anxiety, and sooth his apprehensions of the terrors of death, by flying, as it were, from himself. He was now doomed to feel all those calamities incident to length of days, which he had so eloquently enumerated in his Vanity of Human Wishes.

On the 17th of June 1783, he was afflicted with a paralytic stroke, which deprived him of speech; from which, however, he gradually recovered; so that in July he was able to make a visit to Mr. Langton, at Rochester; and made little excursions, as easily as at any time of his life.

In September, while he was on a visit at Heale, the seat of Mr. Bowles, in Wiltshire, he lost Mrs. Williams, whose death he lamented with all the tenderness which a long connection naturally inspires. This was another shock to a mind like his, ever agitated with the dread of his own dissolution.

Besides the palsy, he was all this year afflicted with the gout, as well as with a sarcoscele, which he bore with uncommon firmness.

In December, he sought a weak refuge from anxiety, in the institution of a weekly club, at the Effex Head, in Effex Street, then kept by an old servant of Mr. Thrale's; but the amusement which he promised himself from this institution, was but of short duration.

In the beginning of the year 1784, he was seized with a spasmodic asthma, which was soon accompanied by some degree of dropsy. From the latter of these complaints, however, he was greatly relieved by a course of medicine.

The interval of convalescence, which he enjoyed during the Summer, induced him to express a wish to visit Italy. Upon this subject, however, his wishes had been anticipated by the anxiety of his friends to preserve his health. His pension not being deemed by them adequate to support the expence of the journey, application was made to the minister, by Mr. Boswell and Sir Joshua Reynolds, unknown to Johnson, through Lord Chancellor Thurlow, for an augmentation of it, by 200*l*. The application was unsuccessful; but the Chancellor, in the handsomest manner offered to let him have 500*l*. from his own purse, under the appellation of a loan, but with the intention of conferring it as a present. It is also to be recorded to the honour of Dr. Brocklesby, that he offered to contribute 100*l*. per annum, during his residence abroad. Johnson, however, declined both these offers, with a gratitude and dignity of sentiment, rising almost to an equal elevation with the generosity of Lord Thurlow, and Dr. Brocklesby; and, indeed, he was now approaching fast to a state in which money could be of no avail.

In the beginning of July, he set out on a visit to Dr. Taylor, at Ashbourn in Derbyshire, where his complaints appear to have met with but little alleviation. From Derbyshire he proceeded to Litchfield, to take a last view of his native city. After leaving Litchfield, he visited Birmingham and Oxford, and arrived in London on the 16th of November.

The fine and firm feelings of friendship which occupied so large a portion of Johnson's heart, were eminently displayed, in the many tender interviews which took place between him and his friends in the country, during his excursion into the North: an excursion which seems to have been undertaken rather from a sense of his approaching dissolution, and a warm wish to bid those he loved a last and long farewell, than from any rational hope that air and exercise would restore him to his former health and vigour.

Soon after his return to London, both the asthma and dropsy became more violent and distressful. Eternity presented to his imagination an awful prospect, and with as much virtue as in general is the lot of man, he shuddered at the approach of his dissolution. He felt strong perturbations of mind. His friends endeavoured all in their power to awaken the comfortable reflections of a life well spent. They prayed with him, and Johnson poured out occasionally the warmest effusions of piety and devotion.

He had for some time kept a journal in Latin of the state of his illness, and the remedies which he used, under the title of Ægri Ephemeris, which he began on the 6th July, but continued it no longer than the 8th November, finding, perhaps, that it was a mournful and unavailing register.

His attention to the cause of literature was evinced, among other circumstances, by his communicating to Mr. Nichols a list of the original authors of "The Universal History," mentioning their several shares in that work. It has, according to his direction, been deposited in the "British Museum," and is printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for December 1784. His integrity was evinced, by paying a small debt to Mr. Faden, which he had borrowed of his father, and a larger one to Mr. Hamilton. But the question will recur, why were these debts so long suffered to remain? for we cannot suppose that his mind was suddenly enlightened, and his memory renovated.

During his sleepless nights also, he amused himself by translating into Latin verse, from the Greek, many of the Epigrams in the Antologia.

The sense of his situation predominated, and "his affection for his departed relations," says Mr. Boswell, "seemed to grow warmer as he approached nearer to the time when he might hope to see them again." In a letter to Mr. Green, at Litchfield, 2d December 1784, he inclosed the Epitaph on his father, mother, and brother, and ordered it to be engraved on a stone, "deep, massy, and hard," and laid on "the exact place of interment," in the middle aisle of St. Michael's church. In the Summer he laid a stone with a Latin Epitaph over his wife in the chapel of Bromley, in Kent.

During his illness he experienced the steady and kind attachment of his numerous friends. Nobody was more attentive to him than Mr. Langton, to whom he tenderly said, Te tenam morians deficiente manu. Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Warren, Dr. Butter, and Mr. Cruickshank, generously attended him without accepting any fees; and all that could be done from professional skill and ability, was done, to prolong a life so truly valuable. But his constitution was decayed beyond the restorative powers of the medical art. Unfortunately for him, he himself had a smattering of the medical science; and imagining that the dropsical collection of water which oppressed him, might be drawn off, by making incisions in the calves of his legs, with his usual defiance of pain, cut deep, when he thought Mr. Cruickshank had done it too tenderly. An effusion of blood followed, which brought on a dozing. Previous to his dissolution, he burnt indiscriminately large masses of papers, and among others, two quarto volumes, "containing a full and most particular Account of his own Life," the loss of which is much to be regretted. The last days of this great man's existence appear to have been unclouded by the gloomy apprehensions which he had formerly entertained. Full of resignation, strengthened in faith, and joyful in hope, on the 13th of December, in the evening, being in the 75th year of his age, he resigned his breath with so much composure, that his death was only known by the ceasing of his respiration, which had been rendered difficult by debility and asthma. He was buried in Westminster-Abbey, near the foot of Shakspeare's monument, and close to the coffin of his friend Garrick. His funeral was attended by a respectable number of his friends; particularly by many of the members of the LITERARY CLUB, who were then in town, and several of the reverend chapter of Westminster. His school-fellow and friend, Dr. Taylor, read the funeral service. Agreeable to his own request, a large blue flag-stone was placed over his grave, with this inscription:

SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL. D.
Obiit XIII die Decembris
Anno Domini
M DCC LXXXV.
Ætatis sue LXXV.

A monument for Johnson, in the Cathedral church of St. Paul's, in conjunction with the illustrious Howard, was resolved upon, with the approbation of the Dean and Chapter, in 1789, and has been supported by a most respectable contribution. It is in such forwardness, that it is expected to be opened in October 1795.

Having no near relations, he left the bulk of his property, amounting to 1500 l. to his faithful servant, Francis Barber, whom he looked upon as particularly under his protection, and whom he had all along treated as an humble friend. He appointed Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. (now Sir) William Scott, his executors.

His death attracted the public attention in an uncommon degree, and was followed by an unprecedented accumulation of literary honours, in the various forms of Sermons, Elegies, Memoirs, Lives, Essays, and Anecdotes. A sermon on that event was preached before the University of Oxford, by Mr. Augutter; and Dr. Fordyce, in his "Addresses to the Deity," 12mo, 1785; and an "Epitaph" printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1785, paid an elegant and affectionate tribute to his memory. The "Elegy on the Death of Dr. Johnson," by Samuel Hobhouse, Esq. 4to, 1785, was distinguished from the mass of elegiac verses on that occasion; and the just, discriminative, and elegant "Poetical Review of the Moral and Literary Character of Dr. Johnson," by John Courtenay, Esq. M. P. 4to. 1788, was perused with avidity by the admirers of wit and learning, and the real friend of virtue and liberty. His conduct and genius were examined and illustrated in the rapid "Biographical Sketch of Dr. Johnson," by Thomas Tyers, Esq. in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1784; the sprightly and entertaining "Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson," by Mrs. Piozzi, 8vo 1785; the candid and judicious "Essay on the Life, Character, and Writings of Dr. Johnson," by Joseph Towers, LL. D. 8vo, 1786; and the instructive and interesting "Life of Samuel Johnson LL. D." by James Boswell, Esq. 2 vols, 4to, 1791, which are sufficiently known to the world.

His Works were collected and published by Sir John Hawkins, with his "Life," in eleven volumes, 1787. In this edition, the Lives of the Poets are placed first, and several pieces are attributed to Johnson without foundation. In the "Life" too much foreign matter is intermixed, and Johnson himself is scarcely visible in the mass. A new edition was published in 12 vols, 8vo, 1792, with an "Essay on his Life and Genius," by Arthur Murphy, Esq. the former "Life" being thought too unwieldy for republication. In this edition, the order observed in the former edition is inverted, and the several pieces are chronologically arranged, omitting those attributed to him without foundation. Some of his Prayers are printed, and several of his Letters added to the 12th volume. Mr. Murphy has no new facts to embellish his work, but the task which has been left him, of giving a short, yet full, a faithful, yet temperate history of Johnson, has been ably executed. In the succinct review of his writings, Mr. Murphy displays his own learning, judgment, and taste. His Prayers and Meditations were published, from his manuscripts, by George Strahan, A. M. vicar of Islington, in 8vo, 1785. Letters to and from Samuel Johnson, LL. D. were published by Mrs. Piozzi, in 2 vols, 8vo, 1788. The Sermons, 8vo, 1790, left for publication, by Dr. Taylor, were unquestionably Johnson's; and the fact is now ascertained on the authority of Mr. Hayes, the editor. An imperfect collection of his Poems was published by Kearsley, in 12mo, 1785; and inserted, with considerable additions, in the edition of "The Works of the English Poets," 1790. They are reprinted in the present collection, together with the tragedy of Irene, and several additional pieces collected from Mr. Boswell's "Life of Johnson," and other publications.

The religious, moral, political, and literary character of Johnson will be better understood by this account of his life, than by any laboured and critical comments. Yet it may not be superfluous here to attempt to collect, into one view, his most prominent excellencies and distinguishing particularities.

His figure and manner are more generally known than those of almost any other man. His person was large, robust, and unwieldy from corpulency. His carriage was disfigured by sudden emotions, which appeared to a common observer to be involuntary and convulsive. But in the opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds, they were the consequence of a depraved habit of accompanying his thoughts with certain untoward actions, which seemed as if they were meant to reprobate some part of his past conduct. Of his limbs, he is said never to have enjoyed the free and vigorous use. When he walked, it seemed the struggling gait of one in fetters; and when he rode, he appeared to have no command over his horse. His strength, however, was great, and his personal courage no less so. Among other instances, which exemplify his possession of both, it is related, that, being once at the Litchfield theatre, he sat upon a chair placed for him beside the scenes. Having had occasion to quit his seat, he found it occupied, upon his return, by an innkeeper of the town. He civilly demanded that it should be restored to him, but meeting with a rude refusal, he laid hold of the chair, and with it, of the intruder, and flung them both, without further ceremony, into the pit. At another time, having engaged in a scuffle with four men in the street, he resolutely refused to yield to superior numbers, and kept them all at bay, until the watch came up and carried him and his antagonists to the watch-house. In his dress he was singular and slovenly, and though he improved somewhat under the lectures of Mrs. Thrale, during his long residence at Streatham, yet he was never able completely to surmount particularity. He never wore a watch till he was sixty years of age, and then caused one to be made for him by Mudge and Dutton, which cost him seventeen guineas, with this inscription on the dial plate "for the night cometh." He was fond of good company, and of good living; and to the last, he knew of no method of regulating his appetites, but absolute restraint or unlimited indulgence. "Many a day," says Mr. Boswell, "did he fast, many a year refrain from wine; but when he did eat, it was voraciously. When he did drink wine, it was copiously.

He could practise abstinence, but not temperance." In conversation, he was rude, intemperate, overbearing, and impatient of contradiction. Addicted to argument, and greedy of victory, he was equally regardless of truth and fair reasoning in his approaches to conquest. "There is no arguing with him," said Goldsmith, alluding to a speech in one of Cibber's plays, "for if his pistol misses fire, he knocks you down with the butt end of it." In the early part of his life, he had been too much depressed; in his latter years, too lavishly indulged. His temper had at first been soured by disappointment and penury, and his petulance was afterwards flattered by universal submission. In his conversation and goodness of heart, his friends met with a recompense for that submission which the sovereignty of his genius challenged, and his temper exacted from them to the uttermost. To great powers, he united a perpetual and ardent desire to excel; and even in an argument on the most indifferent subject, he generally engaged with the whole force and energy of his great abilities. Of his conversation, it is true, all that has been retained by Mr. Boswell, does not seem to be worth recording. Judging of it most favourably, it is not much distinguished by the flashes of wit, or the strokes of humour. Where he appears serious, we are not always sure that he speaks the sentiments of his conviction. Mr. Boswell allows that he often talked for victory, and sometimes took up the weaker side, as the most ingenious things would be said on it. Truth, and the ablest defences of truth, are mixed with error, and the most ingenious glosses which ingenuity could invent, or address enforce. Authors are exalted, or depreciated, as the moment of hilarity or gloom was connected with the subject, or as the opinion of the speaker was adverse, and the whole is given as the sentiment of Johnson. But for the inferiority of his conversation, to our opinion of the man, he has himself made a prophetic apology, in his first interview with his biographer, who was destined to retail it. "People may be taken in once, who imagine that an author is greater in private life than another man. Uncommon parts require uncommon opportunities for their exertions."

With these defects, there was, however, scarcely a virtue of which he was not in principle possessed. He was humane, charitable, affectionate, and generous. His most intemperate fallies were the effects of an irritable habit; he offended only to repent. To the warm and active benevolence of his heart, all his friends have borne testimony. "He had nothing," says Goldsmith, "of the bear but his skin." Misfortune had only to form her claim, in order to found her right to the use of his purse, or the exercise of his talents. His house was an asylum for the unhappy, beyond what a regard to personal convenience would have allowed; and his income was distributed in the support of his inmates, to an extent greater than general prudence would have permitted. The most honourable testimony to his moral and social character, is the cordial esteem of his friends and acquaintances. He was known by no man by whom his loss was not regretted. Another great feature of his mind, was the love of independence. While he felt the strength of his own powers, he despised, except in one instance, pecuniary aid. His pension has been often mentioned, and subjected him to severe imputations. But let those, who, like Johnson, had no patrimony, who were not always willing to labour, and felt the constant recurrence of necessities, reject, without an adequate reason, an independent income, which left his sentiments free, and required neither the servility of adulation, nor the labours of service. It is not uncommon to see a desire to be independent, degenerate into avarice. Johnson did not feel it early, for his benevolence counteracted it; but he declined going to Italy when worth 1500 l. besides his pension, because of the expence; and we see the surly dignity, which formerly spurned at an obligation, relaxed in his refusal of Dr. Brocklesby's assistance, and Lord Thurlow's very delicate offer of the same kind. Some little censure is due to him for his easy faith, occasioned by his political prejudices, in the forgeries of Lauder. That he should have appeared in public, in company with this defamer of Milton, is to be lamented. Yet his renunciation of all connection with Lauder, when his forgeries were detected, is only a proof of his having believed (a common weakness of worthy minds), without examination, not that he was an accomplice with the impostor.

If there is any one trait by which Johnson's mind can be discriminated, it is gigantic vigour. In information and taste he was excelled; but what he seriously attempted, he executed with that masterly original boldness, which leaves us to regret his indolence, that he exerted himself only in the moment when his powers were wanting, and relapsed again into his literary idleness. He united in himself what seldom are united, a vigorous and exursive imagination, with a strong and steady judgment. His memory was remarkably tenacious, and his apprehension wonderfully quick and accurate. He was rather a man of learning than of science. He had accumulated a vast fund of knowledge, without much of system or methodical arrangement. His reading seems to have been casual, generally desultory. To conversation he owed much of his varied knowledge, and to his vigorous comprehensive powers, he was indebted for that clearness of distinction, that pointed judicious discrimination, which elucidated every question, and astonished every hearer. From this casual reading he rose with a mind seldom fatigued, endowed with a clear accurate perception; the variety of his studies relieved, without fatiguing or perplexing him; the ideas arranged in order, were ready for use, adorned with all the energy of language, and the force of manner. But the labour of literature was a task from which he always wished to escape; and as he could excel others without great exertion, we seldom perceive his faculties brought forward in their full power. We scarcely see any attempt, beyond a periodical paper, which he did not professedly continue with lassitude and fatigue.

He deserves the character of master of the Latin language; but it is easy to perceive that his acquaintance with Greek literature was, what it is commonly supposed to be, general and superficial, rather than curious or profound. Of natural science he knew but little; and most of his notions on that branch of philosophy were obsolete and erroneous. In his writings he appears to have taken more from his own mind than from books, and he displays his learning rather in allusions to the opinions of others, than in the direct use of them. History he professed to disregard; yet his memory was so tenacious, that we seldom find him at a loss upon any topic, ancient or modern.

From early prejudices, which all his philosophy and learning could never overcome, he was a zealous and scrupulous high-church-man, following to the uttermost tenet, the notions of Laud, whose talents he has praised, and whose genius he has deplored in his Vanity of Human Wishes. In his political sentiments, he was a rank Tory, and till his present Majesty's accession to the throne, a violent Jacobite. He had never examined either his religious or political creed. Bigotted as to a particular system of politics, he appears obstinately to have closed his eyes against the light of truth; and so far from seeking information on the subject, studiously resisted it. His piety was truly venerable and edifying. In divinity, however, his researches were limited. He was well acquainted with the general evidences of Christianity; but he does not appear to have read his Bible with a critical eye, nor to have interested himself concerning the elucidation of obscure or difficult passages. It was his favourite maxim, "that the proper study of mankind is man;" and we must confess that in all the departments of moral science, his excellence is unrivalled. His acute penetration was constantly alive to "catch the manners living as they rise," and but few follies or peculiarities could escape his observation.

The habitual weaknesses of his mind form a striking and melancholy contrast to the vigour of his understanding. His opinions were tainted with prejudices almost too coarse and childish for the vulgar to imbibe. His attachment to the university of Oxford, to which in his youth he owed no great obligations, led him unjustly to depreciate the merit of every person who had studied at that of Cambridge. His aversion to Whigs, Dissenters, and Presbyterians, and his dislike to Scotland, and many more extravagancies of opinion, that it would be painful to enumerate, inflamed his conversation, and influenced his conduct. He was so prone to superstition as to make it a rule that a particular foot should constantly make the first actual movement, when he came close to the threshold of any door or passage, which he was about to enter, or to quit. So deeply was he infected upon this subject, that Mr Boswell relates that he has often seen him "when he had neglected or gone wrong in this sort of magical movement, go back again, put himself in a proper posture to begin the ceremony, and having gone through it, break from his abstraction, walk briskly on, and join his companion." He took off his hat in token of reverence, when he approached the places on which Popish churches had formerly stood; and bowed before the monastic vestiges. He was solicitous to give authenticity to stories of apparitions, and eager to credit the existence of a second-sight, while he appeared scrupulous and sceptical as to particular facts. These mental distempers were the offspring of his melancholic temperament, and were fostered by solitary contemplation, till they had laid fetters upon the imagination too strong for reason to burst through. We see it exerted in different circumstances, and expanding its gloomy influence, till at last it terminated little short of insanity. To this state we must attribute his mentioning secret transgressions, his constant fear of death, and his religious terrors, not very consistent with his strength of mind, or his conviction of the goodness of God. This, at least, seems to have been his own opinion of the progress of these diseases, as appears from his history of the Mad Astronomer in Rasselas, the description of whose mind he seems to have intended as a representation of his own.

But let us turn from these foibles and singularities, which show him weaker than the generality of his fellow men, and point to those perfections of mind which prove him to have been of a rank so much above them.

As an author, Johnson has distinguished himself as a philologist, a biographer, a critic, a moralist, a novelist, a political writer, and a poet.

On his Dictionary of the English Language, it is unnecessary to enlarge. It is in every body's hands; its utility is universally acknowledged; and its popularity is its best eulogium. The etymologies, though they exhibit learning and judgment, are not entitled to unqualified praise. The definitions exhibit astonishing proofs of acuteness of intellect, and precision of language. A few of them must be admitted to be erroneous. Thus, Windward and Leeward, though directly of opposite meaning, are defined identically the same way. The definition of Net-work has been often quoted with sportive malignity, as obscuring a thing in itself very plain. His introducing his own opinions, and even prejudices, under general definitions of words, as Tory, Whig, Penion, Outs, Exists, and a few more, must be placed to the account of capricious and humorous indulgence. To his list of technical and provincial words, nine thousand have been added by Mr. Herbert Croft, in his "Dictionary of the English Language;" the publication of which is delayed for want of suitable encouragement.

As a biographer, his merit is of the highest kind. His narration in general is vigorous, connected, and perspicuous; and his reflections numerous, apposite, and moral. But it must be owned that he neither dwells with pleasure or success upon those minuter anecdotes of life, which oftener show the genuine man, than actions of greater importance. Sometimes, also, his colourings receive a tinge from prejudice, and his judgment is insensibly warped by the particularity of his private opinion. These observations apply to his Life of Savage, the most finished of his biographical disquisitions; and his Lives of several other eminent men, which were originally printed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," and in other periodical publications, and afterwards collected by Mr. Davies, in his "Miscellaneous and Fugitive Pieces," and to his Lives of the Poets.

As a critic, he is entitled to the praise of being the greatest that our nation has produced. He has not, like his predecessors, tried merely to learn the art, and not to feel it. He has not gone to Dacier or to Bossu, to borrow rules to fetter genius by example, and impart distinctions which lead to no end, but, possessed of two qualities, without which a critic is no more than a caviller, strong sense, and an intimate knowledge of human nature, he has followed his own judgment, unbiassed by authority, and has adopted all the good sense of Aristotle, untrammelled by his forms. This praise he has merited by his Preface to Shakspeare, and the detached pieces of criticism which appear among his works. But his critical powers shine with more concentrated radiance in the Lives of the Poets. These compositions, abounding in strong and just illustrations of criticism, evince the vigour of his mind, and that happy art of moralization, by which he gives to well-known incidents the grace of novelty and the force of instruction; and "grapples the attention," by expressing common thoughts with uncommon strength and elegance. Of many passages, it is scarcely hyperbolic to affirm, that they are executed with all the skill and penetration of Aristotle, and animated and embellished with all the fire of Longinus. The Lives of Cowley, Milton, Eutler, Waller, Dryden, Addison, and Pope, are elaborately composed, and exhibit the noblest specimens of entertaining and solid criticism, that ancient or modern times have produced. The dissertation in the Life of Cowley, on the metaphysical poets of the last century, has all the attraction of novelty; as well as sound observation. In the review of his works, false wit is detected in all its shapes; and the Gothic taste for glittering conceits, and far-fetched allusions, is exploded, never, it is hoped, to revive again. The "Paradise Lost," is a poem which the mind of Milton only could have produced; the criticism upon it is such as, perhaps, the pen of Johnson only could have written. His estimate of Dryden and Pope, challenges Quintilian's remarks upon Demosthenes and Cicero, and rivals the finest specimens of elegant composition, and critical acuteness in the English language. Some caution, however, is required to peruse these admirable compositions with advantage. The present writer means not to say that they are perfect, or that, on the whole, they are executed with propriety. If they be regarded merely as containing narrations of the lives, delineations of the characters, and strictures of the several authors, they are far from being always to be depended upon. Johnson, as he has had occasion to remark, in reviewing his judgments of the several poets who have fallen under his consideration, brought to the production of this work ideas already formed, opinions tinged with his usual hues of party and prejudice, and the rigid unfeeling philosophy, which could neither bend to excuse failings, or judge of what was not capable of a dispassionate disquisition.

To think for himself in critical, as in all other matters, is a privilege to which every one is undoubtedly entitled. This privilege of critical independence, an affectation of singularity, or some other principle not immediately visible, is frequently betraying into a dogmatical spirit of contradiction to received opinion. Of this there need no farther proofs, than his almost uniform attempt to depreciate the writers of blank verse, and his degrading estimate of the exquisite compositions of Prior, Hammond, Collins, Gray, Shenstone, and Akenfide, and his pronouncing the "Paradise Lost" "one of those books which the reader admires and lays down, and forgets to take it up again." In his judgments of these poets, he may be justly accused of being inflamed by prejudice, resolutely blind to merit. His rigorous condemnation, and puerile criticisms upon Gray, and his fastidious judgment of Shenstone, have drawn down upon him the united censures of those who admire poetry in her most daring attitudes and gorgeous attire, and those who are pleased with her modest beauties, most humble steps, and least adorned guise. He observes of Shenstone, that he set little value upon those parts of knowledge which he had not cultivated himself. His own taste of poetry seems in some degree regulated by a similar standard; method, ratiocination, and argument, especially if the vehicle be rhyme, often obtaining his regard and commendation, while the bold and enthusiastic, though perhaps irregular flights of imagination, are past by with obstinate and perverse indifference. It is not, then, to be wondered at, that the panegyrist of Blackmore should withhold from Collins and Gray the commendation he has bestowed on Savage and Yalden; and that his praises of the whole class of descriptive poets are parsimoniously bestowed, and too frigid to make an impression. This is to be attributed to the natural turn of his mind, and to the bent which his feelings had received from the habits of his life. A certain inelegance of taste, a frigid churlishness of temper, unsubdued and unqualified by that melting sensibility, that divine enthusiasm of soul, which are essential to a hearty relish of poetical composition, too often counteracted and corrupted the other poetical virtues of his intellect. Poetry pleases only as it is the image of reality. He who has never delighted in the silent beauties of creation, can feel no emotions, as they are reflected to him in description. Accustomed to dogmatize in his closet, and swelter in some alley in the city, Johnson's mind never throbbed with poetic thrills, as nature expanded her rural glories to his eye; and he preferred the dust of Fleet-Street, or the windings of the Strand, to the air of Hampstead, or the beauties of Greenwich.

One general remark may be ventured upon here: Through the whole of his work, the desire of praise, except in the case of some very favourite author, is almost always overpowered by his disposition to censure; and while beauties are passed over "with the neutrality of a stranger, and the coldness of a critic," the slightest blemish is examined with microscopical sagacity. The truth of this observation is particularly obvious, when he descends to his contemporaries, for whom he appears to have little more brotherly kindness, than they might have expected at Constantinople. The present writer is under no apprehension of being charged with an unjustifiable partiality in this opinion of him, by those who know his disposition, and the habits of his life. All that is great and genuinely good in Johnson, have had no warmer encomiast. He has uniformly praised his genius, his learning, his good sense, the strength of his reasonings, the sagacity of his critical decisions, the happiness of his illustrations, and the animation and energy of his style. He has acknowledged that there is no satiety in the delight he inspires on moral and religious themes; and he makes no scruple to declare that, though there are many opinions erroneous, and many observations improper, a great part of his Lives of the Poets is such as no one but himself could have executed, and in which he will not be followed with success.

As a moralist, his periodical papers are distinguished from those of other writers, who have derived celebrity from similar publications. He has neither the wit nor the graceful ease of Addison, nor does he shine with the humour and classic suavity of Goldsmith. His powers are of a more grave, energetic, and dignified kind, than any of his competitors, and if he entertains us less, he instructs us more. He shows himself master of all the recesses of the human mind, able to detect vice, when disguised in her most specious form, and equally possessed of a corrosive to eradicate, or a lenitive to assuage the follies and sorrows of the heart. Virtuous in his object, just in his conceptions, strong in his arguments, and powerful in his exhortations, he arrests the attention of levity by the luxuriance of his imagery, and grandiloquence of his diction; while he awes detected guilt into submission by the majesty of his declamation, and the sterling weight of his opinions. But his genius is only formed to chastise graver faults, which require to be touched with an heavier hand. He could not chase away such lighter foibles as buzz in our ears in society, and fret the feelings of our less important hours. His gigantic powers were able to prepare the immortal path to heaven, but could not stoop to decorate our manners with these lesser graces, which make life amiable. Johnson, at such a task, was Hercules at the distaff, a lion courting of a mouse, or an eagle stooping at a fly. He was formed to sustain the character of a majestic teacher of moral and religious wisdom. His Rambler furnishes such an assemblage of discourses on practical religion and moral duty, of critical investigations, and allegorical and oriental tales, that no mind can be thought very deficient, that has by constant study and meditation assimilated to itself all that may be found there. Though instruction be its predominant purpose, yet it is enlivened with a considerable portion of amusement. Nos. 19, 44, 82, 83, 179, 182, 194, 195, 197, and 198, may be appealed to for instances of fertility of fancy, and accurate description of real life. Every page of the Rambler shows a mind teeming with classical allusion and poetical imagery; illustrations from other writers, are upon all occasions so ready, and mingle so easily in his periods, that the whole appears of one uniform vivid texture. The serious papers in his Idler, though inferior to those in the Rambler, in sublimity and splendor, are distinguished by the same disguised morality and solemn philosophy, and lead to the same great end of diffusing wisdom, virtue, and happiness. The humorous papers are light and lively, and more in the manner of Addison.

As a novelist, the amazing powers of his imagination, and his unbounded knowledge of men and manners, may be plainly traced in the oriental tales in the Rambler, in which he has not only supported to the utmost, the sublimity of the eastern manner of expression, but even greatly excelled any of the oriental writers, in the fertility of his invention, the conduct of his plots, and the justness and strength of his sentiments. His capital work of that kind is his Rasselas. None of his writings have been so extensively diffused over Europe. Such a reception demonstrates great beauties in the work; and there is no doubt that great beauties do exist there. The language enchants us with harmony; the arguments are acute and ingenious; the reflections novel, yet just. It astonishes with the sublimity of its sentiments, and at the fertility of its illustrations, and delights with the abundance and propriety of its imagery. The fund of thinking which it contains, is such, that almost every sentence of it may furnish a subject of long meditation. But it is not without its faults. It is barren of interesting incidents, and destitute of originality, or distinction of characters. There is little difference in the manner of thinking and reasoning of the philosopher and the female, of the prince and the waiting woman. Nebogab and Imlac, Rasselas and Tebwab, are all equally argumentative, abstracted, eloquent, and obstinate. Of that dark catalogue of es-lamities, which are described as incident to the several situations of life which he contemplates, some are not the necessary consequence of the situation, but of the temper; and others are not those which are most generally or severely felt there. The moral that he seeks to inculcate, that there is no such thing as happiness, is one ungrateful to the human heart. If he could succeed in establishing it, it would cripple every incitement to virtue, and paralyse every stimulus to action. It would leave man contented to be drifted down the stream of life, without an object or an end; to lose attainable excellence for the want of exertion, and sink under surmountable difficulties, without a struggle. Though there may not be permanent happiness in the gratification of our wishes, there is much in our expectations that they will be gratified. Hope is the sweet and innocent solace of our frail natures. It is the staff of the unhappy; and however feeble its support, it is immortal and unkind to wrest it from our hands.

The effect of Rasselas, and of Johnson's other moral tales, is thus beautifully illustrated by Mr. Courtenay, in his "Poetical Review":

Impressive truth, in splendid fiction dress,
Checks the vain wish, and calms the troubled breast;
O'er the dark mind a light celestial throws,
And sooths the angry passions to repose.
As oil effus'd illumines and smooths the deep,
When round the bark the swelling surges sweep.

As a political writer, his productions are more distinguished by subtlety of disquisition, poignancy of sarcasm, and dignity and energy of style, than by truth, equity, or candour. He makes much more use of his rhetoric than of his logic, and often gives his reader high-sounding declamation instead of fair argument. In perusing his representations of those who differed from him on political subjects, we are sometimes inclined to assent to a proposition of his own; that, "there is no credit due to a rhetorician's account, either of good or evil." Many positions are laid down in admirable language, and in highly-polished periods, which are inconsistent with the principles of the British constitution, and repugnant to the common rights of mankind. It must always be regretted, that a man of Johnson's intellectual powers, should have had so strong a propensity to defend arbitrary principles of government. But, on this subject, the strength of his language was not more manifest, than the weakness of his arguments. In apology for him, it may be admitted, that he was a Tory from principle, and that most of what he wrote, was conformable to his real sentiments. But to defend all that was written by him, his warmest friends will find impossible.

In his posthumous writings, there is little that can be said to be interesting to science or criticism. His Letters are valuable, as we find in them the picture, which, without intending it, he has left of himself, to be that of a man, who, to great intellectual powers, added extraordinary piety, and many excellent moral qualities. Of letter writing, he gives his idea in the following passage: "Some, when they write to their friends, are all affection; some are wise and sententious; some strain their powers for effects of gravity; some write news; and some write secrets; but to make a letter without affection, without wisdom, without gravity, without news, and without secrets, is doubtless the great epistolical style. There is a pleasure in corresponding with a friend, where doubt and mistrust have no place, and every thing is said as it is thought. These are the letters by which souls are united, and by which minds, naturally in unison, move each other, as they are moved themselves. Let me know where you are, how you got thither, how you live there? and every thing that one friend loves to know of another." Such is the account of his Letters. The value of them is, that we have the man before us for near twenty years. We see him in his undress, that is, the undress of his mind, which, unlike that of his body, was never slovenly. We see him in health and in sickness, and in all the petty business of life. From himself, and in his own words, we are enabled to collect the truest and best information. He writes always in his own style. His words are now and then too pompous for familiar letters; but his skill in letter writing comes out fully in this collection, and entitles him to rank with the best epistolary writers of our nation. His letters on the death of Mrs. Salusbury (mother of Mrs. Piozzi), and Mr. Thrale's eldest son, are at once moral and pathetic. They flow from a man, who loved them, and the surviving family. His solicitude for Mr. Thrale, during a long illness, and his feelings at his death, do honour to the memory of Mr. Thrale, and to Johnson's gratitude and sensibility. "I am afraid," he says, "of thinking what I have lost: I never had such a friend before." To Mrs. Thrale, he says; "To see and hear you, is always to hear wit and see virtue." He seems at times to think her regard for him is abated; and a letter of kindness from her appears to have revived and comforted him. After lamenting the loss of Williams and Levett, he says: "Such society I had with them, and such I had—where I am never likely to have it more. When I came to "love and honour," in your letter, I said to myself, "How lov'd, how honour'd once, avails me not," Shall we never again exchange our thoughts by the fireside?" After seeing him struggle with illness and morbid melancholy, it is comfortable to hear him say, almost at the close of life "Attention and respect give pleasure, however late, and however useless. But they are not useless, even when they are late; it is reasonable to rejoice as the day declines, to find that it has been spent with the approbation of mankind."

His Prayers and Meditations, published by Mr. Strahan, "at his own request," have occasioned much concern, disquietude, and offence in the minds of many, who apprehend that the cause in which he stood forth, will suffer by the infirmities of the advocate being exposed in this publication, to the prying and malignant eye of the world. It is not merely the name of Johnson that is to do service to any cause. His admirable arguments in favour of religion and morality, are not weakened by the proofs of his practical errors. These are always precisely what they were, once good, and always good. His arguments in favour of self-denial do not lose their force, because he fasted; nor those in favour of devotion, because he said his prayers. His faults, and his prayers add strength to his pious reasonings, from the proof they afford, that he believed in the religion he inculcated. Human nature is frail; common frailties must inevitably preclude perfection to the least faulty professor of Christianity. The world never supposed Johnson to have been a perfect character. His stupendous abilities, and great learning, it is well known, could not preserve their possessor from the depredations of melancholy. But his failings leaned to the side of virtue. His superstition seems to have arisen from the most amiable disposition in the world, "a pious awe, and fear to have offended," a wish rather to do too much than too little. Such a disposition one loves, and always wishes to find in a friend; and it cannot be disagreeable in the sight of Him who made us. It argues a sensibility of heart, a tenderness of conscience, and the fear of God. That he should not be conscious of the abilities with which Providence had blessed him, was impossible. He felt his own powers; he felt what he was capable of having performed, and he saw how little, comparatively speaking, he had performed. Hence his apprehensions on the near prospect of the account to be made, viewed through the medium of constitutional and morbid melancholy, which often excluded from his sight the bright beams of divine mercy. His self-abasement was strictly ingenuous; but his expressions, when compared with the tenor of his conduct, seem too disparaging. Christianity does not require us to deny any one quality we possess, or to represent ourselves, in defiance of truth, as one mass of deformity and guilt. The instruction of St. Paul, enforced by the most sacred example, is singly this, that we "think not of ourselves more highly than we ought to think; but that we think soberly." Johnson walked at all times humbly with his God; but when we follow him through all his weaknesses, his religious horrors, and sacred punctilios, we are inclined to pity the constitutional feebleness of his nature, while we admire the perseverance, and fervour of his devotion. We owe to the excellencies of the Supreme Being, every possible degree of veneration and honour; but that virtue should tremble in the presence of Infinite Goodness, is not less contrary to reason, than it is contrary to heroism. In the presence of Infinite Goodness it feels a congeniality, and assumes a confidence that leaps, as it were, the gulf between, and dares to aspire to sentiments of attachment, fidelity and love. But it would be unfair to conclude from this circumstance, that the piety and humility of Johnson were of no value; and the sincerity of his repentance, the steadfastness of his faith, and the fervor of his charity, of no use. There is something so great and awful in the idea of a God, and something so fascinating in the effusions of gratitude, that there are numbers of men intrepid and heroic, in every other regard, that cannot boast of all the serenity and assurance in the business of religion, that are so earnestly to be desired; and yet the piety of these men is edifying and venerable. Indeed the fate of "the unprofitable servant" may justly beget apprehensions in the stoutest mind. Language affords no finer expressions than those in which the Prayers of Johnson are conceived. They are short, simple, and unadorned. They bear some resemblance to the Collects in the "Common Prayer Book," without that dignity which is derived to the latter, from the venerable antiquity of the style and expression. They have no particular method, no display of genius, and no beauties that should characterize the man under whose name they appear. They have nothing that might not have been produced by any man of plain common sense. At the same time they contain few traces of weakness or absurdity. Never did there exist a greater disparity between the performances of the same author, than between this publication and the Lives of the Poets, or the numbers of the Rambler. His Meditations, as they are improperly called, are merely minutes: at one time of resolutions for his future conduct, and at another, in the style of a diary or journal. Neither of them deserve the commendation which has been bestowed upon the Prayers. They are full of frivolous minutenesses, and feminine weakness, beyond any thing of which an abstract description can suggest the idea. They tell us, that Johnson, in spite of all the contemptuous ridicule with which he has treated that delicate frame, which depends for its compassure on the clouds and the winds, was himself not exempt from languor, sluggishness, and procrastination; that he was full of the most pitiable religious credulity; and that his attention was often engrossed by things in the last degree frivolous, futile, and unimportant. But if these observations are rather disadvantageous to Johnson, it is no less unquestionable that he displays a sensibility and a humane benevolence of heart, that have rarely been equalled. Mr. Strahan's apology for Johnson's seeming to pray for his deceased wife, is supported by his opinion, respecting purgatory, recorded by Mr. Boswell. In his cooler moments he did not think such prayers proper, except with the limitations there expressed; but his morbid melancholy did not always allow him to be cool; there were many moments when his language countenanced a very different opinion. The struggles in a breast, constituted as his was, between the severe principles of Protestantism, and the genuine undisciplinable feelings of the heart, illustrates the kindness of his nature more than it could be illustrated by any other circumstance.

His Sermons, published under the name of Dr. Taylor, are not unworthy of the author of the Rambler, and afford additional proof of his ardour in the cause of piety, and every moral duty. The last discourse in the collection was intended to be delivered by Dr. Taylor, at the funeral of Johnson's wife, but he declined the office, because, as he told Mr. Hayes, the praise of the deceased was too much amplified. He who reads the discourse, will find it a beautiful moral lesson, written with temper, and no where overcharged with ambitious ornaments. The rest of the discourses were the fund which Dr. Taylor, from time to time, carried with him to the pulpit.

The style of his prose writings has been too often criticised, to need being noticed here. It has been censured, applauded, and imitated, to extremes equally dangerous to the purity of the English tongue. That he has innovated upon our language by his adoption of Latin derivatives, and his preference of abstract to concrete terms, cannot be denied. But the danger from his innovation would be trifling, if those alone would copy him who can think with equal precision; for few passages can be pointed out from his works, in which his meaning could be as accurately expressed by such words as are in more familiar use. His comprehension of mind was the mould for his language. Had his comprehension been narrower, his expression would have been easier. His sentences have a dignified march, suitable to the elevation of his sentiments, and the pomp of his sonorous phraseology. And it is to be remembered, that while he has added harmony and dignity to our language, he has neither vitiated it by the insertion of foreign idioms, or the affectation of anomaly in the construction of his sentences. While the flowers of poetic imagination luxuriantly adorn his style, it is never enfeebled by their pleniude. It is close without obtenebration, perspicuous without languor, and strong without impetuosity. No periods are so harmonious; none so nervous. He has laboured his style, with the greatest attention; perhaps its elaborateness is too apparent. It has, perhaps, too unweildy and too uniform a dignity. He seems to have been particularly studious of the glitter of an antithesis between the epithet and the substantive. This strikes while it is new; but to the more experienced reader, though it may seem sometimes forcible, yet it will often prove tiresome. It is remarkable that Johnson's early performances bear few marks of the style which he adopted in his Rambler. In his Life of Savage, the style is elegant, but not ostentatious. His sentences are naturally arranged, and musical without artifice. He affects not the measuring of clauses, and the balancing of periods. He aims not at splendid, glowing diction. He seeks not pointed phrases, and elaborate contrasts. It is also worthy of remark, on this subject, that Johnson has altered, and perhaps improved his style, long after his reputation had been established, and his Rambler had appeared. The composition of this work differs a good deal from that of Rasselas, the Journey to the Western Islands, and The Lives of the Poets. The native vigour, and peculiarity of feature, are indeed preserved, but they are polished to greater elegance, and taught to wear the appearance of a happier ease. In the Rambler his periods are longer, and his meaning more condensed; he is more fond of abstract terms, and ambitious of sesquipedalian words. But this work was written while he was occupied in collecting authorities for his Dictionary; at a time when Browne and Hooker, Bacon and Hakewell were continually before him; men whom it was difficult to read, and remain free from the temptation to imitate. In his latter productions, particularly his Lives of the Poets, his sentences are shorter, their construction more simple, and the use of Latin derivations less frequent. He has made his style in a greater degree elegant without constraint, dignified without ambitious ornament, strong without rigidity, and harmonious without elaboration. He has adopted a measured pause, and a correspondent length in the numbers of his periods, which gives to his prose much of the harmony, and sometimes somewhat of the monotony of verse. As Homer gave a peculiar language to his gods, to express their divine conceptions, let us allow to Johnson, and to men like him, a style such as he has used; for we have as yet found none more grand and energetic. It is certain that his example has given a general elevation to the language of his country; for many of our best writers have approached very near to him; and from the influence which he has had upon our composition, scarcely any thing is written now that is not better expressed than was usual before he appeared to lead the national taste. This circumstance is well described by Mr. Courtenay, in his "Poetical Review;" a performance which shows that he has caught no mean degree of the expansion and harmony which characterize the style of Johnson.

By nature's gifts ordain'd mankind to rule,
He like a Titian form'd his brilliant school,
And taught congenial spirits to excel,
While from his lips impressive wisdom fell.

Among the congenial spirits "who formed the school of Johnson," Mr. Courtenay celebrates the respectable names of Goldsmith, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Burney, Mr. Malone, Mr. Steevens, Dr. Hawkesworth, Sir William Jones, and Mr. Boswell, and concludes his description in the following animated lines:

Nor was his energy confin'd alone
To friends around his philosophic throne;
His influence wide improv'd our letter'd isle,
And lucid vigour mark'd the general style;
As Nile's proud waves, swoln from their oozy bed,
First o'er the neighb'ring mead majestic spread,
Till, gathering force, they more and more expand,
And with due virtue fertilize the land.

Among the imitators of Johnson's style, whether intentionally, or by the imperceptible effect of its strength and animation, may be reckoned a great proportion of the most distinguished writers in our language since he appeared, Dr. Robertson, Dr. Blair, Mr. Gibbon, Dr. Leland, Dr. Ferguson, Dr. Knox, Dr. Stuart, Dr. Parr, Dr. Thomson, Dr. Gillies, &c. Perhaps the most perfect imitation of Johnson is a professed one, intitled "A Criticism on Gray's Elegy in a Country Church-yard," said to be written by Dr. Young, Professor of Greek at Glasgow. It has not only the peculiarities of Johnson's style, but that very species of literary discussion and illustration for which he was eminent. But let men of moderate conceptions beware of ill-judged imitations. Their attempt to copy his language is Salmoneus thundering at Elis, or a mortal wielding the spear of Pelides. It is to raise a melancholy contrast between the slowness of the thought, and the capacity of the expression, to cover the head of a pigmy with the casque of a giant.

As a poet, the merit of Johnson, though considerable, yet falls far short of that which he has displayed in those provinces of literature in which we have already surveyed him. As far as strength of expression, fruitfulness of invention, and abundance of imagery, constitute poetry, he is much more of a poet in his prose works, than in his metrical compositions. Metaphor, to the merit of which he was blind and uncharitable, is so much the soul and essence of poetry, that without it rhyme and metre are vain. There may be smoothness, syllabic arrangement, and good sense, in a metrical production, but there can be no true poetry without imagery, warm expression, and an enthusiasm which intoxicates the reader, lifts him above the ground, and makes him forget that he is mortal. Poetry is passion; passion is a temporary phrenzy, during which we both hear and see what we are totally insensible to in our sober senses. What did the ancients mean by the Pythian priestesses being numine afflata, when they received inspiration, and delivered it in verse, and in applying the same idea to poets, but that they had such a temporary delirium? Ratiocination prevailed in Johnson much more than sensibility. He has no daring sublimities, nor gentle graces; he never glows with the enthusiasm of the god, or kindles a sympathetic emotion in the bosom of his readers. His poems are the plain and sensible effusions of a mind never hurried beyond itself, to which the use of rhyme adds no beauty, and from which the use of prose would detract no force. His versification is smooth, flowing, and unrestrained; but his pauses are not sufficiently varied, to rescue him from the imputation of monotony. He seems never at a loss for rhyme, or destitute of a proper expression; and the manner of his verse appears admirably adapted to didactic or satiric poetry, for which his powers were equally, and perhaps alone qualified.

His tragedy of Irene may be considered as the greatest effort of his genius. It is a legitimate dramatic composition. The unities of time, place, and action, are strictly observed. The diction is nervous, rich, and elegant; but splendid language, and melodious numbers, will make a fine poem, not a tragedy. The substance of the story is shortly this. In 1453, Mahomet the Great, first emperor of the Turks, laid siege to Constantinople, and having reduced the place, became enamoured of a fair Greek, whose name was Irene. The sultan invited her to embrace the law of Mahomet, and to grace his throne. Enraged at this intended marriage, the Janizaries formed a conspiracy to dethrone the emperor. To avert the impending danger, Mahomet, in a full assembly of the grandees, "catching with one hand," as Knolles expresses it, "the fair Greek by the hair of her head, and drawing his sculchion with the other, he, at one blow, struck off her head, to the great terror of them all; and having so done, said unto them; "Now, by this, judge whether your emperor is able to bridle his affections or not." The story is simple, and it remained for Johnson to amplify it with proper episodes, and give it complication and variety. But he has altered the character and catastrophe, which he found in the historian, so as to diminish the dramatic effect. Many faults may be found with the conduct of the fable. The principal one is, that the plot is double, and has the most striking faults of such a fable; for it divides the spectator's attention and regard between characters, whose interests are opposite, and whose happiness or misery is made to depend upon the same events. We cannot hope the escape of Demetrius and Assafia, without dreading the condemnation of Irene; and our wishes as to each, operating in contradiction, must diminish our concern for both. The catastrophe, which is made to depend upon the fate of Irene, is meanly worked up. It is brought about too suddenly, without a due connection with preparatory incidents, and at the very moment when we have not leisure to contemplate it, and are alone interested for the escape of Demetrius and Assafia. We neither anticipate it with sufficient perspicuity, nor consider it with solemnity, so as to be affected upon its occurrence, with genuine dramatic grief or terror. The characters of the piece have nothing discriminative. They are not representations of different tempers, passions, and minds, but of different degrees of virtue and vice. They are so naked of peculiarity, that we cannot know why the same incidents should operate differently upon any one of them, so as to impel them to a different action, or produce an emotion even varying in strength from what it would have done in any other. They possess too much of a balanced importance in the conduct of the drama, so that the mind knows not how to make its election of a principal character, or to fix its attention upon any personage to whose felicity it may attach its wishes, and upon whose fate it may suspend its sympathy. From the name of the tragedy, we must suppose that Johnson considered Irene as the heroine, yet the reader feels more concern, even for the stoic virtue and cool fondness of Spasfu. The former is too much of a mixed character; neither her goodness, nor her weakness, nor her depravity are predominant. She has not sufficient virtue to awaken our sympathy for the sufferings of innocence, nor sufficient vice to arouse our terror at the punishment of guilt. The speeches are oftener the recollections of past feelings, than the ebullitions of immediate passions, started by the passing actions of the scene. Little is made present to the spectator's mind, and of that little, nothing has life. His critique upon the tragic poets, of the commencement of this century, is, perhaps, in no instance, more true than it is of himself.

From bard to bard the frigid caution crept,
And declamation roar'd whilst passion slept;
Yet still did virtue deign the stage to tread,
Philosophy remain'd, though nature fled.

He has nothing of the fire of Lee, or the pathos of Otway. He is more declamatory than Rowe, and Irene, if possible, is colder than "Cato." There is not, throughout the play, a single situation to excite curiosity, and raise a conflict of passions. The sentiments are just and always moral, but seldom appropriated to the character, and generally too philosophic. His poetical imagery is neither striking nor abundant. The language in which the thoughts are conveyed, is, in general, vigorous, accurately polished, and regularly musical. It would be difficult to select a passage in dramatic poetry more nobly conceived, or finely expressed, than the reply of Demetrius to the complaint of his friend, that no prodigy from Heaven had foretold the calamities of Greece.

A thousand horrid prodigies foretold it;
A feeble government, eluded laws,
A factious populace, luxurious nobles,
And all the maladies of sinking states;
When public villany, too strong for justice,
Shows his bold front, the harbinger of ruin,
Can brave Leontius call for any wonders,
Which cheats interpret, and which fools regard?
When some neglected fabric nods beneath
The weight of years, and totters to the tempest,
Must Heaven dispatch the messengers of light,
Or wake the dead to warn us of its fall?

As an alloy to the beauties of this passage, impartial criticism is compelled to turn to another, which is surely little short of nonsense, and well worthy of a place in the treatise of "Scriblerus."

Oft have I rag'd, when their wide-wasting cannon
Lay pointed at our batteries, yet unform'd,
And broke the meditated lines of war.

Irene may be added to some other plays in our language, which have lost their place in the theatre, but continue to please in the closet. As it is the drama of our great English moralist, the present writer should wish to see it revived.

Of the poetical compositions, which are known to be of his writing, the Imitations of Juvenal are the best; and are, perhaps, the noblest imitations to be found in any language. They are not so close as those done by Pope from Horace; but they are infinitely more spirited and energetic. In Pope, the most peculiar images of Roman life are adapted with singular address to our own times; in Johnson, the similitude is only in general passages, suitable to every age in which refinement has degenerated into depravity.

His London breathes the true vehement contemptuous indignation of Juvenal's satire. It is more popular in its subject, and more animated in its composition, than his Vanity of Human Wisdom. It blazes forth with the genuine fire of poetry, in the liveliness of its correspondent allusions, the energy of its expressions, and the frequency of its apostrophes. The Vanity of Human Wishes is more grave, moral, sententious, and stately. In his London he often takes nothing more than the subject from the Roman poet, proves or illustrates it according to the originality of his own conceptions, or the warmth of his own fancy; and sometimes, too, he deserts him altogether, and that not only where the modesty of an English ear, and the inapplicability of the original to modern customs require it, but in places where the topics and the moral use is as applicable to London as they are to ancient Rome. Thus he has either totally neglected, or but slightly imitated that beautiful passage beginning at ver. 137,

Dat testem Romæ tam sanctum, quam fuit hospes
Naminis Idæi, &c.——

and ending with ver. 190.

—— præstare tributa clientes
Cogimur, et cultis augere peculia fervis.

The Vanity of Human Wishes follows the original more closely, but still with many omissions. The subject is taken from the second "Alcibiades" of Plato, and has an intermixture of the sentiments of Socrates, concerning the object of prayers offered up to the Deity. The general proposition is, that good and evil are so little understood by mankind, that their wishes, when granted, are always destructive. This is exemplified in a variety of instances, such as riches, state preferment, eloquence, military glory, long life, and the advantages of beauty. Juvenal's conclusion is admirable. "Let us," he says, "leave it to the gods to judge what is fittest for us. Man is dearer to his Creator than to himself. If we must pray for any special grace, let it be for a sound mind, in a sound body. Let us pray for fortitude, that we may think the labours of Hercules, and all his sufferings, preferable to a life of luxury, dissipation, and the soft repose of Sardanapulus. This is a blessing within the reach of every man; this we can give ourselves. It is virtue, and virtue only, that can make us happy." For the characters which Juvenal has chosen to illustrate his doctrine, Johnson has substituted others from modern history; for Sejanus, he gives Cardinal Wolsey, Buckingham, stabbed by Felton, Sirafford and Clarendon; for Demosthenes and Cicero, Lydiat, Galileo, and Laud; for Hannibal, Charles XII; and to show the consequences of long life, he says,

From Marlbrough's eyes the streams of dotage flow,
And Swift expires a driveller and a show.

and of beauty he says,

Yet Vane would tell what ills from beauty spring,
And Sedley curs'd the form that pleas'd a king.

This last example is ill chosen; for it is well known that the Countess of Dorchester, mistress to James II. was not handsome. Owing to the dearth of modern examples, his instances are less numerous and less striking than those of Juvenal. His thoughts are not so compressed in the expression, or so energetically conveyed to the mind, as those of the Roman satirist; but his diction is less laboured and affected, and he flows in a stream of versification scarcely less rapid and eloquent, but infinitely more smooth than the Latin poet. He has preserved all the beauties and virtue of the original moral, but stripped it, with infinite art, from all appearance of Epicurean infidelity, and filled it with precepts worthy of a philosopher, and wishes fitting for a Christian. He has succeeded wonderfully in giving to his imitation the air of an original. The Christian had to struggle with the Heathen poet, and though we cannot say that he has surpassed him, he has, at least, entered into a noble competition.

Of his smaller poems, the Prologue for the Opening of Drury-Lane Theatre, has been universally admired, as a masterly and comprehensive criticism upon the several ages of English dramatic poetry. The subject and the moral were well conceived, and are as nobly expressed. The character of Shakspeare is delineated with a felicity of expression, that challenges the whole compass of English poetry. His other Prologues are copies of his mind, clear and comprehensive, pointed and energetic. Of his Odes upon the seasons, his addresses to Autumn and Winter seem the best. Many of the stanzas are exceedingly beautiful; as usual, moral, and unusually pathetic. They manifest, however, that his descriptive poetry is not the production of a warm fancy, impelled to give vent by poetry to its overflowing feelings. Those passions and objects which would inspire the genuine poetic mind with enthusiasm, pass by him unfelt and unnoticed. He is melancholy in Spring, joyous in Winter: he lavishes no encomiums upon the perfumed zephyrs, but flies to melancholy morals, or commemorates the comforts of a cheering flaggon and a snug fire-side. His Ode to Evening, addressed to Stella, the Natural Beauty, and the Vanity of Wealth, are in general elegant. The first is warm and sentimental, and shows that he was neither ignorant of the feelings, nor insensible to the joys of a lover. Of his address To Lyce, the idea perhaps is not original, but the images are happily selected, and well expressed. Stella in Mourning, the verses to Lady Firebrace, To an elderly Lady, and On the Sprig of Myrtle, are occasional compositions, and of course derive their merit chiefly from local and temporary circumstances. The principal art in such performances, is to make a trifling circumstance poetical or witty. In the verses on the Sprig of Myrtle, he has very happily succeeded. The Ant must be allowed to be nervous and elegant; the ode on Friendship easy and sentimental; and the verses on the Death of Stephen Grey are worthy the pen of Pope.

The Elegy on the Death of Mr. Leveé, as it was among the last, so it is one of the best of his performances. It is moral, characteristic, and pathetic. The following stanzas are exquisitely beautiful.

Yet still he fills affection's eye,
 Obscurely wise and coarsely kind;
 Nor letter'd arrogance deny
 This praise to merit unresin'd.
 When fainting nature call'd for aid,
 And hovering death prepar'd the blow,
 His vigorous remedy display'd
 The power of art without the show:
 In misery's darkest cavern known,
 His useful care was ever nigh,
 Where hopeless anguish pour'd his groan,
 And lonely want retir'd to die.
 No summons mock'd by chill delay,
 No petty gain disdain'd by pride;
 The modest wants of every day
 The toil of every day supply'd.

The concluding lines are exceptionable:

Death broke at once the vital chain,
 And forc'd his soul the nearest way.

Since it is the soul which gives life, the chain that confines the soul is corporeal: The vital chain cannot be said, with propriety, to be broken by death. Johnson would not have forgiven an error of this kind in Gray.

Of his remaining pieces, some are mere impromptus, which were never intended for the public eye, and others were the suggestions of temporary incidents. Many of them are sprightly and elegant, and may be read with pleasure; but they require no distinct enumeration, or particular criticism.

Among our English poets, it is no unpleasant reflection to be able to find so many elegant writers of Latin verse; in the first rank of which, Johnson stands very high. Jonson, Crashaw, Cowley, May, Milton, Marvel, Addison, Gray, Smart, Warton, and Johnson, are such writers of Latin verse, as any country might with justice be proud to own. Johnson was eminently skilled in the Latin tongue, and strongly attached to the cultivation of Latin poetry. The first fruits of his genius were compositions in Latin verse. His translation of the Messiah, gained him reputation in the college in which it was written, and was approved by Pope. Virgil seems to have been his model for language and versification. He has copied the varied pauses of his verse, the length of his periods, the peculiar grace of his expressions, and his majestic dignity, with considerable success. But his composition is sometimes unclassical and incorrect. The most exceptionable line is the first; tollere concentum, if allowable, is surely an awkward phrase for "begin the song." His Odes, particularly, the Ode Inebrietas, Ode in the Isle of Sky, and that to Mrs. Thrale, from the same place, are easy, elegant, and poetical. They unite classical language, tender sentiment, and harmonious verse. His poem, Τὸ εὐσεβὲς, is nervous and energetic. His Epitaphs are distinguished by elegance of composition, and a masterly style. That on Goldsmith seems the best. His Epigrams are neat and pointed. In the Antologia, we admire sometimes a happy imitation, and sometimes regret inelegant expressions.

For obvious reasons, his Latin pieces, though excellent in their kind, can never acquire the popularity of the English. Those who read with pleasure the Latin classics, see their inferiority; to others, they are uninteresting and unintelligible. "The delight which they afford," to use his own words, in criticizing the Latin poetry of Milton, "is rather by the exquisite imitation of the ancient writers, by the purity of the diction, and the harmony of the numbers, than by any power of invention, or vigour of sentiment." This character will generally suit our modern Latin poetry; for if we except that noble ode of Gray's, written at the Grande Chartreuse, and some few others, there are not many of the Poemata Anglorum, that contain much "power of invention, or vigour of sentiment."

Upon the whole, the various productions of Johnson show a life spent in study and meditation. It may be fairly allowed, as he used to say of himself, that he has written his share. His oddities and infirmities in common life, will, after a while, be overlooked and forgotten; but his writings will remain a monument of his genius and learning; still more and more studied and admired, while Britons shall continue to be characterized by a love of elegance and sublimity, of good sense and virtue. In the works of Johnson, the reader will find a perpetual source of pleasure and instruction. With due precaution, men may learn to give to their style, elegance, harmony, and precision; they may be taught to think with vigour and perspicuity; and all, by a diligent attention to his writings, may advance in virtue.

The character of Johnson, as given by Mr. Boswell in the conclusion of his work, is delineated with a masterly pencil. The drawing appears to be sufficiently accurate, the light and shade well distributed, and the colouring very little overcharged or heightened; though a favourable likeness was perhaps in some degree intended, as far as might seem consistent with the truth of resemblance, and no farther.

"His figure was large and well-formed, and his countenance of the cast of an ancient statue; yet his appearance was rendered strange and somewhat uncouth, by convulsive cramps, by the scars of that distemper which it was once imagined the royal touch could cure, and by a slovenly mode of dress. He had the use only of one eye; yet so much does mind govern, and even supply the deficiency of organs, that his visual perceptions, as far as they extended, were uncommonly quick and accurate. So morbid was his temperament, that he never knew the natural joy of a free and vigorous use of his limbs: when he walked, it was like the struggling gait of one in fetters; when he rode, he had no command or direction of his horse, but was carried as if in a balloon. That with his constitution and habits of life he should have lived seventy-five years, is a proof that an inherent visida vis is a powerful preservative of the human frame.

"Man is in general made up of contradictory qualities, and these will ever show themselves in strange succession, where a consistency in appearance at least, if not in reality, has not been attained by long habits of philosophical discipline. In proportion to the native vigour of the mind, the contradictory qualities will be the more prominent, and more difficult to be adjusted; and therefore we are not to wonder, that Johnson exhibited an eminent example of this remark which I have made upon human nature. At different times he seemed a different man, in some respects; not, however, in any great or essential article, upon which he had fully employed his mind and settled certain principles of duty, but only in his manners, and in displays of argument and fancy in his talk. He was prone to superstition, but not to credulity. Though his imagination might incline him to a belief of the marvellous and the mysterious, his vigorous reason examined the evidence with jealousy. He was a sincere and zealous Christian of high Church of England and monarchical principles, which he would not tamely suffer to be questioned; and had perhaps, at an early period, narrowed his mind somewhat too much, both as to religion and politics. His being impressed with the danger of extreme latitude in either, though he was of a very independent spirit, occasioned his appearing somewhat unfavourable to the prevalence of that noble freedom of sentiment which is the best possession of man. Nor can it be denied, that he had many prejudices; which, however, frequently suggested many of his pointed sayings, that rather show a playfulness of fancy than any settled malignity. He was steady and inflexible in maintaining the obligations of religion and morality, both from a regard for the order of society, and from a veneration for the Great Source of all order; correct, nay stern in his taste; hard to please, and easily offended; impetuous and irritable in his temper, but of a most humane and benevolent heart, which showed itself not only in a most liberal charity, as far as his circumstances would allow, but in a thousand instances of active benevolence. He was afflicted with a bodily disease which made him restless and fretful, and with a constitutional melancholy, the clouds of which darkened the brightness of his fancy, and gave a gloomy cast to his whole course of thinking: we therefore ought not to wonder at his fallies of impatience and passion at any time, especially when provoked by obtrusive ignorance or presuming petulance; and allowance must be made for his uttering hasty and satirical fallies, even against his best friends. And surely, when it is considered, that "amidst sickness and sorrow," he exerted his faculties in so many works for the benefit of mankind, and particularly that he achieved the great and admirable Dictionary of our language, we must be astonished at his resolution. The solemn text of "him to whom much is given, much will be required," seems to have been ever present to his mind in a rigorous sense, and to have made him dissatisfied with his labours and acts of goodness, however comparatively great; so that the unavoidable consciousness of his superiority was in that respect a cause of disquiet. He suffered so much from this, and from the gloom which perpetually haunted him, and made solitude frightful, that it may be said of him, "If in this life only he had hope, he was of all men most miserable." He loved praise when it was brought to him; but was too proud to seek for it. He was somewhat susceptible of flattery. As he was general and unconfined in his studies, he cannot be considered as master of any one particular science; but he had accumulated a vast and various collection of learning and knowledge, which was so arranged in his mind, as to be ever in readiness to be brought forth. But his superiority over other learned men consisted chiefly in what may be called the art of thinking, the art of using his mind; a certain continual power of seizing the useful substance of all that he knew, and exhibiting it in a clear and forcible manner; so that knowledge which we often see to be no better than lumber in men of dull understanding, was in him true, evident, and actual wisdom. His moral precepts are practical; for they are drawn from an intimate acquaintance with human nature. His maxims carry conviction; for they are founded on the basis of common sense. His mind was so full of imagery, that he might have been perpetually a poet; yet it is remarkable, that however rich his prose is in that respect, the poetical pieces which he wrote were in general not so, but rather strong sentiment and acute observation, conveyed in good verse, particularly in heroic couplets. Though usually grave and even awful in his deportment, he possessed uncommon and peculiar powers of wit and humour: he frequently indulged himself in colloquial pleasantry; and the heartiest merriment was often enjoyed in his company; with this great advantage, that as it was entirely free from any poisonous tincture of vice or impiety, it was salutary to those who shared in it. He had accustomed himself to such accuracy in his common conversation, that he at all times delivered himself with a force, choice, and elegance of expression, the effect of which was aided by his having a loud voice, and a slow and deliberate utterance. He united a most logical head with a most fertile imagination, which gave him an extraordinary advantage in arguing; for he could reason close or wide, as he saw best for the moment. Exulting in his intellectual strength and dexterity, he could, when he pleased, be the greatest sophist that ever contended in the lists of declamation; and from a spirit of contradiction, and a delight in showing his powers, he would often maintain the wrong side with equal warmth and ingenuity: so that when there was an audience, his real opinions could seldom be gathered from his talk; though when he was in company with a single friend he would discuss a subject with genuine fairness. But he was too conscientious to make error permanent and pernicious, by deliberately writing it; and in all his numerous works, he earnestly inculcated what appeared to him to be the truth. His piety was constant, and was the ruling principle of all his conduct; and the more we consider his character, we shall be the more disposed to regard him with admiration and reverence."

His character as given by Mrs. Piozzi in her "Anecdotes" is drawn with spirit and propriety; though somewhat less favourably.

His stature was remarkably high, and his limbs exceedingly large: his strength was more than common I believe, and his activity had been greater, I have heard, than such a form gave one reason to expect: his features were strongly marked, and his countenance particularly rugged; though the original complexion had certainly been fair, a circumstance somewhat unusual: his sight was near, and otherwise imperfect; yet his eyes, though of a light-gray colour, were so wild, so piercing, and at times so fierce, that fear was, I believe, the first emotion in the hearts of all his beholders. His mind was so comprehensive, that no language but that he used could have expressed its contents; and so ponderous was his language, that sentiments less lofty and less solid than his were, would have been encumbered, not adorned by it.

"Mr. Johnson was not intentionally, however, a pompous converser; and though he was accused of using big words, as they are called, it was only when little ones could not express his meaning as clearly, or when, perhaps, the elevation of the thought would have been disgraced by a dress less superb. He used to say, "that the size of a man's understanding might always be justly measured by his mirth;" and his own was never contemptible. He would laugh at a stroke of genuine humour, or sudden fall of odd absurdity, as heartily and freely as I ever yet saw any man; and though the jest was often such as few felt besides himself, yet his laugh was irresistible, and was observed immediately to produce that of the company, not merely from the notion that it was proper to laugh when he did, but purely out of want of power to forbear it. He was no enemy to splendour of apparel, or pomp of equipage. "Life," he would say, "is barren enough, surely, with all her trappings; let us therefore be cautious how we strip her."

"Of Mr. Johnson's erudition the world has been the judge; and we who produce each a score of his sayings, as proofs of that wit which in him was inexhaustible, resemble travellers, who, having visited Delhi or Golconda, bring home each a handful of oriental pearl, to evince the riches of the Great Mogul.

"As his purse was ever open to alms-giving, so was his heart tender to those who wanted relief, and his soul susceptible of gratitude, and of every kind impression; yet, though he had refined his sensibility, he had not endangered his quiet, by encouraging in himself a solicitude about trifles, which he treated with the contempt they deserve.

"Mr. Johnson had a roughness in his manner which subdued the saucy, and terrified the meek: this was, when I knew him, the prominent part of a character which few durst venture to approach so nearly, and which was for that reason in many respects grossly and frequently mistaken; and it was, perhaps, peculiar to him, that the lofty consciousness of his own superiority, which animated his looks, and raised his voice in conversation, cast likewise an impenetrable veil over him when he said nothing. His talk, therefore, had commonly the complexion of arrogance, his silence of superciliousness. He was, however, seldom inclined to be silent when any moral or literary question was started; and it was on such occasions that, like the sage in Rasselas, he spoke, and attention watched his lips: he reasoned, and conviction closed his periods: if poetry was talked of, his quotations were the readiest; and had he not been eminent for more solid and brilliant qualities, mankind would have united to extol his extraordinary memory. His manner of repeating deserves to be described, though, at the same time, it defeats all power of description; but whoever once heard him repeat an ode of Horace, would be long before they could endure to hear it repeated by another.

"His equity in giving the character of living acquaintance, ought not, undoubtedly, to be omitted in his own, whence partiality and prejudice were totally excluded, and truth alone presided in his tongue; a steadiness of conduct the more to be commended, as no man had stronger likings or aversions. His veracity was indeed, from the most trivial to the most solemn occasions, strict, even to severity; he scorned to embellish a story with fictitious circumstances, which (he used to say), took off from its real value. "A story," says Johnson, "should be a specimen of life and manners;

but if the surrounding circumstances are false, as it is no more a representation of reality, it is no longer worthy our attention."

"For the rest... That beneficence which during his life increased the comforts of so many, may after his death be, perhaps, ungratefully forgotten; but that piety which dictated the serious papers in the Rambler, will be for ever remembered, for ever, I think, revered. That ample repository of religious truth, moral wisdom, and accurate criticism, breathes, indeed, the genuine emanations of its great author's mind, expressed, too, in a style so natural to him, and so much like his common mode of conversing, that I was myself but little astonished when he told me that he had scarcely read over one of those inimitable essays before they went to the press.

"I will add one or two peculiarities more: Though at an immeasurable distance from content in the contemplation of his own uncouth form and figure, he did not like another man much the less for being a coxcomb. Though a man of obscure birth himself, his partiality to people of family was visible on every occasion; his zeal for subordination warm even to bigotry; his hatred to innovation, and reverence for the old feudal times, apparent, whenever any possible manner of showing them occurred. I have spoken of his piety, his charity, and his truth, the enlargement of his heart, and the delicacy of his sentiments; and when I search for shadow to my portrait, none can I find but what was formed by pride, differently modified as different occasions showed it; yet never was pride so purified as Johnson's, at once from meanness and from vanity. The mind of this man was, indeed, expanded beyond the common limits of human nature, and stored with such variety of knowledge, that I used to think it resembled a royal pleasure-ground, where every plant, of every name and nation, flourished in the full perfection of their powers, and where, though lofty woods and falling cataracts first caught the eye, and fixed the earliest attention of beholders, yet neither the trim parterre, nor the pleasing shrubbery, nor even the antiquated evergreens, were denied a place in some fit corner of the happy valley."

His character, as given by Dr. Towers, in his "Essay," appears to have been written under no impressions of prepossession or prejudice, and exhibits a very commendable degree of candour, impartiality, and precision.

"He possessed extraordinary powers of understanding, which were much cultivated by study, and still more by meditation and reflection. His memory was remarkably retentive; his imagination uncommonly vigorous, and his judgment keen and penetrating. He had a strong sense of the importance of religion; his piety was sincere, and sometimes ardent; and his zeal for the interests of virtue was often manifested in his conversation and in his writings. The same energy which was displayed in his literary productions, was exhibited also in his conversation, which was various, striking, and instructive; and, perhaps, no man ever equalled him for nervous and pointed repartees.

"The great originality which sometimes appeared in his conceptions, and the perspicuity and force with which he delivered them, greatly enhanced the value of his conversation, and the remarks that he delivered, received additional weight from the strength of his voice, and the solemnity of his manner. He was conscious of his own superiority; and when in company with literary men, or with those with whom there was any possibility of rivalry or competition, this consciousness was too apparent. With inferiors, and those who readily admitted all his claims, he was often mild and agreeable; but to others, such was often the arrogance of his manners, that the endurance of it required no ordinary degree of patience. He was very dextrous at argumentation; and when his reasonings were not solid, they were at least artful and plausible. His retorts were so powerful, that his friends and acquaintance were generally cautious of entering the lists against him, and the ready acquiescence of those with whom he associated, in his opinions and assertions, probably rendered him more dogmatic than he might otherwise have been. With those, however, with whom he lived, and with whom he was familiar, he was sometimes cheerful and sprightly, and sometimes indulged himself in sallies of wit and pleasantry. He spent much of his time, especially his latter years, in conversation, and seems to have had such an aversion to being left without company, as was sometimes extraordinary in a man possessed of such intellectual powers, and whose understanding had been so highly cultivated.

“ He sometimes discovered much impetuosity of temper, and was too ready to take offence at others; but when concessions were made, he was easily appeased. For those from whom he had received kindness in the earlier part of his life, he seemed ever to retain a particular regard, and manifested much gratitude towards those by whom he had at any time been benefited. He was soon offended with pertness or ignorance; but he sometimes seemed to be conscious of having answered the questions of others with too much roughness, and was then desirous to discover more gentleness of temper, and to communicate information with more suavity of manners. When not under the influence of personal pique, of pride, or of religious or political prejudices, he seems to have had great ardour of benevolence, and, on some occasions, he gave signal proofs of generosity and humanity.

“ He was naturally melancholy, and his views of human life appear to have been habitually gloomy. This appears from his Rasselas, and in many passages of his writings. It was also a striking part of the character of Johnson, that with powers of mind that did honour to human nature, he had weaknesses and prejudices that seemed suited only to the lowest of the species. His piety was strongly tinged with superstition; and we are astonished to find the author of the Rambler expressing serious concern, because he had put milk into his tea on a Good-Friday. His custom of praying for the dead, though unsupported by reason or by Scripture, was a less irrational superstition. Indeed, one of the great features of Johnson's character, was a degree of bigotry, both in politics and in religion, which is now seldom to be met with in persons of a cultivated understanding. Few other men could have been found in the present age, whose political bigotry would have led them to style the celebrated John Hampden “the zealot of rebellion;” and the religious bigotry of the man, who, when at Edinburgh, would not go to hear Dr. Robertson preach, because he would not be present at a Presbyterian assembly, is not easily to be paralleled in this age and in this country. His habitual incredulity with respect to facts, of which there was no reasonable ground for doubt, as stated by Mrs. Piozzi, and which was remarked by Hogarth, was also a singular trait in his character, and especially when contrary to his superstitious credulity on other occasions. To the close of life he was not only occupied in forming schemes of religious reformation, but even to a very late period of it he seems to have been solicitous to apply himself to study with renewed diligence and vigour. It is remarkable, that in his sixty-fourth year, he attempted to learn the Low Dutch language, and in his sixty-seventh year he made a resolution to apply himself vigorously to study, particularly the Greek and Italian tongues.

“ The faults and the foibles of Johnson, whatever they were, are now descended with him to the grave; but his virtues should be the object of our imitation. His works, with all their defects, are a most valuable and important accession to the literature of England. His political writings will probably be little read on any other account, than for the dignity and energy of his style; but his Dictionary, his moral essays, and his productions in polite literature, will convey useful instructions and elegant entertainment, as long as the language in which they are written shall be understood, and give him a just claim to a distinguished rank among the best and ablest writers that England has produced.”

The estimate of his literary character given by Mr. Murphy in his “Essay” is, with a very few exceptions, fair, candid, and just. He sometimes admits his errors and sometimes endeavours to apologize for them. His comparison between Johnson and Addison is excellent; and though long, is of too much value to be withheld.

“ Like Milton and Addison, Dr. Johnson seems to have been fond of his Latin poetry. Those compositions show that he was an early scholar; but his verses have not the graceful ease that gave so much suavity to the poems of Addison. The translation of the Messiah labours under two disadvantages; it is first to be compared with Pope's inimitable performance, and afterwards with the Pollio of Virgil. It may appear trifling to remark, that he has made the letter o, in the word Virgo, long and short in the same line; Virgo, Virgo parit. But the translation has great merit, and some admirable lines. In the Odes there is a sweet flexibility, particularly To his Worthly Friend Dr. Laurence, on Himself at the Theatre, March 8, 1771, the Ode in the Isle of Sky, and that to Mrs. Tzrale, from the same place.

“ His English poetry is such as leaves room to think, if he had devoted himself to the Muses, that he would have been the rival of Pope. His first production in this kind was London, a poem, in imitation of the third satire of Juvenal. The vices of the metropolis are placed in the room of ancient manners. The author had heated his mind with the ardour of Juvenal, and, having the skill to polish his numbers, he, became a sharp accuser of the times. The Vanity of Human Wishes is an imitation of the tenth satire of the same author. Though it is translated by Dryden, Johnson's imitation approaches nearest to the spirit of the original.

“ What Johnson has said of the Tragedy of Cato, may be applied to Irene: “ It is rather a poem in dialogue than a drama; rather a succession of just sentiments in elegant language, than a representation of natural affections. Nothing excites or assuages emotion. The events are expected without solicitude, and are remembered without joy or sorrow. Of the agents we have no care; we consider not what they are doing, nor what they are suffering; we wish only to know what they have to say. It is unaffected elegance, and chill philosophy.”

“ The prologue to Irene is written with elegance, and, in a peculiar strain, shows the literary pride and lofty spirit of the author. The epilogue, we are told in a late publication, was written by Sir William Yonge. This is a new discovery, but by no means probable. When the appendages to a dramatic performance are not assigned to a friend, or an unknown hand, or a person of fashion, they are always supposed to be written by the author of the play. It is to be wished, however, that the epilogue in question could be transferred to any other writer. It is the worst Jeu d'Esprit that ever fell from Johnson's pen.

“ Of his miscellaneous travels and philological dissertations, it will suffice to say, they are the productions of a man who never wanted decorations of language, and always taught his reader to think. The life of the late King of Prussia, as far as it extends, is a model of the biographical style. The review of the “ Origin of Evil” was, perhaps, written with asperity; but the angry epitaph, which it provoked from Soame Jenyns, was an ill-timed resentment, unworthy of the genius of that amiable author.

“ The Rambler may be considered as Johnson's great work. It was the basis of that high reputation which went on increasing to the end of his days. In this collection, Johnson is the great moral teacher of his countrymen; his essays form a body of ethics; the observations on life and manners are acute and instructive; and the papers, professedly critical, serve to promote the cause of literature. It must, however, be acknowledged, that a settled gloom hangs over the author's mind; and all the essays, except eight or ten, coming from the same fountain-head, no wonder that they have the raciness of the soil from which they sprung. Of this uniformity Johnson was sensible. He used to say, that if he had joined a friend or two, who would have been able to intermix papers of a sprightly turn, the collection would have been more miscellaneous, and by consequence, more agreeable to the generality of readers.

“ It is remarkable that the pomp of diction, which has been objected to Johnson, was first assumed in the Rambler. His Dictionary was going on at the same time, and in the course of that work, as he grew familiar with technical and scholastic words, he thought that the bulk of his readers were equally learned, or at least would admire the splendour and dignity of the style. And yet it is well known, that he praised in Cowley the ease and unaffected structure of the sentences. Cowley may be placed at the head of those who cultivated a clear and natural style. Dryden, Tillotson, and Sir William Temple, followed. Addison, Swift, and Pope, with more correctness, carried our language well nigh to perfection.” “ Of Addison, Johnson was used to say, he is the Raphael of essay writers. How he differed so widely from such elegant models, is a problem not to be solved, unless it be true that he took an early tincture from the writers of the last century, particularly Sir Thomas Brown.—Hence the peculiarities of his style, new combinations, sentences of an unusual structure, and words derived from the learned languages. His own account of the matter is, “ when common words were less pleasing to the ear, or less distinct in their signification, I familiarized the terms of philosophy, by applying them to popular ideas.” But he forgot the observation of Dryden: If too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed, not to assist the natives, but to conquer them. There is, it must be admitted, a swell of language, often out of all proportion to the sentiment; but there is, in general, a fulness of mind, and the thought seems to expand with the sound of the words. Determined to discard colloquial barbarisms and licentious idiom, he forgot the elegant simplicity that distinguishes the writings of Addison. He had what Locke calls a round-about view of his subject; and, though he was never tainted like many modern wits, with the ambition of shining in the paradox, he may be fairly called an original thinker. His reading was extensive. He treasured in his mind whatever was worthy of notice; but he added to it from his own meditation. He collected, quæ reconderet, actaque promoveret. Addison was not so profound a thinker. He was born to write, converse, and live with ease; and he found an early patron in Lord Somers. He depended, however, more upon a fine taste, than the vigour of his mind. His Latin poetry shows, that he relished, with a just selection, all the refined and delicate beauties of the Roman classics; and when he cultivated his native language, no wonder that he formed that graceful style, which has been so justly admired; simple, yet elegant; adorned, yet never over-wrought; rich in allusion, yet pure and perspicuous: correct, without labour, and, though sometimes deficient in strength, yet always musical. His essays, in general, are on the surface of life; if ever original, it was in pieces of humour. Sir Roger de Coverly, and the Tory Fox hunter, need not be mentioned. Johnson had a fund of humour but he did not know it; nor was he willing to descend to the familiar idiom and the variety of diction which that mode of composition required. The letter, in the Rambler, No. 12. from a young girl that wants a place, will illustrate this observation. Addison possessed an unclouded imagination, alive to the first objects of nature and of art. He reaches the sublime without any apparent effort. When he tells us, "if we consider the fixed stars as so many oceans of flame, that are each of them attended with a different set of planets; if we still discover new firmaments and new lights, that are sunk further in those unfathomable depths of æther, we are lost in a labyrinth of suns and worlds, and confounded with the magnificence and immensity of nature;" the ease with which this passage rises to an unaffected grandeur, is the secret charm that captivates the reader. Johnson is always lofty; he seems to use Dryden's phrase, to be o'er-inform'd with meaning, and his words do not appear to himself adequate to his conception. He moves in state, and his periods are always harmonious. His Oriental Tales are in the true style of eastern magnificence, and yet none of them are so much admired as the Visions of Mirza. In matters of criticism, Johnson is never the echo of preceding writers. He thinks and decides for himself. If we except the Essays on the Pleasures of Imagination, Addison cannot be called a philosophical critic. His Moral Essays are beautiful; but in that province nothing can exceed the Rambler; though Johnson used to say, that the essays on the burdens of mankind (in the Spectator, No. 558) was the most exquisite he had ever read. Talking of himself, Johnson said, "Gopham Beauclerk has wit, and every thing comes from him with ease; but when I say a good thing, I seem to labour." When we compare him with Addison, the contrast is still stronger. Addison lends grace and ornament to truth; Johnson gives it force and energy. Addison makes virtue amiable; Johnson represents it as an awful duty. Addison insinuates himself with an air of modesty; Johnson commands like a dictator; but a dictator in his splendid robes, not labouring at his plough. Addison is the Jupiter of Virgil, with placid serenity talking to Venus,

"Vultu, quo cælum tempestatesque ferenat."

Johnson is Jupiter tonans: he darts his lightning, and rolls his thunder, in the cause of virtue and piety. The language seems to fall short of his ideas; he pours along, familiarising the terms of philosophy with bold inversions and sonorous periods; but we may apply to him what Pope has said of Homer: "it is the sentiment that swells and fills out the diction, which rises with it, and forms itself about it; like glass in the furnace, which grows to a greater magnitude, as the breath within is more powerful, and the heat more intense."

"The essays written by Johnson in the 'Adventurer,' may be called a continuation of the Rambler. The Idler, in order to be consistent with the assumed character, is written with abated vigour, in a style of ease and unlaboured elegance. It is the Odyssey after the Iliad: Intense thinking would not become the Idler. The first number presents a well-drawn portrait of an idler; and from that character no deviation could be made. Accordingly Johnson forgets his austere manner, and plays us into sense. He still continues his lectures on human life; but he adverts to common occurrence, and is often content with the topic of the day. This account of the Idler may be closed, after observing, that the author's mother being buried on the 23d of January 1759, there is an admirable paper, occasioned by that event, on Saturday the 27th of the same month, No. 41. The reader, if he pleases, may compare it with another fine paper in the Rambler, No. 41, on the conviction that rushes on the mind at the bed of a dying friend.

"Rasselas," says Sir John Hawkins, "is a specimen of our language scarcely to be paralleled; it is written in a style refined to a degree of immaculate purity, and displays the whole force of turgid eloquence." One cannot but smile at this encomium. Rasselas is undoubtedly both elegant and sublime. It is a view of human life, displayed, it must be owned, in gloomy colours. The author's natural melancholy, depressed at the time by the approaching dissolution of his mother, darkened the picture. A tale that should keep curiosity awake by the artifice of unexpected incidents, was not the design of a mind pregnant with better things. He who reads the heads of the chapters, will find that it is not a course of adventures that invites him forward, but a discussion of interesting questions; Reflections on Human Life; the History of Imlac, the Man of Learning; a Dissertation upon Poetry; the Character of a Wife and Happy Man, who discourses with energy on the government of the passions, and on a sudden, when death deprives him of his daughter, forgets all his maxims of wisdom, and the eloquence that adorned them, yielding to the stroke of affliction with all the vehemence of the bitterest anguish. It is by pictures of life, and profound moral reflection, that expectation is engaged and gratified throughout the work. The History of the Mad Astronomer, who imagines that for five years he possessed the regulation of the weather, and that the sun passed from tropic to tropic by his direction, represents in striking colours the sad effects of a disordered imagination. It becomes the more affecting, when we recollect that it proceeds from one who lived in fear of the same dreadful visitation; from one who says emphatically, "Of the uncertainties in our present state, the most dreadful and alarming is the uncertain continuance of reason." The inquiry into the cause of madness, and the dangerous prevalence of imagination, till in time some particular train of ideas fixes the attention, and the mind recurs constantly to the favourite conception, is carried on in a strain of acute observation; but it leaves us room to think that the author was transcribing from his own apprehensions. The discourse on the nature of the soul gives us all that philosophy knows; not without a tincture of superstition. It is remarkable that the vanity of human pursuits was, about the same time, the subject that employed both Johnson and Voltaire; but Candide is the work of a lively imagination, and Rasselas, with all its splendour of eloquence, exhibits a gloomy picture.

"The Dictionary, though in some instances abuse has been loud, and in others malice has endeavoured to undermine its fame, still remains the Mount Atlas of English literature.

Though storms and tempests thunder on its brow,
And ocean's break their billows at its feet,
It stands unmov'd, and glories in its height.

"That Johnson was eminently qualified for the office of a commentator on Shakspeare, no man can doubt; but it was an office which he never cordially embraced. The public expected more than he had diligence to perform; and yet his edition has been the ground on which every subsequent commentator has chose to build. The general observations at the end of the several plays, with great elegance and precision, give a summary view of each drama. The preface is a tract of great erudition and philosophical criticism.

"Johnson's political pamphlets, whatever was his motive for writing them, whether gratitude for his pension, or the solicitation of men in power, did not support the cause for which they were undertaken. They are written in a style truly harmonious, and with his usual dignity of language. When it is said that he advanced positions repugnant to the common rights of mankind, the virulence of party may be suspected. It is, perhaps, true, that in the clamour raised throughout the kingdom,

Johnson over-heated his mind; but he was a friend to the rights of man, and he was greatly superior to the littleness of spirit that might incline him to advance what he did not think and firmly believe.

“The account of his Journey to the Hebrides or Western Isles of Scotland, is a model for such as shall hereafter relate their travels. The author did not visit that part of the world in the character of an antiquary, to amuse us with wonders taken from the dark and fabulous ages; nor as a mathematician, to measure a degree, and settle the longitude and latitude of the several islands. Those who expected such information, expected what was never intended.

In every work regard the writer's end.

Johnson went to see men and manners, mode of life, and the progress of civilization. His remarks are so artfully blended with the rapidity and elegance of his narrative, that the reader is inclined to wish, as Johnson did with regard to Gray, that to travel, and to tell his travels, had been more of his employment.

“We come now to the Lives of the Poets, a work undertaken at the age of seventy, yet the most brilliant, and certainly the most popular of all our author's writings. For this performance he needed little preparation. Attentive always to the history of letters, and by his own natural bias fond of biography, he was the more willing to embrace the proposition of the booksellers. He was versed in the whole body of the English poetry, and his rules of criticism were settled with precision. The facts are related upon the best intelligence, and the best vouchers that could be gleaned, after a great lapse of time. Probability was to be inferred from such materials as could be procured, and no man better understood the nature of historical evidence than Johnson; no man was more religiously an observer of truth. If his history is any where defective, it must be imputed to the want of better information, and the errors of uncertain tradition.

Ad nos vix tenuis famæ prelabitur aura.

If the strictures on the works of the various authors are not always satisfactory, and if erroneous criticism may sometimes be suspected, who can hope, that in matters of taste all shall agree? The instances in which the public mind has differed from the positions advanced by the author, are few in number. It has been said, that justice has not been done to Swift; that Gay and Prior are undervalued; and that Gray has been harshly treated. This charge, perhaps, ought not to be disputed. Johnson, it is well known, had conceived a prejudice against Swift. His friends trembled for him when he was writing that life, but were pleased, at last, to see it executed with temper and moderation. As to Prior, it is probable that he gave his real opinion, but an opinion that will not be adopted by men of lively fancy. With regard to Gray, when he condemns the apostrophe, in which Father Thames is desired to tell who drives the hoop or tosses the ball, and then adds, that Father Thames had no better means of knowing than himself; when he compares the abrupt beginning of the first stanza of the “Bard” to the ballad of “Johnny Armstrong,” “Is there ever a man in all Scotland;” there are, perhaps, few friends of Johnson, who would not wish to blot out both the passages.”

The following quotation from Horace is given by Mr. Murphy as containing Johnson's picture in miniature.

“Iracundior est paulo minus aptus acutis
Nasibus horum hominum, rideri possit, eo quid
Rusticus totum tæga defluit, et male laxus
In pede calceus hæret. At est bonus, ut melior vir
Non alius quisquam; at tibi amicus, at ingenium ingens
Inculto latet hoc sub corpore.”

His moral and literary character has been delineated by Miss Seward the poetess of Litchfield, in the “European Magazine” for 1785, with equal accuracy of discrimination and strength of colouring.

“Dr. Johnson's learning and knowledge were deep and universal. His conception was so clear, and his intellectual stores were marshalled with such precision, that his style in common conversation equalled that of his moral essays. Whatever charge of pedantic stiffness may have been brought against those essays, by prejudice, or by personal resentment, they are certainly not less superior to all other English compositions of that sort, in the happy fertility and effluence of imagination, harmony of period, and luminous arrangement of ideas, than they are in strength of expression, and force of argument. His Latinisms, for which he has been much censured, have extended the limits of our native dialect, besides enriching its sounds with that sonorous sweetness, which the intermixture of words from a more harmonious language must necessarily produce; I mean in general, for it cannot be denied that they sometimes deform the Johnsonian page, though they much oftener adorn it. His London is a very brilliant and nervous satiric poem, and his Vanity of Human Wishes appears to me a much finer satire than the best of Pope's. Perhaps its poetic beauty is not excelled by any composition in heroic rhyme which this country can boast, rich as she is in that species of writing. As a moralist, Dr. Johnson was respectable, splendid, sublime; but as a critic, the faults of his disposition have disgraced much of his fine writings with frequent paradox, unprincipled misrepresentation, mean and needless exposure of bodily infirmities (as in the life of Pope), irreconcilable contradictions, and with decisions of the last absurdity. Dr. Johnson had strong affections where literary envy did not interfere; but that envy was of such deadly potency, as to load his conversation, as it has loaded his biographic works, with the rancour of party violence, with national aversion, bitter sarcasm, and unchristian-like invective. It is in vain to descant upon the improbability that Dr. Johnson, under the consciousness of abilities so great, and of a fame so extensive, should envy any man, since it is more than improbable, it is wholly impossible, that an imagination so sublime, and a judgment so correct, on all abstract subjects, should decide as he has decided upon the works of some, who were at least his equals, and upon one who is yet greater than himself. Dr. Johnson was a furious Jacobite while one hope for the Stuart line remained; and his politics, always leaning towards despotism, were inimical to liberty, and the natural rights of mankind. He was punctual in his devotions; but his religious faith had much more of bigot-fierceness than of that gentleness which the gospel inculcates. To those who had never entered the literary confines, or, entering them, had paid him the tribute of unbounded praise and total subjection, he was an affectionate and generous friend, soothing in his behaviour to them, and active in promoting their domestic comforts; though, in some spleenful moments, he could not help speaking disrespectfully both of their mental powers and of their virtues. His pride was infinite; yet, amidst all the overbearing arrogance it produced, his heart melted at the sight, or at the representation, of disease and poverty; and, in the hours of affluence, his purse was ever open to relieve them. In several instances his affections seemed unaccountably engaged by people of whose disposition and abilities he scrupled not to speak contemptuously at all times, and in all humours. To such he often devoted, and especially of late years, a large portion of that time which might naturally be supposed to have been precious to him, who so well knew how to employ it. When his attention was called to modern writings, particularly if they were celebrated, and not written by any of his "little senate," he generally listened with angry impatience. "No, Sir, I shall not read the book," was his common reply. He turned from the compositions of rising genius with a visible horror, which too plainly proved, that envy was the bosom serpent of this literary despot, whose life had been unpolled by licentious crimes, and who had some great and noble qualities, accompanying a stupendous reach of understanding."

His character, as a poetical biographer, has been given by his townsman Dr. Newton in his posthumous work, not perhaps with his powers, but with his decision and severity of censure.

"Dr. Johnson's Lives of the Poets afford much amusement, but candour was hurt and offended at the malevolence that preponderated in every part. Never was any biographer more sparing of his praises, or more abundant in his censures. He delights more in exposing blemishes, than in recommending beauties; slightly passes over excellencies, enlarges upon imperfections; and, not content with his own severe reflections, revives old scandal, and produces large quotations from the long-forgotten works of former critics. The panegyrist of Savage in his youth, may, in his old age, become the satirist of the most favoured authors, his encomium as unjust and undeserved as his censures."

The testimony of the classical editor of Milton may be compared with the eulogy pronounced by Dr. Parr, the learned and eloquent editor of "Bellendenus" in his edition of "Tracts by Warburton and a Warburtonian."

"Of literary merit, Johnson, as we all know, was a sagacious but a most severe judge. Such was his discernment, that he pierced into the most secret springs of human actions; and such was his integrity, that he always weighed the moral characters of his fellow creatures in the balance of the sanctuary."

IN IMITATION OF THE THIRD SATIRE OF JUVENAL, 1738.

“ — Quis ineptæ

“ Tam patiens urbis, tam ferreus ut teneat se?”

(a) THOUGH grief and fondness in my breast rebel
When injur'd Thales bids the town farewell,
Yet still my calmer thoughts his choice commend,
I praise the hermit, but regret the friend,
Resolv'd at length, from vice and London far,
To breathe in distant fields a purer air.
And, fix'd on Cambria's solitary shore,
Give to St. David one true Britain more.

(b) For who wou'd leave, unbrib'd, Hibernia's
land,

Or change the rocks of Scotland for the Strand?
There none are swept by sudden fate away,
But all whom hunger spares, with age decay:
Here malice, rapine, accident, conspire,
And now a rabble rages, now a fire;
Their ambush here relentless ruffians lay,
And here the fell attorney prowls for prey;
Here falling houses thunder on your head,
And here a female atheist talks you dead.

(c) While Thales waits the wherry that contains
Of dissipated wealth the small remains,
On Thame's banks, in silent thought we stood,
Where Greenwich smiles upon the silver flood;
Struck with the feat that gave Eliza * birth,
We kneel, and kiss the consecrated earth;

In pleasing dreams the blissful age renew,
And call Britannia's glories back to view;
Behold her cross triumphant on the main,
The guard of commerce, and the dread of Spain;
Ere masquerades debauch'd, excise oppress'd,
Or English honour grew a standing jest.

A transient calm the happy scenes bestow,
And for a moment lull the sense of woe.
At length awaking, with contemptuous frown,
Indignant Thales eyes the neighb'ring town.

(d) Since worth, he cries, in these degen'rate days
Wants ev'n the cheap reward of empty praise;
In those curs'd walls, devote to vice and gain,
Since unwarded science toils in vain;
Since hope but soothes to double my distress,
And ev'ry moment leaves my little less;
While yet my steady steps no (e) staff sustains,
And life still vig'rous revels in my veins;
Grant me, kind Heaven, to find some happier
place,

Where honesty and sense are no disgrace;
Some pleasing bank where verdant oifers play,
Some peaceful vale with nature's paintings gay;
Where once the haras'd Briton found repose,
And safe in poverty desy'd his foes:

Some secret cell, ye pow'rs, indulgent give,
(f) Let — live here, for — has learn'd to live.
Here let those reign, whom pensions can incite
To vote a patriot black, a courtier white;
Explain their country's dear-bought rights away,
And plead for * pirates in the face of day;
